As your worſhips well know, it was my chance to be brought up under my lord of Canterbury my maſter, in writing of the eccleſiaſtical affairs of this realm, as well concerning reformation of corrupt religion, as concerning the advancement of that pure and ſincere religion received by the doctrine of the goſpel; which I take to be ſo ſubſtantially handled and built upon the doctrine of the prophets and apoſtles, that hell-gates ſhall never prevail againſt it. The conſideration whereof compelled me, being a farmer of the parſonage of Chartham in Kent, to retain with me one named Richard Turner, a man not only learned in the ſcriptures of God, but alſo in converſation of life towards the world irreprehenſible, whom for diſcharging of my conſcience I placed at Chartham aforeſaid, to be curate there.

This man, becauſe he was a ſtranger in the country there, and ſo thereby void of grudge or diſpleaſure of any old rancour in the country, I thought it had been a mean to have gotten him the better credit in his doctrine; but where malice once taketh fire againſt truth, no policy I ſee is able to quench it. Well, this man as he knew what appertained to his office, ſo he ſpared not weekly both Sundays and holidays to open the goſpel and epiſtle unto his audience after ſuch a ſort, when occaſion ſerved, that as well by his vehement inveighing againſt the biſhop of Rome's uſurped power and authority, as in the earneſt ſetting forth and advancing of the king's majeſty's ſupremacy, innumerable of the country reſorting unto his ſermons, changed their opinions, and favoured effectually the religion received. The confluence of the people ſo daily increaſed, that the church being a fair, ample, and large church, was not now and then able to receive the number. The fame of this new inſtruction of the people was ſo blazed abroad, that the popiſh prieſts were wonderfully mazed and diſpleaſed, to ſee their pope ſo to be defaced, and their prince ſo highly advanced.

Now thought they it is high time for us to work, or elſe all will here be utterly loſt by this man's preaching: ſome of them went with capons, ſome with hens, ſome with chickens, ſome with one thing, ſome with another, unto the juſtices, ſuch as then favoured their cauſe and faction, and ſuch as were no ſmall fools, as Sir John Baker, Sir Chriſtopher Hales, Sir Thomas Moile, knights, with other juſtices. The prebendaries of Chriſt-church in Canterbury were made privy hereof, giving their ſuccour and aid thereunto. So that in concluſion poor Turner, and other preachers, were grievouſly complained of unto the king's majeſty. Whereupon my lord of Canterbury, and certain other commiſſioners, were appointed at Lambeth to ſit upon the examination of theſe ſeditious preachers. Howbeit, before Turner went up to his examination, I obtained of Sir Thomas Moile, that he in Eaſter-week was content to hear Turner preach a rehearſal ſermon in his pariſh church at Weſtwell, of all the doctrine of his ſermons preached at his cure in Chartham: which he moſt gently granting, heard Turner both before noon and after noon on the Wedneſday in Eaſter-week laſt, and as it ſeemed, took all things in good part, remitting Turner home to his ſaid cure with gentle and favourable words. I ſuppoſed by this means to have ſtayed Mr. Turner at home from further examination, hoping that Sir Thomas Moile would have anſwered for him at Lambeth before the commiſſioners. Notwithſtanding, after Mr. Moile's coming to London, ſuch information was laid in againſt Turner, that he was ſent for to make anſwer himſelf before the ſaid commiſſioners; and there appearing before them, he made ſuch an honeſt, perfect, and learned anſwer unto the articles objected, that he was with a good exhortation, diſcharged home again, without any manner of recantation or other injunction.

Now when the pope-catholic clergy of Kent underſtood of his coming home without controlment, ſo that he preached as freely as he did before, againſt their blind and dumb ceremonies, ſtraightway by the help of Stephen Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, they found a new means to put him to utter confuſion, deviſing that he came home from examination in ſuch glorious pomp by the high-ways ſide in the woods adjoining, that five hundred perſons met him then with banquetting diſhes to welcome him home, ſtirring the people rather to an uproar and commotion, than to keep them in any quiet obedience: when in very deed, contrary to this ſurmiſe, (as God would) on this ſide Rocheſter a mile or two, for avoiding all ſuch light and glorious talk with any his familiars or acquaintance, he of purpoſe left the high way, and came through the woods all alone above eighteen miles together on foot, ſo wearied and meagered for want of ſuſtenance, that when he came into my houſe at Chartham, he was not well able to ſtand or ſpeak for faintneſs and thirſt.

This malicious tale being reported to the king's highneſs, his majeſty was ſo ſore grieved therewith, that he ſent for the archbiſhop of Canterbury, willing him to cauſe Turner to be whipped out of the country. By means whereof the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſent again for Turner: I hearing thereof immediately made report by my letters, with ſuch vehemency proving it mere malice, that the archbiſhop underſtanding the truth, pacified again the king's wrath. Home cometh Turner once again to his cure without blot: which ſo wrung the papiſts, in that they could not prevail, that they thought it all in vain any further to attempt againſt him concerning any accuſation for matters in Kent, the archbiſhop of Canterbury being his ordinary. Well, yet they would not thus leave him undiſcredited. Then was there one new matter deviſed, how that he had preached erroneus doctrine in other countries before he came into Kent, laying to his charge that he had both tranſlated the maſs into Engliſh, and ſaid or miniſtered the ſame, and that he had preached againſt purgatory, pilgrimage, and praying for the dead, &c. By means whereof, he was now convented before the whole council by the biſhop of Wincheſter, who ſent Syriake Petite, gentleman, for him, who brought him up to London bound (as I heard ſay), and being examined before the ſaid biſhop of Wincheſter and others, he was committed to ward for a ſeaſon.

In the mean time, the archbiſhop of Canterbury being in Kent about the trial of a conſpiracy propoſed againſt himſelf by the juſtices of the ſhire and the prebendaries of Chriſt-church: Turner is now ſent down to the archbiſhop, to the intent he ſhould recant that doctrine which long ago he in other places out of Kent had preached, to the utter ſubverſion and defacing of all that he had moſt godly and earneſtly here in Kent taught, both to the glory of God, and the furtherance and ſetting forth of the king's highneſs's proceedings. If his majeſty will thus permit learned honeſt men thus daily to be over-crowned and trodden under foot with a ſort of tyrannous or rather traiterous papiſts (who cannot abide to hear his majeſty's ſupremacy advanced, nor the ſincere word of God preached), it were better for men to dwell amongſt the infidels and miſcreants than in England.

What reaſon is this, that Turner ſhould recant here in Kent the doctrine which in other countries he hath taught, to the wounding and overthrowing moſt deſperately of five hundred men's conſciences and above, (I dare ſay), who lately by his ſincere preaching have embraced a right good opinion both of the king's ſupremacy, and alſo of the reformed religion received? All good ſubjects may well lament the king's majeſty's eſtate in this behalf, that no man may dare to be ſo bold to advance his highneſs's title, but that every ignorant and malicious papiſt ſhall ſpurn againſt him, ſeeking his utter undoing, and that by the aid of papiſtical juſtices ſet in authority. I beſeech your worſhips to pardon me of my rude and homely terms. They herein deſerve worſe, if worſe may be deviſed. For what honeſt man can bear with this, that ſo noble a prince's ears ſhall be thus impudently abuſed with manifeſt lyes and fables, as this one is of Turner's coming home in ſuch triumph as they craftily and falſly had deviſed? It is eaſily to be eſpied what they mean and go about, that, the prince being alive, dare take in hand ſo uncourteouſly to abuſe both the gentle nature of the prince, and his godly preacher, the advancer and extoller of his juſt authority.

What think your worſhips they would attempt if his majeſty were at God's mercy (as God foreſend that ever any of us ſhould ſee that day, without better reformation) that can dally with his highneſs, blinding his eyes with miſts, whilſt he liveth and reigneth amongſt us in moſt proſperity? As for my lord of Canterbury, he dare nothing do for the poor man's delivery, he hath done ſo much for him already. And his grace hath told me plainly, that it is put into the king's head, that he is the maintainer and ſupporter of all the heretics within the realm; nor will he permit me or my neighbours to reſort unto the council for his purgation while he is at Chartham, ſaving only I have obtained this at his hand, that I may become a ſuiter in writing to my friends and good maſters in the court for his delivery.

And therefore it is (right worſhipful) that I have now taken pen in hand, thus to diſcourſe and open our miſery unto you concerning the extreme handling of this poor honeſt man, Mr. Turner, that if it may poſſibly be brought to paſs by your godly wiſdom, the poor man may be releaſed and diſcharged of his recantation; you cannot do to God and your prince a more acceptable ſervice in my poor opinion. For otherwiſe if he ſhould be driven to recant (as I am ſure he will ſooner die), both the cauſe of God and the king will ſuffer no ſmall detriment amongſt his poor loving ſubjects here. For if there be no better ſtay for the maintainance of theſe godly preachers, the king's authority concerning his ſupremacy ſhall lie poſt alone hidden in the Act of parliament, and not in the hearts of his ſubjects.

If they can bring to paſs that Turner may recant, to the defacing of his good doctrine preached here, then have they that for which they have thus long travelled. And yet in effect ſhall not Turner recant, but king Henry the eighth in Turner's perſon ſhall moſt odiouſly recant, to the wounding of all men's conſciences here. If the king's majeſty do not eſteem his authority given to his highneſs by God's word and his parliament; it were well done that the preachers had good warning to talk no more to the people thereof, rather than to be toſſed and troubled for doing their duties by the members of Antichriſt.

And now to the intent that they might effectually for ever ſlander Turner's doctrine here, they have indicted him for offending againſt the ſix articles this laſt ſeſſions, by the witneſs of two papiſts of the pariſh of Chartham his utter enemies, Saunders and Brown by name, for a ſermon preached at Chartham on Paſſion-Sunday, which chanced on St. Gregory's even, they both being abſent that day at Wye fair, as it is well proved, namely, for that he preached againſt the maſs: ſaying, that our Saviour Chriſt was the only ſole prieſt, which ſung maſs on the altar of the croſs, there ſacrificing for the ſins of the world once for ever, and that all other maſſes were but remembrances and thankſgiving for that one ſacrifice; or ſuch words in effect.

Wherefore to conclude (right worſhipful) knowing your godly zeals, as well towards the preferment of ſincere religion, as your no leſs affection towards the king's perſon and his godly proceedings, I moſt humbly beſeech you, in the bowels of our Saviour Chriſt, ſo to ponder the weighty conſideration of the premiſes, as by your travels unto the king's majeſty, or to the honourable council, we here in Kent, that have now of late our hearts bent towards the obſervation of the law of God and the prince, through Turner's godly perſuaſions, may receive from your worſhips ſome comfortable words of his deliverance; or certainly many an honeſt and ſimple man, lately embracing the truth, may perhaps fall away deſperately from the ſame, not without danger of their ſouls. In accompliſhing whereof your worſhips ſhall not only do unto Almighty God and the prince moſt true and acceptable ſervice; but alſo the ſaid Mr. Turner, with all others to whom this cauſe doth appertain, both daily to pray for your proſperities, and alſo to be at your commandments during their lives. From Canterbury the ſecond day of November.

Your worſhips evermore at command,

R. M.

And thus much containeth the letter ſent (as is ſaid) by Mr. Morice to Dr. Butts and Sir Anthony Deny. Now, what ſucceſs and ſpeed this letter had, hereafter ſhall be declared. For Dr. Butts, the king's phyſician aforeſaid, after the receipt of theſe letters, conſidering the weighty contents of the ſame, as he was ever a forward friend in the goſpel's cauſe, ſo he thought not to foreſlack this matter to the uttermoſt of his diligence, and ſo watching his opportunity, when the king was in trimming and in waſhing (as his manner was at certain times to call for his barber), Dr. Butts (whoſe manner was at ſuch times ever to be preſent, and with ſome pleaſant conceits to refreſh and ſolace the king's mind), brought with him in his hand this letter. The king aſking what news, Dr. Butts pleaſantly and merrily beginneth to inſinuate to the king the effect of the matter, and ſo at the king's command read out the letter; which when the king had heard, and pauſed a little thereon, commanded the letter to be read again. The hearing and conſideration whereof ſo altered the king's mind, that whereas before he commanded the ſaid Turner to be whipped out of the country, he now commanded him to be retained as a faithful ſubject. And here of that matter an end. Let us now return to the archbiſhop again.

Who although he was encompaſſed about (as is ſaid) with mighty enemies, and by many crafty trains impugned, yet through God's more mighty providence, working in the king's heart ſo to favour him, he rubbed out all king Henry's time without blemiſh or foil, by means of the king's protection; who not only defended the ſaid archbiſhop againſt ſuch conſpired adverſaries, but alſo extended ſuch ſpecial favour in ſuch a manner, that he not being ignorant of his wife, whom he had married before at Norembergege, (being neice to the wife of Oſiander), keeping her alſo during their ſix articles time contrary to law, notwithſtanding he both permitted the ſame, and kept his counſel.

Then after the death of king Henry, immediately ſucceeded his ſon king Edward, under whoſe government and protection the ſtate of this archbiſhop, being his godfather, was not impaired, but rather more advanced.

During all this mean time of king Henry aforeſaid, until the entering in of king Edward, it ſeemed that Cranmer was ſcarcely yet thoroughly perſuaded in the right knowledge of the ſacrament, or at leaſt was not yet fully ripened in the ſame: wherein ſhortly after he being more groundedly confirmed by conference with biſhop Ridley, in proceſs of time did ſo profit in more ripe knowledge, that at laſt he took upon him the defence of that whole doctrine, that is, to refute and throw down firſt the corporal preſence; ſecondly, the fantaſtical tranſubſtantiation; thirdly, the idolatrous adoration; fourthly, the falſe error of the papiſts, that wicked men do eat the natural body of Chriſt; and laſtly, the blaſphemous ſacrifice of the maſs. Whereupon in the concluſion he wrote five books for the public inſtruction of the church of England, which inſtruction to this day ſtandeth, and is received in the church of England.

Againſt theſe five books of the archbiſhop, Stephen Gardiner, the arch-enemy to Chriſt and his goſpel, being then in the Tower, ſtubbereth up a certain anſwer, ſuch as it was, which he in open court exhibited at Lambeth, being there examined by the archbiſhop aforeſaid, and other the king's commiſſioners in king Edward's days, which book was intitled, "An explication and "aſſertion of the true catholic faith, touching the bleſ-"ſed ſacrament of the altar, with a confutation of a "book written againſt the ſame.

Againſt this explication, or rather cavilling ſophiſtication of Stephen Gardiner doctor of law, the archbiſhop of Canterbury learnedly and copiouſly replied again, which alſo he publiſhed abroad to the eyes and judgments of all men.

The unquiet ſpirit of Stephen Gardiner being not yet contented, after all this thruſteth out another book in Latin of the like popoſh argument, but after another title, named, Marcus Antonius Conſtantinus. Whereunto firſt the archbiſhop again intending a full confutation, had already abſolved three parts of his anſwer lying in priſon. Of which parts two periſhed in Oxford; the other yet remaineth in my hands ready to be ſeen and ſet forth, as the Lord ſhall ſee good. Alſo biſhop Ridley lying likewiſe the ſame time in priſon, having there the ſaid book of Marcus Antonius, for lack of pen and paper, with a lead of a window, in the margin of the book wrote annotations, as ſtraightneſs of time would ſerve him, in refutation of the ſame book. And finally, becauſe theſe worthy martyrs had neither liberty nor leiſure to go through with that travail, that which lacked in them, for accompliſhment of that behalf, was ſupplied ſhortly after by Peter Martyr, who abundantly and ſubſtantially hath overthrown that book in his learned defence of the truth, againſt the falſe ſophiſtication of Marcus Antonius aforeſaid.

Beſides theſe books above cited of this archbiſhop, divers other things there were alſo of his doing, as the book of the reformation, the catechiſm, with the book of homilies, whereof part was by him contrived, part by his procurement approved and publiſhed. Whereunto alſo may be adjoined another writing or confutation of his againſt 88 articles by the convocation deviſed and propounded, but yet not ratified nor received in the reign of king Henry the eighth.

And thus much concerning the actions of this archbiſhop of Canterbury, during the lives of king Henry VIII. and of king Edward his ſon. During whoſe lives this archbiſhop lacked no ſtay of maintenance againſt all his maligners.

After this king Edward, a prince of moſt worthy qualifications, falling ſick, when he perceived that his death was at hand, and the force of his painful diſeaſe would not ſuffer him to live longer, and knowing that his ſiſter Mary was wholly wedded to the popiſh religion, bequeathed the ſucceſſion of this realm to the lady Jane (a lady of great birth, but of greater learning, being neice to king Henry the eighth by his ſiſter), by conſent of the council and lawyers of this realm. To this teſtament of the king's, when all the nobles of the realm, eſtates and judges had ſubſcribed, they ſent for the archbiſhop, and required him that he alſo would ſubſcribe. But he excuſing himſelf on this manner, ſaid, That it was otherwiſe in the teſtament of king Henry his father, and that he had ſworn to the ſucceſſion of Mary, as then the next heir; by which oath he was ſo bound, that without manifeſt perjury he could not go from it.

The council anſwered, that they were not ignorant of that, and that they had conſcience as well as he; and moreover, that they were ſworn to that teſtament, and therefore he ſhould not think there was any danger therein, or that he ſhould be in more peril or perjury than the reſt.

To this the archbiſhop anſwered, that he was judge of no man's conſcience but his own; and therefore as he would not be prejudicial to others, ſo he would not commit his conſcience unto other men's facts, or caſt himſelf into danger, ſeeing that every man ſhould give account of his own conſcience, and not of other men's. And as concerning ſubſcription, before he had ſpoken with the king himſelf, he utterly refuſed to do it.

The king therefore being demanded of the archbiſhop concerning this matter, ſaid, That the nobles and lawyers of this realm counſelled him unto it, and perſuaded him that the bond of the firſt teſtament could nothing hinder, but that this lady Jane might ſucceed him as heir, and the people without danger acknowledge her as their queen. Who then demanding leave of the king that he might firſt talk with certain lawyers that were in the court; when they all agreed, that by the law of the realm it might be ſo, returning to the king, with much ado he ſubſcribed.

Well, not long after this king Edward died, being almoſt ſixteen years old, to the great ſorrow, but greater calamity of the whole realm. After whoſe deceaſe immediately it was commanded that the lady Jane (who was unwilling thereto), ſhould be proclaimed queen. Which thing the common people much miſliked, not that they did ſo much favour the lady Mary, before whom they ſaw the lady Jane preferred, as for the hatred conceived againſt ſome whom they could not favour.

Beſides this, there happened alſo other cauſes of diſcord between the nobles and commons the ſame time: for what injuries of commons and encloſures wrongfully held, with other inordinate pollings and uncharitable dealing between the landlords and tenants, I cannot tell. But, in fine, thus the matter fell out, that the lady Mary hearing of the death of her brother, and ſhifting for herſelf, was ſo aſſiſted by the commons, that ſhe ſoon prevailed. Who being eſtabliſhed in the poſſeſſion of the realm, not long after came to London: and after ſhe had firſt cauſed the two fathers, the duke of Northumberland and the duke of Suffolk to be beheaded (as has been already related), ſhe likewiſe cauſed the lady Jane, being both in age tender, and innocent from this crime, after ſhe could by no means be turned from the conſtancy of her faith, together with her huſband, to be beheaded.

The reſt of the nobles paying fines, were forgiven, the archbiſhop of Canterbury only excepted: who tho' he deſired pardon (by means of his friends) could obtain none; inſomuch that the queen would not once vouchſafe to ſee him. For as yet the old grudge againſt the archbiſhop for the divorcement of her mother, remained hid in the bottom of her heart. Beſides this divorce ſhe remembered the ſtate of religion changed; all which was imputed to the archbiſhop as the cauſe thereof.

While theſe things were in doing, a rumour was in all men's mouths, That the archbiſhop, to curry favour with the queen, had promiſed to ſay a Dirige maſs after the old cuſtom, for the funeral of king Edward her brother. Neither wanted there ſome who reported that he had already ſaid maſs at Canterbury; which maſs indeed was ſaid by Dr. Thornton. This rumour Cranmer thinking ſpeedily to ſtay, gave forth a writing of his purgation; the tenor whereof being before expreſſed, (p. 70.) I need not here again to recite.

This bill being thus written, and lying openly in a window in his chamber, cometh in by chance Mr. Story, then biſhop of Roche ſter, who after he had read and and peruſed the ſame, required the archbiſhop to have a copy of the bill. The archbiſhop granted the ſame, and Mr. Story lending it to another friend, there were divers copies taken, and the thing publiſhed abroad among the common people, inſomuch that almoſt every ſcrivener's ſhop was occupied in copying out the ſame: and ſo at length ſome of theſe copies coming to the biſhops and ſo brought to the council, and they ſending it to the commiſſioners, the matter was known, and ſo he commanded to appear.

Whereupon Dr. Cranmer appeared at the very day prefixed, before the ſaid commiſſioners, bringing a true inventory, as he was commanded, of all his goods. That done, a biſhop of the queen's privy council, being one of the ſaid commiſſioners, after the inventory was received, bringing in mention of the bill: My lord, ſaid he, there is a bill put forth in your name, wherein you ſeem to be aggrieved with ſetting up the maſs again; we doubt not you are ſorry that it is gone abroad.

To whom the archbiſhop anſwered, As I do not deny myſelf to be the author of that bill or letter, ſo muſt I confeſs here unto you, concerning the ſame bill, that I am ſorry that the ſaid bill went from me in ſuch ſort as it did. For when I had written it, Mr. Story got the copy from me, and it is now come abroad, and as I underſtand, the city is full of it. For which I am ſorry, that it is ſo paſſed my hands: for I intended otherwiſe to have made it in a more large and ample manner, and minded to have ſet it on Paul's church door, and on the doors of all the churches in London, with mine own ſeal joined thereunto.

At which words when they ſaw the conſtancy of the man, they diſmiſſed him, affirming that they had no more at preſent to ſay unto him, but that ſhortly he ſhould hear farther. The ſaid biſhop declared afterwards to one of Dr. Cranmer's friends, that notwithſtanding his attainder of treaſon, the queen's determination at that time was, that Cranmer ſhould only have been deprived of his archbiſhopric, and have had a ſufficient living aſſigned him, upon his exhibiting of a true inventory, with commandment to keep his houſe without meddling in matters of religion. But how true that was I have not to ſay. This is certain, that not long after this, he was ſent to the Tower, and ſoon after condemned for treaſon. Notwithſtanding the queen, when ſhe could not honeſtly deny him his pardon, ſeeing all the reſt were diſcharged, and eſpecially, ſeeing he laſt (of all others) ſubſcribed to king Edward's requeſt, and that againſt his own will, releaſed to him his action of treaſon, and accuſed him only of hereſy, which the archbiſhop liked well, and came to paſs as he wiſhed, becauſe the cauſe was not his own, but Chriſt's; not the queen's, but the church's. Thus ſtood the cauſe of Cranmer, till at length it was determined by the queen and the council, that he ſhould be removed from the Tower, where he was priſoner, to Oxford, there to diſpute with the doctors and divines. And privily word was ſent before to them of Oxford to prepare themſelves, and make them ready to diſpute. And although the queen and the biſhops had concluded before what ſhould become of him, yet it pleaſed them that the matter ſhould be debated with arguments, that under ſome honeſt ſhew of diſputation the murder of the man might be covered. Neither could their haſty ſpeed of revenge abide any long delay; and therefore in all haſte he was carried to Oxford.

What this diſputation was, and how it was handled, what were the queſtions and reaſons on both ſides, and alſo touching his condemnation by the univerſity and the prolocutor, becauſe it hath been ſufficiently declared, we intend now therefore to proceed to his final judgment and order of condemnation, which was the 12th day of September 1555, and ſeven days before the condemnation of biſhop Ridley and Mr. Latimer, as is before mentioned The ſtory whereof here followeth, faithfully corrected by the report and narration (coming by chance to our hands) of one who being both preſent thereat, and alſo a devout favourer of the ſee and faction of Rome, can lack no credit (I think) with ſuch who ſeek what they can to diſcredit whatſoever maketh not with their phantaſied religion of Rome.

After the diſputations done and finiſhed in Oxford between the doctors of both univerſities, and the three worthy biſhops, Dr. Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, ye heard then how ſentence condemnatory immediately upon the ſame was adminiſtered againſt them by Dr. Weſton and others of the univerſity; whereby they were judged to be heretics, and ſo committed to the mayor and ſheriffs of Oxford. But foraſmuch as the ſentence given againſt them was void in law (for at that time the authority of the pope was not yet received into the land) therefore a new commiſſion was ſent from Rome, and a new proceſs framed for the conviction of theſe reverend and godly learned men aforeſaid. In which commiſſion, firſt was Dr. James Brooks biſhop of Glouceſter the pope's ſubdelegate, with Dr. Martin and Dr. Story, commiſſioners in the king and queen's behalf for the execution of the ſame. Of which three commiſſioners above-named, as touching Dr. Martin, this by the way is to be underſtood, that although he was uſed for an inſtrument of the pope's ſide to ſerve a turn (whoſe book alſo is extant againſt the lawful marriage of prieſts) yet notwithſtanding neither was he ſo bitter an enemy in this perſecution as other commiſſioners were; and alſo in the time of queen Elizabeth, where divers other doctors of the arches refuſed to be ſworn againſt the pope, he denied not the oath; and yet notwithſtanding not altogether here to be excuſed. But to the purpoſe of this ſtory. Wherefore firſt it ſhall be requiſite to declare the circumſtance, and the whole ſtate of the matter, as in a general deſcription, before we come to their orations, according as in a parcel of a certain letter concerning the ſame it came to our hands.

Imprimis, Here is to be underſtood, that at the coming down of the aforeſaid commiſſioners, which was upon Thurſday the 12th of September 1555. in the church of St. Mary, and in the eaſt end of the ſaid church at the high altar, was erected a ſolemn ſcaffold for biſhop Brooks aforeſaid, repreſenting the pope's perſon, ten foot high. The ſeat was made that he might ſit under the ſacrament of the altar. And on the right hand of the pope's delegate, beneath him ſate Dr. Martin, and on the left hand ſate Dr. Story, the king and queen's commiſſioners, who were both doctors of the civil law; and underneath them other doctors, ſcribes and phariſees alſo, with the pope's collector, and a rabblement of ſuch others.

And thus theſe biſhops being placed in their Pontificalibus, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was ſent for to come before them. He having intelligence of them that were there, thus ordered himſelf. He came forth of the priſon to the church of St. Mary, ſet forth with bills and glieves for fear he ſhould ſtart away, being cloathed in a fair black gown with his hood on both ſhoulders, ſuch as doctors of divinity uſe to wear in the univerſity. Who, after he was come into the church, and did ſee them ſit in their Pontificalibus, he did not put off his cap to any of them, but ſtood ſtill till he was called.

And anon one of the proctors for the pope, or elſe his doctor, called Thomas, archbiſhop of Canterbury, appear here and make anſwer to what ſhall be laid to thy charge; that is to ſay, for blaſphemy, incontinence and hereſy; and make anſwer here to the biſhop of Glouceſter, repreſenting the pope's perſon.

Upon this he being brought nearer unto the ſcaffold where the aforeſaid biſhop ſate, he firſt well viewed the place of judgment, and eſpying where the king and queen's proctors were, putting off his cap, he firſt humbly bowing his knee to the ground, making reverence to the one, and after to the other.

That done, beholding the biſhop in the face, he put on his bonnet again, making no manner of token of obedience towards him at all. Whereat the biſhop being offended, ſaid unto him, that it might beſeem him right well, weighing the authority he did repreſent, to do his duty unto him.

Whereupon Dr. Cranmer anſwered and ſaid, That he had once taken a ſolemn oath, never to conſent to the admitting of the biſhop of Rome's authority into this realm of England again; and that he had done it advisedly, and meant by God's grace to keep it; and therefore would commit nothing, either by ſign or token, which might argue his conſent to the receiving of the ſame; and ſo he deſired the ſaid biſhop to judge of him, and that he did it not for any contempt to his perſon, which he would willingly have honoured as well as any of the others, if his commiſſion had come from as good an authority as theirs. This anſwered he both modeſtly, wiſely, and patiently, with his cap on his head, not once bowing or making any reverence to him that repreſented the pope's perſon, which was wonderfully marked by the people that were there preſent and ſaw it, and marked it as nigh as could be poſſible.

The Oration of Dr. Brooks Biſhop of Glouceſter, unto Dr. Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the Church of St. Mary at Oxford.

WHEN after many means uſed, they perceived that the archbiſhop would not move his bonnet, the biſhop proceeded in theſe words following.

My lord, at this preſent we are come to you as commiſſioners, and for you, not intruding ourſelves by our own authority, but ſent by commiſſion, partly from the pope's holineſs, partly from the king and queen's moſt excellent majeſties, not to your utter diſcomfort, but to your comfort if you will yourſelf. We come, not to judge you, but to put you in remembrance of what you have been, and may be. Neither come we to diſpute with you, but to examine you in certain matters; which being done, to make relation thereof to him that hath power to judge you. The firſt, being well taken, ſhall make the ſecond to be will taken. For if you, of your part be moved to come to a conformity, then ſhall not only we of our ſide take joy of our examination, but alſo they that have ſent us.

And firſt as charity doth move us, I would think good ſomewhat to exhort you, and that by the ſecond chapter of St. John in the Revelations, "Remember from whence thou art fallen, and do the firſt works, or if not," and ſo as ye know what followeth. Remember yourſelf from whence you have fallen. You are fallen from the univerſal and catholic church of Chriſt, from the very true and received faith of all Chriſtendom, and that by open hereſy. You have fallen from your promiſe to God, from your fidelity and allegiance, and that by open preaching, marriage and adultery. You have fallen from your ſovereign prince and queen by open treaſon. Remember therefore from whence you are fallen. Your fall is great, the danger cannot be ſeen. Wherefore, when I ſay, Remember from whence you are fallen, I put you in mind, not only of your fall, but alſo of the ſtate you were in before your fall. You were ſometime, as I and other poor men, in a mean eſtate, God I take to witneſs, I ſpeak it to no reproach or abaſement of you, but to put you in memory, how God hath called you from alow to a high degree, from one degree to another, from better to better, and never gave you over, till he had appointed you an ambaſſador, metropolitan of all England, and paſtor of his own flock: ſuch great truſt did he put you in, in his church; what could he do more? for even as he ordained Moſes to be a ruler over his church of Iſrael, and gave him full authority of the ſame: ſo he did make you over his church of England. And when did he this for you? forſooth, when you gave no occaſion or cauſe of miſtruſt either to him or to his magiſtrates. For although it be conjectured, that in all your time ye were not upright in the honour and faith of Chriſt, but rather ſet up of purpoſe as a fit inſtrument, whereby the church might be ſpoiled and brought into ruin; yet may it appear by many your doings otherwiſe; and I for my part, as it behoveth each one of us, ſhall think the beſt. For who was thought as then more devout? who was more religious in the face of the world? who was thought to have more conſcience of a vow making, and obſerving the order of the church, more earneſt in the defence of the real preſence of Chriſt's body and blood in the ſacrament of the altar than ye were? and then all things proſpered with you; your prince favoured you; yea, God himſelf favoured you; your candleſtick was ſet up in the higheſt place of the church, and the light of your candle was over all the church: I would God it had ſo continued ſtill.

But after ye began to fall by ſchiſm, and would not acknowledge the pope's holineſs, as ſupreme head, but would ſtoutly uphold the unlawful requeſts of king Henry the eighth, and would bear with what ſhould not be borne withal, then began you to fancy unlawful liberty; and when you had exiled a good conſcience, then enſued great ſhipwreck in the ſea, which was out of the true and catholic church caſt into the ſea of deſperation: for, as he ſaith, Without the church there is no ſalvation. When ye had forſaken God, God forſook you, and gave you over to your own will; and ſuffered you to fall from ſchiſm to apoſtacy, from apoſtacy to hereſy, and from hereſy to perjury, from perjury to treaſon, and ſo in concluſion, into the full indignation of our ſovereign prince, which you may think a juſt puniſhment of God for your other abominable opinions.

After that, ye fell lower and lower, and now to the loweſt degree of all, to the end of honour and life. For if the light of your candle be as it hath been hitherto duſky, your candleſtick is like to be removed, and have a great fall, ſo low, and ſo far out of knowledge, that it be quite out of God's favour, and paſt all hope of recovery; for in hell there is no redemption. The danger whereof being ſo great, very pity cauſeth me to ſay, "Remember from whence thou haſt fallen." I add alſo, and whither you fall.

But here peradventure, you will ſay to me, What, Sir, my fall is not ſo great as you make it: I have not yet fallen from the catholic church. For that is not the catholic church that the pope is head of. There is another church. But as touching that I anſwer, You are ſure of that as the Donatiſts were, for they ſaid they had the true church, and that the name of true chriſtians remained only in Africk, where only their ſeditious ſect was preached. And as you think, ſo thought Novatus, That all they that did acknowledge their ſupreme head at the ſee of Rome, were out of the church of Chriſt. But here St. Cyprian defending Cornelius againſt Novatus, Book 2. Epiſt. 6, ſaith on this wiſe, The church is one, which church whereas it is one, it cannot be here and there. So that if Novatus were in the church, then was not Cornelius, who indeed by lawful ſucceſſion ſucceeded pope Fabian. Here St. Cyprian intendeth by the whole proceſs to prove and concludeth thereupon, that the true church was only Rome. Gather you then what will follow of your fall. But you will ſay peradventure, that you fell not by hereſy, and ſo ſaid the Arians, alledging for themſelves that they had ſcripture; and going about to perſuade their ſchiſm by ſcripture; for indeed they had more places by two and forty, which by their torture ſeemed to depend upon ſcripture, than the catholics had.

So did the Marcions provoke their hereſy to ſcripture. But thoſe are no ſcriptures; for they are not truly alledged, nor truly interpreted, but untruly wreſted and wrong, according to their own phantaſies. And therefore were they all juſtly condemned for their wrong taking of the ſcriptures; and the church replieth againſt them, ſaying, What make you here in my heritage? from whence came you? the ſcripture is mine inheritance; I am right heir thereof: I hold it by true ſucceſſion of the apoſtles; for as the apoſtles required me to hold, ſo do I hold it. The apoſtles have received me, and put me in my right, and have rejected you as baſtards, having no title thereunto.

Alſo ye will deny that ye have fallen by apoſtacy, by breaking your vow; and ſo Vigilantius ſaid, inſomuch that he would admit none to his miniſtry, but thoſe who had their wives bagged with children. What now? ſhall we ſay Vigilantius did not fall therefore? Did not Donatus and Novatus fall, becauſe they ſaid ſo, and brought ſcripture for their defence? Then let us believe as we liſt, pretending well, and ſay ſo; nay, there is no man ſo blind that will not ſay ſo: for except the church, which condemneth them for their ſay-ſo, do approve us for to do ſo, then will ſhe condemn you alſo. So that your denial will not ſtand. And therefore I tell you, Remember from whence ye are fallen, and how long you ſhall fall, if you hold on as you do begin. But I truſt you will not continue, but revoke yourſelf in time, and the remedy followeth.

Repent, and do thy firſt works, for by ſuch means as ye have fallen, ye muſt riſe again. Firſt, your heart hath fallen, then your tongue and your pen, and beſides your own damage, hath cauſed many more to fall. Therefore, firſt your heart muſt turn, and then ſhall the tongue and the pen be quickly turned; or elſe I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candleſtick out of its place.

I need not to teach you a method to turn; you know the ready way yourſelf. But I would God I could but exhort you to the right and truth, then the way ſhould ſoon be found out. For if ye remember how many ye have brought by abominable hereſy into the way of perdition, I doubt not but very conſcience would move you, as much for them as for yourſelf, to come again. And ſo would you ſpare neither tongue nor pen, if the heart were once reformed: for as touching that point, the Holy Ghoſt toucheth their hearts very near by the mouth of his holy prophet Ezekiel, when he requireth the blood of his flock at the prieſt's hands, for lack of good and wholeſome food. How much more ſhould this touch your guilty heart, having overmuch diligence to teach them the way of perdition, and feeding them with baggage and corrupt food, which is hereſy; "He that ſhall convert a ſinner from his wicked life, ſhall ſave his ſoul from death, and ſhall cover the multitude of ſins." So that if it be true that he who converteth a ſinner, ſaveth a ſoul: then the contrary muſt needs be true, that he that perverteth a ſoul, and teacheth him the way of perdition, muſt needs be damned.

Origen, on the epiſtle of St. Paul to the Romans, ſaith, The damnation of thoſe that preach hereſy doth increaſe to the day of judgment. The more that periſh by heretical doctrine, the more grievous ſhall their torment be, that miniſter ſuch doctrine. Berengarius, who ſeemed to fear that danger, provided for it in his lifetime, but not without a troubled and diſquiet conſcience. He did not only repent, but recant, and not ſo much for himſelf, as for them whom he had with moſt peſtilent hereſies infected. For as he lay in his death-bed upon Epiphany-day, he demanded of them that were preſent, Is this, quoth he, the day of Epiphany, and appearing of the Lord? They anſwered him, Yea. Then, quoth he, this day ſhall the Lord appear to me, either to my comfort, or to my diſcomfort. This remorſe argueth, that he feared the danger of them whom he had taught, and led out of the faith of Chriſt. Origines upon him ſaith in this wiſe, "Although his own blood was upon his head, for that he did repent, and was ſorry for his former errors, yet being converted, he feared the blood of them whom he had infected, and who received his doctrine."

Let this move you even at the laſt point. Inſomuch as your caſe is not unlike to Berengarius, let your repentance be like alſo. And what ſhould ſtay you, tell me, from this godly return? Fear that you have gone ſo far, ye may not return? Nay, then I may ſay as David ſaid, "Ye fear where ye have no cauſe to fear." For if ye repent, and be heartily ſorry for your former hereſy and apoſtacy, ye need not to fear. For as God of his part is merciful and gracious to the repentant ſinner, ſo is the king, ſo is the queen merciful, which ye may well perceive by your own caſe, ſince ye might have ſuffered a great while ago for treaſon committed againſt her highneſs, but that ye have been ſpared and reſerved upon hope of amendment, which ſhe conceived very good of you; but now, as it ſeemeth, is but a very deſperate hope. And what do you thereby? "According to the hardneſs of your heart ye treaſure up to yourſelf anger in the day of wrath."

Well, what is it then, if fear do not hinder you? ſhame, to unſay that that you have ſaid: Nay, it is no ſhame, unleſs you think it ſhame to agree with the true and the catholic church of Chriſt. And if that be a ſhame, then blame St. Paul, who perſecuted the diſciples of Chriſt with the ſword; then blame St. Peter, who denied his maſter Chriſt with an oath, that he never knew him. St. Cyprian before his return being a witch; St. Auſtin being nine years out of the church. They thought it no ſhame after their return of that they had returned. Shall it then be ſhame for you to convert and conſent with the church of Chriſt? No, no.

What is it then that doth hinder you? Glory of the world? nay, as for the vanity of the world, I for my part judge not in you, being a man of learning and knowing your eſtate.

And as for the loſs of your eſtimation, it is ten to one that where you were archbiſhop of Canterbury, and metropolitan of all England, it is ten to one (I ſay) that ye ſhall be as well ſtill, yea, and rather better.

And as for the winning of good men, there is no doubt but all that be here preſent, and the whole congregation of Chriſt's church alſo, will more rejoice of your return, than they were ſorry for your fall. And as for the other, ye need not to doubt, for they ſhall all come after; and to ſay the truth, if you ſhould loſe them for ever, it were no force, ye ſhould have no leſs thereby at all. I do not here touch them which ſhould confirm your eſtimation. For as St. Paul, after his converſion, was received into the church of Chriſt, with wonderful joy to the whole congregation, even ſo ſhall you be. The fame of your return ſhall be ſpread abroad throughout all Chriſtendom, where your face was never known.

But you will ſay, perhaps, your conſcience will not ſuffer you. My lord, there is a good conſcience, and there is a bad conſcience. The good conſcience have not they, as St. Paul declareth to Timothy concerning Hymeneus and Alexander. The evil and bad conſcience is, ſaith St. Cyprian, well to be known by his mark. What mark? This conſcience is marked with the print of hereſy. This conſcience is a naughty, filthy, and a branded conſcience, which I truſt is not in you. I have conceived a better hope of you than ſo, or elſe would I never go about to perſuade or exhort you. But what conſcience ſhould ſtay you to return to the catholic faith and univerſal church of Chriſt? What conſcience doth ſeparate you to that deviliſh and ſeveral church, to a liberty which never had ground in the holy ſcriptures? If you judge your liberty to be good, then judge you all Chriſtendom to do evil beſides you?

O what a preſumptuous perſuaſion is this, upon this utterly to forſake the church of Chriſt? Under what colour or pretence do you this? for the abuſes? as though in your church were no abuſes: Yes, that there were. And if you forſake the univerſal church for the abuſes, why do you not then forſake your particular church, and ſo be flitting from one to another? That is not the next way, to ſlip from the church for the abuſes; for if you had ſeen abuſes, you would rather have endeavoured for a reformation than for a defection. He is a good chirurgeon, who, for a little pain in the toe, will cut off the whole leg. He helpeth well the tooth-ach, which cutteth away the head by the ſhoulders. It is mere folly to amend abuſes by abuſes. Ye are all like Diogenes; for Diogenes on a time, envying the cleanlineſs of Plato, ſaid on this wiſe, Behold, I tread upon the pride of Plato. Plato anſwered, But with another ſort of pride. So that Diogenes ſeemed more faulty of the two.

But when we have ſaid all that we can, peradventure you will ſay, I will not return. And to that I ſay, I will not anſwer. Nevertheleſs hear what Chriſt ſaith to ſuch obſtinate and ſtiff-necked people in the parable of the ſupper. When he had ſent out his men to call them in that were appointed, and they would not come, he bade his ſervants go into the ways and ſtreets, to Compel men to come in. If then the church will not loſe any member that may be compelled to come in, ye muſt think it good to take the compulſion, leſt you loſe your part of the ſupper which the Lord hath prepared for you, and this compulſion ſtandeth well with charity.

But it may be, perhaps, that ſome hath animated you to ſtick to your tackle, and not to give over, bearing you in hand that your opinion is good, and that ye die in a good quarrel, and God ſhall accept your oblation. But hear what Chriſt ſaith of a meaner gift; If thou come to the altar to offer thy oblation, and knoweſt that thy brother hath ſomewhat to ſay againſt thee, leave there thy gift, and go and be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer up thy gift, or elſe thy brother will make thy offering unſavoury before God. This he ſaid unto all the world, to the end they ſhould know how their offerings ſhould be received, if they were not according.

Remember you therefore, before you offer up your offering, whether your gift be qualified or no. Remember the church of Rome, and alſo of England, where not one only brother, but a number have matter againſt you, ſo juſt, that they will make your burnt-offering to ſtink before God, except you be reconciled. If you muſt needs appoint upon a ſacrifice, make yet a mean firſt to them that have to lay againſt you. I ſay no more than the church hath allowed me to ſay. For the ſacrifice that is offered without the church is not profitable. The premiſes therefore conſidered, for God's ſake, I ſay, "Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do thy firſt works, or elſe I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candleſtick out of his place, except thou repent." Caſt not yourſelf away, ſpare your body, ſpare your ſoul, ſpare them alſo whom you have ſeduced, ſpare the ſhedding of Chriſt's blood for you in vain. Harden not your heart, acknowledge the truth, yield to the preſcript word of God, to the catholic church of Rome, to the received verity of all Chriſtendom. Wed not yourſelf to your own ſelf-will. Stand not too much in your own conceit. Think not yourſelf wiſer than all Chriſtendom is beſides you. Leave off this unjuſt cavil. How? leave what? Leave reaſon, leave wonder, and believe as the catholic church doth believe and teach you. Perſuade with yourſelf, that without the church there is no ſalvation. And thus much have I ſaid of charity.

If this poor ſimple exhortation of mine may ſink into your head, and take effect with you, then have I ſaid as I would have ſaid, otherwiſe not as I would, but as I could for this preſent.

And thus biſhop Brooks, finiſhing his oration, ſat down. After whom, Dr. Martin, taking the matter in hand, beginneth thus.

The Oration of Dr. Martin.

ALBEIT there be two governments, the one ſpiritual, and the other temporal, the one having the keys, and the other the ſword, yet in all ages we read, that for the honour and glory of God, both theſe powers have been adjoined together. For if we read the Old Teſtament, we ſhall find that ſo did Joſias and Ezekias. So did the king of the Ninivites compel a general faſt through all the whole city. So did Darius in breaking the great idol Bell, and delivered godly Daniel out of the den of lions. So did Nebuchadonoſor make and inſtitute laws againſt the blaſphemers of God. But to let paſs theſe examples, with a great number more, and to come to Chriſt's time, it is not unknown what a great travail they took to ſet forth God's honour: and although the rule and government of the church did only appertain to the ſpiritualty, yet for the ſuppreſſion of hereſies and ſchiſms, kings were admitted as aiders thereunto. Firſt, Conſtantine the Great called a council at Nice for the ſuppreſſion of the Arian ſect, where the ſame time was raiſed a great contention among them. And after long diſputation had, when the fathers could not agree upon the putting down the Arians, they referred their judgment to Conſtantine. God forbid, quoth Conſtanſtine; you ought to rule me, and not I you. And as Conſtantine did, ſo did Theodoſius againſt the Neſtorians, ſo did Marcianus againſt Manicheus. Jovinian made a law, that no man ſhould marry with a nun, that had wedded herſelf to the church.

So had king Henry the eighth the title of Defender of the faith, becauſe he wrote againſt Luther and his accomplices. So theſe nine hundred years the king of Spain had the title of Catholic, for the expulſion of the Arians, and to ſay the truth, the king and queen's majeſties do nothing degenerate from their anceſtors, taking upon them to reſtore again the title to be Defender of the faith, to the right heir thereof, the pope's holineſs.

Therefore the two princes, perceiving this noble realm, how it hath been brought from the unity of the true and catholic church, which you and your confederates do and have renounced; perceiving alſo that you do perſiſt in your deteſtable errors, and will by no means be revoked from the ſame, have made their humble requeſt and petition to the pope's holineſs, Paul the fourth, as ſupreme head of the church of Chriſt, declaring to him, that where you were archbiſhop of Canterbury, and metropolitan of England, and at your conſecration took two ſolemn oaths for your due obedience to be given to the ſee of Rome, to become a true preacher or paſtor of his flock; yet contrary to your oath and allegiance, for unity have ſowed diſcord; for chaſtity, marriage and adultery; for obedience, contention; and for faith, ye have been the author of all miſchief. The pope's holineſs, conſidering their requeſt and petition, hath granted them, that according to the cenſure of this realm proceſs ſhould be made againſt you.

And whereas, in this late time, you both excluded charity and juſtice, yet hath his holineſs decreed, that you ſhall have both charity and juſtice ſhewed unto you. He willeth you ſhould have the laws in moſt ample manner to anſwer in your behalf, and that you ſhall here come before my lord of Glouceſter, as high commiſſioner from his holineſs, to the examination of ſuch articles as ſhall be propoſed againſt you, and that we ſhould require the examination of you in the king's and queen's majeſties behalf. The king and queen as touching themſelves, becauſe by the law they cannot appear perſonally [Quia ſunt illuſtriſ. perſonæ] have appointed as their attornies Dr. Story and me. Wherefore here I offer to your good lordſhip our proxy, ſealed with the broad ſeal of England, and offer myſelf to be proctor in the king's majeſty's behalf. I exhibit here alſo certain articles, containing the manifeſt adultery and perjury. Alſo books of hereſy made partly partly by him, partly ſet forth by his authority. And here I produce him as party principal to anſwer to your good lordſhip.

Thus when Dr. Martin had ended his oration, the archbiſhop began as followeth.

Cranmer. Shall I then make my anſwer?

Martin. As you think good, no man ſhall hinder you.

And here the archbiſhop kneeling down on both knees towards the weſt, ſaid firſt the Lord's-prayer. Then riſing up he recited the articles of the creed. Which done, he entereth with his proteſtation in form as followeth.

The Faith and Profeſſion of Dr. Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury before the Commiſſioners.

THIS I do profeſs as touching my faith, and make my proteſtation, which I deſire you to note. I will never conſent that the biſhop of Rome ſhall have any juriſdiction within this realm.

Story. Take a note thereof.

Martin. Mark, Mr. Cranmer, how you anſwer for yourſelf. You refuſe and deny him, by whoſe laws ye do remain in life, being otherwiſe attainted of high-treaſon, and but a dead man by the laws of the realm.

Cranmer. I proteſt before God I was no traitor, but indeed I confeſſed more, at my arraignment, than was true.

Martin. That is not to be reaſoned at this preſent. Ye know ye were condemned for a traitor, and a cauſe determined is taken for a truth. But proceed to your matter.

Cranmer. I will never conſent to the biſhop of Rome, for then ſhould I give myſelf to the devil; for I have made an oath to the king, and I muſt obey the king by God's laws. By the ſcripture the king is chief, and no foreign perſon in his own realm above him. There is no ſubject but to a king. I am a ſubject. I owe my fidelity to the crown. The pope is contrary to the crown. I cannot obey both; for no man can ſerve two maſters at once, as you in the beginning of your oration declared by the ſword and keys, attributing the keys to the pope, and the ſword to the king. But I ſay the king hath both. Therefore he that is ſubject to Rome, and the laws of Rome, he is perjured; for the popes' and the judges' laws are contrary, they are uncertain and confounded.

A prieſt indebted, by the laws of the realm, ſhall be ſued before a temporal judge; by the pope's laws contrary.

The pope doth the king injury, in that he hath his power from the pope. The king is head in his own realm: but the pope claimeth all biſhops, prieſts, curates, &c. So the pope in every realm hath a realm.

Again, by the laws of Rome the benefice muſt be given by the biſhop; by the laws of the realm, the patron giveth the benefice. Herein the laws be as contrary as fire and water.

No man can, by the laws of Rome, proceed in a premunire, and ſo is the law of the realm expelled, and the king ſtandeth accurſed in maintaining his own lands. Therefore in conſideration that the king and queen take their power of him, as though God ſhould give it to them, there is no true ſubject, unleſs he be abrogate, ſeeing the crown is held of him out of the realm.

The biſhop of Rome is contrary to God, and injurious to his laws; for God commandeth all men to be diligent in the knowledge of his law; and therefore hath appointed one holy day in the week, at the leaſt, for the people to come to the church, and hear the word of God expounded unto them; and that they might the better underſtand it, to hear it in their mother tongue which they know. The pope doth contrary; for he willeth the ſervice to be had in the Latin tongue, which they do not underſtand. God would have it to be perceived; the pope will not. When the prieſt giveth thanks, God would that the people ſhould do ſo too, and God will them to confeſs all together, the pope will not.

Now as concerning the ſacrament, I have taught no falſe doctrine of the ſacrament of the altar: for if it can be proved by any doctor above a thouſand years after Chriſt, that Chriſt's body is there really, I will give over. My book was made ſeven years ago, and no man hath brought any authors againſt it. I believe that whoſo eateth and drinketh that ſacrament, Chriſt is within them, whole Chriſt, his nativity, paſſion, reſurrection, and aſcenſion; but not that corporally that ſitteth in heaven.

Now Chriſt commanded all to drink of the cup: the pope taketh it away from the laymen: and yet one ſaith, that if Chriſt had died for the devil, that he ſhould drink thereof. Chriſt biddeth us to obey the king [etiam diſcolo,] the biſhop of Rome biddeth us to obey him; therefore unleſs he be Antichriſt, I cannot tell what to make of him. Wherefore if I ſhould obey him, I cannot obey Chriſt.

He is like the devil in his doings; for the devil ſaid to Chriſt, If thou wilt fall down and worſhip me, I will give thee all the kingdoms of the world. Thus he took upon him to give that which was not his own. Even ſo the biſhop of Rome giveth princes their crowns, being none of his own; for where princes, either by election, either by ſucceſſion, either by inheritance obtain their crown, he ſaith that they ſhould have it from him.

Chriſt ſaith, that Antichriſt ſhall be. And who ſhall he be? Forſooth he that advanceth himſelf above all other creatures. Now if there be none already that hath advanced himſelf after ſuch ſort beſides the pope, then in the mean time let him be Antichriſt.

Story. Pleaſeth it you to make an end?

Cranmer. For he will be the vicar of Chriſt, he will diſpenſe with the Old and New Teſtament alſo, yea and with apoſtacy.

Now I have declared why I cannot with my conſcience obey the pope. I ſpeak not this for hatred I bear to him that now ſupplieth the room, for I know him not. I pray God give him grace not to follow his anceſtors. Neither ſay I this for my defence, but to declare my conſcience for the zeal that I bear to God's word trodden under foot by the biſhop of Rome. I caſt fear apart, for Chriſt ſaid to his apoſtles, that in the latter days they ſhould ſuffer much ſorrow, and be put to death for his name's ſake: fear them not, ſaith he, but fear him which when he hath killed the body, hath power to caſt the ſoul into fire everlaſting. Alſo Chriſt ſaith, that he that will live ſhall die, and he that loſeth his life for my name's ſake, he ſhall find it again, Matt. 16. Moreover he ſaid, confeſs me before men, and be not afraid; for if you do ſo, I will ſtand with you; if you ſhrink from me, I will ſhrink from you, Matt. 8. This is a comfortable and terrible ſaying, this maketh me to ſet all fear apart. I ſay therefore the biſhop of Rome treadeth under foot God's laws and the king's.

The pope would give biſhoprics, ſo would the king. But at the laſt the king got the upper hand, and ſo are all biſhops perjured, firſt to the pope, and then to the king.

The crown hath nothing to do with the clergy. For if a clerk come before a judge, the judge ſhall make proceſs againſt him, but not to execute any laws. For if the judge ſhould put him to execution, then is the king accurſed in maintaining his own laws. And therefore I ſay, that he is neither true to God, neither to the king, that firſt received the pope. But I ſhall heartily pray for ſuch counſellors as may inform her the truth; for the king and queen, if they be well informed, will do well.

Martin. As you underſtand, then if they maintain the ſupremacy of Rome, they cannot maintain England too.

Cranmer. I require you to declare to the king and queen what I have ſaid, and how their oaths do ſtand with the realm and the pope. St. Gregory ſaith, he that taketh upon him to be head of the univerſal church, is worſe than the Antichriſt. If any man can ſhew me, that it is not againſt God's word to hold his ſtirrop when he taketh his horſe, and kiſs his feet, as kings do, then will I kiſs his feet alſo.

And you for your part, my lord, are perjured; for now ye ſit judge for the pope, and yet you did receive your biſhopric of the king. You have taken an oath to be adverſary to the realm; for the pope's laws are contrary to the laws of the realm.

Glouceſter. You were the cauſe that I did forſake the pope, and did ſwear that he ought not to be the ſupreme head, and gave it to king Henry the eighth, that he ought to be it; and this you made me to do.

Cranmer. To this I anſwer: You report me ill, and ſay not the truth, and I will prove it here before you all. The truth is, that my predeceſſor, archbiſhop Warham, gave the ſupremacy to king Henry the eight, and ſaid, that he ought to have it before the biſhop of Rome, and that God's word would bear him. And upon the ſame was there ſent to both the univerſities, Oxford and Cambridge, to know what the word of God would do touching the ſupremacy, and it was reaſoned upon, and argued at length. So at the laſt both the univerſities agreed, and ſet to their ſeals, and ſent it to Henry the eighth to the court, that he ought to be ſupreme head, and not the pope. Whereupon you were at that time doctor of divinity, and your conſent was thereunto, as by your hand doth appear. Therefore you miſreport me, that I was the cauſe of your falling away from the pope, but it was yourſelf. All this was in archbiſhop Warham's time, and while he was alive, ſo that it was three quarters of a year after ere ever I had the archbiſhopric of Canterbury in my hands, and before I might do any thing. So that here ye have reported of me that which ye cannot prove, which is ill done. All this while his cap was on his head.

Glouceſter. We come to examine you, and you, methinks, examine us.

Dr. Story's Oration.

PLeaſeth it your good lordſhip, becauſe it hath pleaſed the king and the queen's majeſties to appoint my companion and me to hear the examination of this man before your good lordſhip, to give me leave ſomewhat to talk in that behalf. Although I know that in talk with heretics there cometh hurt to all men; for it wearieth the ſtedfaſt, troubleth the doubtful, and taketh in ſnare the weak and ſimple: yet becauſe he ſaith, he is not bound to anſwer your lordſhip ſitting for the pope's holineſs, becauſe of Premunire, and the word of God, as he termeth it; I think good ſomewhat to ſay, that all men may ſee how he runneth out of his race of reaſon into the rage of common talk, ſuch as here I truſt hath done much good. And as the king and queen's majeſties will be glad to hear of your moſt charitable dealing with him; ſo will they be weary to hear the blundering of this ſtubborn heretic. And where he alledgeth divinity, mingling right and wrong together, he ſhould not have been heard. For ſhall it be ſufficient for him to alledge, the judge is not competent? Do we not ſee that in the common law it is not lawful for a man in Weſtminſter-hall to refuſe his judge? and ſhall we diſpute againſt one that denies principals? Although there be here a great company of learned men, that know it unmeet ſo to do, yet have I here a plain canon, wherein he declareth himſelf convicted Ipſo facto. The canon [as we have tranſlated it into Engliſh] is this; "Let it be to their own deſtruction whoſoever acts contrary to the apoſtolic decrees, let them have no place amongſt the prieſts, but be put out from the holy miniſtry, neither be capable of holding any cure, ſeeing they are condemned by the holy apoſtolic church for their diſobedience and preſumption, but let them be caſt out by the greater excommunication, to whom the diſcipline of the holy church being committed, not only ought to obey themſelves, but alſo teach others to do ſo, yet will reſiſt her divine and pontifical ſervices, and ſo diſobey the apoſtolical precepts."

He hath alledged many matters againſt the ſupremacy, but maliciouſly. You ſay the king in his realm is ſupreme head of the church. Well, Sir, you will grant me that there was a perfect catholic church before any king was chriſtened. Then if it were a perfect church, it muſt needs have a head, which muſt needs be before any king was member thereof; for you know Conſtantius the emperor was the firſt chriſtened king that ever was. And although you are bound, as St. Paul ſaith, to obey your rulers, and kings have the rule of the people, yet doth it not follow that they have cure of ſouls: for if you argue from the more powerful, the head may do that the miniſter cannot do; but the prieſt may conſecrate, and the king cannot, therefore the king is not head.

It was licenced by Chriſt to every man to bring into th ſheepfold, and to augment the flock, but not to rule, for that was only given to Peter.

And where the apoſtles do call upon men to obey their princes, to pay tribute to whom tribute is due; cuſtom to whom cuſtom; they perceiving that men were bent to a kind of liberty and diſobedience, were enforced to exhort them to obedience and payment of their tribute, which exhortation extendeth only to temporal matters.

And again, where you ſay that the biſhop of Rome maketh laws contrary to the laws of the realm, that is not true: for this is a maxim in the law, That which is true in a part, cannot be falſe in the whole.

Now as touching that monſtrous talk of your conſcience, that is no conſcience that ye profeſs; it is but private judgment, choice, and opinion. And as yet for all your glorious babble, you have not proved by God's laws that ye ought not to anſwer the pope's holineſs.

The canons which be received of all Chriſtendom compel you to anſwer, therefore you are bound ſo to do. And although this realm of late time, through ſuch ſchiſmatics as you were, hath exiled and baniſhed the canons, yet that cannot make for you, for you know yourſelf, that equal things produce equal things, nor can a part oblige the whole. Wherefore this Iſland, being indeed but a member of the whole, could not determine againſt the whole. That notwithſtanding the ſame laws, being put away by parliament, are now received again by a parliament, and have a full authority now as they had then, and they will now that ye anſwer to the pope's holineſs; therefore by the laws of the realm ye are bound to anſwer him. Wherefore my good lord, all that this Thomas Cranmer (I cannot otherwiſe term him, concerning his diſobedience) hath brought for his defence, ſhall not prevail with you, nor take any effect. Require him therefore to anſwer directly to your lordſhip; command him to ſet aſide his trifles, and to be obedient to the laws and ordinances of this realm. Take witneſs here of his ſtubborn contempt againſt the king and queen's majeſties, and compel him to anſwer directly to ſuch articles as we ſhall here lay againſt him, and in refuſal your good lordſhip is to excommunicate him.

As ſoon as Dr. Story had thus ended his tale, Dr. Martin began again to enter ſpeech with the archbiſhop; which diſcourſe I thought proper here to mention, although the report of the ſame be ſuch, as the author thereof ſeemeth in his writings very partial; for as he expreſſeth the ſpeech of Dr. Martin at full, and to the uttermoſt of his diligence, leaving out nothing in that part that either was or could be ſaid more; ſo again on the other part, how raw and weak he leaveth the matter, it is eaſy to perceive, who neither comprehendeth all that Dr. Cranmer again anſwered for his defence, nor yet in thoſe ſhort ſpeeches which he expreſſeth, ſeemeth to diſcharge the part of a ſincere and faithful reporter. Notwithſtanding, ſuch as it is I thought good to let the reader underſtand, who in peruſing the ſame may uſe therein his own judgment and conſideration.

Talk between Dr. Martin and Archbiſhop Cranmer.

Martin. MR. Cranmer, ye have told here a long glorious tale, pretending ſome matter of conſcience in appearance, but in verity you have no conſcience at all. You ſay that you have ſworn once to king Henry the eighth againſt the pope's juriſdiction, and therefore you may never forſwear the ſame; and ſo ye make a great matter of conſcience in the breach of the ſaid oath. Here will I aſk you a queſtion or two. What if ye made an oath to an harlot, to live with her in continual adultery, ought you to keep it?

Cranmer. I think no.

Martin. What if you do ſwear never to lend a poor man one penny, ought you to keep it?

Cranmer. I think not.

Martin. Herod did ſwear whatſoever his harlot aſked of him he would give her, and he gave her John Baptiſt's head; did he well in keeping his oath?

Cranmer. I think not.

Martin. Jephtha one of the judges of Iſrael did ſwear unto God, that if he would give him victory over his enemies, he would offer unto God the firſt ſoul that came forth of his houſe; it happened that his own daughter came firſt, and he ſlew her to ſave his oath. Did he well?

Cranmer. I think not.

Martin. So ſaith St. Ambroſe De officiis, "It is a miſerable neceſſity which is paid with parricide." Then Mr. Cranmer, you can no leſs confeſs by the premiſes, but that you ought not to have conſcience of every oath, but if it be juſt, lawful, and adviſedly taken.

Cranmer. So was that oath.

Martin. That is not ſo, for firſt it was unjuſt, for it tended to the taking away of another man's right. It was not lawful, for the laws of God and the church were againſt it. Beſides, it was not voluntary; for every man and woman were compelled to take it.

Cranmer. It pleaſeth you to ſay ſo.

Martin. Let all the world be judge. But Sir, you that pretended to have ſuch a conſcience to break an oath, I pray you did you never ſwear and break the ſame?

Cranmer. I remember not.

Martin. I will help your memory. Did you never ſwear obedience to the ſee of Rome?

Cranmer. Indeed I did once ſwear unto the ſame.

Martin. Yea, that you did twice, as appeareth by records and writings here ready to be ſhewed.

Cranmer. But I remember I ſaved all by proteſtation that I made by the counſel of the beſt learned men I could get at that time.

Martin. Hearken good people what this man ſaith. He made a proteſtation one day, to keep never a whit of that which he would ſwear the next day; was this the part of a chriſtian man? If a chriſtian man would bargain with a Turk, and before he maketh his bargain ſolemnly, before witneſs readeth in his paper that he holdeth ſecretly in his hand, or peradventure proteſteth before one or two, that he mindeth not to perform whatſoever he ſhall promiſe to the Turk; I ſay, if a chriſtian man ſhould ſerve a Turk in this manner, that the chriſtian man were worſe than the Turk. What would you then ſay to this man, that made a ſolemn oath and promiſe unto God and his church, and made a proteſtation before quite contrary?

Cranmer. That which I did, I did by the beſt learned men's advice I could get at that time.

Martin. I proteſt before all the learned men here, that there is no learning will ſave your perjury herein; for there be two rules of the civil law clean contrary againſt you, and ſo brought forth his rules, which being done he proceeded further. But will you have the truth of the matter? King Henry the eighth even then meant the lamentable change which after you ſee came to paſs, and to further his pitiful proceedings from the divorcement of his moſt lawful wife, to the deteſtable departing from the bleſſed unity of Chriſt's church, this man made the aforeſaid proteſtation; and on the other ſide, he letted not to make two ſolemn oaths quite contrary; and why? for otherwiſe by the laws and canons of this realm, he could not aſpire to the archbiſhopric of Canterbury.

Cranmer. I proteſt before you all, there was never man came more unwillingly to a biſhopric, than I did to that. Inſomuch that when king Henry ſent for me in poſt, that I ſhould come over, I prolonged my journey by ſeven weeks at the leaſt, thinking that he would be forgetful of me in the mean time.

Martin. You declare well by the way that the king took you to be a man of good conſcience, who could not find within all his realm any man that would ſet forth his ſtrange attempts, but was inforced to ſend for you in poſt to come out of Germany. What may we conjecture hereby, but that there was a compact between you, being then queen Anne's chaplain, and the king: Give me the archbiſhopric of Canterbury, and I will give you licence to live in adultery.

Cranmer. You ſay not true.

Martin. Let your proteſtation, joined with the reſt of your talk, give judgment. [Hinc prima mali labes.] Of that your execrable perjury, and his coloured and too ſhamefully ſuffered adultery, came hereſy and all miſchief to this realm.

And thus have I ſpoken as touching the conſcience you make for breaking your heretical oath made to the king. But to break your former oath made at two ſundry times both to God and his church, you have no conſcience at all. And now to anſwer another part of your oration, wherein you bring in God's word, that you have it on your ſide and no man elſe, and that the pope hath deviſed a new ſcripture contrary to the ſcripture of God; ye play herein as the phariſees did, which cried always, The word of the Lord, the word of the Lord, when they meant nothing ſo. This bettereth not your cauſe, becauſe you have God's word for you; for Baſilides and Phontinus the heretics ſaid, that they had God's word to maintain their hereſy. So Neſtorius, ſo Macedonius, ſo Pelagius, and briefly, all the heretics that ever were, pretended that they had God's word for them; yea, and ſo the devil being the father of hereſies, alledged God's word for him, ſaying, It is written: So ſaid he to Chriſt, Caſt thyſelf downward, which you applied moſt falſly againſt the pope. But if you mark the devil's language well, it agreed with your proceedings moſt truly. For, Caſt thyſelf downward, ſaid he, and ſo taught you to caſt all things downward. Down with the ſacrament, down with the maſs, down with the altars, down with the arms of Chriſt, and up with a lion and a dog; down with the abbeys, down with chauntries, down with hoſpitals and colleges, down with faſting and prayer, yea, down with all that good and godly is. All your proceedings and preachings tended to no other, but to fulfill the devil's requeſt, Caſt thyſelf downward. And therefore tell not us that you have God's word. For God hath given us by his word a mark to know that your teaching proceeded not of God, but of the the devil, and that your doctrine came not of Christ but of Antichrist. For Christ foresaid there should come against his church, ravening wolves, and false apostles. But how should we know them? Christ teacheth us, saying, By their fruits ye shall know them. Why, what be their fruits? St. Paul declareth, After the flesh they walk in concupiscence and uncleanness; they contemn powers. Again, In the latter days there shall be perilous times. Then shall there be men loving themselves, covetous, proud, disobedient to parents, treason-workers. Whether these be not the fruits of your gospel, I refer me to this worshipful audience; whether the said gospel began not with perjury, proceeded with adultery, was maintained with heresy, and ended in conspiracy.

Now, Sir, two points more I marked in your raging discourse that you made here: the one against the holy sacrament; the other against the pope's jurisdiction, and the authority of the see apostolic.

Touching the first, ye say you have God's word with you, yea and all the doctors. I would here ask you one question, whether God's word be contrary to itself, and whether the doctors teach doctrine contrary to themselves, or no? for you Mr. Cranmer have taught in this high sacrament of the altar three contrary doctrines, and yet you pretended in every one the word of the Lord.

Cranmer. Nay, I taught but two contrary doctrines in the same.

Martin. What doctrine taught you when you condemned Lambert the sacramentary in the king's presence in Whitehall.

Cranmer. I maintained then the papists doctrine.

Martin. That is to say, the catholic and universal doctrine of Christ's church. And how when King Henry died; did you not translate Justus Jonas's book?

Cranmer. I did so.

Martin. Then there you defended another doctrine touching the sacrament, by the same token, that you sent to Lynn your printer, that whereas in the first print there was an affirmative, that is to say Christ's body really in the sacrament, you sent then to your printer to put in a [not] whereby it came miraculously to pass, that Christ's body was clean conveyed out of the sacrament.

Cranmer. I remember there were two printers of my said book, but where the same [not] was put in, I cannot tell.

Martin. Then from a Lutheran ye became a Zwinglian, which is the vilest heresy of all in the high mystery of the sacrament, and for the same heresy you did help to burn Lambert the sacramentary, which you now call the catholic faith, and God's word.

Cranmer. I grant that then I believed otherwise than I do now, and so I did until my lord of London, Dr. Ridley, did confer with me, and by sundry persuasions and authorities of doctors drew me quite from my opinion.

Martin. Now, Sir, as touching the last part of your oration, you denied that the pope's holiness was supreme head of the church of Christ.

Cranmer. I did so.

Martin. Who say you then is supreme head?

Cranmer. Christ.

Martin. But whom hath Christ left here in earth his vicar and head of his church?

Cranmer. Nobody.

Martin. Ah, why told you not king Henry this when you made him supreme head? and now nobody is. This is treason against his own person, as you then made him.

Cranmer. I mean not but every king in his own realm and dominion is supreme head, and so was he supreme head of the church of Christ in England.

Martin. Is this always true? and was it ever so in Christ's church.

Cranmer. It was so.

Martin. Then what say you by Nero? He was the mightiest prince of the earth after Christ was ascended: Was he head of Christ's church?

Cranmer. Nero was Peter's head.

Martin. I ask whether Nero was head of the church or no? if he were not, it is false that you said before, that all princes be, and ever were heads of the church within their realms.

Cranmer. Nay it is true, for Nero was head of the church: that is, in worldly respect of the temporal bodies of men, of whom the church consisteth; for so he beheaded Peter and the apostles. And the Turk too is head of the church in Turky.

Martin. Then he that beheaded the heads of the church, and crucified the apostles, was head of Christ's church; and he that was never member of the church, is head of the church, by your new-found understanding of God's word.

It is not to be supposed contrary, but much other matter passed in this communication between them, especially on the archbishop's behalf. Whose answers I do not think to be so slender, nor altogether in the same form of words framed, if the truth as it was, might be known: but so it pleased the notary thereof, being too much partially addicted to his mother see of Rome in favour of his faction, to diminish and drive down the other side, either in not shewing all, or in reporting the thing otherwise than it was; as the common guise is of most writers, to what side their affection most weigheth, their oration commonly inclineth. But let us proceed further in the story of this matter.

It followed then (said this reporter), when the archbishop had thus answered, and the standers by began to murmur against him, the judges not content with his answers, willed him to answer directly to the interrogatories; which interrogatories articulated against him in form of law, were these under following.

Interrogatories objected to the Archbishop, with his Answers annexed to the same.

1. INterrog. First was objected, That he the aforesaid Thomas Cranmer, being yet free, and before he entered into holy orders, married one Joan, surnamed Black or Brown, dwelling at the sign of the Dolphin, in Cambridge.

Answer. Whereunto he answered, that whether she was called Black or Brown, he knew not, but that he married there one Joan, that he granted.

2. Interrog. That after the death of the aforesaid wife, he entered into holy orders, and after that was made archbishop by the pope.

Answer. He received (he said) a certain bull of the pope, which he delivered unto the king, and was archbishop by him.

3. Interrog. Item, That he being in holy orders, married another woman as his second wife, named, Anne, and so was twice married.

Answer. To this he granted.

4. Interrog. Item, In the time of king Henry the eighth, he kept the said wife secretly, and had children by her.

Answer. Hereunto he also granted, affirming, that it was better for him to have his own, than to do like other priests, holding and keeping other men's wives.

5. Interrog. Item, In the time of king Edward, he brought out the said wife openly, affirming and professing publicly the same to be his wife.

Answer. He denied not but he did so, and lawfully might do the same, forasmuch as the laws of the realm did so permit him.

6. Interrog.

6. Interrog. Item, That he ſhamed not openly to glory himſelf to have had his wife in ſecret many years.

Anſwer. And though he did ſo (he ſaid) there was no cauſe why he ſhould be aſhamed thereof.

7. Interrog. Item, That the ſaid Thomas Cranmer falling afterward into the deep bottom of errors, did fly and refuſe the authority of the church, did hold and follow the hereſy concerning the ſacrament of the altar, and alſo did compile, and cauſed to be ſet abroad divers books.

Anſwer. Whereunto when the names of the books were recited to him, he denied not ſuch books which he was the author of. As touching the treatiſe of Peter Martyr upon the ſacrament, he denied that he ever ſaw it before it was abroad, yet did approve and well like of the ſame. As for the catechiſm, the book of the articles, with the other book againſt Wincheſter, he granted the ſame to be his doings.

8. Interrog. Item, That he compelled many againſt their wills to ſubſcribe to the ſame articles.

Anſwer. He exhorted (he ſaid) ſuch as were willing to ſubſcribe; but againſt their wills he compelled none.

9. Interrog. Item, Foraſmuch as he ceaſed not to perpetrate enormous and inordinate crimes, he was therefore caſt into the Tower, and from thence was brought to Oxford, at what time it was commonly thought that the parliament there ſhould be held.

Anſwer. To this he ſaid, that he knew no ſuch enormous and inordinate crimes that ever he committed.

10. Interrog. Item, That in the ſaid city of Oxford he did openly maintain his hereſy, and there was convict upon the ſame.

Anſwer. He defended (he ſaid) there the cauſe of the ſacrament; but that he was convicted in the ſame, that he denied.

11. Interrog. Item, When he perſevered ſtill in the ſame, he was by the public cenſure of the univerſity pronounced an heretic, and his books to be heretical.

Anſwer. That he was ſo denounced he denied not, but that he was an heretic, or his books heretical, that he denied.

12. Interrog. Item, That he was and is notoriouſly infamed with the note of ſchiſm, as who not only himſelf receded from the catholic church and ſee of Rome, but alſo moved the king and ſubjects of this realm to the ſame.

Anſwer. As touching the receding, that he well granted; but that receding or departing, ſaid he, was only from the ſee of Rome, and had in it no matter of any ſchiſm.

13. Interrog. Item, That he had been twice ſworn to the pope; and withal Dr. Martin brought out the inſtrument of the public notary, wherein was contained his proteſtation made when he ſhould be conſecrated, aſking if he had any thing elſe proteſted.

Anſwer. Whereunto he anſwered, that he did nothing but by the laws of the realm.

14. Interrog. Item, That he the ſaid archbiſhop of Canterbury did not only offend in the premiſes, but alſo in taking upon him the authority of the ſee of Rome, in that without leave and licence from the ſaid ſee, he conſecrated biſhops and prieſts.

Anſwer. He granted that he did execute ſuch things as were wont to be referred to the pope, at what time it was permitted to him by the public laws and determination of the realm.

15. Interrog. Item, That when the whole realm had ſubſcribed to the authority of the pope, he only ſtill perſiſted in his error.

Anſwer. That he did not admit the pope's authority, he confeſſed to be true. But that he erred in the ſame, that he died.

16. Interrog. Item, That all and ſingular the premiſes be true.

Anſwer. That likewiſe he granted, excepting thoſe things whereunto he had now anſwered.

After he had thus anſwered to the objections aforeſaid, and the public notary had entered the ſame, the judges and commiſſioners, as having now accompliſhed that wherefore they came, were about to ariſe and depart. But the biſhop of Glouceſter thinking it not proper ſo to diſmiſs the people, being ſomewhat ſtirred with the words of the archbiſhop, began his oration in the hearing of the people, thus to declaim.

The Oration of Biſhop Brooks, in cloſing up his Examinations againſt Dr. Cranmer, Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

MR. Cranmer (I cannot otherwiſe term you, conſidering your obſtinacy), I am right ſorry, I am right heartily ſorry to hear ſuch words eſcape your mouth ſo unadviſedly. I had conceived a right good hope of your amendment. I ſuppoſe that this obſtinacy of yours came not of a vain-glory, but rather of a corrupt conſcience, which was the occaſion that I hoped ſo well of your return. But now I perceive by your fooliſh babble that it is far otherwiſe. You are ſo puffed up with vain-glory, there is ſuch a notorious mark of hereſy crept into your conſcience, that I am clean void of hope, and my hope is turned into perdition. Who can ſave that will be loſt? God would have you to be ſaved, and you refuſe it. The perdition is only upon thyſelf, O Iſrael; only in me is thy ſalvation, ſaith the Lord by his prophet. You have uttered ſo erroneous talk, with ſuch open malice againſt the pope's holineſs, with ſuch open lying againſt the church of Rome, with ſuch open blaſphemy againſt the ſacrament of the altar, that no mouth could have expreſſed more maliciouſly, more lyingly, more blaſphemouſly.

To reaſon with you, although I would of myſelf to ſatisfy this audience, yet may I not by our commiſſion, neither can I find how I may do it with the ſcriptures: For the apoſtle doth command, that ſuch a one ſhould not only not be talked withal, but alſo ſhunned and avoided; ſaying, An heretical perſon after once or twice conferring, ſhun, knowing that he is perverſe and ſinneth, being of his own judgment condemned. Ye have been conferred withal not once or twice, but oftentimes, ye have oft been lovingly admoniſhed, ye have been oft ſecretly diſputed with. And the laſt year in the open ſchool, in open diſputations, ye have been openly convict, ye have been openly driven out of the ſchool with hiſſes: your book which ye brag you made ſeven years ago, and no man anſwered it, Marcus Antonius hath ſufficiently detected and confuted, and yet ye perſiſt ſtill in your wonted hereſy.

Wherefore being ſo oft admoniſhed, conferred withal, and convicted, if ye deny you to be the man whom the apoſtle noteth, hear then what Origen ſaith, who wrote above 1300 years ago, and interpreteth the ſaying of the apoſtle in this wiſe, in Apologia Pamphili; "All thoſe ought to be eſteemed heretics, who profeſſing to believe in Chriſt, judge otherwiſe of his truth, than the eccleſiaſtical tradition." Even now ye profeſſed a king of Chriſtianity and holineſs unto us, for at your beginning you fell down upon your knees, and ſaid the Lord's prayer (God knows like an hypocrite), and then ſtanding upon your feet, you rehearſed the articles of your faith, but to what end I pray you elſe, but to cloak that inward hereſy rooted in you, that you might blind the poor, ſimple, and unlearned people's eyes? For what will they ſay or think, if they do not thus ſay? Good Lord, what mean theſe men to ſay that he is an heretic, they are deceived, this is a good chriſtian, he believeth as we believe.

But

But is this ſufficient to eſcape the name of an heretic? To the ſimple and unlearned it is ſufficient, but for you that have profeſſed a greater knowledge and higher doctrine, it is not enough to recite your belief. For unleſs (as Origen ſaith) ye believe all things that the church hath decreed beſides, you are no chriſtian man. In which becauſe you do halt, and will come to no conformity; from henceforth ye are to be taken for an heretic, with whom we ought neither to diſpute, neither to reaſon, whom we ought rather to eſchew and avoid.

Nevertheleſs, although I do not intend to reaſon with you, but to give you up as an abject and an out-caſt from God's favour, yet becauſe ye have uttered, to the annoying of the people, ſuch peſtilent hereſies as may do harm among ſome rude and unlearned, I think meet to ſay ſomewhat herein; not becauſe I hope to have any good at your hands, which I would willingly wiſh, but that I may eſtabliſh the ſimple people which be here preſent, leſt they being ſeduced by your diabolical doctrine, may periſh thereby.

And firſt (as it behoveth every man to purge himſelf firſt before he enter with any other), where you accuſe me of an oath made againſt the biſhop of Rome, I confeſs it, and deny it not; and therefore do ſay with the reſt of this realm, good and catholic men, the ſaying of the prophet, "We have ſinned with our fathers, we have done unjuſtly and wickedly. The ſins of my youth, and my ignorances, O Lord, do not remember." I was then a young man, and as young a ſcholar here in the univerſity.

I knew not then what an oath did mean, and yet to ſay the truth, I did it compulſed, compulſed, I ſay, by you Mr. Cranmer, and here were you the author and cauſe of my perjury; you are to be blamed herein, and not I. Now where you ſay I made two oaths, the one contrary to the other, it is not ſo, for the oath I made to the pope's holineſs appertaineth only to ſpiritual things; the other oath that I made to the king pertaineth only to temporal things; that is to ſay, that I do acknowledge all my temporal livings to proceed only from the king, and from none elſe. But all men may ſee, as you agree in this, ſo ye agree in the reſt of your opinions.

Now, Sir, as concerning the ſupremacy which is only due to the ſee of Rome, a word or two. Although there be a number of places which do confirm that Chriſt appointed Peter head of the church, yet this is a moſt evident place; when Chriſt demanded of his apoſtles whom men called him, they anſwered, Some Elias, ſome a prophet, &c. But Chriſt replied unto Peter and ſaid, Whom ſayeſt thou Peter that I am? Peter anſwered, Thou art Chriſt the Son of God: and Chriſt replied, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church. The doctors interpreting this place, Upon this rock, expound it thus, Not only on the faith of Peter, but upon Peter himſelf. And why did Chriſt change his name from Simon to Peter, which in Latin is a Stone, but only to declare that he was only the foundation and head of the church?

Again, where Chriſt demanded of Peter being amongſt the reſt of his apoſtles, three times a-row, Peter, loveſt thou me, he gave him charge over his ſheep, Feed my ſheep, feed my lambs. Which place Chryſoſtom interpreting, ſaith, Feed, that is, be you in my ſtead, and head of your brethren. To conclude, when they came that required Didrachma of Chriſt, he commanded Peter to caſt his net into the ſea, and to take out of the fiſh's mouth that he took, a piece of money, which was a double Didrachma, and give it, ſays he, for thee and me. Which words do ſignify, that when he had paid for them two, he had paid for all the reſt. For as in the old law there were appointed two heads over the people of Iſrael, Moſes and Aaron; Moſes as chief, and Aaron next head under him; ſo in the new law there were two heads of the church, which were Chriſt and Peter. Chriſt is head of all, and Peter next under him. St. Auſtin, in 75 queſt. Veteris & Novi Teſtamenti, ſaith, "Our Saviour Chriſt commanding the tribute to be given for him and for Peter, meant thereby the ſame to be given for all others, for he appointed him to be head of them." What can be more plain than this? but I will not tarry upon this matter.

Now as touching the pope's laws, where you ſay they be contrary, becauſe the ſervice which ſhould be (as you ſay) in Engliſh, is in Latin; I anſwer, Whoſoever will take the pains to peruſe the fourteenth chapter of the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians, ſhall find, that his meaning is concerning preaching, and by the way only of praying.

Again, where you ſay, that the pope's holineſs doth take away one part of the ſacrament from the lay-men, and Chriſt would have it under both, ye can ſay no more but this, Drink ye all of this. And what followeth? And all drank thereof. Now if a man would be ſo froward with you, he might ſay that Chriſt gave it only to his apoſtles, in whoſe places ſucceeded prieſts, and not lay-men.

And admit that Chriſt commanded it to be received under both kinds, yet the church hath authority to change that, as well as others. Ye read, that Chriſt calling his apoſtles together, ſaid unto them, "Go, and preach the goſpel to every nation, baptizing them in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt." But the apoſtles being deſirous to publiſh Chriſt's name every where, did baptize only in Chriſt's name. Again, Chriſt before his laſt ſupper waſhed his apoſtles feet, ſaying, "If I have waſhed your feet, being your Lord and Maſter, alſo you ought to waſh the feet one of another. I have given you example." This was a precept, yet hath the church altered it, that the ſimple people ſhould not think a re-baptization in it. "So becauſe, ſaith the apoſtle, I have received of the Lord the ſame which I have delivered unto you, that our Lord, the ſame night in which he was betrayed, &c." Notwithſtanding that this was a precept that the ſacrament ſhould be adminiſtered after ſupper, the church hath altered it, and commanded it to be received faſting. And where Chriſt did break the bread, we receive the whole hoſt. Chriſt adminiſtered ſitting at the table, we ſtanding at the altar.

It was alſo commanded in Acts 25. that chriſtian men ſhould abſtain from ſtrangled and blood. But the church perceiving it to be a precept but for a time, hath altered it. Chriſt commanded to keep holy the Sabbath-day, and the church hath altered it to Sunday. If then the church may change things that be ſo expreſſed in the ſcriptures, ſhe may alſo change the form of receiving of lay-men under both kinds, for divers occaſions.

Firſt, that in carrying it to the ſick, the blood may not be ſhed, loſt, or miſuſed.

And next, that no occaſion might be given to heretics to think that there is not ſo much under one kind as under both.

But why would you have it under both kinds, I pray you elſe, but only to pervert and contradict the commandment of the church? For when you had it under both kinds, you believed in neither. And we having but one, believe both kinds. Now, Sir, as concerning the ſacrament of the altar, where you ſay, you have a number of doctors on your ſide, and we none of our ſide, that is to ſay, to confirm the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar, indeed one, to ſtop your mouth, I think is not poſſible to find. Nevertheleſs where your requeſt is to have one ſhewed unto you, and then you will recant, I will ſhew you two.

St. Auſtin upon Pſalm 33. He carried himſelf in his own hands: I find not how this is true in David (ſaith he) literally, that he was borne in his own hands; but in Chriſt I find it literally, when he gave his body to his apoſtles at his laſt ſupper.

Again, St. Cyprian de Cœna Domini, ſaith, The bread which our Lord gave to his diſciples, was not a bare likeneſs, but the nature being changed, was made fleſh by his almighty word. What can be more plain than this? yet to your expoſition it is not plain enough. But give me your figurative, ſignificative, and other ſuch like terms, and I will defend that Chriſt hath not yet aſcended; no nor yet that he was incarnate, &c. Wherefore I can do no other but put you in the number of them, whom Chryſoſtom ſpake of in this wiſe, ſaying, Hear, O thou chriſtian man, wilt thou do more than Chriſt could do? Chriſt confuted the phariſees, yet he could not put them to ſilence; and art thou ſtronger than Chriſt? Wilt thou go about to bring them to ſilence that will receive no anſwer? as who ſhould ſay, thou canſt not. Thus much have I ſaid, not for you, Mr. Cranmer, for my hope that I conceived of you, is now gone and paſt; but ſomewhat to ſatisfy the rude and unlearned people, that they, perceiving your arrogant lying, and lying arrogancy, may the better eſchew your deteſtable and abominable ſchiſm.

And thus the prelate ended his worſhipful tale. After whom Dr. Story taketh the matter, and thus inferred in words, as followeth.

Mr. Cranmer, you have made a goodly proceſs concerning your heretical oath made to the king, but you forget your oath made to the ſee apoſtolic. As concerning your oath made to the king, if you made it to him only, it took an end by his death, and ſo it is releaſed; if you made it to his ſucceſſors, well Sir, the true ſucceſſors have the empire, and they will you to diſſolve the ſame, and become a member of Chriſt's church again, and it ſtandeth well with charity.

To this the archbiſhop anſwered again, ſaith the reporter: but what his anſwer was, that he ſuppreſſeth, and returneth to the words of Dr. Story, who imperiouſly turning his ſpeech again to the archbiſhop, ſaid as followeth.

Hold your peace, Sir, and ſo ſhall it right well become you, conſidering that I gave you licence before to ſay your fancy. Your oath was no oath: for it lacked the three points of an oath, that is to ſay, judgment, righteouſneſs, and truth.

Theſe, with the like words to the ſame effect, being uttered by Dr. Story, ſeeking to break up and make an end of that ſeſſion, immediately called for witneſſes to be produced, who ſhould be ſworn upon the book, to utter and declare the next day whatſoever they knew, or could remember to be inferred againſt Dr. Cranmer's hereſy. The names of the witneſſes are theſe following:

Dr. Marſhall, commiſſary, and dean of Chriſt-church.
Dr. Smith, under commiſſary.

Dr. Treſham,	Mr. Curtop,
Dr. Crook,	Mr. Warde,
Mr. London,	Mr. Serles.

After the depoſitions, of which witneſſes being taken, Dr. Story admoniſhed the archbiſhop, permitting him to make his exceptions, if he thought any of the ſaid witneſſes were to be refuſed. The archbiſhop refuſed them all, as being men perjured, and not in chriſtian religion. For if to ſwear, ſaid he, againſt the pope, were unlawful, they ſhould rather have given their lives, than their oath. But if it were lawful, then they are perjured, to defend him whom they forſwore before. Nevertheleſs, this anſwer of the archbiſhop being lightly regarded, as little to the purpoſe appertaining, he was commanded again to the place from whence he came. Who at his departing out, like as at his firſt coming in, ſhewed low obedience to Dr. Martin and Dr. Story, the queen's commiſſioners. Then Dr. Story, pointing him to the biſhop of Glouceſter, ſaid that he ought rather to give reverence unto him. So the moſt reverend archbiſhop, departing without any obeyſance, exhibited to the ſaid biſhop of Glouceſter the pope's delegate, all the others roſe up, and departed every one to his own. And thus brake up the ſeſſion for that day, about two of the clock in the afternoon.

And thus much hitherto concerning the ſummary effect of this action or ſeſſion, with the orations, diſcourſes and articles commenced againſt the archbiſhop of Canterbury; alſo with the reaſons and anſwers of the ſaid archbiſhop to their objections and interrogatories. Touching which his anſwers, foraſmuch as they being recited by report of a papiſt, (as is aforeſaid) ſeem to be partially handled, it ſhall therefore not greatly be out of the matter, as ye have heard the orations of biſhop Brooks, with the reaſons and talk of the other commiſſioners, amplified and ſet forth at large on the one ſide, ſo now repeating the words and anſwers of the other part, to declare and ſet forth ſomewhat more amply and effectually, what ſpeech the ſaid archbiſhop uſed for himſelf in the ſame action, by the faithful relation and teſtimony of certain others, who were likewiſe there preſent, and do thus report the effect of the archbiſhop's words, anſwering to the firſt oration of biſhop Brooks in manner as followeth.

A more full Anſwer of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to the firſt Oration of Biſhop Brooks.

MY lord, you have very learnedly and eloquently in your oration put me in remembrance of many things touching myſelf, wherein I do not mean to ſpend the time in anſwering of them. I acknowledge God's goodneſs to me in all his gifts, and thank him as heartily for this ſtate wherein I find myſelf now, as ever I did for the time of my proſperity; and it is not the loſs of my promotions that grieveth me. The greateſt grief I have at this time is, and one of the greateſt that ever I had in all my life, to ſee the king and queen's majeſties, by their procters here, to become my accuſers, and that in their own realm and country, before a foreign power. If I have tranſgreſſed the laws of the land, their majeſties have ſufficient authority and power both from God, and by the ordinance of the realm, to puniſh me, whereunto I both have, and at all times ſhall be content to ſubmit myſelf.

Alas! what hath the pope to do in England? whoſe juriſdiction is ſo far different from the juriſdiction of this realm, that it is impoſſible to be true to the one, and true to the other. The laws alſo are ſo diverſe, that whoſoever ſweareth to both, muſt needs incur perjury to the one. Which as often as I remember, even for the love that I bear to her grace, I cannot but be heartily ſorry to think upon it, how that her highneſs the day of her coronation, at which time ſhe took a ſolemn oath to obſerve all the laws and liberties of this realm of England, at the ſame time alſo took an oath to the biſhop of Rome, and promiſed to maintain that ſee. The ſtate of England being ſo repugnant to the ſupremacy of the pope, it was impoſſible but ſhe muſt needs be forſworn in the one. Wherein if her grace had been faithfully advertiſed by her council, then ſurely ſhe would never have done it.

The laws of this realm are, that the king of England is the ſupreme and ſole governor of all his countries and dominions: and that he holdeth his crown and ſceptre of himſelf, by the ancient laws, cuſtoms, and deſcents of the kings of the realm, and of none other. The pope ſaith, that all emperors and kings hold their crowns and regalities of him, and that he may depoſe them when he liſt; which is high treaſon for any man to affirm and think, being born within the king's dominions.

The laws of England are, that all biſhops and prieſts offending in caſes of felony or treaſon, are to be judged and tried by the laws and cuſtoms of the realm. The pope's pope's laws are, that the ſecular power cannot judge the ſpiritual power, and that they are not under their juriſdiction; which robbeth the king of the one part of his people.

The laws alſo of England are, that whoſoever hindereth the execution or proceeding of the laws of England for any other foreign laws eccleſiaſtical or temporal, incurreth the danger of a premunire. The pope's laws are, that whoſoever hindereth the proceedings or executions of his laws, for any other laws, of any other king or country, both the prince himſelf, his council, all his officers, ſcribes, clerks, and whoſoever give conſent or aid to the making or executing of any ſuch laws, ſtand accurſed. An heavy caſe (if his curſe were any thing worth) that the king and queen cannot uſe their own laws, but they and theirs muſt ſtand accurſed.

Theſe things, and many more examples he alledged, which (he ſaid) ſtirred him, that he could not give his conſent to the receiving of ſuch an enemy into the realm, ſo ſubverting the dignity and ancient liberties of the ſame.

And as for the matter of hereſy and ſchiſm, wherewith he was charged, he proteſted, and called God to witneſs, that he knew none that he maintained. But if that were an hereſy to deny the pope's authority, and the religion which the ſee of Rome hath publiſhed to the world theſe latter years, then all the ancient fathers of the primitive church, the apoſtles and Chriſt himſelf taught hereſy; and he deſired all then preſent to bear him witneſs, that he took the traditions and religion of that uſurping prelate to be moſt erroneous, falſe, and againſt the doctrine of the whole ſcripture; which he had oftentimes well proved by writing, and the author of the ſame to be very Antichriſt, ſo often preached of the apoſtles and prophets, in whom did moſt evidently concur all ſigns and tokens whereby he was painted out to the world to be known.

For it was moſt evident that he had advanced himſelf above all emperors and kings of the world, whom he affirmeth to hold their eſtates and empires of him, as of their chief, and to be at his commandment to depoſe and erect at his good will and pleaſure, and that ſtories make mention of his intolerable and inſolent pride and tyranny, uſed over them in ſuch ſort, as no king would have uſed to his chriſtian ſubjects, nor yet a good maſter to his ſervants, ſetting his feet on the emperor's neck, affirming that to be verified in him, which was ſpoken only of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, in theſe words, "Thou ſhalt go upon the lion and the adder, the young lion and the dragon ſhalt thou tread under thy feet." Other ſome had he made to hold his ſtirrup, others he had diſplaced and removed from their empires and ſeats royal: and not content herewithal, more inſolent than Lucifer, he hath occupied not only the higheſt place in this world, above kings and princes, but hath further preſumed to ſit in the ſeat of Almighty God, which only he reſerved to himſelf, which is the conſcience of man, and to keep the poſſeſſion thereof, he hath promiſed forgiveneſs of ſins Toties Quoties.

He hath brought in gods of his own framing, and invented a new religion, full of gain and lucre, quite contrary to the doctrine of the holy ſcripture, only for the maintaining of his kingdom, diſplacing Chriſt from his glory, and holding his people in a miſerable ſervitude of blindneſs, to the loſs of a great number of ſouls, which God at the latter day ſhall exact at his hand; boaſting many times in his canons and decrees, that he can diſpenſe "againſt Peter, againſt Paul, againſt the Old and New Teſtament: and that he of the fullneſs of power may do as much as God." O Lord! who ever heard ſuch blaſphemy? if there be any man that can advance himſelf above him, let him be judged Antichriſt.

This enemy of God and of our redemption, is ſo evidently painted out in the ſcriptures by ſuch manifeſt ſigns and tokens, which all ſo clearly appear in him, that except a man will ſhut up his eyes and heart againſt the light, he cannot but know him: and therefore, for my part, I will never give my conſent to the receiving of him into this church of England. And you, my lord, and the reſt that ſit here in commiſſion, conſider well and examine in your own conſciences; you have ſworn againſt him, you are learned, and can judge of the truth. I pray God you be not wilfully blind. As for me, I have herein diſcharged mine own conſcience toward the world, and I will write alſo my mind to her grace, touching this matter.

The copy of which letter ſent to the queen, ye ſhall find after in the end of his ſtory. While he thus made his anſwer, ye heard before how Dr. Martin and Dr. Story interrupted him divers times with blaſphemous talk, and would fain have had the biſhop of Glouceſter to put him to ſilence: who notwithſtanding did not, but ſuffered him to end his tale at full. After this ye heard alſo how they proceeded to examine him of divers articles, whereof the chief was, That at the time of being created archbiſhop of Canterbury, he was ſworn to the pope, and had his inſtitution and induction from him, and then promiſed to maintain the authority of that ſee, and therefore was perjured: wherefore he ſhould rather ſtick to his firſt oath, and return to his old fold again, than to continue obſtinate in an oath forced in the time of ſchiſm.

To that he anſwered, ſaving his proteſtation (which term he uſed before all his anſwers) That at ſuch time archbiſhop Warham died he was ambaſſador in Germany for the king, who thereupon ſent for him home, and having intelligence by ſome of his friends (who were near about the king) how he intended to beſtow the archbiſhopric upon him, and therefore counſelled him in that caſe to make haſte home, he feeling in himſelf a great inability to ſuch a promotion, and very ſorry to leave his ſtudy, and eſpecially conſidering by what means he muſt have it, which he could not utter without great peril and danger, deviſed an excuſe to the king of matter of great importance, for which his longer abode there ſhould be moſt neceſſary, thinking by that means in his abſence, that the king would have beſtowed it upon ſome other, and ſo remained there by that device, one half year after the king had written for him to come home. But after that no ſuch matter fell out, as he ſeemed to make ſuſpicion of, the king ſent for him again. Who after his return, underſtanding ſtill the archbiſhopric to be reſerved for him, made means by divers of his beſt friends to ſhift it off, deſiring rather ſome ſmaller living, that he might more quietly follow his book.

To be brief, when the king himſelf ſpake with him, declaring that his full intention, for his ſervice ſake, and for the good opinion he conceived of him, was to beſtow that dignity upon him, after long diſabling of himſelf, perceiving he could by no perſuaſions alter the king's determination, he freely opened his conſcience unto him, moſt humbly craving his grace's pardon, for that he ſhould declare unto his highneſs. Which obtained, he declared, that if he accepted the office, then he muſt receive it at the pope's hand, which he neither would nor could do, for that his highneſs was only the ſupreme governor of this church of England, as well in cauſes eccleſiaſtical as temporal, and that the full right and donation of all manner of biſhoprics and benefices, as well as of any other temporal dignities and promotions, appertained to his grace, and not to any other foreign authority, whatſoever it was, and therefore if he might in that vocation ſerve God, him, and his country, ſeeing it was his pleaſure ſo to have it, and receive it of his majeſty, and of none other ſtranger, who had no authority within this realm, neither in any ſuch gift, nor in any other thing. Whereat the king, ſaid he, ſtaying awhile and muſing, aſked me how I was able to prove it. At which time I alledged many texts out of the ſcriptures, and the fathers alſo, approving the ſupreme and higheſt authority of kings in their realms and dominions, diſcloſing therewithal the intolerable uſurpation of the pope of Rome.

Afterward it pleaſed his highneſs (quoth the archbiſhop) many and ſundry times to talk with me of it, and perceiving that I could not be brought to acknowledge the authority of the biſhop of Rome, the king himſelf called Dr. Oliver, and other civil lawyers, and deviſed with him how he might beſtow it upon me, inforcing me nothing againſt my conſcience. Who thereupon informed him, that I might do it by the way of proteſtation, and ſo one to be ſent to Rome who might take the oath, and do every thing in my name. Which when I underſtood, I ſaid, he ſhould do it Super animam ſuam: and I indeed Bona fide made my proteſtation, that I did not acknowledge his authority any further than as it agreed with the expreſs word of God, and that it might be lawful for me at all times to ſpeak againſt him, and ſo to impugn his errors, when time and occaſion ſhould ſerve me. And this my proteſtation I did cauſe to be inrolled, and there I think it remaineth.

They objected to him alſo that he was married, which be confeſſed. Whereunto Dr. Martin ſaid, that his children were bondmen to the ſee of Canterbury. At which ſaying the archbiſhop ſmiled, and aſked him if a prieſt at his benefice kept a concubine, and had by her baſtards, whether they were bond-men to the benefice or no, ſaying, I truſt you will make my children's cauſes no worſe.

After this Dr. Martin demanded of him, who was ſupreme head of the church of England? Marry, quoth my lord of Canterbury, Chriſt is head of this member, as he is of the whole body of the univerſal church. Why, quoth Dr. Martin, you made king Henry the eighth ſupreme head of the church. Yea, ſaid the archbiſhop, of all the people of England, as well eccleſiaſtical as temporal. And not of the church, ſaid Dr. Martin? No, ſaid he, for Chriſt is the only head of his church, and of the faith and religion of the ſame. The king is head and governor of his people, which are the viſible church. What, quoth Martin, you never durſt tell the king ſo. Yea, that I durſt, quoth he, and did in the publication of his ſtyle, wherein he was named ſupreme head of the church, there was never other thing meant. A number of other fond and fooliſh objections were made, with repetition whereof I thought not to trouble the reader.

Thus after they had received his anſwers to all their objections, they cited him (as is aforeſaid) to appear at Rome within fourſcore days, to make there his perſonal anſwers: which he ſaid, if the king and queen would ſend him, he would be content to do; and ſo thence was carried to priſon again, where he continually remained, notwithſtanding that he was commanded to appear at Rome.

Wherein all men that have eyes to ſee, may eaſily perceive the crafty practice of theſe prelates, and the vizored face of their juſtice, as though the court of Rome would condemn no man before he anſwered for himſelf, as all law and equity required. But the very ſame inſtant time, the holineſs of that unholy father, contrary to all reaſon and juſtice, ſent his letter executory unto the king and queen to degrade and deprive him of his dignity: which thing he did not only before the four-ſcore days were ended, but before there were twenty days ſpent. Furthermore, whereas the ſaid archbiſhop was firſt detained in ſtrait confinement, ſo that he could not appear (as was notorious both in England and alſo in the Romiſh court) and there had a lawful and moſt juſt excuſe of his abſence by all laws, both popiſh and others: yet in the end of the ſaid fourſcore days, was that worthy martyr decreed Contumax, that is, ſturdily, frowardly, and wilfully abſent, and in pain of the ſame his abſence, condemned and put to death.

Dr. Thirlby and Dr. Bonner coming with a new Commiſſion to ſit upon the Archbiſhop, February 14.

THIS letter or ſentence difinitive of the pope, was dated about the firſt day of January, and was delivered here in England about the midſt of February. Upon the receipt of which letters, another ſeſſion was appointed, for the archbiſhop to appear the 14th day of February, before certain commiſſioners directed down by the queen, the chief whereof was the biſhop of Ely, Dr. Thirlby. Concerning which Dr. Thirlby by the way here is to be noted, that albeit he was not the ſaid archbiſhop's houſhold chaplain, yet he was ſo familiarly acquainted with him, ſo dearly beloved, ſo inwardly accepted and advanced of him (not like a chaplain, but rather like a natural brother) that there was never any thing in the archbiſhop's houſe ſo dear, were it plate, jewels, horſe, maps, books, or any thing elſe, but if Thirlby did never ſo little commend it (a ſubtle kind of begging) the archbiſhop ſoon after either gave it to him, or elſe ſent it after him to his houſe. So greatly was the archbiſhop enamoured with him, that whoſoever would obtain any thing of him, moſt commonly would make their way before by Dr. Thirlby. Which by matter of the ſaid Dr. Thirlby I thought here to recite; not ſo much to upbraid the man with the vice of unthankfulneſs, as chiefly and only for this, to admoniſh him of old benefits received, whereby he may the better remember his old benefactor, and ſo to favour the cauſe and quarrel of him whom he was ſo ſingularly bounden unto.

With the ſaid Dr. Thirlby biſhop of Ely, was alſo aſſigned in the ſame commiſſion Dr. Bonner biſhop of London; which two coming to Oxford upon St. Valentine's day, as the pope's delegates, with a new commiſſion from Rome, by the virtue thereof commanded the archbiſhop aforeſaid to come before them, in the quire of Chriſt-church, before the high altar, where they ſitting (according to their manner, in their Pontificalibus) firſt began, as the faſhion is, to read their commiſſion: wherein was contained, how that in the court of Rome all things being indifferently examined on both parts, and council heard as well on the king and queen's behalf, his accuſers, as on the behalf of Thomas Cranmer; the party guilty, ſo that he wanted nothing appertaining to his neceſſary defence, &c. which foreſaid commiſſion, as it was in reading, O Lord, ſaid the archbiſhop, what lyes be theſe, that I being continually in priſon, and never could be ſuffered to have council or advocate at home, ſhould produce witneſs and appoint my council at Rome! God muſt needs puniſh this open and ſhameleſs lying. They read on the commiſſion which came from the pope, Plenitudine poteſtatis, ſupplying all manner of defects in law or proceſs, committed in dealing with the archbiſhop, and giving them full authority to proceed to deprivation and degradation of him, and ſo upon excommunication to deliver him up to the ſecular power.

When the commiſſion was read thus, they proceeding thereupon to his degradation, firſt cloathed and diſguiſed him, putting on him a ſurplice, and then an albe; after that the veſtment of a ſub-deacon, and every other furniture as a prieſt ready to maſs.

When they had apparelled him ſo far; What, ſaid he, I think I ſhall ſay maſs: Yea, ſaid Coſins, one of Bonner's chaplains, my lord, I truſt to ſee you ſay maſs for all this. Do you ſo, quoth he? that you ſhall never ſee, nor will I ever do it.

Then they inveſted in all manner of robes of a biſhop and archbiſhop, as he is at his inſtallation, ſaving that as every thing then is moſt rich and coſtly, ſo every thing here was of canvas and old rags, with a mitre and a pall of the ſame ſute put upon him in mockery, and then the croſier-ſtaff was put in his hand.

This done after the pope's pontifical form and manner, Bonner, who for the ſpace of many years had borne, as it ſeemed, ſeemed, no great good will towards him, and now rejoiced to ſee this day wherein he might triumph over him, and take his pleaſure at full, began to ſtretch out his eloquence, making his oration to the aſſembly after this manner of ſort.

This is the man that hath ever deſpiſed the pope's holineſs, and now is to be judged by him. This is the man that hath pulled down ſo many churches, and now is come to be judged in a church. This is the man that contemned the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, and now is come to be condemned before the bleſſed ſacrament hanging over the altar. This is the man that like lucifer ſat in the place of Chriſt upon an altar to judge others, and now is come before an altar to be judged himſelf.

Whereunto the archbiſhop interrupting him ſaid, that in that he belyed him, as he did in many other things. For that which he would now ſeem to charge him withal, was his own fault, if it was any, and none of his. For the thing you mean was in Paul's church, ſaid he, where I came to ſit in commiſſion; and there was a ſcaffold prepared for me and others, by you and your officers, and whether there were any altar under it or not, I could not perceive it, nor once ſuſpected it, wherefore you do wittingly evil to charge me with it.

But Bonner went on ſtill in his rhetorical repetition, lying and railing againſt the archbiſhop, beginning every ſentence with, This is the man, this is the man, till at length every man grew tired of his unmannerly uſage of him in that time and place; inſomuch that the biſhop of Ely divers times pulled him by the ſleeve to make an end, and ſaid to him afterward, when they went to dinner, that he had broken promiſe with him: for he had intreated him earneſtly to uſe him with reverence.

After all this done and finiſhed, they began then to buſtle toward his degrading, and firſt to take from him his croſier-ſtaff out of his hands, which he held faſt, and refuſed to deliver, and withal imitating the example of Martin Luther, pulled an appeal out of his left ſleeve under the wriſt, which he there and then delivered unto them, ſaying, I appeal to the next general council; and herein I have comprehended my cauſe and form of it, which I deſire may be admitted: and prayed divers of the ſtanders by, by name, to be witneſſes, and eſpecially Mr. Curtop, to whom he ſpake twice.

The copy of which appellation, becauſe it was not printed before, I thought here to exhibit, ad rei memoriam, as in form here followeth.

The Tenor of the Appeal of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury from the Pope to the next General Council.

IN the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt.

Firſt, my plain proteſtation made, that I intend to ſpeak nothing againſt one holy catholic and apoſtolic church, or the authority thereof (which authority I have in great reverence, and to whom my mind is in all things to obey) and if any thing peradventure, either by ſlipperineſs of tongue, or by indignation of abuſes, or elſe by the provocation of mine adverſaries be ſpoken or done otherwiſe than well, or not with ſuch reverence as becometh me, I am moſt ready to amend it.

Although the biſhop of Rome (whom they call pope) beareth the room of Chriſt in earth, and hath authority of God, yet by that power or authority he is not become unſinnable, neither hath he received that power to deſtroy, but to edify the congregation. Therefore if he ſhall command any thing that is not right to be done, he ought to take it patiently and in good part, in caſe he be not therein obeyed. And he muſt not be obeyed, if he command any thing againſt the precepts of God: no, rather he may lawfully be reſiſted, even as Paul withſtood Peter. And if he being aided by help of princes, deceived perchance by falſe ſuggeſtion, or with evil counſel, cannot be reſiſted, but the remedies of withſtanding him be taken away, there is nevertheleſs one remedy of appealing (which no prince can take away) uttered by the law of nature: foraſmuch as it is a certain defence, which is meet for every body by the law of God, of nature, and of man.

And whereas the laws do permit a man to appeal, not only from the griefs and injuries done, but alſo from ſuch as ſhall be done hereafter, or threatened to be done, inſomuch that the inferior cannot make laws of not appealing to a ſuperior power; and ſince it is openly enough confeſſed, that a holy general council, lawfully gathered together in the Holy Ghoſt, and repreſenting the holy catholic church, is above the pope, eſpecially in matters concerning faith; that he cannot make decrees that men ſhall not appeal from him to a general council: therefore I Thomas Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, or in time paſt ruler of the metropolitical church of Canterbury, doctor in divinity, do ſay and publiſh before you and the public notary, and witneſſes here preſent, with mind and intent to challenge and appeal from the perſons and griefs underneath written, and to proffer myſelf in place and time convenient and meet, to prove the articles that follow. And I openly confeſs, that I would lawfully have publiſhed them before this day, if I might have had either liberty to come abroad myſelf, or licence of a notary and witneſſes. But further than I am able to do, I know well is not required of the laws.

1. Firſt, I ſay, and publiſh that James by the mercy of God, prieſt, called Cardinal of the Pit, and of the title of our lady in the church of Rome, judge and commiſſary ſpecially deputed out of our moſt holy lord the pope (as he affirmed) cauſed me to be cited to Rome, there to appear fourſcore days after the citation ſerved on me, to make anſwer to certain articles touching the peril of my ſtate and life: and whereas I was kept in priſon with moſt ſtrait ward, ſo that I could in no wiſe be ſuffered to go to Rome, nor to come out of priſon (and in ſo grievous cauſes concerning ſtate and life, no man is bound to ſend a proctor) and though I would never ſo fain ſend my proctor, yet by reaſon of poverty I am not able (for all that ever I had, wherewith I ſhould bear my proctor's coſts and charges, is quite taken from me) nevertheleſs the moſt reverend cardinal aforeſaid doth ſore threaten me, that whether I ſhall appear or not, he will nevertheleſs yet proceed in judgment againſt me: wherein I feel myſelf ſo grieved, that nothing can be imagined more miſchievous or further from reaſon.

2. Secondly, The reverend father James Brooks, by the mercy of God biſhop of Glouceſter, judge and under-deputy (as he affirmeth) of the moſt reverend cardinal, cauſed me to be cited at Oxford, where I was then kept in priſon, to anſwer to certain articles, concerning the danger of my ſtate and life. And when I, being unlearned and ignorant in the laws, deſiring counſel of the learned in the law, that thing was moſt unrighteouſly denied me, contrary to the equity of all laws both of God and man. Wherein again I feel me moſt wrongfully grieved.

3. And when I refuſed the ſaid biſhop of Glouceſter to be my judge, for moſt juſt cauſes, which I then declared, he nevertheleſs went on ſtill, and made proceſs againſt me, contrary to the rule of the laws of appealing, which ſay, A judge that is refuſed ought not to proceed in the cauſe, but to leave off. And when he had required of me anſwers to certain articles, I refuſed to make him any anſwer: I ſaid I would yet gladly make anſwer to the moſt renowned king's and queen's deputies or attornies then preſent, with this condition notwithſtanding, that mine anſwer ſhould be extrajudicial, and that was permitted me. And with this my proteſtation made and admitted, I made anſwer; but my anſwer was ſudden and unprovided for: and therefore I deſired to have a copy of mine anſwers, that I might put to, take away, change and amend them; and this was alſo permitted me. Nevertheleſs, contrary to his promiſe made unto me, no reſpect had to my proteſtation, nor licence given to amend mine anſwer, the ſaid reverend father biſhop of Glouceſter, as I hear, commanded mine anſwers to be enacted contrary to the equity of the law. In which thing again I feel me much grieved.

4. Furthermore, I could not for many cauſes admit the biſhop of Rome's uſurped authority in this realm, nor conſent to it: for my ſolemn oath hindering me, which I made in the time of king Henry the eighth, of moſt famous memory, according to the laws of England. Secondly, becauſe I knew the authority of the biſhop of Rome which he uſurpeth, to be againſt the crown, cuſtoms, and laws of this realm of England, inſomuch, that neither the king can be crowned in this realm, without the moſt grievous crime of perjury; nor may biſhops enjoy their biſhoprics, nor judgments to be uſed according to the laws and cuſtoms of this realm, except by the biſhop of Rome's authority, be accurſed both the king and queen, the judges, writers, and executors of the laws and cuſtoms, with all that conſent to them. Finally, the whole realm ſhall be accurſed.

5. Moreover that heinous and uſurped authority of the biſhop of Rome, through reſervations of the biſhoprics, proviſions, annuates, diſpenſations, pardons, appellations, bulls, and other merchandize of Rome, was wont exceedingly to ſpoil and conſume the riches and ſubſtance of this realm, all which things ſhould follow again by recognizing and receiving of that uſurped authority unto the unmeaſurable loſs of this realm.

6. Finally, it is moſt evident by that uſurped authority, not only the crown of England to be under yoke, the laws and cuſtoms of this realm to be thrown down, and trodden under foot, but alſo the moſt holy decrees of councils, together with the precepts both of the goſpel and of God.

When in times paſt the Sun of righteouſneſs being riſen in the world, chriſtian religion by the preaching of of the apoſtles began to be ſpread very far abroad, and to flouriſh inſomuch that their ſound went out into all the world; innumerable people, which walked in darkneſs ſaw a great light, God's glory every where publiſhed did flouriſh, the only cark and care of the miniſters of the church was purely and ſincerely to preach Chriſt; the people to embrace and follow Chriſt's doctrine. Then the church of Rome, as it were lady of the world, both was, and alſo was counted worthily the mother of other churches, foraſmuch as then ſhe firſt begat to Chriſt, nouriſhed with the food of pure doctrine, did help them with their riches, ſuccoured the oppreſſed, and was a ſanctuary for the miſerable, ſhe rejoiced with them that rejoiced, and wept with them that wept. Then by the examples of the biſhops of Rome, riches were deſpiſed, worldly glory and pomp was trodden under foot, pleaſures and riot nothing regarded. Then this frail and uncertain life, being full of all miſeries, was laughed to ſcorn, whilſt through the example of Romiſh martyrs, men did every where preſs forward to the life to come. But afterward when the ungraciouſneſs of damnable ambition, never-ſatisfied avarice, and the horrible enormity of vices had corrupted and taken the ſee of Rome, there followed every where almoſt the deformities of all churches, growing out of kind into the manners of the church their mother, leaving their former innocency and purity, and ſlipping into foul and heinous uſages.

For the aforeſaid and many other griefs and abuſes (which I intend to prove, and to proffer myſelf in time convenient to prove hereafter) ſince reformation of the abovementioned abuſes is not to be looked for of the biſhop of Rome, neither can I hope by reaſon of his wicked abuſes and uſurped authority, to have him an equal judge in his own cauſe: therefore I do challenge and appeal in theſe writings from the pope, having no good council, and from the abovenamed pretences, commiſſions, and judges, from their citations, proceſſes, and from all other things that have or ſhall follow thereupon, and for every one of them, and from all their ſentences, cenſures, pains, and puniſhments of curſing, ſuſpenſion, and interdicting, and from all others whatſoever their denouncings and declarations (as they pretend) of ſchiſm, of hereſy, adultery, deprivation, degrading by them, or by any of them, in any manner or wiſe attempted, done and ſet forward hereafter (ſaving always their honours and reverences) as unequal and unrighteous, moſt tyrannical and violent, and from every grief to come, which ſhall happen to me, as well for myſelf as for all and every one that cleaveth to me, or will hereafter be on my ſide, unto a free general council, that ſhall hereafter lawfully be, and in a ſure place, to which place I or a proctor, deputed by me, may freely and with ſafety come, and to him or them, to whom a man may by the law, privilege, cuſtom, or otherwiſe challenge and appeal.

And I deſire the firſt, the ſecond and third time, inſtantly, more inſtantly, and moſt inſtantly, that I may have meſſengers, [Letters of protection and defence] if there be any man that will and can give me them. And I make open promiſe of proſecuting this mine appellation, by the way of diſannulling, abuſe, inequality, and unrighteouſneſs, or otherwiſe as I ſhall be better able: choice and liberty reſerved to me, to put to, diminiſh, change, correct, and interpret my ſayings, and to reform all things after a better faſhion, ſaving always to me every other benefit of the law, and to them that either be, or will be on my part.

And touching my doctrine of the ſacrament, and other my doctrine, of what kind ſoever it be, I proteſt that it was never my mind to write, ſpeak, or underſtand any thing contrary to the moſt holy word of God, or elſe againſt the holy catholic church of Chriſt, but purely and ſimply to imitate and teach thoſe things only, which I had learned of the ſacred ſcripture, and of the holy catholic church of Chriſt from the beginning, and alſo according to the expoſition of the moſt holy and learned fathers and martyrs of the church.

And if any thing hath peradventure chanced otherwiſe than I thought, I may err, but heretic I cannot be, foraſmuch as I am ready in all things to follow the judgment of the moſt ſacred word of God, and of the holy catholic church, deſiring none other thing, than meekly and gently to be taught, if any where (which God forbid) I have ſwerved from the truth.

And I proteſt and openly confeſs, that in all my doctrine and preaching, both of the ſacrament, and of other my doctrine whatſoever it be, not only I mean and judge thoſe things, as the catholic church, and the moſt holy fathers of old with one accord have meant and judged, but alſo I would gladly uſe the ſame words that they uſed, and not uſe any other words, but to ſet my hand to all and ſingular their ſpeeches, phraſes, ways and forms of ſpeech, which they do uſe in their treatiſes upon the ſacrament, and to keep ſtill their interpretation. But in this thing I only am accuſed for an heretic, becauſe I allow not the doctrine lately brought in of the ſacrament, and becauſe I conſent not to words not accuſtomed in ſcripture, and unknown to the ancient fathers, but newly invented and brought in by men, and belonging to the deſtruction of ſouls, and overthrowing of pure and old religion. Yea, even, &c.

This appeal being put up to the biſhop of Ely, he ſaid to the archbiſhop, My lord, our commiſſion is to proceed againſt you, Omni appellatione remota, and therefore we cannot admit it.

Why, quoth the archbiſhop, then you do me the more wrong: for my caſe is not as every private man's caſe. The matter is immediately between the pope and me, and none otherwiſe: and I think no man ought to be a judge in his own cauſe.

Well,

Well, quoth Ely, if it may be admitted it ſhall; and ſo received it of him. And then he began earneſtly to perſuade with the archbiſhop to conſider his ſtate, and to weigh it well, while there was time to do him good, promiſing to become a ſuiter to the king and queen for him; and ſo proteſted his great love and friendſhip that had been between them, heartily weeping, ſo that for a time he could not go on with his tale. After going forward, he earneſtly affirmed, that if it had not been the king and queen's commandment, whom he could not deny, elſe no worldly advantage ſhould have made him to have done it, concluding that to be one of the ſorrowfulleſt things that ever happened unto him. The archbiſhop gently ſeeming to comfort him, ſaid, he was very well content withal: and ſo they proceeded to his degradation: the perfect form whereof, with all the rites and ceremonies thereunto appertaining, taken out of the pope's pontifical, we have already deſcribed, (p. 120, 411.)

To be ſhort, when they came to take off his pall (which is a ſolemn veſture only belonging to an archbiſhop), then, ſaid he, Which of you hath a pall, to take off my pall? which imported as much as they being his inferiors, could not degrade him. Whereupon one of them anſwered, confeſſing that as they were but biſhops they were inferior to him, and therefore not competent judges: but as being the pope's delegates, they had authority to take his pall, which accordingly they did; and ſo proceeding took every thing in order from him, as it was put on. Then a barber clipped his hair round about, and the biſhop ſcraped the tops of his fingers where he had been anointed, wherein biſhop Bonner behaved himſelf as roughly and unmannerly, as the other biſhop was to him ſoft and gentle. Whilſt they were thus doing, All this, quoth the archbiſhop, needed not; I had myſelf done with this gear long ago. Laſt of all they ſtripped him out of his gown into his jacket, and put upon him a poor yeoman beadle's gown, full bare and nearly worn, and as ill ſhaped as one might probably ſee, and a townſman's cap on his head, and ſo delivered him to the ſecular power.

After this pageant of degradation, and all was finiſhed, then ſpake lord Bonner, ſaying to him, Now are you no lord any more: and ſo whenſoever he ſpake to the people of him (as he was continually barking againſt him), he ever uſed this term, This gentleman here, &c.

And thus with great compaſſion and pity of every man in this evil-favoured gown was he carried to priſon. Whom there followed a gentleman of Glouceſterſhire, with the archbiſhop's own gown, who ſtanding by, and being thought to be toward one of the biſhops, had it delivered unto him; who by the way talking with him, ſaid, the biſhop of Ely proteſted his friendſhip with tears. Yet, ſaid he, he might have uſed a great deal more friendſhip towards me, and never have been the worſe thought on, for I have well deſerved it: and going up into the priſon with him, aſked him if he would drink. Who anſwered him, ſaying, if he had a piece of ſalt fiſh, that he had a better will to eat; for he had been that day ſomewhat troubled with this matter, and had eaten little, but now that it is paſt, my heart, ſaid he, is well quieted. Whereupon the gentlemen ſaid, he would give him money with all his heart, for he was able to do it. But he being one toward the law, and fearing Mr. Farmer's caſe [who loſt all his lands for relieving a prieſt in the Tower in king Henry's time] durſt therefore give him nothing, but gave money to the bailiffs that ſtood by, and ſaid, that if they were good men they would beſtow it on him (for my lord of Canterbury had not one penny in his purſe to help him) and ſo left him, my lord bidding him earneſtly farewel, commending himſelf to his prayers, and all his friends. That night this gentleman was ſtayed by Bonner and Ely, for giving him this money: and but for the help of his friends, he had been ſent up to the council. Such was the cruelty and iniquity of the time, that men could not do good without puniſhment.

In this mean time while the archbiſhop was thus remaining in durance, whom they had kept now in priſon almoſt the ſpace of three years, the doctors and divines of Oxford buſied themſelves all that ever they could about Dr. Cranmer to perſuade him to recant, endeavouring by all the crafty practices and allurements they could invent to bring their purpoſe to paſs. And to the intent they might win him the more eaſily, they entertained him in the dean's houſe of Chriſt-church in the ſaid univerſity, where lacked no delicate fare, played at bowls, had his pleaſure for walking, and all other things that might bring him from Chriſt. And beſides all this, they ſecretly ſuborned certain men, who when they could not expugn him by arguments and diſputation, ſhould by intreaty and fair promiſes, or any other means allure him to a recantation; perceiving otherwiſe what a great wound they ſhould receive, if the archbiſhop had ſtood ſtedfaſt in his ſentence: and again on the other ſide, how great profit they ſhould get, if he, as the principal ſtandard-bearer, ſhould be overthrown. By reaſon whereof the wily papiſts flocked about him, with threatening, flattering, intreating, and promiſing, and all other means; eſpecially Henry Sydall, and Friar John de Villa Garcina a Spaniard, to the end to drive him, to the uttermoſt of their poſſibility, from his former ſentence to recantation.

Firſt, they ſet forth how acceptable it would be both to the king and queen, and eſpecially how gainful to him, and for his ſoul's health the ſame ſhould be. They added moreover, how the council and the noblemen bare him good will. They put him in hope, that he ſhould not only have his life, but alſo be reſtored to his ancient dignity, ſaying, it was but a ſmall matter, and ſo eaſy that they required him to do, only that he would ſubſcribe to a few words with his own hand; which if he did, there ſhould be nothing in the realm that the queen would not eaſily grant him, whether he would have riches or dignity; or elſe if he had rather live a private life in quiet reſt, in whatſoever place he liſted, without all public miniſtry, only that he would ſet his name in two words to a leaf of paper; but if he refuſed there was no hope of health and pardon: for the queen was ſo purpoſed, that ſhe would have Cranmer a catholic, or elſe no Cranmer at all. Therefore he ſhould chuſe whether he thought it better to end his life ſhortly in the flames and fire-brands now ready to be kindled, than with much honour to prolong his life until the courſe of nature did call him: for there was no middle way.

Moreover, they exhorted him that he would look to his wealth, his eſtimation and quietneſs, ſaying, that he was not ſo old, but that many years yet remained in this his ſo luſty age; and if he would not do it in reſpect of the queen, yet he ſhould do it for reſpect of his life, and not ſuffer that other men ſhould be more careful for his health than he was himſelf; ſaying, that this was agreeable to his learning and notable virtues; which being adjoined with his life would be profitable both to himſelf and to many others; but being extinct by death ſhould be fruitful to no man: that he ſhould take good heed that he went not too far; yet there was time enough to reſtore all things ſafe, and nothing wanted, if he wanted not to himſelf. Therefore they would have him to lay hold upon the occaſion of his health while it was offered, leſt if he ſhould now refuſe it, he might hereafter ſeek it when he could not have it.

Finally, if the deſire of life did nothing move him, yet he ſhould remember that to die is grievous in all ages, and eſpecially in theſe his years and flower of dignity it were more grievous: but to die in the fire and ſuch torments is moſt grievous of all. With theſe and like provocations theſe fair flatterers ceaſed not to ſollicit and urge him, uſing all poſſible means they could to draw him to their ſide; whoſe force his manly conſtancy did a great while reſiſt. But at laſt, when they made no end of calling and crying upon him, the archbiſhop being overcome, whether through their importunity, or by his own imbecility, or of what mind I cannot tell, at length gave his hand.

It might be ſuppoſed that it was done for the hope of life, and better days to come. But as we may ſince perceive, by a letter of his ſent to a lawyer, the greateſt cauſe why he deſired his time to be delayed, was that he would make an end of Marcus Antonius, which he had already begun: but howſoever it was, plain it was to be againſt his conſcience. The form of which recantation, made by the friars and doctors, whereunto he ſubſcribed, was this:

The Copy and Words of Dr. Cranmer's Recantation.

I Thomas Cranmer, late archbiſhop of Canterbury, do renounce, abhor and deteſt all manner of hereſies and errors of Luther and Zuinglius, and all other teachings which be contrary to ſound and true doctrine. And I believe moſt conſtantly in my heart, and with my mouth I confeſs one holy and catholic church viſible, without which there is no ſalvation; and thereof I acknowledge the biſhop of Rome to be ſupreme head in earth, whom I acknowledge to be the higheſt biſhop and pope, and Chriſt's vicar, unto whom all chriſtian people ought to be ſubject.

And as concerning the ſacraments, I believe and worſhip in the ſacrament of the altar the very body and blood of Chriſt, being contained moſt truly under the forms of bread and wine; the bread through the mighty power of God being turned into the body of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and the wine into his blood.

And in the other ſix ſacraments alſo, like as in this, I believe and hold as the univerſal church holdeth, and the church of Rome judgeth and determineth.

Furthermore, I believe that there is a place of purgatory, where ſouls departed be puniſhed for a time, for whom the church doth godly and wholeſomely pray, like as it doth honour ſaints, and make prayers to them.

Finally, in all things I profeſs, that I do not otherwiſe believe, than the catholic church and church of Rome holdeth and teacheth. I am ſorry that ever I held or thought otherwiſe. And I beſeech Almighty God, that of his mercy he will vouchſafe to forgive me, whatſoever I have offended againſt God or his church, and alſo I deſire and beſeech all chriſtian people to pray for me.

And all ſuch as have been deceived either by mine example or doctrine, I require them by the blood of Jeſus Chriſt, that they will return to the unity of the church, that we may be all one mind, without ſchiſm or diviſion.

And to conclude, as I ſubmit myſelf to the catholic church of Chriſt, and to the ſupreme head thereof, ſo I ſubmit myſelf unto the moſt excellent majeſties of Philip and Mary, king and queen of this realm of England, &c. and to all other their laws and ordinances, being ready always as a faithful ſubject ever to obey them. And God is my witneſs, that I have not done this for favour or fear of any perſon, but willingly and of mine own mind, as well to the diſcharge of mine own conſcience, as to the inſtruction of others.

This recantation of the archbiſhop was not ſo ſoon conceived, but the doctors and prelates without delay cauſed the ſame to be imprinted, and ſet abroad in all men's hands. Whereunto for better credit, firſt was added the name of Thomas Cranmer, with a ſolemn ſubſcription; then followed the witneſſes of this recantation, Henry Sydall, and friar John de villa Garcina. All this while Cranmer had no certain aſſurance of his life, although the ſame was faithfully promiſed to him by the doctors; but after they had their purpoſe, the reſt they committed to all adventure, as became men of that religion to do. The queen, having now gotten a time to revenge her old grief, received his recantation very gladly: but of her purpoſe to put him to death ſhe would nothing relent.

Now was Dr. Cranmer in a miſerable caſe, having neither inwardly any quietneſs in his own conſcience, nor yet outwardly any help in his adverſaries.

Beſides this, on the one ſide was praiſe, on the other ſide ſcorn, on both ſides danger, ſo that he could neither die honeſtly, nor yet honeſtly live. And whereas he ſought profit, he fell into double diſprofit, that neither with good men he could avoid ſecret ſhame, nor yet with evil men the note of diſſimulation.

In the mean time while theſe things were doing (as I ſaid) in the priſon amongſt the doctors, the queen taking ſecret counſel how to diſpatch Cranmer out of the way (who as yet knew not of her ſecret hate, and not expecting death), appointed Dr. Cole, and ſecretly gave him in commandment, that againſt the 21ſt of March, he ſhould prepare a funeral ſermon for Cranmer's burning, and ſo inſtructing him orderly and diligently of her will and pleaſure in that behalf, ſendeth him away.

Soon after the lord Williams of Tame, and the lord Shandois, Sir Thomas Bridges, and Sir John Brown were ſent for, with other worſhipful men and juſtices, commanded in the queen's name to be at Oxford at the ſame day, with their ſervants and retinue, leſt Cranmer's death ſhould raiſe there any tumult.

Dr. Cole having this leſſon given him before, and charged by her commandment, returned to Oxford, ready to play his part; who as the day of execution drew near, even the day before, came into the priſon to Dr. Cranmer, to try whether he abode in the catholic faith wherein before he had left him. To whom, when Cranmer had anſwered, that by God's grace he would be daily more confirmed in the catholic faith: Cole departing for that time, the next day following repaired to the archbiſhop again, giving no ſignification as yet of his death that was prepared: And therefore in the morning, which was the 21ſt day of March appointed for Cranmer's execution, the ſaid Cole coming to him, aſked him if he had any money, to whom when he had anſwered that he had none, he delivered him fifteen crowns to give to the poor to whom he would: and ſo exhorting him as much as he could to conſtancy in faith, departed thence about his buſineſs, as to his ſermon appertained.

By this partly, and other like arguments, the archbiſhop began more and more to ſurmiſe what they went about. Then becauſe the day was not far paſt, and the lords and knights that were looked for were not yet come, there came to him the Spaniſh friar, witneſs of his recantation, bringing a paper with articles, which Cranmer ſhould openly profeſs in his recantation before the people, earneſtly deſiring him that he would write the ſaid inſtrument with the articles with his own hand, and ſign it with his name: which when he had done, the ſaid friar deſired that he would write another copy thereof which ſhould remain with him, and that he did alſo. But yet the archbiſhop being not ignorant whereunto their ſecret devices tended, and thinking that the time was at hand in which he could no longer diſſemble the profeſſion of his faith with Chriſt's people, he put his prayer and his exhortation written in another paper ſecretly into his boſom, which he intended to recite to the people before he ſhould make the laſt profeſſion of his faith, fearing leſt if they heard the confeſſion of his faith firſt, they would not afterwards have ſuffered him to exhort the people.

Soon after about nine of the clock, the lord Williams, Sir Thomas Bridges, Sir John Brown, and the other juſtices, juſtices, with certain other noblemen, that were ſent of the queen's council, came to Oxford with a great train of waiting-men. Alſo of the other multitude on every ſide (as is wont in ſuch a matter) was made a great concourſe, and a greater expectation: For firſt of all, they that were of the pope's ſide were in great hope that day to hear ſomething of Cranmer that ſhould eſtabliſh the vanity of their opinion: the other part, who were indued with a better mind, could not yet doubt, that he who by continual ſtudy and labour for ſo many years had ſet forth the doctrine of the goſpel, either would or could now in the laſt act of his life forſake his part. Briefly, as every man's will inclined, either to this part or to that, ſo according to the diverſity of their deſires, every man wiſhed and hoped for. And yet becauſe in an uncertain thing the certainty could be known of none what would be the end; all their minds were hanging between hope and doubt. So that the greater the expectation was in ſo doubtful a matter, the more was the multitude that was gathered thither to hear and behold.

During this great expectation, Dr. Cranmer at length came from the priſon of Bocardo unto St. Mary's church, becauſe it was a foul and rainy day, the chief church in the univerſity, in this order. The mayor went before, next him the aldermen in their place and degree; after them was Cranmer brought between two friars, which mumbling to and fro certain Pſalms in the ſtreets, anſwered one another until they came to the church door, and there they began the Song of Simeon, Nunc dimittis, and entering into the church, the Pſalm-ſaying friars brought him to his ſtanding, and there left him. There was a ſtage ſet over againſt the pulpit, of a mean height from the ground, where Cranmer had his ſtanding, waiting until Dr. Cole made him ready to his ſermon.

The lamentable caſe and ſight of that man gave a ſorrowful ſpectacle to all chriſtian eyes that beheld him. He that late was archbiſhop, metropolitan, and primate of all England, and the king's privy counſellor, being now in a bare and ragged gown, and ill favouredly cloathed, with an old ſquare cap, expoſed to the contempt of all men, did admoniſh men not only of his own calamity, but alſo of their ſtate and fortune. For who would not pity his caſe and bewail his fortune, and might not fear his own chance, to ſee ſuch a prelate, ſo grave a counſellor, and of ſo long continued honour, after ſo many dignities, in his old years to be deprived of his eſtate, adjudged to die, and in ſo painful a death to end his life, and now preſently from ſuch freſh ornaments, to deſcend to ſuch vile and ragged apparel?

In this habit, when he had ſtood a good ſpace upon the ſtage, turning to a pillar near adjoining thereunto, he lifted up his hands to heaven and prayed unto God once or twice; till at length Dr. Cole coming into the pulpit, and beginning his ſermon, entered firſt into mention of Tobias and Zachary; whom after he had praiſed in the beginning of his ſermon for their perſeverance in the true worſhipping of God, he then divided his whole ſermon into three parts, according to the ſolemn cuſtom of the ſchools, intending to ſpeak firſt of the mercy of God: ſecondly, of his juſtice to be ſhewed: and laſt of all, how the prince's ſecrets are not to be opened. And proceeding a little from the beginning, he took occaſion by and by to turn his tale to Cranmer, and with many hot words reproved him, that once he being indued with the ſavour and feeling of wholſome and catholic doctrine, fell into the contrary opinion of pernicious error: which he had not only defended by writings, and all his power, but alſo allured other men to do the like, with great liberality of gifts, as it were appointing rewards for error; and after he had allured them, by all means did cheriſh them.

It were too long to repeat all things, that in long order were pronounced. The ſum of his tripartite declamation was, that he ſaid God's mercy was ſo tempered with his juſtice, that he did not altogether require puniſhment according to the merits of offenders, nor yet ſometimes ſuffered the ſame altogether to go unpuniſhed, yea, though they had repented. As in David, who when he was bidden chuſe of three kinds of puniſhment which he would, and he had choſen peſtilence for three days; the Lord forgave him half the time, but did not releaſe all: and that the ſame thing came to paſs in him alſo, to whom although pardon and reconciliation was due according to the canons, ſeeing he repented him of his errors, yet there were cauſes, why the queen and the council at this time judged him to death; of which, leſt he ſhould marvel too much, he ſhould hear ſome.

Firſt, that being a traitor, he had diſſolved the lawful matrimony between the king her father and mother; beſides the driving out of the pope's authority, while he was metropolitan.

Secondly, that he had been an heretic, from whom as from an author and only fountain, all heretical doctrine and ſchiſmatical opinions, that ſo many years have prevailed in England, did firſt riſe and ſpring: of which he had not been a ſecret favourer only, but alſo a moſt earneſt defender, even to the end of his life, ſowing them abroad by writings and arguments, privately and openly, not without great ruin and decay of the catholic church.

And further, it ſeemed meet, according to the law of equity, that as the death of the duke of Northumberland of late, made even with Tho. Moor, chancellor, that died for the church, ſo there ſhould be one that ſhould make even with Fiſher of Rocheſter: and becauſe that Ridley, Hooper, Farrar, were not able to make even with that man, it ſeemed that Cranmer ſhould be joined to them to fill up their part of equality.

Beſides theſe, there were other juſt and weighty cauſes which ſeemed to the queen and council, which was not meet at that time to be opened to the common people.

After this, turning his tale to the hearers, he bade all men beware by this man's example, that among men nothing is ſo high that can promiſe itſelf ſafety on the earth, and that God's vengeance is equally ſtretched againſt all men, and ſpareth none: therefore they ſhould beware, and learn to fear their prince. And ſeeing the queen's majeſty would not ſpare ſo notable a man as this, much leſs in the like cauſe would ſhe ſpare other men, that no man ſhould think to make thereby any defence of his error, either in riches or any kind of authority. They had now an example to teach them all, by whoſe calamity every man might conſider his own fortune; who from the top of dignity, none being more honourable than he in the whole realm, and next the king, was fallen into ſo great miſery, as they might now ſee, being a man of ſo high degree, ſometime one of the chiefeſt prelates in the church, and an archbiſhop, the chief of the council, the ſecond perſon in the realm of long time, a man thought in greateſt aſſurance, having a king on his ſide; notwithſtanding all his authority and defence, to be debaſed from high eſtate to a low degree, of a counſellor to become a caitiff, and to be ſet in ſo wretched a ſtate, that the pooreſt wretch would not change condition with him; briefly ſo heaped with miſery on all ſides, that neither was left in him any hope of better fortune, nor place for worſe.

The latter part of his ſermon he converted to the archbiſhop, whom he comforted and encouraged to take his death well, by many places of ſcripture, as with theſe and ſuch like; bidding him not to miſtruſt, but he ſhould incontinently receive that the thief did, to whom Chriſt ſaid, "This day thou ſhalt be with me in paradiſe." And out of St. Paul he armed him againſt the terror of the fire by this, "The Lord is faithful, which will not ſuffer you to be tempted above your ſtrength:" By the example of the three children, to whom God made the flame to ſeem like a pleaſant dew; adding alſo the rejoicing of St. Andrew in his croſs, the patience of St. Laurence on the fire, aſſuring him, that God, if he called on him, and to ſuch as die in his faith, either would abate the fury of the flame, or give him ſtrength to abide it.

He glorified God much in his converſion, becauſe it appeared to be only his work, declaring what travail and conference had been with him to convert him, and all prevailed not, till that it pleaſed God of his mercy to reclaim him, and call him home. In diſcourſing of which place, he much commended Cranmer, and qualified his former doings, thus tempering his judgment and talk of him, that all the time (ſaid he) he flowed in riches and honour, he was unworthy of his life: and now that he might not live, he was unworthy of death. But leſt he ſhould carry with him no comfort, he would diligently labour (he ſaid) and alſo he did promiſe, in the name of all the prieſts that were preſent, that immediately after his death there ſhould be dirges, maſſes and funerals executed for him in all the churches of Oxford for the ſuccour of his ſoul.

Cranmer in all this time with what great grief of mind he ſtood hearing this ſermon, the outward ſhews of his body and countenance did better expreſs, than any man can declare; one while lifting up his hands and eyes unto heaven, and then again for ſhame letting them down to the earth. A man might have ſeen the very image and ſhape of perfect ſorrow lively in him expreſſed. More than twenty ſeveral times the tears guſhed out abundantly, dropping down marvellouſly from his fatherly face. They that were preſent do teſtify, that they never ſaw in any child more tears, than came from him at that time, all the ſermon while; but eſpecially when they recited his prayer before the people. It is marvellous what commiſeration and pity moved all men's hearts, that beheld ſo heavy a countenance, and ſuch abundance of tears in an old man of ſo reverend dignity.

After Cole had ended his ſermon, he called back the people to prayers that were ready to depart. Brethren (ſaid he) leſt any man ſhould doubt of this man's earneſt converſion and repentance, you ſhall hear him ſpeak before you; and therefore I pray you, Mr. Cranmer, to perform that now which you promiſed not long ago; namely, that you would openly expreſs the true and undoubted profeſſion of your faith, that you may take away all ſuſpicion from men, and that all men may underſtand that you are a catholic indeed. I will do it (ſaid the archbiſhop) and that with a good will; who by and by riſing up, and putting off his cap, began to ſpeak thus unto the people.

I deſire you, well beloved brethren in the Lord, that you will pray to God for me, to forgive me my ſins, which above all men, both in number and greatneſs I have committed. But among all the reſt there is one offence which moſt of all at this time doth vex and trouble me, whereof in proceſs of my talk you ſhall hear more in its proper place, and then putting his hand into his boſom he drew forth his prayer, which he recited to the people, beginning in the following manner.

Good chriſtian people, my dearly beloved brethren and ſiſters in Chriſt, I beſeech you moſt heartily to pray for me to Almighty God, that he will forgive me all my ſins and offences, which be many without number, and great above meaſure. But yet one thing grieveth my conſcience more than all the reſt, whereof God willing, I intend to ſpeak more hereafter. But how great and how many ſoever my ſins be, I beſeech you to pray God of his mercy to pardon and forgive them all. And here kneeling down he ſaid the following prayer.

The Prayer of Dr. Cranmer, Archbiſhop.

"O Father of heaven, O Son of God, Redeemer of the world, O Holy Ghoſt, three Perſons and one God, have mercy upon me, moſt wretched caitiff and miſerable ſinner. I have offended both againſt heaven and earth, more than my tongue can expreſs. Whither then may I go, or whither ſhall I flee? To heaven I may be aſhamed to lift up mine eyes, and in earth I find no place of refuge or ſuccour. To thee therefore, O Lord, do I run, to thee do I humble myſelf, ſaying, O Lord my God, my ſins be great, but yet have mercy upon me for thy great mercy. The great myſtery that God became man, was not wrought for little or few offences. Thou didſt not give thy Son, O heavenly Father, unto death for ſmall ſins only, but for all the greateſt ſins of the world, ſo that the ſinner return to thee with his whole heart, as I do here at this preſent. Wherefore have mercy on me, O God, whoſe property is always to have mercy; have mercy upon me, O Lord, for thy great mercy. I crave nothing for mine own merits, but for thy name's ſake, that it may be hallowed thereby, and for thy dear ſon Jeſus Chriſt's ſake. And now therefore, Our Father of heaven, hallowed be thy name, &c." And then he riſing, ſaid:

Every man (good people) deſireth at the time of his death to give ſome good exhortation, that others may remember the ſame before their death, and be the better thereby: ſo I beſeech God grant me grace, that I may ſpeak ſomething at this my departing, whereby God may be glorified and you edified.

Firſt, it is an heavy cauſe to ſee that ſo many folk ſo much doat upon the love of this falſe world, and be ſo careful for it, that of the love of God, or the world to come, they ſeem to care very little or nothing. Therefore this ſhall be my firſt exhortation: That you ſet not your minds overmuch upon this deceitful world, but upon God, and upon the world to come, and to learn to know what this leſſon meaneth which St. John teacheth, "That the love of this world is hatred againſt God."

The ſecond exhortation is, That next under God you obey your king and queen willingly and gladly, without murmuring or grudging; not for fear of them only, but much more for the fear of God; knowing that they be God's miniſters, appointed by God to rule and govern you: and therefore whoſoever reſiſteth them, reſiſteth the ordinance of God.

The third exhortation is, That you love altogether like brethren and ſiſters. For alas, pity it is to ſee what contention and hatred one chriſtian man beareth to another, not taking each other as brother and ſiſter, but rather as ſtrangers and mortal enemies. But I pray you learn and bear well away this one leſſon, To do good unto all men, as much as in you lieth, and to hurt no man, no more than you would hurt your own natural loving brother or ſiſter. For this you may be ſure of, that whoſoever hateth any perſon, and goeth about maliciouſly to hinder or hurt him, ſurely, and without all doubt, God is not with that man, although he thinks himſelf never ſo much in God's favour.

The fourth exhortation ſhall be to them that have great ſubſtance and riches of this world, That they will well conſider and weigh three ſayings of the ſcripture: One is of our Saviour himſelf, who ſaith, Luke 18. "It is hard for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven." A ſore ſaying, and yet ſpoken by him who knoweth the truth.

The ſecond is of St. John, 1 John. 3. whoſe ſaying is this, "He that hath the ſubſtance of this world, and ſeeth his brother in neceſſity, and ſhutteth up his mercy from him, how can he ſay that he loveth God?

The third is of St. James, who ſpeaketh to the covetous rich man after this manner, "Weep you and howl for the miſery that ſhall come upon you: your riches do rot, your cloaths be moth-eaten, your gold and ſilver doth canker and ruſt, and their ruſt ſhall bear witneſs againſt you, and conſume you like fire; you gather a hoard or treaſure of God's indignation againſt the laſt day." Let them them that be rich ponder well theſe three ſentences: for if they ever had occaſion to ſhew their charity, they have it now at this preſent; the poor people being ſo many, and victuals ſo dear.

And now foraſmuch as I am come to the laſt end of my life, whereupon hangeth all my life paſt, and all my life to come, either to live with my maſter Chriſt for ever in joy, or elſe to be in pain for ever with wicked devils in hell, and I ſee before mine eyes preſent either heaven ready to receive me, or elſe hell ready to ſwallow me up: I ſhall therefore declare unto you my very faith how I believe: without any colour of diſſimulation: for now is no time to diſſemble, whatſoever I have ſaid or written in times paſt.

Firſt, I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, &c. And I believe every article of the catholic faith, every word and ſentence taught by our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, his apoſtles and prophets, in the New and Old Teſtament.

And now I come to the great thing which ſo much troubleth my conſcience, more than any thing that ever I did or ſaid in my whole life, and that is the ſetting abroad of a writing contrary to the truth; which now here I renounce and refuſe, as things written with my hand contrary to the truth which I thought in my heart, and written for fear of death, and to ſave my life if it might be; and that is, all ſuch bills and papers which I have written or ſigned with my hand ſince my degradation; wherein I have written many things untrue. And foraſmuch as my hand offended, writing contrary to my heart, therefore my hand ſhall firſt be puniſhed: for may I come to the fire, it ſhall be firſt burned.

And as for the pope, I refuſe him, as Chriſt's enemy and Antichriſt, with all his falſe doctrine.

And as for the ſacrament, I believe as I have taught in my book againſt the biſhop of Wincheſter, which my book teacheth ſo true a doctrine of the ſacrament, that it ſhall ſtand at the laſt day before the judgment of God, where the papiſtical doctrine contrary there ſhall be aſhamed to ſhew her face.

Here the ſtanders by were all aſtoniſhed, marvelled and amazed, and looked one upon another, whoſe expectation he had ſo notably deceived. Some began to admoniſh him of his recantation, and to accuſe him of falſhood.

Briefly, it was a world to ſee the doctors beguiled of ſo great an hope. I think there was never cruelty more notably or better in time deluded and deceived. For it is not to be doubted but they looked for a glorious victory, and a perpetual triumph by this man's retractation.

Who, as ſoon as they heard theſe things, began to let down their ears, to rage, fret and fume; and ſo much the more, becauſe they could not revenge their grief: for they could now no longer threaten or hurt him. For the moſt miſerable man in the world can die but once: and whereas of neceſſity he muſt needs die that day, though the papiſts had been never ſo well pleaſed; now being never ſo much offended with him, yet could he not be twice killed by them. And ſo when they could do nothing elſe unto him, yet leſt they ſhould ſay nothing, they ceaſed not to object unto him his falſhood and diſſimulation.

Unto which accuſation he anſwered, Ah my maſters (quoth he) do you not take it ſo. Always ſince I lived hitherto, I have been a hater of falſhood, and a lover of ſimplicity, and never before this time have I diſſembled; and in ſaying this, all the tears that remained in his body appeared in his eyes. And when he began to ſpeak more of the ſacrament and of the papacy, ſome of them began to cry out, yelp, and baul, and eſpecially Cole cried out upon him, Stop the heretic's mouth, and take him away.

And then Cranmer being pulled down from the ſtage was led to the fire, accompanied with thoſe friars, vexing, troubling, and threatening him moſt cruelly. What madneſs (ſay they) hath brought thee again into this error, by which thou wilt draw innumerable ſouls with thee into hell? To whom he anſwered nothing, but directed all his talk to the people, ſaving that to one troubling him in the way he ſpake, and exhorted him to get him home to his ſtudy, and apply his book diligently, ſaying, if he did diligently call upon God, by reading more he ſhould get knowledge.

But the other Spaniſh barker, raging and foaming, was almoſt out of his wits, always having this in his mouth, Non feciſti? Didſt thou it not?

But when he came to the place where the holy biſhops and martyrs of God, biſhop Latimer and biſhop Ridley were burnt before him for the confeſſion of the truth, kneeling down he pray'd to God, and not long tarrying in his prayers, putting off his garments to his ſhirt, he prepared himſelf to death. His ſhirt was made long down to his feet. His feet were bare. Likewiſe his head, when both his caps were off, was ſo bare that one hair could not be ſeen upon it. His beard was ſo long and thick, that it covered his face with marvellous gravity; and his reverend countenance moved the hearts both of his friends and enemies.

Then the Spaniſh friars John and Richard, of whom mention was made before, began to exhort him, and play their parts with him afreſh, but with vain and loſt labour. Cranmer with ſtedfaſt purpoſe abiding in the profeſſion of his doctrine, gave his hand to certain old men, and others that ſtood by, bidding them farewel.

And when he had thought to have done ſo likewiſe to Mr. Ely, the ſaid Ely drew back his hand and refuſed, ſaying, it was not lawful to ſalute heretics, and eſpecially ſuch a one as falſely returned unto the opinions that he had foreſworn. And if he had known before that he would have done ſo, he would never have uſed his company ſo familiarly, and chid thoſe ſergeants and citizens, who had not refuſed to give him their hands. This Mr. Ely was a ſtudent in divinity, and lately made a prieſt, being then one of the fellows in Brazen-noſe college.

Then was an iron chain ty'd about Cranmer, and they commanded the fire to be ſet unto him.

And when the wood was kindled, and the fire began to burn near him, he ſtretched forth his right hand, which had ſigned his recantation, into the flames, and there held ſo ſtedfaſt that all the people might ſee it burnt to a coal before his body was touch'd. In ſhort, he was ſo patient and conſtant in the midſt of theſe extreme tortures, that he ſeemed to move no more than the ſtake to which he was bound; his eyes were liſted up to heaven, and often he repeated his Unworthy right hand, ſo long as his voice would ſuffer him, and as often uſing the words of the bleſſed martyr St. Stephen, "Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit," till the fury of the flames putting him to ſilence, he gave up the ghoſt.

This fortitude of mind, which perchance is rare and not found among the Spaniards, when friar John ſaw, thinking it came not of fortitude, but of deſperation, although ſuch manner of examples which are of like conſtancy have been common here in England, he ran to the lord Williams of Tame, crying that the archbiſhop was vexed in mind, and died in great deſperation. But he, who was not ignorant of the archbiſhop's conſtancy, being unknown to the Spaniards, ſmiled only, and as it were by ſilence rebuked the friar's folly. And this was the end of this learned archbiſhop, whom, leſt by evil ſubſcribing he ſhould have periſhed, by well recanting God preſerved; and leſt he ſhould have lived longer with ſhame and reproof, it pleaſed God rather to take him away to the glory of his name and profit of his church. So good was the Lord both to his church, in fortifying the ſame with the teſtimony and blood of ſuch a martyr; and ſo good alſo to the man with this croſs of tribulation, to purge his offences in this world, not only of his recantation, but alſo of his his ſtanding againſt John Lambert and Mr. Allen, or if there were any other, with whoſe burning or blood his hand had been any thing before polluted. But eſpecially he had to rejoice, that dying in ſuch a cauſe, he was numbered amongſt the martyrs of Chriſt, and much more worthy of the name of St. Thomas of Canterbury, than he whom the pope falſly before did canonize.

And thus have you the full ſtory concerning the life and death of this reverend archbiſhop and martyr of God, Thomas Cranmer, and alſo of divers others, of whom this archbiſhop was the laſt that ſuffered in the middle of the reign of queen Mary, and almoſt the middle man that was burnt in her time.

Now proceed we to exhibit the letters which this worthy martyr left behind him, beginning firſt with his famous letter to queen Mary, which he wrote immediately after he was cited up to Rome by biſhop Brooks and his fellows, the tenor whereof is as followeth.

The Archbiſhop of Canterbury's Letter to Queen Mary.

MAY it pleaſe your majeſty to pardon my preſumption, that I dare be ſo bold to write to your highneſs. But very neceſſity conſtraineth me, that your majeſty may know my mind, rather by mine own writing than by other men's reports. So it is that upon Wedneſday, being the 12th day of this month, I was cited to appear at Rome the 80th day after, there to make anſwer to ſuch matters as ſhould be objected againſt me upon the behalf of the king and your moſt excellent majeſty, which matters the Thurſday following were objected againſt me by Dr. Martin and Dr. Story, your majeſty's proctors, before the biſhop of Glouceſter, ſitting in judgment by commiſſion from Rome. But (alas) it cannot but grieve the heart of a natural ſubject, to be accuſed of the king and queen of his own realm; and eſpecially before an outward judge, or by authority coming from any perſon out of this realm: where the king and queen, as if they were ſubjects within their own realm, ſhall complain and require juſtice at a ſtranger's hands againſt their own ſubject, being already condemned to death by their own laws. As though the king and queen could not do or have juſtice within their own realms againſt their own ſubjects; but they muſt ſeek it at ſtrangers hands in a ſtrange land: the like whereof (I think) was never ſeen. I would have wiſhed to have had ſome meaner adverſaries: and, I think, that death ſhall not grieve me much more, than to have my moſt dread and moſt gracious ſovereign lord and lady, to whom, under God, I do own all obedience, to be mine accuſers in judgment within their own realm, before any ſtranger and outward power. But foraſmuch as in the time of the prince of moſt famous memory, king Henry the eighth your grace's father, I was ſworn never to conſent, that the biſhop of Rome ſhould have or exerciſe any authority or juriſdiction in this realm of England, therefore leſt I ſhould allow his authority contrary to mine own oath, I refuſed to make anſwer to the biſhop of Glouceſter ſitting here in judgment by the pope's authority, leſt I ſhould run into perjury.

Another cauſe why I refuſed the pope's authority, is this, that his authority, as he claimeth it, repugneth to the crown imperial of this realm, and to the laws of the ſame; which every true ſubject is bound to defend. Firſt, for that the pope ſaith, that all manner of power, as well temporal as ſpiritual, is given firſt to him of God; and that the temporal power he giveth unto emperors and kings, to uſe it under him, but ſo as to be always at his commandment and beck.

But contrary to this claim, the imperial crown and juriſdiction temporal of this realm is taken immediately from God, to be uſed under him only, and is ſubject to none but God alone.

Moreover, to the imperial laws and cuſtoms of this realm the king in his coronation, and all juſtices when they receive their offices, be ſworn, and all the whole realm is bound to defend and maintain. But contrary hereunto, the pope by his authority maketh void, and commandeth to blot out of our books, all laws and cuſtoms being repugnant to his laws, and declareth accurſed all rulers and governors, all the makers, writers, and executioners of all ſuch laws or cuſtoms; as it appeareth by many of the pope's laws, whereof one or two I ſhall rehearſe. In the Decrees, Dict. 10. is written thus, "The conſtitutions or ſtatutes enacted againſt the canons and decrees of the biſhops of Rome or their good cuſtoms, are of none effect." Alſo, "We excommunicate all heretics of both ſexes, what name ſoever they be called by, and their favourers, receptors and defenders; and alſo them that ſhall hereafter cauſe to be obſerved the ſtatutes and cuſtoms made againſt the liberty of the church, except they cauſe the ſame to be put out of their records and chapters within two months after the publication thereof. Alſo we excommunicate the ſtatute-makers and writers of thoſe ſtatutes, and all the poteſtates, conſuls, governors and counſellers of places, where ſuch ſtatutes or cuſtoms ſhall be made or kept; and alſo thoſe that ſhall preſume to give judgment according to them, or ſhall notify in public from the matter ſo adjudged."

Now, by theſe laws, if the biſhop of Rome's authority which he claimeth by God, be lawful, all your grace's laws and cuſtoms of your realm, being contrary to the pope's laws, be naught, and as well your majeſty, as your judges, juſtices, and all other executors of the ſame, ſtand accurſed amongſt heretics, which God forbid. And yet this curſe can never be avoided, if the pope hath ſuch power as he claimeth, until ſuch time as the laws and cuſtoms of this realm being contrary to his laws, be taken away and blotted out of the laws-books. And although there be many laws of this realm, contrary to the laws of Rome, yet I named but a few; as to convict a clerk before any temporal judge of this realm for debt, felony, murder, or for any other crime; which clerks by the pope's laws are ſo exempt from the king's laws, that they can be no where ſued, but before their ordinary.

Alſo the pope by his laws may give all biſhoprics and benefices ſpiritual; which by the laws of this realm can be given but only by the king and other patrons of the ſame, except they fall into the lapſe.

By the pope's laws, Jus patronatus ſhall be ſued only before the eccleſiaſtical judge; but by the laws of the realm it ſhall be ſued before the temporal judge.

And to be ſhort, the laws of this realm do agree with the pope's laws like fire and water. And yet the kings of this realm have provided for their laws by the Præmunire; ſo that if any man have let the execution of the laws of this realm by any authority from the ſee of Rome, he falleth into the Præmunire.

But to meet with this, the popes have provided for their laws by curſing. For whoſoever hindered the pope's laws to have full courſe within this realm, by the pope's power ſtandeth accurſed; ſo that the pope's power treadeth all the laws and cuſtoms of this realm under his feet, curſing all that execute them, until ſuch time as they do give place unto his laws.

But it may be ſaid, that notwithſtanding all the pope's decrees, yet we do ſtill execute the laws and cuſtoms of this realm. Nay, not all quietly without interruption of the pope. And where we do execute them, yet we do it unjuſtly, if the pope's power be of force, and for the ſame we ſtand excommunicate, and ſhall do until we leave the execution of our own laws and cuſtoms. Thus we be well reconciled to Rome allowing ſuch authority, whereby the realm ſtandeth accurſed before God, if the pope have any ſuch authority.

Theſe things, as I ſuppoſe, were not fully opened in the parliament houſe, when the pope's authority was received again within this realm; for if they had, I do not believe that either the king or queen's majeſty, or the nobles of this realm, or the commons of the ſame, would ever have conſented to receive again ſuch a foreign authority, ſo injurious, hurtful and prejudicial, as well to the crown as to the laws and cuſtoms and ſtate of this realm, as whereby they muſt needs acknowledge themſelves to be accurſed. But none could open this matter well, but the clergy, and ſuch of them as had read the pope's laws, whereby the pope had made himſelf as it were a god. Theſe ſeek to maintain the pope, whom they deſired to have their chief head, to the intent they might have as it were a kingdom and laws within themſelves, diſtinct from the laws of the crown, and wherewith the crown may not meddle; and ſo being exempted from the laws of the realm, might live in this realm like lords and kings, without damage or fear of any man, ſo that they pleaſe their high and ſupreme head at Rome. For this conſideration, I think, ſome that knew the truth, held their peace in the parliament, whereas if they had done their duties to the crown and whole realm, they ſhould have opened their mouths, declared the truth, and ſhewed the perils and dangers that might enſue to the crown and realm.

And if I ſhould agree to follow ſuch authority within this realm, whereby I muſt needs confeſs, that your moſt gracious highneſs, and alſo your realm, ſhould ever continue accurſed, until ye ſhall ceaſe from the execution of your own laws and cuſtoms of your realm; I could not think myſelf true either to your highneſs, or to this my natural country, knowing that I do know. Ignorance, I know, may excuſe other men; but he that knoweth how prejudicial and injurious the power and authority which he challengeth every where, is to the crown-laws and cuſtoms of this realm, and yet will allow the ſame, I cannot ſee in any wiſe how he can keep his due allegiance, fidelity, and truth to the crown and ſtate of this realm.

Another cauſe I alledged, why I could not allow the authority of the pope, which is this; That by his authority he ſubverteth not only the laws of this realm, but alſo the laws of God: ſo that whoſoever be under his authority, he ſuffereth them not to be under Chriſt's religion purely, as Chriſt did command.

And for one example I brought forth, that whereas by God's laws all chriſtian people be bounden diligently to learn his word, that they may know how to believe and live accordingly, for that purpoſe he ordained holydays, when they ought, leaving apart all other buſineſs, to give themſelves wholly to know and ſerve God. Therefore God's will and commandment is, that when the people be gathered together, miniſters ſhould uſe ſuch language as the people may underſtand and take profit thereby, or elſe hold their peace. For as an harp or lute, if it give no certain ſound that men may know what is ſtricken, who can dance after it? for all the ſound is in vain. So it is in vain, and profiteth nothing, ſaith almighty God by the mouth of St. Paul, if the prieſt ſpeak to the people in a language which they know not; "For elſe he may profit himſelf, but profiteth not the people," ſaith St. Paul. But herein I was anſwered thus; that St. Paul ſpake only of preaching, that the preacher ſhould preach in a tongue which the people did know, or elſe the preaching availeth nothing: but if the preaching availeth nothing, being ſpoke in a language which the people underſtand not, how ſhould any other ſervice avail them, being ſpoken in the ſame language? And yet that St. Paul meant not only of preaching, it appeareth plainly by his own words. For he ſpeaketh by name expreſly of praying, ſinging, and thanking of God, and of all other things which the prieſts ſay in the churches, whereunto the people ſay Amen; which they uſe not in preaching, but in other divine ſervice; that whether the prieſts rehearſe the wonderful works of God, or the great benefits of God unto mankind above all other creatures, or give thanks unto God, or make open profeſſion of their faith, or humble confeſſion of their ſins, with earneſt requeſt of mercy and forgiveneſs, or make ſuit or requeſt unto God for any thing; then all the people underſtanding what the prieſts ſay, might give their minds and voices with them, and ſay, Amen, that is to ſay, allow what the prieſts ſay; that the rehearſal of God's univerſal works and benefits, the giving of thanks, the profeſſion of faith, the confeſſion of ſins, and the requeſts and petitions of the prieſts and of the people, might aſcend up into the ears of God all together, and be as a ſweet ſavour, odour, and incenſe in his noſe; and thus was it uſed many hundred years after Chriſt's aſcenſion.

But the aforeſaid things cannot be done when the prieſts ſpeak to the people in a language not known, and ſo they (or their clerk in their name) ſay Amen, but they cannot tell whereunto. Whereas St. Paul ſaith, "How can the people ſay Amen to thy well ſaying, when they underſtand not what thou ſayeſt?" And thus was St. Paul underſtood by all interpreters, both the Greeks and Latins, old and new, ſchool authors and others that I have read, until above thirty years paſt. At which time one Eckius with others of his ſort, began to deviſe a new expoſition, underſtanding St. Paul of preaching only.

But when a good number of the beſt learned men reputed within this realm, ſome favouring the old, ſome the new learning, as they term it (where indeed that which they call the new is indeed the old), but when a great number of ſuch learned men of both ſorts were gathered together at Windſor [1549] for the reformation of the ſervice of the church, it was agreed by both, without controverſy (not one ſaying contrary) that the ſervice of the church ought to be in the mother tongue; and that St. Paul in the 14th chapter to the Corinthians was ſo to be underſtood. And ſo is St. Paul to be underſtood in the civil law, more than a thouſand years paſt, where Juſtinian, a moſt godly emperor, in a ſynod writeth on this manner: "We command that all biſhops and prieſts celebrate the holy oblation and prayer uſed in holy baptiſm, not after a ſtill and cloſe manner, but with a clear loud voice, that they may be plainly heard by the faithful people, ſo as the hearers minds may be lifted up thereby with the greater devotion, in uttering the praiſes of the Lord God. For ſo Paul teacheth alſo in the epiſtle to the Corinthians, If the Spirit do only bleſs (or ſay well) how ſhall he that occupieth the place of a private perſon ſay Amen to thy thankſgiving? for he perceiveth not what thou ſayeſt. Thou doſt give thanks well; but the other is not edified." And not only the civil law, and all other writers a thouſand and five hundred years continually together have expounded St. Paul, not of preaching only, but of other ſervice ſaid in the church; but alſo reaſon giveth the ſame, that if men be commanded to hear any thing, it muſt be ſpoken in a language which the hearers underſtand, or elſe, as St. Paul ſaith, what availeth it to hear? So that the pope giving a contrary commandment, that the people coming to the church ſhall hear they know not what, and ſhall anſwer they know not whereto; taketh upon him to command, not only againſt reaſon, but alſo directly againſt God.

And again, I ſaid, whereas our Saviour Chriſt ordained the ſacrament of his moſt precious body and blood to be received by all chriſtian people under the forms of bread and wine, and ſaid of the cup, "Drink ye all of this:" the pope giveth a clean contrary commandment, that no layman ſhall drink of the cup of their ſalvation; as though the cup of ſalvation by the blood of Chriſt pertained not to laymen. And whereas Theophilus Alexandrinus, whoſe works St. Jerome did tranſlate about eleven hundred years paſt, ſaith, That if Chriſt had had been crucified for the devils, his cup ſhould not be denied them; yet the pope denieth the cup of Chriſt to chriſtian people, for whom Chriſt was crucified. So that if I ſhould obey the pope in theſe things, I muſt needs diſobey my Saviour Chriſt.

But I was anſwered hereunto, as commonly the papiſts do anſwer, that under the form of bread is whole Chriſt's fleſh and blood; ſo that whoſoever receiveth the form of bread, receiveth as well Chriſt's blood as his fleſh. Let it be ſo, yet in the form of bread only, Chriſt's blood is not drunk, but eaten; nor is it received in the cup in the form of wine, as Chriſt commanded, but eaten with the fleſh under the form of bread. And moreover, the bread is not the ſacrament of his blood, but of his fleſh only; nor is the cup of the ſacrament of his fleſh, but of his blood only. And ſo the pope keepeth from all lay-perſons the ſacrament of their redemption by Chriſt's blood, which Chriſt commandeth to be given unto them.

And furthermore, Chriſt ordained the ſacrament in two kinds, the one ſeparated from the other, to be a repreſentation of his death, where his blood was ſeparated from his fleſh, which is not repreſented in one kind alone: So that the lay-people receive not the whole ſacrament whereby Chriſt's death is repreſented as he commanded.

Moreover, as the pope taketh upon him to give the temperal ſword, by royal and imperial power, to kings and princes: ſo doth he likewiſe take upon him to depoſe them from their imperial ſtates, if they be diſobedient to him, and commandeth the ſubjects to diſobey their princes, aſſoyling the ſubjects as well of their obedience, as well as of their lawful oaths made unto their true kings and princes, directly contrary to God's commandment, who commandeth all ſubjects to obey their kings, or their rulers under them.

One John, patriarch of Conſtantinople, in the time of St. Gregory, claimed ſuperiority above all other biſhops. To whom St. Gregory writeth, that therein he did injury to his three brethren, which were equal with him, that is to ſay, the biſhop of Rome, the biſhop of Alexandria, and of Antioch: which three were patriarchal ſees, as well as Conſtantinople, and were brethren one to another. But (ſaith St. Gregory) if any one ſhall exalt himſelf above all the reſt, to be the univerſal biſhop, the ſame paſſeth in pride. But now the biſhop of Rome exalteth himſelf not only above kings and emperors, and above all the whole world, but takes upon him to give and take away, to ſet up and pull down as he ſhall think good. And as the devil having no ſuch authority, yet took upon him to give unto Chriſt all the kingdoms of the world, if he would fall down and worſhip him: in like manner the pope taketh upon him to give empires and kingdoms being none of his, to ſuch as will fall down and worſhip him, and kiſs his feet.

And moreover, his lawyers and gloſſers ſo flatter him, that they feign he may command emperors and kings to hold his ſtirrup when he lighteth from his horſe, and to be his footmen: and that if any emperor or king give him any thing, they give him nothing but what is his own, and that he may diſpenſe againſt God's word, againſt both the Old and New Teſtament, againſt St. Paul's epiſtles, and againſt the goſpel. And furthermore, whatſoever he doth, although he draw innumerable people by heaps with himſelf into hell, yet may not mortal man reprove him, becauſe he being judge of all men, may be judged of no man. And thus he ſitteth in the temple of God as if he were a god, and nameth himſelf God's vicar, and yet he diſpenſeth againſt God. If this be not to play Antichriſt's part, I cannot tell what is Antichriſt, which is no more to ſay, but Chriſt's enemy and adverſary; who ſhall ſit in the temple of God advancing himſelf above all other, yet by hypocriſy and feigned religion ſhall ſubvert the true religion of Chriſt, and under pretence and colour of Chriſt's religion ſhall work againſt Chriſt, and therefore hath the name of Antichriſt. Now if any man lift himſelf higher than the pope hath done, who lifteth himſelf above all the world; or can be more adverſary to Chriſt, than to diſpenſe againſt God's law; and where Chriſt hath given any commandment, to command directly the contrary, that man muſt needs be taken for Antichriſt. But until the time that ſuch a perſon may be found, men may eaſily conjecture where to find Antichriſt.

Wherefore ſeeing the pope thus to overthrow both God's laws and man's laws, taketh upon him to make emperors and kings to be vaſſals and ſubjects unto him, eſpecially the crown of this realm, with the laws and cuſtoms of the ſame; I ſee no mean how I may conſent to admit his uſurped power within this realm, contrary to mine oath, mine obedience to God's laws, mine allegiance and duty to your majeſty, and my love and affection to this realm.

This that I have ſpoken againſt the power and authority of the pope, I have not ſpoken (I take God to record and judge) for any malice I owe to the pope's perſon, whom I know not, but I ſhall pray to God to give him grace, that he may ſeek above all things to promote God's honour and glory, and not to follow the trade of his predeceſſors in theſe latter days.

Nor have I ſpoken it for fear of puniſhment, and to avoid the ſame, thinking it rather an occaſion to aggravate than diminiſh my trouble; but I have ſpoken it for my moſt bounden duty to the crown, liberties, laws, and cuſtoms of this realm of England, but moſt eſpecially to diſcharge my conſcience in uttering the truth to God's glory, caſting away all fear by the comfort which I have in Chriſt, who ſaith, "Fear not them that kill the body, and cannot kill the ſoul, but fear him that can caſt both body and ſoul into hell-fire." He that for fear to loſe this life will forſake the truth, ſhall loſe the life everlaſting: and he that for the truth's ſake will ſpend his life, ſhall find everlaſting life. And Chriſt promiſeth to ſtand faſt with them before his Father, which will ſtand faſt with him here. Which comfort is ſo great, that whoſoever hath his eyes fixed upon Chriſt, cannot greatly paſs on this life, knowing that he may be ſure to have Chriſt ſtand by him in the preſence of his Father in heaven.

And as touching the ſacrament, I ſaid; Foraſmuch as the whole matter ſtandeth in the underſtanding of theſe words of Chriſt, "This is my body, This is my blood;" I ſaid, that Chriſt in theſe words made demonſtration of the bread and wine, and ſpake figuratively, calling bread his body, and wine his blood, becauſe he ordained them to be ſacraments of his body and blood. And where the papiſts ſay in thoſe two points contrary unto me, that Chriſt called not bread his body, but a ſubſtance uncertain, nor ſpake figuratively: Herein I ſaid I would be judged by the old church, and which doctrine could be proved the elder, that I would ſtand unto. And foraſmuch as I have alledged in my book many old authors, both Greeks and Latins, which above a thouſand years after Chriſt continually taught as I do: if they could bring forth but one old author, that ſaith in theſe two points as they ſay, I offered ſix or ſeven years ago, and do offer yet ſtill, that I will give place unto them.

But when I bring forth any author that ſaith in moſt plain terms as I do, yet ſaith the other part, that the authors meant not ſo; as who ſhould ſay, that the authors ſpake one thing, and meant clean contrary. And upon the other part, when they cannot find any one author, that ſaith in the words as they ſay; yet ſay they, that the authors meant as they ſay. Now, whether I or they ſpeak more to the purpoſe herein, I refer me to the judgment of all impartial hearers; yea, the old church of Rome, above a thouſand years together, neither believed lieved nor uſed the ſacrament, as the Church of Rome hath done of late years.

For in the beginning, the church of Rome taught a pure and a ſound doctrine of the ſacrament. But after that the church of Rome fell into a new doctrine of tranſubſtantiation: with the doctrine they changed the uſe of the ſacrament contrary to that Chriſt commanded, and the old church of Rome uſed above a thouſand years. And yet to deface the old, they ſay that the new is the old: wherein for my part I am content to ſtand to the trial. But their doctrine is ſo fooliſh and uncomfortable, that I marvel that any man would allow it, if he knew what it was. But howſoever they bear the people in hand, that which they write in their books hath neither truth nor comfort.

For by their doctrine, of one body of Chriſt is made two bodies: one natural, having diſtance of members, with form and proportion of man's perfect body, and this body is in heaven: but the body of Chriſt in the ſacrament, by their own doctrine, muſt needs be a monſtrous body, having neither diſtance of members nor form, faſhion or proportion of a man's natural body. And ſuch a body is in the ſacrament (teach they) and goeth into the mouth with the form of bread, and entereth no further than the form of bread goeth, and tarrieth no longer than the form of bread is by natural heat in digeſting. So that when the form of bread is digeſted, that body of Chriſt is gone. And foraſmuch as evil men be as long in digeſting as good men, the body of Chriſt (by their doctrine) entereth as far, and tarrieth as long in wicked men as in godly men. And what comfort can be herein to any Chriſtian man to receive Chriſt's unſhapen body, and it to enter no further than the ſtomach, and to depart by and by as ſoon as the bread is conſumed?

It ſeemeth to me a more ſound and comfortable doctrine, that Chriſt hath but one body, and that hath form and faſhion of a man's true body; which body ſpiritually entereth into the whole man, body and ſoul: and though the ſacrament be conſumed, yet whole Chriſt remaineth, and feedeth the receiver unto eternal life, if he continue in godlineſs, and never departeth until the receiver forſake him. And as for the wicked, they have not Chriſt within them at all, who cannot be where Belial is. And this is my faith, and (as me ſeemeth) a ſound doctrine, according to God's word, and ſufficient for a chriſtian to believe in that matter. And if it can be ſhew'd unto me that the pope's authority is not prejudicial to the things before mentioned, or that my doctrine in the ſacrament is erroneous (which I think cannot be ſhewed) then I never was nor will be ſo perverſe to ſtand wilfully in my own opinion, but I ſhall with all humility ſubmit myſelf unto the pope, not only to kiſs his feet, but another part alſo.

Another cauſe why I refuſed to take the biſhop of Glouceſter for my judge, was the reſpect of his own perſon, being more than once perjured. Firſt, for that he being divers times ſworn never to conſent that the biſhop of Rome ſhould have any juriſdiction within this realm, but to take the king and his ſucceſſors for ſupreme heads of this realm, as by God's laws they be; contrary to that lawful oath, the ſaid biſhop ſat then in judgment by authority from Rome, wherein he was perjured, and not worthy to ſit as judge.

The ſecond perjury was, that he took his biſhopric both of the queen's majeſty and of the pope, making to each of them a ſolemn oath, which oaths be ſo contrary that the one muſt needs be perjured. And furthermore in ſwearing to the pope to maintain his laws, decrees, conſtitutions, ordinances, reſervations, and proviſions, he declareth himſelf an enemy to the imperial crown, and to the laws of this realm, whereby he declareth himſelf not worthy to ſit as a judge within this realm. And for theſe conſiderations I refuſed to take him for my judge.

Part of another Letter to the Queen.

I Learned by Dr. Martin, that at the day of your majeſty's coronation, you took an oath of obedience to the pope of Rome, and the ſame time you took another oath to this realm, to maintain the laws, liberties, and cuſtoms of the ſame. And if your majeſty did make an oath to the pope, I think it was according to the other oaths which he uſeth to adminiſter to princes; which is, to be obedient to him, to defend his perſon, to maintain his authority, honour, laws, lands and privileges. And if it be ſo (which I know not but by report) then I beſeech your majeſty to look upon your oath made to the crown and realm, and to expend and weigh the two oaths together, to ſee how they do agree, and then do as your grace's conſcience ſhall give you: For I am ſurely perſuaded, that willingly your majeſty will not offend, nor do againſt your conſcience for any thing.

But I fear that there be contradictions in your oaths, and that thoſe which ſhould have informed your grace thoroughly, did not their duties therein. And if your majeſty ponder the two oaths diligently, I think you ſhall perceive you were deceived; and then your highneſs may uſe the matters as God ſhall put in your heart. Furthermore, I am kept here from company of learned men, from books, from counſel, from pen and ink, except at this time to write unto your majeſty, which all were neceſſary for a man being in my caſe. Wherefore I beſeech your majeſty, that I may have ſuch of theſe as may ſtand with your majeſty's pleaſure. And as for my appearance at Rome, if your majeſty will give me leave, I will appear there. And I truſt that God ſhall put in my mouth to defend his truth there, as well as here. But I refer it wholly to your majeſty's pleaſure.

Another Letter of the Archbiſhop to Dr. Martin and Dr. Story.

I Have me commended unto you. And as I promiſed, I have ſent my letters unto the queen's majeſty unſigned, praying you to ſign them, and deliver them with all ſpeed. I might have ſent them by the carrier ſooner, but not ſurer. But hearing Mr. Bayliff ſay that he will go to the court on Friday, I thought him a meet meſſenger to ſend my letters by. For better is later and ſurer, than ſooner and never to be delivered. Yet one thing I have written to the queen's majeſty incloſed and ſealed; which I require you may be ſo delivered without delay, and not be opened until it be devered unto her grace's own hands. I have written all that I remember I ſaid, except that which I ſpake againſt the biſhop of Glouceſter's own perſon, which I thought not meet to write. And in ſome places I have written more than I ſaid, which I would have anſwered to the biſhop, if you would have ſuffered me.

You promiſed I ſhould ſee mine anſwers to the ſixteen articles, that I might correct, amend, and change them where I thought good, which your promiſe you kept not. And mine anſwer was not made upon mine oath, nor repeated, nor made in Judicio, but extra Judicium, as I proteſted; nor to the biſhop of Glouceſter as judge, but to you the king's and queen's proctors. I truſt you deal ſincerely with me without fraud or craft, and uſe me as you wiſh to be in like caſe yourſelves. Remember, that what meaſure you mete, the ſame ſhall be meaſured to you again. Thus fare you well, and God ſend you his Spirit to induce you into truth.

Ye heard before how archbiſhop Cranmer in the month of February was cited up to Rome, and in the month of March next following was degraded by the biſhop of Ely and biſhop Bonner. In time of which his degradation he put up his appellation.

In this his appellation, becauſe he needed the help of ſome good lawyer; he writeth to a friend of his about the ſame: the copy of which letter I thought good here to inſert as followeth.

A Letter of Archbiſhop Cranmer to a lawyer, for the drawing out of his Appeal.

THE law of nature requireth of all men, that ſo far forth as it may be done without offence to God, every one ſhould ſeek to defend and preſerve his own life. Which thing when I, about three days ago, bethought myſelf of, and therewithal remembered how that Martin Luther appealed in his time from pope Leo the tenth, to a general council (leſt I ſhould ſeem raſhly and unadviſedly to caſt away myſelf), I determined to appeal in like ſort to ſome lawful and free general council. But ſeeing the order and form of an appeal pertaineth to the lawyers, whereof I myſelf am ignorant, and ſeeing that Luther's appeal cometh not to my hand, I purpoſed to break my mind in this matter to ſome faithful friend, and ſkilful in the law, whoſe help I might uſe in this behalf, and you only among others came to my remembrance, as a man moſt meet in this univerſity for my purpoſe. But this is a matter that requireth great ſilence, ſo that no man know of it before it be done. It is ſo that I am ſummoned to make mine anſwer at Rome, the 16th day of this month, before which day I think it good, after ſentence pronounced, to make mine appeal. But whether I ſhould firſt appeal from the judge delegate to the pope, and ſo afterward to the general council, or elſe leaving the pope, I ſhould appeal immediately to the council, herein I ſtand in need of your counſel.

Many cauſes there be for which I think good to appeal. Firſt, becauſe I am by an oath bound never to conſent to the receiving of the biſhop of Rome's authority into this realm. Beſides this, whereas I utterly refuſed to make anſwer to the articles objected unto me by the biſhop of Glouceſter, appointed by the pope to be my judge, yet I was content to anſwer Martin and Story with this proteſtation, that mine anſwer ſhould not be taken as made before a judge, nor yet in place of judgment, but as pertaining nothing to judgment at all: moreover, after I had made mine anſwer, I required to have a copy of the ſame, that I might either by adding thereunto, or by altering or taking from it, correct and amend it as I thought good. Which, though both the biſhop of Glouceſter, and alſo the king and the queen's proctors promiſed me, yet have they altogether broken promiſe with me, and have not permitted me to correct my ſaid anſwers according to my requeſt; and yet notwithſtanding have, as I underſtand, regiſtered the ſame as acts formally done in place of judgment.

Finally, foraſmuch as all this my trouble cometh upon my departing from the biſhop of Rome, and from the popiſh religion, ſo that now the quarrel is betwixt the pope himſelf and me, and no man can be a lawful and indifferent judge in his own cauſe, it ſeemeth, methinks, good reaſon, that I ſhould be ſuffered to appeal to ſome general council in this matter; eſpecially ſeeing the law of nature (as they ſay) denieth no man the remedy of appeal in ſuch caſes.

Now, ſince it is very requiſite that this matter ſhould be kept as cloſe as may be, if perhaps for lack of ſkill herein you ſhall have need of further advice, then I beſeech you even for the fidelity and love you bear to me in Chriſt, that you will open to no creature alive whoſe the caſe is. And foraſmuch as the time is now at hand, and the matter requireth great expedition, let me obtain thus much of you, I beſeech you, that laying aſide all other your ſtudies and buſineſs for the time, you will apply this my matter only, till you have brought it to paſs. The chiefeſt cauſe in every deed, to tell you the truth, of this mine appeal is, that I might gain time (as it ſhall ſo pleaſe God) to live until I have finiſhed mine anſwer againſt Marcus Antonius Conſtantius, [S. Gardiner] which I have now in hand. But if the adverſaries of the truth will not admit mine appeal, as I fear they will not, God's will be done; I paſs not upon it, ſo that God may therein be glorified, be it by my life, or by my death. For it is much better for me to die in Chriſt's quarrel, and to reign with him, than here to be ſhut up and kept in the priſon of this body, unleſs it were to continue yet ſtill a while in this warfare, for the advantage and profit of my brethren, and to the further advancing of God's glory. To whom be all glory for evermore, Amen.

There is alſo yet another cauſe why I think good to appeal, that whereas I am cited to go to Rome to anſwer there for myſelf, I am notwithſtanding kept here faſt in priſon, that I cannot there appear at the time appointed: and moreover, foraſmuch as the ſtate I ſtand in is a matter of life and death, ſo that I have great need of learned counſel for my defence in this behalf; yet when I made my earneſt requeſt for the ſame, all manner of counſel, and help of proctors, advocates and lawyers, was utterly denied me.

Your loving friend, Thomas Cranmer.

Another Letter of Archbiſhop Cranmer, to Mrs. Wilkinſon, exhorting her to fly in the Time of Perſecution.

THE true Comforter in all diſtreſs is only God, through his Son Jeſus Chriſt; and whoſoever hath him, hath company enough, if he were in a wilderneſs all alone: and he that hath twenty thouſand in his company, if God be abſent, is in a miſerable wilderneſs and deſolation. In him is all comfort, and without him is none. Wherefore I beſeech you ſeek your dwelling there where you may truly and rightly ſerve God, and dwell in him, and have him ever dwelling in you. What can be ſo heavy a burden as an unquiet conſcience, to be in ſuch a place as a man cannot be ſuffered to ſerve God in Chriſt's religion? If you be loth to depart from your kindred and friends, remember that Chriſt calleth them his mother, ſiſters, and brothers, that do his Father's will. Where we find therefore God truly honoured according to his will, there we can lack neither friend nor kindred.

If you be loth to depart for the ſlander of God's word, remember that Chriſt, when his hour was not yet come, departed out of his country into Samaria, to avoid the malice of the ſcribes and phariſees; and commanded his apoſtles that if they were purſued in one place they ſhould fly to another. And was not Paul let down by a baſket out at a window, to avoid the perſecution of Aretas? And what wiſdom and policy he uſed from time to time to eſcape the malice of his enemies, the Acts of the apoſtles do declare. And after the ſame ſort did the other apoſtles, albeit, when it came to ſuch a point, that they could no longer eſcape danger of the perſecutors of God's true religion, then they ſhewed themſelves, that they flying before came not of fear, but of godly wiſdom to do more good; and that they would not raſhly, without urgent neceſſity, offer themſelves to death, which had been but a temptation of God. Yea, when they were apprehended, and could no longer avoid, then they ſtood boldly to the profeſſion of Chriſt; then they ſhewed how little they paſſed of death; how much they feared God more than men; how much they loved and preferred the eternal life to come above this ſhort and miſerable life.

Wherefore I exhort you as well by Chriſt's commandment, as by the example of him and his apoſtles, to withdraw yourſelf from the malice of yours and God's enemies, into ſome place where God is moſt purely ſerved; which which is no ſlandering of the truth, but a preſerving of yourſelf to God, and the truth, and to the ſociety, and comfort of Chriſt's little flock. And that you will do, do it with ſpeed, leſt by your own folly you fall into the perſecutor's hand. And the Lord ſend his Holy Spirit to lead and guide you whereſoever you go, and all that be godly will ſay, Amen.

Unto theſe former letters of Dr. Cranmer, archbiſhop, written by him unto others, it ſeemeth to me not much out of place to annex withal a certain letter alſo of Dr. Taylor, written to him and his fellow-priſoners: the tenor of which letter here followeth.

To my dear Fathers and Brethren, Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, Priſoners in Oxford, for the faithful Teſtimony of God's holy Word.

RIGHT reverend fathers in the Lord, I wiſh you to enjoy continually God's grace and peace, through Jeſus Chriſt; and God be praiſed again for this your moſt excellent promotion which ye are called unto at this preſent, that is, that ye are counted worthy to be allowed amongſt the number of Chriſt's records and witneſſes. England hath but a few learned biſhops, that would ſtick to Chriſt ad ignem incluſivè. Once again I thank God heartily in Chriſt for your moſt happy onſet, moſt valiant proceeding, moſt conſtant ſuffering of all ſuch infamies, hiſſings, clappings, taunts, open rebukes, loſs of living and liberty, for the defence of God's cauſe, truth and glory. I cannot utter with pen how I rejoice in my heart for you three ſuch captains in the foreward under Chriſt's croſs, banner or ſtandard, in ſuch a cauſe and ſkirmiſh; when not only one or two of our dear Redeemer's ſtrong holds are beſieged, but all his chief caſtles ordained for our ſafeguard, are traiterouſly impugned. This your enterprize in the ſight of all that be in heaven, and of all God's people in earth, is moſt pleaſant to behold. This is another manner of nobility than to be in the fore-front in worldly warfares. For God's ſake pray for us, for we fail not daily to pray for you. We are ſtronger and ſtronger in the Lord, his name be praiſed, and we doubt not but ye be ſo in Chriſt's own ſweet ſchool. Heaven is all and wholly of our ſide; therefore rejoice always in the Lord: and again, rejoice and be glad.

Your aſſured in Chriſt,
Rowland Taylor.

On the Recantation of Archbiſhop Cranmer, while in Priſon.

HOW near, great Cranmer, had thy footſteps fail'd,
But thou'rt recover'd with a ſteadier pace:
Thy fall to thy ſure goings much avail'd,
And brought thee more into thy Saviour's grace.
Denying makes thee bolder own thy cauſe;
So good from evil oft th' Almighty draws.

Beſides, 'tis lawful fraud 'gainſt fraud to uſe,
Since the falſe popiſh tribe (we always find)
Endeavour ſtrongly others to abuſe.
They're now but juſtly ſerv'd in their own kind.
This pious fraud then let us boldly own,
And give the glory unto God alone.

On his Death.

UNhappy's he wh' offends his God, howe'er
His outward bleſſings to the world appear;
But he who ſerves him's happy, tho' forlorn,
Tho' doom'd to death and univerſal ſcorn.
This, Cranmer, was thy fate, unhappy made,
By thee too flatt'ring love of life betray'd.
But, to that trifle, when you death preferr'd,
Eternal happineſs was your reward.

Agnes Potten, and Joan Trunchfield, Martyrs, perſecuted in Suffolk.

IN the ſtory of Robert Samuel, (p. 332.) mention was made before of two godly women of the ſame town of Ipſwich, who ſhortly after him ſuffered likewiſe, and obtained the crown of martyrdom: the names of whom were, Agnes, the wife of Robert Potten; and another, wife of Michael Trunchfield, a ſhoemaker, both dwelling in one town: who about the ſame time that the archbiſhop aforeſaid was burnt at Oxford, ſuffered likewiſe in the aforeſaid town of Ipſwich, either in the ſame month of March, or as ſome ſay, in the end of February before.

Their opinion or perſuaſion was this, that in the ſacrament was the memorial only of Chriſt's death and paſſion: for, ſaid they, Jeſus Chriſt is aſcended up into heaven, and is on the right hand of God the Father, according to the ſcriptures, and not in the ſacrament, as he was born of the virgin Mary.

For this they were burnt. In whoſe ſuffering their conſtancy worthily was to be wondered at, who being ſo ſimple women, ſo manfully ſtood to the confeſſion and teſtimony of God's word and verity: inſomuch, that when they had prepared and undreſſed themſelves ready to the fire, with comfortable words of the ſcripture they earneſtly required the people to credit and to lay hold on the word of God, and not upon man's devices and inventions, deſpiſing the ordinances and inſtitutions of the Romiſh Antichriſt, with all his ſuperſtitions and rotten religion; and ſo continuing in the torment of fire, they held up their hands and called unto God conſtantly ſo long as life did endure.

This Potten's wife, one night, a little before her death, being aſleep in her bed, ſaw a burning fire, right up as a pole, and on the ſide of the fire ſhe thought there ſtood a number of queen Mary's friends looking on. Then being aſleep, ſhe ſeemed to muſe with herſelf whether her fire ſhould burn ſo bright or no: and indeed her ſuffering was not far unlike to her dream.

This alſo I thought further to note, how theſe two, being always together in priſon, the one which was Michael's wife, ſeemed to be nothing ſo ardent and zealous as Potten's wife was, although God be thanked they did both ſtoutly ſtand to the confeſſion of the truth; but when the ſaid Michael's wife came to the ſtake, and ſaw nothing but preſent death before her, ſhe much exceeded the other in joy and comfort; albeit both of them did ſo joyfully ſuffer, as it was marvelled at of thoſe who knew them, and did behold their end. And thus theſe two martyrs ended their lives with great triumph: the Lord grant we may do the like, Amen.

The Hiſtory of John Maundrel, William Coberley, and John Spicer, Martyrs, perſecuted in the Dioceſe of Saliſbury.

JOHN MAUNDREL, was the ſon of Robert Maundrel, of Rowd, in the county of Wilts, farmer; he was from his childhood brought up in huſbandry, and when he came to man's eſtate, he dwelt in a village called Buchampten, in the pariſh of Kevel, in the county aforeſaid, where he lived in good repute with his wife and children. After the ſcripture was tranſlated into Engliſh by William Tindall, this John Maundrel became a diligent hearer thereof, and a fervent embracer of God's true religion, ſo that he delighted in nothing ſo much, as to hear and ſpeak of God's word, never being without the New Teſtament about him, although he could not read himſelf. But when he came into any company that could read, his book was always ready, having a good memory, ſo that he could recite by heart moſt places of the New Teſtament; his life and converſation being very honeſt and charitable, as his neighbours are able to teſtify.

So it was, that in the days of king Henry the eighth, at which time Dr. Trigonion and Dr. Lee did viſit abbeys, the ſaid John Maundrel was brought before Dr. Trigonion at an abbey called Edyngton in Wiltſhire; where he was accuſed that he had ſpoken againſt the holy water and holy bread, and ſuch like ceremonies, and for the ſame did wear a white ſheet, bearing a candle in his hand about the market, in the town of the Devizes, which is in the ſaid county. Nevertheleſs his fervency did not abate, but by God's merciful aſſiſtance he took better hold, as the ſequel thereof did declare.

For in the days of queen Mary, when popery was reſtored again, and God's true religion put to ſilence, the ſaid John Maundrel left his own houſe and went into Glouceſterſhire, and into the north part of Wiltſhire, wandering from one to another to ſuch men as he knew feared God, with whom, as a ſervant to keep their cattle, he there did remain with one John Bridges, or ſome other at Kingſwood; but after a time he returned to his country, and there coming to the Devizes to a friend of his, named Anthony Clee, had talk and conference with him in a garden, of returning home to his houſe.

And when the other exhorted him by the words of ſcripture, to fly from one city to another, he replied again by the words of the Revelations 21. of them that be fearful, &c. ſaid, that he muſt needs go home, and ſo did. Where he with Spicer and Coberley uſed at times to reſort and confer together.

At length upon the Sunday following they agreed together to go to the pariſh church, called Kevel, where the ſaid Maundrel and the other two ſeeing the pariſhioners in the proceſſion to follow and worſhip the idol there carried, advertiſed them to leave the ſame, and to return to the living God, namely ſpeaking to one Robert Barkſdale, head-man of the pariſh, but he took no regard to their words.

After this the vicar came into the pulpit, who there being about to read his bead-roll, and to pray for the ſouls in purgatory, the ſaid John Maundrel, ſpeaking with an audible voice, ſaid, that was the pope's pinfold, the other two affirming the ſame. After which words, by command of the prieſt, they were had to the ſtocks, where they remained till their ſervice was done, and then were brought before a juſtice of peace, and the next day were all three carried to Saliſbury, and preſented before biſhop Capon, and W. Geffrey being chancellor of the dioceſe. By whom they were impriſoned, and oftentimes examined of their faith in their houſes, but ſeldom openly. And at the laſt examination theſe were the articles which the chancellor alledged againſt them, being accompanied with the ſheriff of the ſhire, Mr. St. Johns, and other popiſh prieſts in the pariſh church of Fiſherton Anger, demanding how they did believe.

They anſwered, as chriſtian men ſhould and ought to believe: and firſt they ſaid, they believed in God the Father, and in the Son, and in the Holy Ghoſt, the twelve articles of the creed, the holy ſcriptures from the firſt of Geneſis to the laſt of the Revelations.

But that faith the chancellor would not allow. Wherefore he poſed them in particular articles: Firſt, whether they did not believe, that in the ſacrament of the altar (as he termed it) after the words of conſecration ſpoken by the prieſt at maſs, there remained no ſubſtance of bread nor wine, but Chriſt's body, fleſh and blood, as he was born of the virgin Mary. Whereunto they anſwered negatively, ſaying, that the popiſh maſs was abominable idolatry, and injurious to the blood of Chriſt; but confeſſing that in a faithful congregation, receiving the ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood, being duly adminiſtered according to Chriſt's inſtitution, Chriſt's body and blood is ſpiritually received of the faithful believer.

Alſo, being aſked whether the pope was ſupreme head of the church, and Chriſt's vicar on earth; they anſwered negatively, ſaying, that the biſhop of Rome doth uſurp over emperors and kings, being antichriſt, and God's enemy.

The chancellor ſaid, Will you have the church without head? They anſwered, Chriſt was head of the church, and under Chriſt the queen's majeſty.

What, ſaid the chancellor, a woman head of the church? Yea, ſaid they, within her grace's dominions.

Alſo, whether the ſouls in purgatory were delivered by the pope's pardon, and the ſuffrages of the church?

They ſaid, they believed faithfully that the blood of Chriſt had purged their ſins, and the ſins of them that were ſaved, unto the end of the world, ſo that they feared nothing the pope's purgatory, or eſteemed his pardons.

Alſo, whether images were neceſſary to be in the churches, as lay-men's books, and ſaints to be prayed unto and worſhipped.

They anſwered negatively; John Maundrel adding, that wooden images were good to roaſt a ſhoulder of mutton, but evil in the church: whereby idolatry was committed.

Thoſe articles thus anſwered (for their articles were one, and their anſwers in manner alike), the chancellor read their condemnation, and ſo delivered them to the ſheriff. Then ſpake John Spicer, ſaying, O maſter ſheriff, now muſt you be their butcher, that you may be guilty alſo with them of innocent blood before the Lord. This was the 23d day of March 1556, and the 24th day of the ſame month they were carried out of the common gaol to a place betwixt Saliſbury and Wilton, where were two poſts ſet for them to be burnt at. Which men coming to the place, kneeled down, and made their prayers ſecretly together, and then being uncloathed to their ſhirts, John Maundrel ſpake with a loud voice, Not for all Saliſbury. Which words men judged to be an anſwer to the ſheriff, who offered him the queen's pardon if he would recant. And after that in like manner ſpake John Spicer, ſaying, This is the joyfulleſt day that ever I ſaw. Thus were they three burnt at two ſtakes: where moſt conſtantly they gave their bodies to the fire, and their ſouls to the Lord, for teſtimony of his truth.

As touching William Coberley, this moreover is to be noted, that his wife alſo, called Alice, being apprehended, was detained in the keeper's houſe at the ſame time that her huſband was in priſon. Where the keeper's wife, named Agnes Penicote, had ſecretly heated a key fire-hot, and laid it in the graſs in the backſide. So ſpeaking to Alice Coberley to fetch her the key in all haſte, the ſaid Alice went with ſpeed to bring the key, and ſo taking up the key in haſte did piteouſly burn her hand. Whereupon ſhe crying out at the ſudden burning of her hand, Ah thou drab, quoth the other, thou that canſt not abide the burning of the key, how wilt thou be able to abide burning thy whole body? and ſo ſhe afterward revoked.

But to return again to the ſtory of Coberley, who being at the ſtake, was ſomewhat long a burning as the wind ſtood: after his body was ſcorched with the fire, and his left arm drawn and taken from him by the violence of the fire, that the fleſh being burnt to the white bone, at length he ſtooped over the chain, and with the right-hand, being ſomewhat ſtarkned, knocked upon his breaſt ſoftly, the blood and matter iſſuing out of his mouth. Afterward when they all thought he had been dead, ſuddenly he roſe upright with his body again. And thus much concerning theſe three Saliſbury martyrs.

A Diſcourſe of the Death of Six other Martyrs ſuffering at London, whoſe Names follow.

ABOUT the 23d day of April, 1556, were burned in Smithfield at one fire, theſe ſix conſtant martyrs of Chriſt, ſuffering for the profeſſion of the goſpel, viz.

Robert Drakes, Miniſter.	Thomas Spurge, Fuller.
William Tyms, Curate.	John Cavel, Weaver.
Richard Spurge, Sheerman.	George Ambroſe, Fuller.

They were all of Eſſex, and ſo of the dioceſe of London, and were ſent up, ſome by the lord Rich, and ſome by others at ſundry times, unto Stephen Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, then lord chancellor of England, about the 22d day of March, 1555; who after ſmall examination, ſent them, ſome unto the King's-bench, and others unto the Marſhalſea, where they remained almoſt all the whole year, until the death of the ſaid biſhop of Wincheſter, and had during that time nothing ſaid unto them. Whereupon after that Dr. Heath, archbiſhop of York, was choſen to the office of lord chancellor, four of theſe perſecuted brethren now weary of this their long impriſonment, made their ſupplication unto the ſaid Dr. Heath, requiring his favour and aid for their deliverance: the copy whereof enſueth.

To the Moſt Reverend Father in God, Thomas, Archbiſhop of York, Lord Chancellor of England.

MAY it pleaſe your honourable good lordſhip, for the love of God to tender the humble ſuit of your lordſhip's poor orators, whoſe names are ſubſcribed, who have lain in great miſery in the Marſhalſea, for the ſpace of ten months and more, at the commandment of the late lord chancellor, to their utter ruin, with their wives and children. In conſideration whereof your lordſhip's ſaid orators do moſt humbly pray and beſeech your good lordſhip, to ſuffer them to be brought before your honour; and there, if any man of good conſcience can lay any thing to our charge, we truſt either to declare our innocency againſt their accuſation, or if otherwiſe their accuſations can be proved true and we faulty, we are ready (God helping us) with our condign puniſhments to ſatisfy the law according to your wiſe judgment, as we hope, full of fatherly mercy towards us and all men, according to your godly office, and in which we pray for your godly ſucceſs to the good pleaſure of God, Amen.

This ſupplication was ſent (as is ſaid) and ſubſcribed with the names of theſe four underwritten:

Richarge Spurge.	George Ambroſe.
Thomas Spurge.	John Cavel.

Richard Spurge.

UPON the receipt hereof, it was not long after, but Sir Richard Read, knight, then one of the officers of the court of Chancery, the 16th day of January, was ſent unto the Marſhalſea to examine the ſaid four priſoners; and therefore beginning firſt with Richard Spurge upon certain demands, received his anſwers thereunto: the effect whereof was, that he with others were complained upon by the parſon of Bocking, unto the lord Rich, for not coming to their pariſh church of Bocking, where they had inhabited; thereupon was by the ſaid lord Rich ſent unto the late lord chancellor, about the 22d of March laſt, Anno 1555.

And farther, he ſaid, that he came not to the church ſince the firſt alteration of the Engliſh ſervice into Latin (Chriſtmas-day then a twelvemonth only excepted), and that becauſe he miſliked both the ſame and the maſs alſo, as not conſonant and agreeing with God's holy word.

Moreover, he required that he might not be any more examined upon the matter, unleſs it pleaſed the lord chancellor that then was, to know his fault therein, which to him he would willingly utter.

Thomas Spurge.

THOMAS Spurge being then next examined, made the ſame anſwer in effect that the other had done; confeſſing, that he abſented himſelf from the church, becauſe the word of God was not there truly taught, nor the ſacraments of Chriſt duly adminiſtered in ſuch ſort as was preſcribed by the ſame word. And being farther examined of his belief concerning the ſacrament of the altar, he ſaid, That if any could accuſe him thereof, he would then make anſwer as God had given him knowledge therein.

George Ambroſe.

THE like anſwer made George Ambroſe, adding moreover, that after he had read the late biſhop of Wincheſter's book; intituled, De vera Obedientia, with Bonner's preface thereunto annexed, inveighing both againſt the authority of the biſhop of Rome, he did ſet much leſs by their doings than before.

John Cavel.

JOHN Cavel agreeing in other matters with them, anſwered, that the cauſe why he did forbear coming to church, was, that the parſon there had preached two contrary doctrines. For firſt, in a ſermon that he made at the queen's firſt entry to the crown, he did exhort the people to believe the goſpel; for it was the truth, and if they did not believe it, they ſhould be damned. But in a ſecond ſermon, he preached that the Teſtament was falſe in forty places, which contrariety in him was a cauſe, amongſt others, of his abſenting from the church.

Robert Drakes.

ABOUT the fourth day of March next after, Robert Drakes was alſo examined, who was parſon of Thunderſley, in Eſſex, and had there remained for the ſpace of three years. He was firſt made deacon by Dr. Taylor of Hadley, at the commandment of Dr. Cranmer, late archbiſhop of Canterbury. And within one year after (which was the third year after king Edward), he was by the ſaid archbiſhop, and Dr. Ridley, biſhop of London, admitted miniſter of God's holy word and ſacraments, not after the order then in force, but after ſuch order as was after eſtabliſhed; and was preſented unto the ſaid benefice of Thunderſley, by the lord Rich, at the ſuit of Mr. Cauſton and Mr. Treheron; and now notwithſtanding was ſent up by the ſaid lord Rich, with the others before-mentioned: and at his coming to the biſhop of Wincheſter, was by him demanded whether he could conform himſelf like a ſubject to the laws of this realm then in force. To whom he ſaid, he would abide all laws that ſtood with the laws of God; and thereupon was committed to priſon, where he, and the reſt above-named, did reman ever ſince.

The

The Hiſtory of William Tyms, Deacon, and Curate of Hockley in Eſſex.

IN the days of queen Mary there were two ſermons preached in the woods at Hockley, which woods belonged to one Mr. Tyrel; one was called Plumborough-wood, and other Beches-wood, and there was at the ſame ſermons an honeſt man and his wife, whoſe name was John Gye, and ſervant to Mr. Tyrel at the farm called Plumborough. Shortly after it was known to Mr. Tyrel that his woods were polluted with ſermons, which he took very ill, and much matter did ariſe about it as an unlawful aſſembly, which was laid to John Gye's charge, becauſe he did not diſcloſe that unlawful act to his maſter, being then in the commiſſion of the peace, appointed at that time to keep down the goſpel, which he did to the utmoſt, as it may appear by many of his acts. Good God give him repentance if it be thy will.

Soon after Mr. Tyrel came to Hockley to ſift out this matter, and to know who was at theſe preachings. Well, there were found many faulty; for it is ſuppoſed there were an hundred perſons at the leaſt. So it pleaſed Mr. Tyrel to begin firſt with John Gye, and aſked where that naughty fellow was that ſerved their pariſh, one Tyms; for it is told me, ſaid he, that he is the cauſe to bring theſe naughty fellows into the country. Therefore I charge thee, Gye, to fetch me this naughty fellow Tyms; for thou knoweſt where he is. No, ſaid Gye, I do not know. So in no wiſe could he make him fetch him.

Then ſtepped forth another of Mr. Tyrel's men, willing to pleaſe his maſter, whoſe name was Richard Sheriff, and ſaid to him; Sir, I know where he is. Well, ſaid his maſter, go to the conſtables, and charge them to bring him unto me.

So the ſaid Richard Sheriff being very diligent, made ſure work, and had him brought by the conſtables (whoſe names were Edward Hedge and John James) before his maſter.

Then Mr. Tyrel commanded all the reſt to depart; and it was wiſely done, for he was not able to open his mouth againſt Tyms without reproach; and there he kept him about three hours. But there was ſome that liſtened at the walls, and heard Mr. Tyrel ſay thus to Tyms.

Methinketh, ſaid he, when I ſee the bleſſed rood, it maketh me think of God.

Why, Sir, ſaid Tyms, if an idol that is made with man's hands doth make you remember God, how much more ought the creatures of God, as man being his workmanſhip, or the graſs, or the trees that bring forth fruit, make you remember God?

So Mr. Tyrel ended his talk with Tyms, as it were in a heat, calling him a traitorly knave.

Why, Sir, ſaid Tyms, in king Edward's days you affirmed the truth that I do now.

Affirm! quoth Tyrel, nay, by God's body I never thought it with my heart.

Well, ſaid Tyms, I pray you Mr. Tyrel, bear with me, for I have been a traitor but a while, but you have been a traitor ſix years.

After this Tyms was ſent to London to the biſhop, and from him to the biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſo from him to the King's-bench, and then was Mr. Tyrel's rage ceaſed with them that were in the woods at the ſermons. So Mr. Tyrel took away Gye's coat, and gave it to John Trayford, and ſent him to St. Toſies to ſee good rule kept there.

When Tyms came before the biſhop of London, there was at that time the biſhop of Bath, and William Tyms was examined of his faith before them both. So mightily God wrought with this true-hearted man, that he had wherewith to anſwer them both; for the conſtables ſaid that brought him before the biſhop that they never heard the like. Then the biſhop (as though he would have had Tyms to turn from the truth) ſaid to the conſtables, I pray you give him good counſel, that he may turn from his error. My lord, ſaid the conſtables, he is at a point, for he will not turn.

Then both the biſhops began to grow weary of him, for he had troubled them about ſix or ſeven hours. Then the biſhops began to pity Tyms's caſe, and to flatter him, ſaying, Ah, good fellow (ſaid they) thou art bold, and thou haſt a good freſh ſpirit, we would thou hadſt learning to thy ſpirit. I thank you, my lords, ſaid Tyms, and both you be learned, and I would you had a good ſpirit to your learning.

So thus they broke up, and ſent Tyms to the biſhop of Wincheſter, and there were Edward Hedge and John James the conſtables aforenamed diſcharged, and Tyms commanded to the King's-bench, where he was mightily ſtrengthened with the good men that he found there.

And thus hitherto ye heard, firſt upon what occaſion this William Tyms was apprehended, how he was treated by Mr. Tyrel the juſtice, and by him ſent up to the ordinary of the dioceſe, which was biſhop Bonner; who after ſome talk and debating with the ſaid Tyms, at length directed him to the biſhop of Wincheſter, being then lord chancellor, and was commanded by him upon the ſame to the King's-bench.

Here by the way is to be underſtood, that Tyms as he was but a deacon, ſo he was but ſimply, or at leaſt not prieſtly apparelled, foraſmuch as he went not in a gown, but in a coat; and his hoſe were of two colours, the upper part white, and the nether ſtocks of ſheeps ruſſet. Whereupon the prelate ſending for him to come before him, and ſeeing his ample attire, began to mock him, ſaying, Ah, ſirrah, are you a deacon? Yes, my lord, that I am, quoth Tyms. So methinketh, ſaid the biſhop, ye are decked like a deacon. My lord, ſaid Tyms, my veſture doth not ſo much vary from a deacon; but methinketh your apparel doth as much vary from an apoſtle.

So then there ſpake one of the biſhop's gentlemen, My lord (ſaid he in mockery) give him a chair, a toaſt and drink, and he will be luſty. But the biſhop bade to have him away, and commanded him to come before him again the next day at an hour appointed.

But Wincheſter, for lack of leiſure, or becauſe of ſickneſs growing upon him, or for what cauſe elſe I know not, either would not, or could not attend unto him, but returned him again to his ordinary biſhop from whence he came. So William Tyms being put off again to biſhop Bonner, was placed together and coupled with the other five martyrs above named, and with them brought together to public examination before the biſhop the 21ſt day of March, firſt in the biſhop's palace of London, where the ſaid biſhop after his accuſtomed manner proceeding againſt them, enquired of them their faith upon the ſacrament of the altar. To whom they anſwered, that the body of Chriſt was not in the ſacrament of the altar really and corporally, after the words of conſecration ſpoken by the prieſt; of which opinion they had been of long time, ſome later, ſome ſooner, even as God of his mercy did call upon them unto the knowledge of his goſpel.

Then the biſhop's chaplains began to reaſon with them, but with no great authorities either of the ſcripture or of the ancient fathers, as other their large conferences with the learned do declare.

Another Examination of Tyms and Drakes, &c. before the Biſhop of London.

THE 23d day of the ſame month of March, the biſhop ſent again for Tyms and Drakes, and Ex Officio, did object to them certain articles, the ſum and manner manner whereof were the ſame which before were objected to Whittle, Green, Tudſon, &c. And the 26th day of the ſame month he ſent for the other four, adminiſtering to them alſo the ſame general articles. Unto which they all in effect anſwered in matters touching their faith, as did the ſame Bartlet Green and the reſt. Other appearances they had, as the biſhop's common manner of proceeding was more (as I have often ſaid for order and common law) than for any zeal of juſtice.

But in concluſion, the 28th day of the ſaid month, William Tyms and Robert Drakes, with the other four above named, were brought to the open conſiſtory in Paul's before the ſaid biſhop of London to be condemned for hereſy.

The biſhop firſt began in this manner: Tyms, ſaid he, I will begin with thee firſt, for thou art and haſt been the ringleader of theſe thy companions; thou haſt taught them hereſies, and confirmed them in their erroneous opinions, and haſt endeavoured as much as in thee lieth, to make them like unto thyſelf. If thy fault had not tended to the hurt of others, I would then have uſed thee more charitably, and not have brought thee to open rebuke. I would, according to the rule of Chriſt in the 18th of Matthew, have told thee thy fault between me and thee; if thou wouldeſt not have heard me, I would not ſo have left thee, but I with two or three others would have exhorted thee; if that would not have ſerved, then would I have told the church, &c. But for that thy fault is open and manifeſt to the world, and thou thyſelf remaineſt ſtout in thine error, this charitable dealing is not to be extended towards thee: I have therefore thought good to proceed by another rule, whereof St. Paul ſpeaketh, 1 Tim. 5. "Such as ſin, rebuke them openly, that others may fear." For this cauſe art thou brought before me in the face of this people, to receive judgment according to thy deſerts. Let me ſee what thou canſt ſay, why I ſhould not proceed againſt thee as thine ordinary.

My lord, quoth Tyms, will you now give me leave to ſpeak? Yea, quoth the biſhop. Then ſaid Tyms, My lord, I marvel that you will begin with a lye. You call me the ringleader and teacher of this company, but how untruly you have ſaid ſhall ſhortly appear: for there is none of all theſe my brethren, which are brought hither as priſoners, but when they were at liberty and out of priſon, they diſſented from you and your doings, as much as they do at this preſent; and for that cauſe they are now priſoners.

So it is evident, that they learned not their religion in priſon. And as for me, I never knew them, until ſuch time as I by your commandment was priſoner with them; how could I then be their ringleader and teacher? So that all the world may ſee how untruly you have ſpoken. And as for my fault which you make ſo grievous, whatſoever you judge of me, I am well aſſured that I hold none other religion than Chriſt preached, the apoſtles witneſſed, the primitive church received, and now of late the apoſtolical and evangelical preachers of this realm have faithfully taught; for which you have cruelly burnt them, and now you ſeek our blood alſo. Proceed on hardly by what rule you will, I force not, I do not refuſe you for mine ordinary.

Then, ſaid the biſhop, I perceive thou wilt not be counted their ringleader. How ſayeſt thou, wilt thou ſubmit thyſelf to the catholic church as an obedient child? In ſo doing thou ſhalt be received and do well enough, otherwiſe thou ſhalt have judgment as an heretic.

Then one of the priſoners (whoſe name is not certainly known) ſaid, My lord, you are no upright judge, for you judge after your own luſt. But if you will judge us according to the holy Teſtament of Chriſt, which is the word of truth, we will, according to your judgment; for unto that word we wholly ſubmit ourſelves. But as for your judgment without the truth, God ſhall condemn. This was very earneſtly expreſſed, inſiſting that they might be judged by the word of God.

At this the biſhop was offended, calling him buſy knave, and commanded him to hold his tongue, or elſe he ſhould be had away to a place of ſmaller eaſe.

Then Tyms anſwered and ſaid, My lord, I doubt not but I am of the catholic church, whatſoever you judge of me. But as for your church, you have before this day renounced it, and by corporal oath promiſed never to conſent to the ſame. Contrary to which you have received into this realm the pope's authority, and therefore you are falſly perjured and forſworn all the ſort of you. Beſides this, you have both ſpoken and written very earneſty againſt that uſurped power, and now you burn men that will not acknowledge the pope to be ſupreme head.

Have I? quoth the biſhop. Where have I written any thing againſt the church of Rome?

My lord, quoth Tyms, the biſhop of Wincheſter wrote a very learned oration, intituled, De vera Obedientia, which containeth worthy matter againſt the Romiſh authority: unto which book you made a preface inveighing againſt the biſhop of Rome, reproving his tyranny and falſhood, calling his power falſe and pretenſed. The book is extant, and you cannot deny it.

Then was the biſhop ſomewhat aſhamed, and looking upon thoſe that were preſent, ſpake very gently ſaying, Lo, here is a good matter indeed. My lord of Wincheſter being a great learned man, did write a book againſt the ſupremacy of the pope's holineſs, and I alſo did write a preface before the ſaid book, tending to the ſame effect. And thus did we becauſe of the perilous world that then was. For then it was made treaſon by the laws of this realm to maintain the pope's authority, and great danger it was to be ſuſpected a favourer of the ſea of Rome; and therefore fear compelled us to comply with the time, for otherwiſe there had been no way but one. You know when any uttered his conſcience in maintaining the pope's authority, he ſuffered death for it.

And then turning his tale unto Tyms, he ſaid, But ſince that time, even ſince the coming in of the queen's majeſty, when we might be bold to ſpeak our conſcience, we have acknowledged our faults, and my lord of Wincheſter ſhamed not to recant the ſame at Paul's Croſs. And alſo thou thyſelf ſeeſt that I ſtand not in it, but willingly have ſubmitted myſelf. Do thou alſo as we have done.

My lord, quoth Tyms, that which you have written againſt the ſupremacy of the pope, may be well approved by the ſcriptures. But that which you now do, is againſt the word of God, as I can well prove.

Then another, I ſuppoſe it was Dr. Cooke, ſaid; Tyms, I pray thee to let me talk with thee a little, for I think we two are learned alike. Thou ſpeakeſt much of the ſcripture, and yet underſtandeth it not. I will tell thee to whom thou mayſt be compared: Thou art like to one which intendeth to go on hunting, riſeth up early in the morning, taketh his hounds, and forth he goeth, up to the hills, and down into the valleys; he paſſeth over the fields, over hedge and ditch, he ſearcheth the woods and thickets; thus laboureth he all the whole day, without finding any game. At night home he cometh, weary of his travel, not having caught any thing at all; and thus fareth it by thee. Thou laboureſt in reading of the ſcriptures, thou takeſt the letter, but the meaning thou knoweſt not, and thus thy reading is as unprofitable unto thee, as hunting was unto the man I ſpeak of even now.

Sir, quoth Tyms, you have not well applied your ſimilitude: for I praiſe God, I have not read the ſcriptures unprofitably: but God, I thank him, hath revealed unto me ſo much as I doubt not is ſufficient for my ſalvation.

Then ſaid the biſhop, You brag much of knowledge, and yet you know nothing: you ſpeak much of ſcripture, and you know not what ſcripture is. I pray thee tell me; How knoweſt thou that thing to be the word of God, which thou calleſt ſcripture?

To this anſwered Robert Drakes, that he knew it to be the word of God, becauſe it ſhewed unto men their ſalvation in Chriſt, and doth revoke and call back all men from wicked life, unto a pure and undefiled converſation.

The biſhop replied, That the heathen writers have taught precepts of good living, as well as the ſcripture, and yet their writings are not eſteemed to be God's word.

Then ſaid Tyms, the Old Teſtament beareth witneſs of thoſe things which are written in the New; for (quoth he) there is nothing taught in the New Teſtament but it was foreſhewed in the law and the prophets.

I will deny all, quoth the biſhop, I will deny all; what ſayeſt thou then? Then Robert Drakes alledged a ſentence in Latin out of the 59th chapter of Iſaiah's prophecy; Spiritus meus qui eſt in te, &c. that is, "My Spirit which is in thee, and my words which I put in thy mouth, ſhall not depart out of the mouth of thy ſeed, nor out of the mouth of the ſeed of thy ſeed from henceforth even for ever;" meaning hereby to prove, that he who had the Spirit of God, could thereby diſcern and judge truly which was God's word. But before he could explicate his mind, he was interrupted by the biſhop, who ſpake unto Dr. Pendleton, ſaying,

Mr. Doctor, I pray you ſay ſomewhat unto theſe folks that may do them ſome good. Then Dr. Pendleton leaning near the biſhop, covered his face with both his hands, to the end he might the more quietly deviſe what to ſay; but other talk was preſently miniſtered, ſo that for that time he ſaid nothing.

And thus much William Alſbury, witneſs hereof, being preſent thereat, ſo far as he heard, hath faithfully recorded and reported. What more was ſpoken and there ſaid (for they made not yet an end a good while after) becauſe he departed then out of the houſe, he doth not know, nor did hear.

Then the biſhop, after this, and ſuch like communication, proceeded at length in form of law, cauſing both the articles, and his anſwers to the ſame, to be then and there openly read: the ſum of which his confeſſion recorded and left by his own hand-writing, tendeth to this effect as followeth.

The Articles for which William Tyms, of Hockley, in Eſſex, was condemned in the Conſiſtory of St. Paul's, the 28th of March, with his Anſwers and Confeſſion upon the ſame.

FIRST, I did truly confeſs and believe that I was baptized in the true catholic church of Chriſt; for when I was baptized, there was the element and the word of God, according to Chriſt's inſtitution. And my godfathers and godmothers did promiſe for me, that I ſhould forſake the devil, and all his works, and that I ſhould keep God's commandments, and believe all the articles of the chriſtian faith; all which I do believe at this day, and with God's help I truſt to do while I live; for it was not the wickedneſs of the miniſter that made the ſacrament of none effect, &c.

Item, I confeſſed two ſacraments, and but two in Chriſt's true church; that is, the ſacrament of baptiſm, and the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt, and that Chriſt is preſent with his ſacraments, as it pleaſeth him.

Item, I confeſſed, that Chriſt hath a viſible church, wherein the word of God is truly preached, and the ſacraments truly adminiſtered.

Item, I confeſſed the ſee of Rome to be as the late biſhip of Wincheſter hath written in his book, De vera Obedientia, to which I ſaid unto the biſhop of London, that he had made a godly preface; and alſo John Bale hath plainly declared in his book, called The image of both churches, even ſo much as I believe thereof.

Item, I confeſſed the maſs to be blaſphemy to Chriſt's death and paſſion.

Item, I confeſſed that in the ſacrament of the altar Chriſt is not preſent either ſpiritually or corporally; but as they uſe it, it is an abominable idol.

Laſt of all, I confeſſed the biſhop of London to be mine ordinary.

After this the biſhop fell to intreaty and perſuaſions, earneſtly exhorted him to revoke his hereſies (as he termed them) and to reform himſelf unto the church of Rome, and not to ſtick ſo much to the literal ſenſe of the ſcriptures, but to uſe the interpretation of the old fathers.

To which Tyms anſwered, I will not reform myſelf thereunto. And I thank God for this day; for I truſt he will turn your curſings into bleſſings.

And furthermore, aſking this queſtion, he ſaid; And what have you to maintain the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, but only the bare letter?

We have (quoth the biſhop) the catholic church.

No, ſaid Tyms, you have the popiſh church of Rome for you, for which you be perjured and forſworn. And the ſee of Rome is the ſee of Antichriſt; and therefore to that church I will not conform myſelf, nor once conſent unto it.

Then the biſhop ſeeing his conſtant boldneſs to be unmoveable, proceeding to his condemnation, pronounced the ſentence definitive upon him, and gave him over to the ſecular power.

Afterwards calling for Robert Drakes, he uſed towards him the like manner of exhortation that he did before.

To whom Drakes ſaid, As for your church of Rome, I utterly defy and deny it, with all the works thereof, even as I deny the devil and all his works.

The biſhop then uſing his accuſtomed order of law, with his like exhortations, at laſt gave him the like bleſſing that Tyms had, and ſo charged the ſheriff with him.

Thomas Spurge being next demanded if he would return to the catholic church, ſaid as followeth; As for your church of Rome I do utterly deny it: but to the true catholic church I am content to return, and continue in the ſame, whereof I believe the church of Rome to be no part or member.

Then in fine, calling the reſt in their turns, and upon the like demands receiving the like anſwers, the ſaid biſhop gave unto each of them their ſeveral judgments; and ſo ridding his bloody hands, committed them unto the cuſtody of the ſheriffs of London, who ſent them unto Newgate, whither they all went moſt joyfully, abiding there the Lord's good time, wherein they ſhould ſeal this their faith with the ſhedding of their blood; which they moſt ſtoutly and willingly performed, in the month of April.

A Letter of William Tyms to his faithful Siſter in the Lord, Agnes Glaſcock, Pariſhioner in the Town of Hockley.

THE grace, mercy, and peace of God our Father through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord and Saviour, with the ſweet comfort of his Holy and mighty Spirit, to the performance of his will, to your everlaſting comfort, be with you my dear ſiſter Glaſcock, both now and evermore, Amen.

My moſt dear and entirely beloved ſiſter, yea mother I might rightly well call you, for the motherly care which you have always had for me, I have me moſt heartily commended unto you, giving God moſt hearty thanks for you, that he hath given you ſo loving a heart to Chriſt's poor goſpel, and his poor afflicted flock for the ſame: and as you have full godly begun, ſo I beſeech God to give you power to go forward in the ſame, and never never more to look back, fearing neither fire nor ſword; and then I warrant you, you have not far to run.

And now (my dear heart) remember well what I have taught you when I was preſent with you, and alſo written being abſent, and no doubt we ſhall ſhortly meet again with a moſt joyful meeting. I go on Friday next to the biſhop of London's coal-houſe, which is the 20th day of March, where I think it will be hard for any of my friends to ſpeak with me. Howbeit I truſt I ſhall not long tarry there, but ſhortly after be carried up after my dear brethren and ſiſters, which are gone before me into heaven in a fiery chariot: therefore now I take my leave of you till we meet in heaven; and haſten you after.

I have tarried a great while for you, and ſeeing you are ſo long making ready, I will tarry no longer for you. You ſhall find me merrily ſinging, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Sabbath, at my journey's end. Therefore now (my dear heart) make good haſte, and loiter not by the way, leſt night take you, and ſo ye be ſhut out of the gate with the fooliſh virgins. And now (my ſiſter) in witneſs that I have taught you nothing but the truth, here I write my name with my blood for a teſtimonial unto you, that I will ſeal the ſimple doctrine which I have taught you, with the reſt. And thus fare you well: And God defend you from Antichriſt, and all his miniſters, the falſe prieſts, Amen.

Theſe words following were written with his own blood.

Continue in prayer.
Aſk in faith.
And obtain your deſire.

By me W. Tyms in the King's-bench for the goſpel of Chriſt.

Another Letter of the ſaid William Tyms, wherein he comforteth his Siſter Glaſcock, being in great Sorrow and Repentance for going to the Maſs.

GOD be merciful unto you, pardon and forgive all your ſins, and ſend you faith to believe the ſame, that you may be partaker of his heavenly kingdom, Amen.

My dear ſiſter, I have me moſt heartily commended unto you; and as I have lamented your falling from God, by being partaker with that idolatrous prieſt; ſo have I, ſince I heard of your earneſt repentance, very much rejoiced, and alſo praiſed Almighty God for his mercy ſhewed unto you, in that he hath not left you to yourſelf, but ſince your denial he hath ſhewed his mercy on you, by looking back on you as he did on Peter, and ſo cauſed you to repent as Peter did, and bitterly to weep for your ſins: whereas if God had left you to yourſelf, you had run forward from one evil to another, till at length your heart ſhould either have been hardened, or elſe you ſhould have deſpaired of the mercy of God. And ſeeing that God hath been ſo merciful unto you as he hath been, be you not unthankful unto him for the ſame. For I certify you that your ſorrowful heart that you have had, doth declare unto me that God hath pardoned and forgiven all your ſins for the blood-ſhedding of that immaculate Lamb, Jeſus Chriſt our Lord and Saviour.

Therefore as Peter, after the time that Chriſt had forgiven him his ſin, did boldly confeſs Chriſt before all his enemies; even ſo my dear heart in the Lord, ſeeing that God hath ſo mercifully pardoned and forgiven you your ſins, now cleave unto him, and be at defiance with his enemies the papiſts: and as they do bear witneſs with their father the devil, by going to the church, and ſhedding the innocent blood of all thoſe that will not go with them; even ſo do you bear witneſs with Chriſt, by not coming here: for all thoſe that do go thither ſhall be partakers of their brethren's blood, that is ſhed for the teſtimony of Chriſt, except they repent and amend; which grace that they may ſo do, I beſeech the eternal God for his Chriſt's ſake, if it be his good will, to give them in his good time. And the ſame good God that hath been ſo merciful unto you to call you to repentance, him I beſeech to keep you in his fear and love, that you may have always affiance in him, and evermore ſeek his honour and glory to your everlaſting comfort in Chriſt, Amen. Thus fare you well. From the King's-bench, this 28th of Auguſt. By me, William Tyms.

Another Letter of William Tyms to certain godly Women of his Pariſh, Followers of the Goſpel.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, be with you both now and evermore, Amen.

Dear ſiſters, I have me moſt heartily recommended unto you, thanking you for the great kindneſs ſhewed unto me in this time of mine impriſonment, and not only unto me, but alſo unto my poor wife and children; and alſo for the great kindneſs that you ſhew unto all the living ſaints that be diſperſed abroad, and are fain to hide their heads for fear of this cruel perſecution.

Dear ſiſters, when I do remember your conſtancy in Chriſt, I call to remembrance the conſtancy of divers godly women, as Suſannah, Judith, Heſter, and the good wife of Nabal, that through her godly conditions ſaved both her huſband's life, and all her houſhold, when David had thought to have ſlain him for his churliſh anſwer that he ſent him. Alſo I do remember Rahab that lodged the Lord's ſpies, how God preſerved her and her whole houſhold for her faithfulneſs that ſhe bare to God's people. So I do believe that when the Lord ſhall ſend his angel to deſtroy theſe idolatrous Egyptians here in England, and ſhall find the blood of the Lamb ſprinkled on the door-poſt of your hearts, he will go by and not hurt you, but ſpare your whole houſholds for your ſakes. Alſo I do remember Mary Magdalen, how faithful ſhe was; for ſhe was the firſt that preached the reſurrection of Chriſt. Remember the bleſſed martyr Anne Aſkew in our time, and follow her example of conſtancy. And for the love of God take heed that in no caſe you do conſent to idolatry, but ſtand faſt to the Lord, as the good woman did that had her ſeven ſons put to death before her face, and ſhe always comforting them, yea and laſt of all ſuffered death herſelf, for the teſtimony of her God, which is the living God. Thus I beſeech God to ſend you grace and ſtrength to ſtand faſt to the Lord, as ſhe did, and then you ſhall be ſure of the ſame kingdom that ſhe is ſure of; to which kingdom I pray God bring both you and me, Amen.

By me, William Tyms, priſoner in the King's-bench.

Another Letter of William Tyms to his Friends in Hockley.

THE grace of God the Father, through the merits of his dear Son Jeſus, our Lord and only Saviour, with the continual aid of his Holy and mighty Spirit, to the performance of his will, to our everlaſting comfort, be with you my dear brethren, both now and evermore, Amen.

My dearly beloved, I beſeech God to reward the great goodneſs that you have ſhewed unto me, ſeven fold into your boſoms; and as you have always had a moſt godly love unto his word, even ſo I beſeech him to give you grace to love your own ſouls, and then I truſt you will flee from all thoſe things that ſhould diſpleaſe our good and merciful God, and hate and abhor all the company of thoſe that would have you to worſhip God any otherwiſe wiſe than is contained in his holy word. And beware of thoſe maſters of idolatry; that is, theſe papiſtical prieſts. My dear brethren, for the tender mercy of God, remember well what I have ſaid unto you, and alſo written, which I am now ready to ſeal with my blood. I praiſe God that ever I lived to ſee the day, and bleſſed be my good and merciful God, that ever he gave me a body to glorify his name. And, dear hearts, I do now write unto you for none other cauſe, but to put you in remembrance that I have not forgotten you, to the end that I would not have you forget me, but to remember well what I have ſimply by word of mouth and writing taught you. Which although it were moſt ſimply done, yet truly, as your own conſcience beareth me record: and therefore in any caſe take good heed that you do not that thing which your own conſcience doth condemn. Therefore come out of Sodom, and go to heaven-ward with the ſervants and martyrs of God, leſt you be partakers of the vengeance of God that is coming upon this wicked nation, from which the Lord God defend you, and ſend us a joyful meeting in the kingdom of heaven: unto which God bring you all, Amen. Thus now I take my leave of you for ever in this world, except I be burned amongſt you, which thing is uncertain unto me as yet.

By me your pooreſt and moſt unworthy brother in Chriſt, W. Tims, in Newgate, April 12.

Another Letter of William Tyms, giving Thanks to his Pariſhioners, for their Charity ſhewed to his Wife, being brought to-Bed of a Child in his Captivity.

THE everlaſting peace of our dear Lord and only Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, with the ſweet comfort of his Holy and mighty Spirit, to the increaſe of your faith, to the performance of his will, and to your eternal comfort in the everlaſting kingdom of heaven, be with you my dear brethren and ſiſters both now and ever, Amen.

My moſt dear brethren and ſiſters in our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, I have me moſt heartily commended unto you, with hearty thanks for all the great liberality that you have ſhewed unto me, and eſpecially now in the time of my neceſſity, when that God hath ſent my poor wife a child in my captivity; which is no little care to me, ſo to provide, that I might keep both the child and my wife from the antichriſtian church: which thing I thank my God, through his moſt gracious providence, I have yet done, though it be (as ye know) great charge, not to me, but to the congregation of God, and it grieveth me that I have been ſo chargeable to them as I have been, and eſpecially you my dear brethren, I being ſo unworthy a member as I have been, and alſo of ſo ſmall acquaintance; but ſuch is the merciful goodneſs of God, ſo to move your hearts with charity towards me. And as he hath moved your hearts ſo to do, even ſo I beſeech God to give you power to forſake and refuſe all things which be diſpleaſant in his ſight, and to do all things which are requiſite to a chriſtian; and ſend you grace to go forwards in the ſame as you have godly begun, neither fearing fire nor ſword. And, my moſt dear hearts, remember well the ſimple plain doctrine which I have taught you, and alſo written unto you, which was the truth, and for a teſtimony of the ſame I truſt that you ſhall ſhortly hear, or elſe ſee that I will ſeal the ſame with my blood. And in the mean time I deſire you all to remember me in your prayers, as I know you do, and as with God's help I will do for you, that God, for his dear Son Chriſt's ſake, will ſo finiſh the days of our pilgrimage, that we may reſt together with Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, in the everlaſting kingdom of heaven, to which I beſeech the eternal God for his Chriſt's ſake to bring both you and all yours, Amen.

By me, William Tyms.

Another Letter of William Tyms to his Siſter Colfox and Agnes Glaſcock.

GRACE and peace from God the Father of all mercy, through the merits of our dear Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, be perceived and felt in the hearts of you, my dearly beloved ſiſters in the Lord, by the mighty working of the Holy Ghoſt the Comforter, both now and evermore, Amen.

My moſt dear and entirely beloved ſiſters in the Lord, after my moſt hearty commendations, according to my moſt bounden duty, I do as I am accuſtomed, or at leaſt bound to do, that is, I give you warning of your enemies, which be the papiſts, and take good heed to them, for they ſerve a crafty maſter; yea, and as St. Peter ſaith, He ſleepeth not, but goeth about like a roaring lion, ſeeking whom he may devour. For your old familiar friends, or worldly companions, when they ſee that you will not run into the idol's temple with them, it will ſeem a ſtrange thing unto them, that ye run not to the ſame exceſs of riot, as St. Peter ſaith, And therefore they will ſpeak evil of you, rail on you, and perſecute you.

But, my dear ſiſters, let it not trouble you, for it is but to try you, and let it not ſeem a ſtrange thing unto you. But when they do ſo, remember wherefore it is, and for whoſe ſake, even becauſe you will not forſake God as they do. For the hatred they bear you, is for the word of God, and then it is God's cauſe, and I tell you he will revenge it. And therefore if ye be railed on, and troubled for his ſake, think yourſelves moſt happy. For if you ſuffer with the patriarchs, prophets, and apoſtles, then ſhall ye be ſure to be partakers of the ſame joy that they are in. Yea, you have heard by the word of God, how cruelly the tyrants always have perſecuted the true members of Chriſt, as he himſelf hath promiſed that they ſhall do unto the end of the world.

By the way I will bring to your remembrance the holy martyr St. Stephen, who for favouring, maintaining, and defending the ſame doctrine that now we ſuffer for, was called a blaſphemer, and ſtoned to death at Jeruſalem. And Chriſt's apoſtles were diverſly afflicted all the world over for the ſame by this viperous generation. Antipas the faithful witneſs of Chriſt was ſlain at Pergamus. Jaſon for receiving Paul and Silas, with other diſciples and teachers of the goſpel, was brought before the council at Theſſalonica, and accuſed for a ſeditious traitor againſt Cæſar. No marvel therefore though at this day we be vexed on the ſame ſort, maintaining the ſame cauſe, and favouring the teachers thereof. Is there any other reward following the true ſervants of God now, than hath been aforetimes? No ſurely, for ſo hath Chriſt promiſed. And if they have perſecuted him, needs muſt they perſecute his members; if they have called the Maſter of the houſe Beelzebub ſo will they do his houſhold; "You ſhall be hated of all men, (ſaith Chriſt) for my name's ſake."

It is no new thing, my dear hearts, to ſee the true members of Chriſt handled as in our days they be, as it is not unknown to you how they be cruelly entreated, and blaſphemed without any reaſonable cauſe. For heretics muſt they be taken, who follow not their traditions. And then they may as well call Chriſt an heretic, for he never allowed their dirty ceremonies. He never went a proceſſion with a cope, croſs, or candleſtick. He never cenſed image, nor ſang Latin ſervice. He never ſate in confeſſion. He never preached of purgatory nor of the pope's pardons. He never honoured ſaints nor prayed for the dead. He never ſaid maſs, matins, nor even-ſong. He never commanded to faſt Friday nor vigil, Lent nor Advent. He never hallowed church nor chalice, aſhes nor palms, candles nor bells. He never made holy water nor holy bread, with ſuch like. But ſuch dumb ceremonies, not having the expreſs commandment of God, he calleth the leaven of the phariſees, and and damnable hypocriſy; admoniſhing his diſciples to beware of them. He curſeth all thoſe that add to his ſuch beggarly ſhadows, wiping their names clean out of the book of life. St. Paul ſaith, they have no portion with Chriſt, which warp themſelves again with ſuch yokes of bondage.

Therefore my dear hearts, ſeeing that our good God hath by the light of his holy word, delivered us from all ſuch dark, blind, dumb, beggarly traditions of men, ſtand faſt in the liberty wherewith Chriſt hath made you free, wrap not yourſelves again in the yoke of bondage. But let us always be ready, looking for the coming of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, which as St. Peter ſaith, will come as a thief in the night." And our captain Chriſt ſaith, "If the good man of the houſe knew what hour the thief would come, he would ſurely watch."

Therefore, my dear hearts, be of good comfort, although the world rage never ſo ſore againſt you. And for your comfort mark well the great mercy of God, who according to his promiſe for the weakneſs of our nature hath ſo aſſwaged the heat of the fire, that our dear brethren that have gone before us, to the ſight of all men, have found it rather to be joy than pain. And think you ſurely God will be as merciful unto you, as he hath been unto them; and ſay with St. Paul, Rom. 8. "Who ſhall ſeparate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or anguiſh, or perſecution, either hunger, either nakedneſs, either peril, either ſword? As it is written, for thy ſake are we killed all the day long, &c."

Therefore (my dear ſiſters) if to ſave your lives, any diſſembling goſpellers would have you to go to the idols temple with them, ſay unto them, No, for my Maſter Chriſt ſaith, Matth. 10. "He that would ſave his life ſhall loſe it." And in another place to comfort us he ſaith, "There ſhall not one hair fall from your head, without it be your heavenly Father's will." And therefore ſay you will not be of that ſort, that be neither hot nor cold, leſt God ſhould ſpue you out of his mouth. But make them this anſwer, ſaying, St. Paul ſaith, 2 Cor. 6. "Bear no ſtrange yoke with the unbelievers: for what fellowſhip hath righteouſneſs with unrighteouſneſs? what company hath light with darkneſs? what concord hath Chriſt with Belial; either what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? how agreeth the temple of God with images?" And ye are the temple of God; as God ſaith, I will dwell among them, walk among them, and will be their God, and they ſhall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them and ſeparate yourſelves, ſaith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing: ſo will I receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye ſhall be my ſons and daughters ſaith the Lord."

Thus mine own bowels in the Lord, as I began, ſo make I an end, bidding you beware of your enemies, and take up your croſs, and follow your captain Chriſt in at the narrow gate here by perſecution, and then you ſhall be ſure to reign and rejoice with him in his everlaſting kingdom, which he himſelf hath purchaſed with his own moſt precious blood: to whom with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour both now and for ever, Amen.

By me, William Tyms.

Another Letter of William Tyms, with an Exhortation to all God's faithful Servants, to eſchew the Society of Idolaters, and God's Enemies.

GRACE be with you, and peace from the Father, and from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

I thank my God with all remembrance of you always in my prayers for you, and pray with gladneſs, becauſe of the fellowſhip which ye have in the goſpel, from the firſt day that I knew you, until this day; and I am ſurely certified of this, that he who hath begun a good work in you, ſhall go forth with it, until the day of Jeſus Chriſt, as it becometh me to judge of you; whom I have in my heart, and as companions of grace with me, even in my bonds. And thus I pray, that your love may increaſe more and more in knowledge. Good brethren, I moſt heartily deſire God, that as you have a willing mind to comfort my vile earthly body in this time of perſecution, ſo he will ſtrengthen you with his Holy Spirit, that my impriſonment do not diſcomfort, but rather ſtrengthen and comfort you, to ſee the goodneſs of God ſhewed unto me, in that being a man without learning, and brought before three ſuch biſhops concerning worldly wiſdom, he gave me both mouth and wiſdom; inſomuch that the biſhop of London went away in a great haſte from me, and after that he ſent his man with a Bible, turning to the ninth chapter to the Hebrews, and the biſhop of Bath looking on it, ſaid, What meaneth my lord? this maketh nothing for his purpoſe. Then I looked on it, and ſaid, My lord ſeeth that I was weak, and therefore he hath holpen me; for here he hath condemned the ſacrifice of your maſs: for you ſay that you offer a daily ſacrifice in your maſs, both for the quick and the dead; and here St. Paul ſaith, "Without blood-ſhedding there is no forgiveneſs of ſins;" therefore that is here condemned. He anſwered, Yea, ſaith he ſo? So ſay all ſuch heretics, and ſo forth, with many like arguments, which my neighbours that heard them can declare, therefore I leave them. This have I written that you ſhould not be afraid, but call upon God as he hath commanded us to aſk and we ſhall have; ſeek and you ſhall find, knock and it ſhall be opened unto you. Alſo he hath commanded us to call on him in the day of trouble, and he hath promiſed to hear us. Therefore if we have not both mouth and wiſdom at his hand, the fault is in us, that either we will not repent us of our wickedneſs, and amend our lives, or elſe we be unfaithful, and believe not the promiſes of God; and ſo we ourſelves are the cauſe that this wiſdom is lacking in us. Therefore let us repent and amend our lives, and God is merciful. And in any caſe, as I have always ſaid unto you, ſince I firſt knew you, ſo ſay I now: Beware of idolatry, and of your good intents; if not, mark what hath followed upon them that have left God's commandments, and done their own good intents. Remember when the children of Iſrael had made them a golden calf, did not God ſay they had marred all, and would have deſtroyed them, had not Moſes earneſtly prayed for them? I let many other places alone that prove the wrath of God to come upon the people for idolatry; therefore as we will avoid the wrath of God, let us keep us unſtained from it. You have example out of the Old Teſtament, how loth the godly fathers were to be partakers with the wicked; and yet to ſee how little we regarded it, it would make any chriſtian man's heart to weep. God ſend us more grace.

Firſt look in the 11th and 12th of Geneſis; Abraham, becauſe he would not be partaker of their idolatry, fled from the people of Chaldea, being his native country. And in the 19th of Geneſis, Lot at the commandment of the angels departed from Sodom, leſt he tarrying with the Sodomites ſhould have been conſumed with them. In the 21ſt of Geneſis, Sarah would not ſuffer Iſhmael, who was given to mocking, to keep company with her ſon Iſaac, leſt he ſhould alſo become a mocker. Look in the 16th of Numbers, Moſes at God's appointment commanded the people to depart from the dwelling-places of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, leſt they alſo ſhould be all wrapped in their ſins, and ſo periſh among them. So do I, even as Moſes commanded them that they ſhould not keep company with thoſe wicked people, leſt the vengeance of God ſhould light on them; ſo do I (I ſay) give you warning, that you ſhould not keep company with the the idolaters, in their idolatrous temples, leſt the wrath of God come upon you to deſtroy you.

Look what St. Paul ſaith in the ſecond epiſtle, and the ſixth chapter to the Corinthians: "Set yourſelves (ſaith he) therefore at large, and bear no ſtrange yoke with the unbelievers: for what fellowſhip hath righteouſneſs with unrighteouſneſs? what company hath light with darkneſs? what concord hath Chriſt with Belial? either what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? how agreeth the temple of God with images? And ye are the temple of God; as ſaith God, I will dwell among them, and walk among them, and will be their God, and they ſhall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and ſeparate yourſelves, ſaith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing."

Good brethren, mark what cometh of keeping company with the wicked. Syrach ſaith, "He that toucheth pitch, ſhall be defiled therewith; and he that keepeth company with the proud, ſhall cloath himſelf with pride." Even ſo he that is familiar with idolaters, cannot be unſtained from idolatry, except he do it to win them to Chriſt, as there be but a few that do: Yea, it may not be where idolatry is openly committed, as for an example: Peter, ſo long as he continued with Chriſt and Chriſt's diſciples, he continued in the truth, preached the truth, confeſſed openly Chriſt to be the Son of the living God, and promiſed that he would not only go to priſon, but alſo to very death with him: but when he came once into the court into the biſhop's houſe, he ſtraitway was ſtricken with ſure fear, that a poor maiden, and ſimple ruffian (ſuch a one as my lord of London hath, that ſaid, By God's blood, if I meet with any of theſe vile heretics, I will thruſt an arrow in him), when Peter, I ſay, was amongſt them, he denied his maſter, and ſwore that he never knew him, whom he, before he came there, boldly confeſſed before all men: and again, after that he had repented him of his wicked deed, he boldly preached to the believing Jews, commanding them, among other his godly exhortations, to ſave themſelves from that untoward generation. How many of our prieſts before this ſtorm of perſecution, when the goſpel was truly preached, were bold, and could ſay, They would die rather then deny their maſter? but when they come once into the biſhops houſes, they preach no more Chriſt, but utterly deny him: therefore I pray God keep them from thence, or elſe ſend them more grace and ſtrength. It is needful to pray; therefore watch in prayer.

Paul, all the while he was among the biſhops, was a cruel perſecutor; but after he was called by God from the biſhops, he became a true preacher: therefore God keep all chriſtian men out of the hands of our biſhops. St. Paul in the fifteenth to the Romans, ſaith, I dare not ſpeak any of thoſe things that Chriſt hath not wrought by me. He ſaith alſo, Rom. 16. "I beſeech you brethren, mark them that make diviſion, and give occaſion of evil, contrary to the doctrine that ye have learned, and them avoid: for they that are ſuch ſerve not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, but their own bellies, and with ſweet and flattering words deceive the hearts of the ſimple." Our maſter Chriſt himſelf hath given us warning which they be; for he hath ſet the plain mark on them, in the 24th of Matthew, "If they ſay here is Chriſt, or there is Chriſt, believe them not. If they ſay, he is in the deſert, go not forth. If they ſay, he is in the ſecret place, believe them not." And I pray you, where can he be more ſecret, than in ſo ſmall a piece of bread? For my lord of London, like a lyar, ſaid to me, that after the words be ſpoken, there remaineth neither bread nor wine. Then I aſked him what he ſaid to David, where he ſaith, "Thou ſhalt not ſuffer thy holy One to ſee corruption." How ſay you to that? Will not the ſacrament of the altar putrify or corrupt? He anſwered, Yes. I aſked him, what it was that did corrupt, if there were neither bread nor wine. He anſwered, and ſaid the accidents. I ſaid unto him, It was a mad accident without ſubſtance: for you ſay, there is neither bread nor wine, and then there is nothing to corrupt: with many ſuch like arguments.

Therefore beware of them, for they go about to deceive you with ſuch arguments. Say not but ye be warned, and a great deal the more worthy of your damnation, if they deceive you, becauſe you have had ſo much warning. Repent you betimes of your ſinful lives, and amend, and then no doubt but God will either turn their hearts, or elſe take them away, or elſe he will give us that which he promiſed to his diſciples, if we be contented to take the ſame reward that they had. And if we diſdain the one, let us not look for the other. For he that will be his Father's heir, muſt be contented to receive his Father's correction. For St. Paul ſaith in the 12th to the Hebrews, "If we be not under correction, whereof all are partakers, then are we baſtards and not ſons."

And you know what belongeth to a baſtard; he ſhall not be his father's heir. And if we remember ourſelves well, how negligent we have been to our Father's commandment, we ſhall find ourſelves worthy to be corrected at his hand. If we refuſe his correction, he will refuſe us to be his ſons. I pray you look what he promiſed to his diſciples, and I pray you alſo look how willingly they received it: and ſo muſt we do if we will be partakers with them. Firſt let us ſee what Chriſt promiſed to his diſciples. Look in the tenth chapter of St. Matthew, and there ſhall you ſee theſe words, "Behold, I ſend you forth as ſheep among wolves. Be wiſe therefore as ſerpents and innocent as doves. Beware of men, for they ſhall deliver you up to the councils, and ſhall ſcourge you in their ſynagogues: ye ſhall be brought before the head-rulers and kings for my name's ſake. But when they put you up, take ye no thought how or what ye ſhall ſpeak: for it ſhall be given you in the ſame hour what you ſhall ſpeak. For it is not you that ſpeak, but the Spirit of my Father," &c. Read the whole chapter, for it is very comfortable to a chriſtian man; and mark it well, and you ſhall find what we ought to do in the time of perſecution. Alſo look into the fourth chapter of the ſecond epiſtle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, where it is ſaid, "For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jeſus's ſake, that the life alſo of Jeſus might appear in our mortal fleſh." Thus have you heard that St. Paul doth boaſt of perſecution; even ſo ſhould we, for it is the way to bring us to reſt.

Therefore let us ſtrive to enter in at the narrow gate, and let us remember the ſaying of St. Paul in the 21ſt chapter of the Acts of the Apoſtles, when he was going to Jeruſalem. When he was in the houſe of Philip the Evangeliſt, there came in a prophet, and took off his girdle, and bound his hands and his feet, ſaying, "Thus ſhall they do with the man that owneth this girdle when he cometh to Jeruſalem." When the diſciples heard that, they would have perſuaded him that he ſhould not go thither. Here you ſhall ſee what anſwer this paſtor made them; he was a faithful ſhepherd; "What do ye weeping and breaking of my heart? I am not ready to be bound only, but alſo to die at Jeruſalem, for the name of the Lord Jeſus."

Yet I think there be ſome that will ſay, that I needed not to have been taken, if I would have kept me out of the way. But I ſay unto them, that the ſhrinking away of ſo many of our ſhepherds as be gone, maketh ſo many of the flock to ſcatter; which will be required at their hands, of the maſter of the ſheep. What will he ſay to them at the day of account, when they ſhall come to receive their wages? He ſhall ſay to them, Depart from me ye wicked hirelings, for when ye ſaw the wolf come, ye ran away, and left my ſheep in the wilderneſs. If you had been good ſhepherds you would rather have loſt your lives than have loſt one ſheep committed to your charge, thro' your fault. And I pray you, what caſe be the ſheep in, in, when the ſhepherd runneth away from them? I need not tell you, you know the danger that followeth ſo well.

Therefore let us pray to God to ſend us faithful ſhepherds, as alſo obedient ſheep, that will not hear a ſtranger's voice. I would all men would mark well the ſaying of St. Paul in the eighth chapter of his epiſtle to the Romans, where he thus ſaith, "Who ſhall ſeparate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or anguiſh, or perſecution, or nakedneſs, or peril, or ſword? As it is written, for thy ſake are we killed all the day long, and are counted as ſheep appointed to be ſlain: nevertheleſs we overcome ſtrongly through his help that loved us. Yea, I am ſure, that neither death nor life; neither angels nor rule; neither power; neither things preſent nor things to come, neither height nor depth, nor any other creature ſhall be able to ſeparate us from the love of God, &c." Alſo he hath in another place, "All that will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus muſt ſuffer perſecution, 2 Tim. 3. Thus I prove it to be our heavenly Father's rod: therefore let us thankfully receive it like obedient children, and then our Father will love us,

Yet hear what St. Peter ſaith in his firſt epiſtle, and the fourth chapter, "Dearly beloved (ſaith he) be not troubled in this heat which is now come among you to try you, as though ſome ſtrange thing had happened unto you: but rejoice inaſmuch as ye are partakers of Chriſt's paſſions, that when his glory appeareth you may be merry and glad. If ye are railed on for the name of Chriſt, happy are ye, for the ſpirit of glory, and the ſpirit of God reſteth upon you. On their part he is evil ſpoken of, but on your part he is glorified." Here St. Peter ſaith, it is no ſtrange thing; and that I have partly proved before, becauſe we have nothing elſe promiſed us in this world.

Therefore let us call on God for grace. Be ye ſure that they can do nothing to us, till God permit it. As for example, look in the firſt book of Samuel, chap. 19. you ſhall ſee how Saul perſecuted David, purpoſing to kill him: but his labour was in vain.

Alſo in the 19th chapter of the firſt book of Kings, Jezabel threatened and ſware to ſlay Elias, but the Lord preſerved him. Alſo in the ſecond chapter of Job, you ſee that Satan could do nothing to Job till God ſuffered him, neither exerciſe his cruelty any further than God appointed him. The godly woman Suſannah, through the falſe accuſation of the wicked judges, was even at a point to die, yet God wonderfully delivered her. Theſe have I written to put you in remembrance, that man can do no more than is the will of God: therefore let us not reſiſt his will, but refer all to him: and let us be doing that thing that God hath commanded us in his holy word.

Dear brethren, for the blood of Chriſt refuſe not the croſs of Chriſt, but remember the ſaying of the godly man David in his 119 Pſalm, where he ſaith, "It is good for me that I have been in trouble; that I may learn thy ſtatutes." In the ſame place he ſaith, "Before I was in trouble I went wrong, but now I have kept thy word." Even ſo it is in trouble with us, for the word of God was never ſo ſweet and comfortable as it is now that we be in trouble. Alſo St. Paul ſaith in the fifth chapter to the Romans, "We rejoice in tribulation: for we know that tribulation bringeth patience, patience bringeth experience, experience bringeth hope, and hope maketh not aſhamed."

Alſo I pray you remember the ſaying of St. Paul in the firſt chapter of the ſecond epiſtle to Timothy, where he ſaith, "Be not aſhamed to teſtify the Lord: neither be aſhamed of me." Even ſo I ſay unto you, dear brethren, be not aſhamed of my impriſonment, neither ſorry, but rejoice with me, that it hath pleaſed God of his goodneſs to call me to ſuch a dignity as this ſhall be unto me, if I may have his grace to loſe my life (which I regard as moſt vile) for his name's ſake: for then I ſhall be ſure to find it again with advantage. Therefore I deſire you all that you will pray with me unto Almighty God, that he of his merciful goodneſs will ſend me his grace and ſtrength, that I may continue unto the end; as I will pray for you, that God will preſerve you from all the wicked ways of Antichriſt, and ſtrengthen and comfort you, if it be his good pleaſure, that you ſhall ſuffer any thing for his name ſake, as he hath faithfully promiſed to do.

And I certify you, that if all men knew the comfort that they ſhould receive at the hand of God being in priſon, I think there would come more to priſon than there do. For ſurely we find ſuch comfort at the hand of God ſince we have been in priſon, that we had rather die than be abroad to ſee the idolatry that is committed among them that be abroad; beſide the ſeeking one another's blood, with other wickedneſs too much; God ſend me more grace. But I truſt, among you there be none ſuch: and if there be, repent and amend, leſt it be verefied on you that was ſpoken by the prophet Jeremy, the ſecond chapter, where he ſaith, "My people hath committed two great evils: they have forſaken me the fountain of living waters, and digged them pits: pits (I ſay) that are broken, and can hold no water." Alſo in the ſeventh chapter, he ſaith, "Hear not the words of the prophets that preach their own dreams." Good brethren, beware of thoſe falſe prophets that I have given you warning of.

Dearly beloved, here I make an end for this time, deſiring the ſame health both of body and ſoul unto you all that I would have myſelf, and I end with the ſame that St. Peter ſaith in the fifth chapter of his firſt epiſtle: "Submit yourſelves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you when the time is come. Caſt all your care on him, for he careth for you. Be ſober and watch, for your adverſary the devil, like a roaring lion, walketh about ſeeking whom he may devour, whom reſiſt ſtedfaſt in faith:" remembering that ye do but fulfil the ſame afflictions, that are appointed to your brethren that are in the world. The God of all grace that called you unto his eternal glory by Chriſt Jeſus, ſhall, his own ſelf, after you have ſuffered a little affliction, make you perfect, ſhall ſettle, ſtrengthen and eſtabliſh you. To him be glory and dominion for ever, and while the world endureth. Amen.

Greet one another with an holy kiſs of love. Peace be with you all which are in Chriſt Jeſus. I pray you all ſay, Amen.

Theſe be in the ſame priſon where I am; the biſhop of St. David's, Dr. Taylor of Hadley, Mr. Philpot, and my ſingular good father Mr. Bradford, with five others, laymen of Suſſex.

I deſire ſome good brother to write this anew, for I wrote it (as I do many times) with fear. For if the keepers had found me, they would have taken it from me, and my pen and ink alſo.

Good brethren, I am kept alone, and yet I thank God he comforteth me paſt all the comfort of any man: for I thank him, I was never merrier in Chriſt.

By me, William Tyms, priſoner in the King's bench.

ABOUT this time certain commiſſioners aſſigned by the queen and council, came to Norfolk, (as they did to other countries) to enquire after matters of religion: unto which commiſſioners there was a ſupplication then exhibited by ſome well-diſpoſed men dwelling about thoſe parts. Which ſupplication, for the worthy matter contained in it, I thought proper here to inſert.

The Supplication exhibited by certain Inhabitants of the County of Norfolk, fruitful to be read and obſerved by all Men.

IN moſt humble and lowly wiſe, we beſeech your honours, right honourable commiſſioners, to tender and and pity the humble ſuit of us poor men, and true, faithful, and obedient ſubjects, who as we have ever heretofore, ſo intend we, with God's grace, to continue in chriſtian obedience unto the end, and (according to the word of God) with all reverend fear of God, to do our bounden duty to all thoſe ſuperior powers, whom God hath appointed over us, doing as St. Paul ſaith, Rom. 13. "Let every ſoul be ſubject to the ſuperior powers. For there is no power but of God: but thoſe powers that are, are ordained of God. Wherefore whoſoever reſiſteth the powers, the ſame reſiſteth God, and they that reſiſt get themſelves judgment." Theſe leſſons (right honourable commiſſioners) we have learned of the holy word of God, in our mother tongue.

Firſt, That the authority of a king, queen, lord, and other their officers under them, is no tyrannical uſurpation, but a juſt, holy, lawful, and neceſſary eſtate for a man to be governed by, and that the ſame is of God, the fountain and author of righteouſneſs.

Secondly, That to obey the ſame in all things not againſt God, is to obey God, and to reſiſt them, is to reſiſt God. Therefore, as to obey God in his miniſters and magiſtrates bringeth life; ſo to reſiſt God in them, bringeth puniſhment and death. The ſame leſſon have we learned of St. Peter, 1 Pet. 2. ſaying, "Be ye ſubject to all human ordinances for the Lord's ſake, whether it be to the king, as ſupreme, or unto governors, as unto them that are ſent by him, for the puniſhment of evil doers, and for the praiſe of them that do well. For ſo is the will of God, that with well-doing ye may put to ſilence the ignorance of fooliſh men. As free, and not uſing your liberty for a cloak of maliciouſneſs, but as the ſervants of God."

Wherefore conſidering with ourſelves, both that the magiſtrates power is of God, and that for the Lord's ſake we be bound to chriſtian obedience unto them, having now preſently a commandment, as though it were from the queen's majeſty; with all humble obedience due to the regal power and authority ordained of God (which we acknowledge to ſtand wholly and perfectly in her grace) and with due reverence unto you her grace's commiſſioners, we humbly beſeech you with patience and pity to receive this our anſwer unto this commandment, given unto us.

Firſt, right honourable commiſſioners, we have conſidered ourſelves to be not only Engliſhmen, but alſo chriſtians, and therefore bound by the holy vow made to God in our baptiſm, to prefer God's honour in all things, and that all obedience (not only of us mortal men, but even of the very angels and heavenly ſpirits) is due unto God's word; inſomuch that no obedience can be true and perfect, either before God or man, that fully and wholly agreeth not with God's word.

Then have we weighed the commandment concerning the reſtitution of the late aboliſhed Latin ſervice, given unto us to diſſent and diſagree from God's word, and to command manifeſt impiety, and the overthrow of godlineſs and true religion, and to import a ſubverſion of the regal power of this our native country and realm of England, with the bringing in of the Romiſh biſhop's ſupremacy, with all errors, ſuperſtitions, and idolatry, waſting of our goods and bodies, deſtroying of our ſouls, bringing with it nothing but the ſevere wrath of God, which we already feel, and fear leaſt the ſame ſhall be more fiercely kindled upon us. Wherefore we humbly proteſt, that we cannot be perſuaded, that the ſame wicked commandment ſhould come from the queen's majeſty, but rather from ſome other, abuſing the queen's goodneſs and favour, and ſtudying to work ſome feat againſt the queen, her crown, and the realm, to pleaſe with it the Romiſh biſhop, at whoſe hands the ſame thinketh hereafter to be advanced.

As the Agagite Haman wrought maliciouſly againſt the noble king Ahaſuerus, and as the princes of Babel wrought againſt the good king Darius; ſo think we the queen's moſt gentle heart to be abuſed by ſome, who ſeeking themſelves and their own vain-glory, procure ſuch commandments as are againſt the glory of God. For we cannot have ſo evil an opinion in her majeſty, that ſhe ſhould ſubvert the moſt godly and holy religion (ſo according to God's word ſet forth by the moſt noble, virtuous, and innocent king, our late moſt dear king Edward, her grace's brother) except ſhe were wonderfully abuſed; who, as hating reformation, will rather the deſtruction of all others, than acknowledge their errors, and to be according to God's word, reformed. For truly, the religion lately ſet forth by king Edward, is ſuch in our conſciences, as every chriſtian man is bound to confeſs to be the truth of God, and every member of Chriſt's church here in England muſt needs embarce the ſame in heart, and confeſs it with mouth, and (if need require) loſe and forſake, not only houſe, land and poſſeſſions, riches, wife, children, and friends; but alſo (if God will ſo call them) gladly to ſuffer all manner of perſecution, and to loſe their lives in the defence of God's word and truth ſet out amongſt us. For our Saviour Chriſt requireth the ſame of us, ſaying, "Whoſoever ſhall be aſhamed of me and my word before this adulterous and ſinful generation, the Son of man will alſo be aſhamed of him, when he ſhall come in the glory of his Father with the holy angels." And again ſaith he, "Whoſoever will confeſs me before men, I will confeſs him before my Father which is in heaven. And whoſoever will deny me before men, I will alſo deny him before my Father that is in heaven. And whoſoever ſhall ſpeak a word againſt the Son of man, it ſhall be forgiven him, but whoſoever ſhall rail againſt the Holy Ghoſt, it ſhall not be forgiven him."

We humbly beſeech the queen's majeſty, and you her honourable commiſſioners, be not offended with us, and for confeſſing this truth of God, ſo ſtraitly given us in charge of Chriſt; neither bring upon us that great ſin that never ſhall be forgiven, and ſhall cauſe our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt in the great day of judgment, before his heavenly Father, and all his angels, to deny us, and to take from us the bleſſed price and ranſom of his bloodſhed, wherewith we are redeemed.

For in that day, neither the queen's highneſs, neither you, nor any man ſhall be able to excuſe us, nor to purchaſe a pardon of Chriſt for this horrible ſin and blaſphemy of caſting aſide and condemning his word. We cannot agree nor conſent to this ſo horrible a ſin; but we beſeech God for his mercy to give us, and all men, grace, moſt earneſtly to flee from it, and rather (if the will of God be ſo) to ſuffer all extremity and puniſhment in this world, than to incur ſuch damnation before God.

Manaſſes, who reſtored again the wickedneſs of idolatrous religion (before put down by Ezechias his father) brought the wrath of God upon the people: ſo that the ſcripture ſaith, 2 Kings 23. "Notwithſtanding the reformation made by Joſias, the Lord turned not from the fierceneſs of his great wrath wherewith he was angry againſt Judah, becauſe of the provocation with which Manaſſes provoked him. And the Lord ſaid, Even Judah will I take away from my preſence, as I caſt away Iſrael: and I will caſt away this city of Jeruſalem, and the houſe whereof I ſaid, My name ſhall be there." Jeroboam, who at Bethel and Dan erected up a new-found ſervice of God, and not only ſinned himſelf, but alſo made all Iſrael to ſin with him, ſo that not only he was damned for commanding, but the wrath of God came upon all Iſrael, for obeying that his ungodly commandment; yet was it not ſo heinous an offence to bring in an idolatry never yet heard of, as after reformation made by the godly kings and princes, by the holy and virtuous biſhops, by the prophets and ſervants of God, to reject and caſt off the word and true religion of God, and to receive again a damned impiety.

This

This moſt heinous offence is now offered unto us, although the ſame be painted and coloured with the name of reformatian, reſtoring of religion, ancient faith, with the name of the catholic church, of unity, catholic truth, and with the cloak of feigned holineſs. Theſe are ſheep-ſkins, under which (as Chriſt ſaith) ravening wolves hide themſelves. But Chriſt willeth us to look upon their fruits, whereby we may know them; and truly that is no good fruit to caſt aſide God's word, and to baniſh the Engliſh ſervice out of the churches, and in the place of it to bring in a Latin tongue unknown to the people. Which as it edifieth no man, ſo it hath been occaſion of all blindneſs and error among the people. For afore the bleſſed reformation begun by the moſt noble prince of godly memory, the queen's good father; and by our late holy and innocent king, her good brother, finiſhed; it is not unknown what blindneſs and error we were all in, when not one man in all this realm unlearned in the Latin, could ſay in Engliſh the Lord's Prayer, or knew any one of his Belief, or rehearſe any one of the Ten Commandments. And that ignorance mother of miſchief, was the very root and well-ſpring of all idolatry, Sodomitical monkery, and whoriſh chaſtity of unmarried prieſts, of all whoredom, drunkenneſs, covetouſneſs, ſwearing, and blaſphemy, with all other wicked ſinful living. Theſe brought in the ſevere wrath and vengeance of God plaguing ſin, with famine and peſtilence; and at laſt the ſword conſumed and avenged all their impiety and wicked living. As it is greatly to be feared the ſame or more grievous plagues ſhall now again follow.

We cannot therefore conſent nor agree that the word of God and prayers in our Engliſh tongue, which we underſtand, ſhould be taken away from us, and for it a Latin ſervice, we know not what, (for none of us underſtand it) to be again brought in amongſt us, eſpecially ſeeing that Chriſt hath ſaid, "My ſheep hear my voice, and follow me, and I give to them everlaſting life." The ſervice in Engliſh teacheth us, that we are the Lord's people, and the ſheep of his paſture; and commandeth that we harden not our hearts, as when they provoked the Lord's wrath in the wilderneſs, leſt he ſwear unto us, as he did ſwear unto them, that they ſhould not enter into his reſt.

The ſervice in Latin is a confuſed noiſe; which if it be good (as they ſay it is) yet unto us that lack underſtanding, what goodneſs can it bring? St. Paul commandeth, that in the churches all things ſhall be done to edifying, which we are ſure is God's commandment. But in the Latin ſervice nothing is done to edifying, but contrarily all to deſtroy thoſe that are already edified, and to drive us from God's word and truth, and from believing of the ſame, and ſo to bring us to believe lyes and fables, that tempting and provoking God, we ſhould be brought into that judgment that bleſſed Paul ſpeaketh of, ſaying, "Antichriſt ſhall come according to the working of Satan, with all manner of power and ſigns, and lying wonders in all deceiveableneſs of unrighteouſneſs in thoſe that periſh: becauſe they have not received the love of the truth, that they might be ſaved. And therefore God will ſend them ſtrong deluſion, that they ſhould believe lyes and be damned, as many as have not believed the truth, but have approved unrighteouſneſs.

Thus, altogether drawn from God, we ſhall fall into his wrath through unbelief, till he ſwear unto us as he did unto the unfaithful Jews, that ſuch infidels ſhould not enter into his reſt.

In the adminiſtration of the Lord's ſupper, which we confeſs to be the holy communion, and partaking with Chriſt and his holy congregation, we have learned God's holy commandments, and at the rehearſal of every one of them to aſk God mercy for our moſt grievous tranſgreſſions againſt them, and to aſk grace of God, to keep them in time to come, that the ſame may not only outwardly ſound in our ears, but alſo inwardly by the Holy Ghoſt be written in our hearts.

We have learned alſo the holy prayer made for the queen's majeſty; wherein we learn that her power and authority is of God, therefore we pray to God for her, that ſhe and all magiſtrates under her, may rule according to God's word, and we her ſubjects obey according to the ſame.

Truly (moſt honourable commiſſioners) we cannot think theſe things evil, but think them moſt worthy to be retained in our churches, and we ſhould think ourſelves not to have true ſubjects hearts, if we ſhould go about to put away ſuch godly prayers, as puts us perpetually in memory of our bounden obedience and duty to God and our rulers. For, as we think, at this preſent the unquiet multitude had more need to have theſe things more often and earneſtly beaten and driven into them (eſpecially given in many places to ſtir and trouble) than to take from them that bleſſed doctrine, whereby only they may to their ſalvation be kept in quiet.

Furthermore, we cannot forſake that bleſſed partaking of the body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt's inſtitution, miniſtered with ſuch godly prayers, exhortations and admonitions teaching us the knowledge of God, the exceeding love and charity of our loving Redeemer Chriſt, breaking his body upon the croſs for our ſins, and ſhedding his moſt precious blood for our redemption: which we in eating of that bleſſed bread, and drinking of the bleſſed cup, aſſuredly believe that we receive, and be perfectly joined with Chriſt and his holy catholic church into one body, and into one unity and brotherly love, whereby every member faithfully embraceth each other. We muſt needs confeſs this inſtitution of Chriſt to be moſt holy and godly, whereof we have the only comfort in conſcience againſt ſin and damnation with the aſſurance of ſalvation, and whereof hath enſued reformation of many heinous ſins, much lawing, ſtrife and contention is ended; drunkenneſs, whoredom, and other vices in ſome reformed goodneſs and virtue increaſed and nouriſhed.

In the Latin maſs we never had any ſuch edifying, but only we ſaw a great many ceremonies and ſtrange geſtures; as turning of the prieſt, croſſings, bleſſings, breathings, waſhing of hands, and ſpreading abroad of his arms, with like ceremonies that we underſtand not. And concerning the Latin tongue, wherein the prieſt prayeth, we know not whether he bleſſeth or curſeth us. We are not partakers of the ſacrament, as Chriſt's inſtitution appointeth we ſhould be.

In the miniſtering of the ſacrament the prieſts alter the inſtitution of Chriſt, committing theft and ſacrilege, robbing us of the cup of Chriſt's blood, contrary to Chriſt's commandment, ſaying, Drink ye all of this.

They rob us alſo of God's word, ſpeaking all things in Latin, which nothing edifieth us either in faith or manners. Chriſt commandeth not that his ſupper ſhould be adminiſtred in an unknown tongue: but foraſmuch as faith cometh by hearing, and hearing cometh of God's word, how can we believe Chriſt's word and promiſe made unto us in this holy ſacrament, ſaying, "This is my body broken for you, and this is my blood of the New Teſtament, which is ſhed for you, for the remiſſion of ſins;" if the ſame promiſes of Chriſt either be not at all recited, or elſe ſo recited in Latin, that the congregation underſtandeth not, nor heareth not what is ſpoken? St. Paul ſaith thus, reciting the ſaying of Iſaiah, "As truly as I live, ſaith the Lord, all knees ſhall bow unto me, all tongues ſhall give praiſe unto God." Alſo he ſaith, "All tongues muſt confeſs that Jeſus Chriſt is the Lord, unto the glory of God the Father." The Holy Ghoſt came upon the apoſtles in fiery tongues, ſo that they ſpake the tongues of all nations under heaven. St. Paul miniſtered to the Corinthians, and preached to them in their own mother-tongue, and rebuked the bringing in of ſtrange tongues into the congregations. We cannot not think that to be well which ſo holy an apoſtle rebuked. And whatſoever virtue the Latin tongue hath to ſuch as underſtand it, to us Engliſhmen not underſtanding it, it is altogether without virtue and edifying, and therefore unmeet for our churches.

The prieſts complain that we laymen love them not, nor have them in honours, but it is their own fault: for how ſhould we love them that only ſeek to keep us in blindneſs and ignorance, to damn our ſouls, to deſtroy our bodies, to rob and ſpoil our goods and ſubſtance under a colour of pretenſed holineſs? We know (right honourable commiſſioners) what honour is due to ſuch wolves, and how by the authority of God's word ſuch are to be fled, as peſtilences to the Lord's lambs, whom they miſerably daily murder.

But we have rather choſe by this our meek ſupplication, humbly to deſire the queen's majeſty, and you her honourable commiſſioners, to render God's word again unto the churches, and to permit us freely to enjoy the ſame. For we certainly know, that the whole religion lately ſet out by the holy ſaint of God, our late moſt dear king Edward, is Chriſt's true religion written in the holy ſcripture of God, and by Chriſt and his apoſtles taught unto his church. Wherefore we cannot allow with ſafe conſciences this refuſal of it, and caſting of it out of our churches; foraſmuch as to refuſe, caſt off, and to reject it, is to caſt off Chriſt himſelf, and to refuſe our part in his bleſſed body broken for our ſins, and his blood ſhed for our redemption. Which thing whoſo doth, the ſame without repentance can look for no ſacrifice for his ſins, but muſt fearfully wait for the judgment, and for that vehement fire that ſhall deſtroy Chriſt's adverſaries. For if he that deſpiſeth the law of Moſes, is without mercy put to death under two or three witneſſes, how much more grievous torments ſhall he ſuffer that treadeth under foot the Son of God, and eſteemeth the blood of the Teſtament (whereby he was ſanctified), as a profane thing, and contumelioufly uſeth the Spirit of grace?

Wherefore we moſt humbly pray and beſeech the queen's gracious majeſty, to have mercy and pity upon us her poor and faithful ſubjects, and not to compel us to do the thing that is againſt our conſciences, and ſhall ſo incurably wound us in heart, by bringing into the church the Latin maſs and ſervice that nothing edifieth us, and caſting out of Chriſt's holy communion and Engliſh ſervice, ſo cauſing us to ſin againſt our redemption. For ſuch as wittingly and willingly againſt their conſciences ſhall ſo do (as it is to be feared many a one doth), they are in a miſerable eſtate, until the mercy of God turn them; which if he do not, we certainly believe that they ſhall eternally be damned: and as in this world they deny Chriſt's holy word and communion before men, ſo ſhall Chriſt deny them before his heavenly Father and his angels.

And whereas it is very earneſtly required, that we ſhould go in proceſſion (as they call it) at which time the prieſts ſay in Latin ſuch things as we are ignorant of, the ſame edifieth nothing at all unto godlineſs, and we have learned that to follow Chriſt's croſs is another matter, namely, to take up our croſs, and to follow Chriſt in patient ſuffering for his love, tribulations, ſickneſs, poverty, priſon, or any other adverſity, whenſoever God's holy will and pleaſure is to lay the ſame upon us. The triumphant paſſion and death of Chriſt, whereby in his own perſon he conquered death, ſin, hell, and damnation, hath moſt lively been preached unto us, and the glory of Chriſt's croſs declared by our preachers; whereby we have learned the cauſes and effects of the ſame more lively in one ſermon, than in all the proceſſions that ever we went in, or ever ſhall go in.

When we worſhipped the Divine Trinity kneeling, and in the Litany invocating the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, aſking mercy for our ſins, and deſiring ſuch petitions as the need of our frail eſtate and this mortal life required, we were edified, both to know unto whom all chriſtian prayers ſhould be directed, and alſo to know that of God's hand we receive all things, as well to the ſalvation of our ſouls, as to the relief of our mortal neceſſities. And we humbly beſeech the queen's majeſty, that the ſame moſt holy prayers may be continued amongſt us; that our miniſters praying in our mother-tongue, and we underſtanding their prayers and petitions, may anſwer, Amen, unto them. At evening-ſervice we underſtood our miniſters prayers, we were taught and admoniſhed by the ſcriptures then read; which in the Latin Even-ſong is all gone.

At the miniſtration of holy baptiſm, we learned what league and covenant God hath made with us, and what vows and promiſes we upon our part had made, namely, to believe in him, to forſake Satan and his works, and to walk in the way of God's holy word and commandments.

The chriſtian catechiſm continually taught and called to remembrance the ſame, whereas before no man knew any thing at all. And many good men of forty years, that had been godfathers to thirty children, knew no more of the godfather's office, but to waſh their hands ere they departed the church, or elſe to faſt five Fridays with bread and water.

O merciful God, have pity upon us. Shall we be altogether caſt from thy preſence? We may well lament our miſerable eſtate, to receive ſuch a commandment, to reject and caſt out of our churches all theſe moſt godly prayers, inſtructions, admonitions and doctrines, and thus to be compelled to deny God, and Chriſt our Saviour, his holy word, and all his doctrine of our ſalvation, the candle to our feet, and the light to our ſteps, the bread coming down from heaven that giveth life, which whoſo eateth, it ſhall be in him a well-ſpring ſtreaming unto eternal life; whereby we have learned all righteouſneſs, all true religion, all true obedience towards our governors, all charity one towards another, all good works that God would have us to walk in, what puniſhment abideth the wicked, and what heavenly reward God will give to thoſe that reverently walk in his ways and commandments.

Wherefore, right honourable commiſſioners, we cannot without impiety refuſe and caſt from us the holy word of God which we have received, or condemn any thing ſet forth by our moſt godly late king Edward and his virtuous proceedings, ſo agreeable to God's word. And our moſt humble ſuit is, that the commandment may be revoked, ſo that we be not conſtrained thereunto. For we proteſt before God, we think if the holy word of God had not taken ſome root amongſt us, we could not in times paſt have done that poor duty of ours, which we did in aſſiſting the queen, our moſt dear ſovereign, againſt her grace's mortal foe, that then ſought her deſtruction. It was our bounden duty, and we thank God for the knowledge of his word and grace, that we then did ſome part of our bounden ſervice.

And we meekly pray and beſeech the queen's majeſty for the dear paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt, that the ſame word may not be taken away out of our churches, nor from us her loving, faithful, and true ſubjects; leſt if the like neceſſity ſhould hereafter chance (which God for his mercy ſake forbid, and ever ſave and defend her grace, and us all) the want of knowledge and due remembrance of God's word may be occaſion of great ruin to an infinite number of her grace's true ſubjects. And truly we judge this to be one ſubtil part of the devil (enemy to all godly peace and quietneſs), that by taking God's word from among us, and planting ignorance, he may make a way to all miſchief and wickedneſs; and by baniſhing the holy goſpel of peace he may bring upon us the heavy wrath of God, with all manner of plagues; as death, ſtrange ſickneſs, peſtilence, murrain, moſt terrible uproars, commotions and ſeditions. Theſe things did the Lord threaten unto the Jews for refuſing his word, ſaying, ing, "Go, and thou ſhalt ſay unto this people: Ye ſhall hear indeed, but ye ſhall not underſtand, ye ſhall plainly ſee, and not perceive. Harden the heart of this people, ſtop their ears, and ſhut their eyes, that they ſee not with their eyes, hear not with their ears, underſtand not with their hearts, and convert and be healed. And I ſaid, How long Lord? And he anſwered, Until the cities be deſtroyed, utterly waſted without inhabitants, and the houſes without men, till the land alſo be deſolate, and lie unbuilded." And the prophet Micah in the ſeventh chapter, conſidering the contempt of God's word among the Iſraelites, threatened them thus, "When the day that thy preachers warned thee of, cometh, thou ſhalt be waſted away. And let no man believe his friend, or put confidence in his brother. Keep the door of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy boſom: for the ſon ſhall put his father to diſhonour, and the daughter ſhall riſe againſt her mother, the daughter-in-law againſt the mother-in-law; and a man's foes ſhall be even they of his own houſhold." The ſame plague Chriſt threatened unto the Jews, for refuſing his peace proffered them in the goſpel, and he wept on the city of Jeruſalem which murdered the prophets, and ſtoned ſuch as were ſent unto her.

The ſame plagues, we are afraid, will alſo fall upon us. For whereas heretofore with the receiving of Chriſt's word and peaceable goſpel, we had great benedictions of God, eſpecially this chriſtian concord and holy peace, ſo that all were at a full and perfect ſtay in religion, and no man offended with another, but as the ſons of peace, each of us with chriſtian charity embraced other. Now, alas, for pity, the devil, riding upon the red horſe, ſhewed unto St. John in the revelation, is come forth, and power is given unto him to take peace from the earth. For now a man can go to no place, but malicious buſy-bodies curiouſly ſearch out his deeds, mark his words, and if he agree not with them in deſpiſing God's word, then will they ſpitefully and hatefully rail againſt him and it, calling it error and hereſy, and the profeſſors thereof heretics and ſchiſmatics, with other odious and ſpiteful names, as traitors, and not the queen's friends, nor favourers of the queen's proceedings; as if to love God's word were hereſy, and as though to talk of Chriſt were to be ſchiſmatic; as though none could be true to the queen that were not falſe to God; as though none were the queen's friends, but ſuch as deſpitefully rail on her grace's father and brother, and on God's word that they ſet forth; as though none favoured the queen's majeſty, but ſuch as hate all godly knowledge.

And in very deed theſe things that all this turmoil is made for, as mere inventions of popes, brought into the church of their own imaginations without commandment or enſample either of Chriſt or his apoſtles; and there is not one word in the Bible, that being truly alledged, maintained them, nor any doctor of antiquity before St. Auguſtine's days, as it hath been divers times ſufficiently proved before all the whole parliament and convocation of this realm. Yet theſe being mere traditions of biſhops, are ſet out for God's commandments, and the queen's authority (given to her of God to maintain his word) muſt be abuſed to put down God's word. And you, right honourable juſtices, and keepers of laws and righteouſneſs, are alſo abuſed and made the biſhops apparators, to ſet forth ſuch Romiſh traſh as is to Chriſt's diſhonour, and againſt the ſupreme authority of the regal ſtate of this realm. And we poor ſubjects, for ſpeaking of that which is truth, and our bounden allegiance, are daily puniſhed, railed upon, and noted for ſeditious, and not the queen's friends.

But God (who is bleſſed forever) knoweth that they ſlander us, and pull the thorn out of their own foot, and put it in ours: for the ſearcher of hearts knoweth, that we bear a faithful and true heart unto her grace, and unto all her proceedings, that are not againſt God and his holy word. And we daily pray unto the heavenly Father, to enlighten her grace's royal heart with the glorious light of the goſpel, that ſhe may eſtabliſh and confirm that religion, that her grace's brother, our moſt dear king, did ſet out among us; and ſo governing and ruling this her realm in the fear and true way of God, ſhe may long live, and with proſperity, peace, and honour, reign over us.

But we cannot think that thoſe men do ſeek either God's honour, or her graces proſperity, or wealth of the realm, that take from her grace's faithful ſubjects God's word, which only is the root of all love and faithful obedience under her grace, and of all honeſty, good life, and virtuous concord among her commons. And this we fear, leſt the root being taken away, the branches will ſoon whither and be fruitleſs. And when the Philiſtines have ſtopped up the well-ſpring, the fair ſtreams that ſhould flow, ſhall ſoon be dried up. All our watchmen, our true preachers, have taught us, that as long as we retained God's word, we ſhall have God our gracious merciful Father: but if we refuſed and caſt off the Lord's yoke of his doctrine, then ſhall we look for the Lord's wrath and ſevere viſitation to plague us as he did the Jews for the like offences. And Paul ſaith, Rom. 2. "God gave to them the ſpirit of unquietneſs and uproar, eyes wherewith they ſhould not ſee, and ears wherewith they ſhould not hear, unto this day." And as David ſaid, Pſalm 69. "Let their table be made a ſnare to take themſelves withal, a trap to catch them, and a ſtumbling-block to fall at. Let their eyes be blinded that they ſee not, and bow thou down their backs always."

O merciful God, all this is now come upon us, and daily more and more increaſed, and we fear at laſt it will ſo bow down our backs, that we ſhall utterly be deſtroyed; the troubleſome ſpirit of uproars and unquietneſs daily troubleth men's hearts, and worketh ſuch unquietneſs in all places, that no man that loveth quietneſs can tell where to place himſelf. Men have eyes and ſee not how grievous an offence it is to caſt off the yoke of God's doctrine, and to bear the heavy burden that unfaithful hypocrites lay upon us. We have ears and hear not the warning of God's word, calling us to true repentance, nor his threats againſt our impiety. Our moſt ſweet table of Chriſt's word and moſt holy communion is taken away, and turned to a moſt perilous ſnare, thro' the brawling diſputations of men. And as the idol of abomination betokened final ſubverſion unto the Jewiſh nation; ſo we fear, this ſetting aſide of the goſpel and holy communion of Chriſt, and the placing in of a Romiſh religion, betokeneth deſolation of the noble realm of England to be at hand.

For the plagues of hunger, peſtilence and ſword, cannot long tarry; but except we repent, and turn again to the Lord, our backs ſhall be ſo bowed, that the like horrible plagues were never ſeen. And no marvel, for the like offence was never committed, as to reject and caſt off Chriſt and his word, and in plain Engliſh to ſay, We will not have him to reign over us. O Lord how terrible is that which followeth in the goſpel? "Thoſe mine enemies that would not have me to reign over them, bring them hither and ſlay them before me," Luke 19. God be merciful to us, and move the heart of the queen's majeſty, and the hearts of her honourable council, and your hearts (right worſhipful commiſſioners) to weigh theſe dangers in due time; and to call God's word into your council, and then you ſhall ſee how it agreeth with this unreaſonable commandment; and to be as wary to avoid the contempt of the eternal God, and dangers of the ſame, as you are prudent and wiſe in matters of this world, leſt if the Almighty be contemned, he ſtretch forth his arm which no man can turn, and kindling his wrath, which no man can quench.

We have humbly opened to you our conſciences, doubtleſs ſore wounded and grieved by this commandment: and we meekly pray and beſeech the queen's majeſty, jeſty, for the precious death and blood-ſhedding of Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour, to have mercy and pity upon us her grace's poor commons, faithful and true ſubjects, members of the ſame body politic, whereof her grace is ſupreme head. All our bodies, lands, goods, and lives, are ready to do her grace faithful obedience, and true ſervice of all commandments that are not againſt God and his word: but in things that import a denial of Chriſt, and refuſal of his word and holy communion, we cannot conſent nor agree unto it. For we have bound ourſelves in baptiſm to be Chriſt's diſciples, and to keep his holy word and ordinances. And if we deny him before men, he will deny us before his heavenly Father and his holy angels in the day of judgment: which we truſt her benign grace will not require of us.

And we humbly beſeech her majeſty, that we be not enforced unto it; but as we ſerve her grace with body and goods, and due obedience, according to God's commandments; ſo we may be permitted freely to ſerve God and Chriſt our Saviour, and keep unto him our ſouls, which he hath with his precious blood redeemed, that ſo (as Chriſt teacheth) we may render to Cæſar that which is due to Cæſar, and to God that which is due to God.

For we think it no true obedience unto the queen's majeſty, or to any other magiſtrate ordained of God under her, to obey in the things contrary to God's word, although the ſame be never ſo ſtraightly charged in her grace's name. The biſhop of Wincheſter hath truly taught in this point, in his book of True Obedience, that true obedience is in the Lord, and not againſt the Lord: as the apoſtle anſwered before the council at Jeruſalem, commanding them no more to preach in the name of the Lord Jeſus: "Judge you (ſaid they) whether it be right in the ſight of God, to hear you rather than God." And again they ſaid, "We muſt obey God rather than man." Wherefore we learn, that true obedience is to obey God, King of all Kings, and Lord of all Lords, and for him, in him, and not againſt him and his word, to obey the princes and magiſtrates of this world, who are not truly obeyed when God is diſobeyed, nor yet diſobeyed when God is faithfully obeyed.

Tobias diſobeyed not his king, although contrary to his commandment, and contrary to the uſage of all others, when they went to Dan and Bethel he went unto Jeruſalem, and worſhipped in the temple of the Lord. The three young men in Babylon, refuſing Nebuchadnezzar's commandment, pleaſed God more than the whole multitude that obeyed. And Daniel that prayed to the God of heaven, contrary to king Darius's commandment, bare a more true and faithful heart to the king, than thoſe wicked counſellors that procured that wicked law, or thoſe that for fear or flattery obeyed it. Which two peſtilences (fear and flattery) have ever deſtroyed true obedience to God and man; when wicked men (that care not if the devil were worſhipped, ſo they might get and obtain riches, promotions, dignity and worldly glory), turn to and fro as every wind bloweth; and weak and frail men fearing loſs of goods, puniſhment, or death, do outwardly in body that thing, that their hearts and conſciences inwardly abhorreth, and ſo outwardly diſobey God, and in heart diſſemble with man, which diſſimulation we think worthy the hate of all men and moſt uncomely for chriſtian men.

Wherefore we humbly beſeech the queen's majeſty, with pity and mercy to tender the lamentable ſuit of us her poor ſubjects, which be by this commandment ſore hurt, and wounded in our conſciences, and driven to many miſeries, and by the malicious attempts of wicked men ſuffer great wrongs and injuries, ſlanders, loſs of goods, and bodily vexations. We think not good, by any unlawful ſtir or commotion to ſeek remedy; but intend, by God's grace, to obey her majeſty in all things not againſt God, and his holy word. But unto ſuch ungodly commandments as are againſt God, we anſwer with the apoſtle, "God muſt be obeyed rather than man." If perſecution ſhall enſue, which ſome threaten us with, we deſire the heavenly Father, according to his promiſe, to look from heaven, to hear our cry, to judge between us and our adverſaries, and to give us faith, ſtrength and patience to continue faithful unto the end, and to ſhorten theſe evil days for his choſen's ſake: and ſo we faithfully believe he will.

Notwithſtanding, we truſt the queen's gracious and merciful heart will not ſuffer ſuch tyranny to be done againſt her poor, innocent, faithful and obedient ſubjects, that daily pray unto God for her; which have no remedy in this world but to ſue unto her highneſs, our moſt gracious and benign ſovereign: whom we pray and beſeech, for the dear blood of Chriſt, to pity our lamentable caſe and hurt of conſcience, and to call back all ſuch commandments as are againſt God's honour, as the good king Darius, Ahaſuerus, Trajan, Theodoſius, and divers others have done, and permit the holy word of God and true religion (ſet forth by our moſt holy and innocent king Edward), to be reſtored again unto our churches, to be ſo frequented amongſt us. So ſhall we grow and increaſe in the knowledge of God and of Chriſt, in true repentance and amendment of life: ſo ſhall we exhibit true obedience to our lawful magiſtrates, and all ſuperiors ordained of God: ſo ſhall love and charity (of late through this commandment ſo decayed), be again reſtored, the honour of her regal eſtate the more confirmed and eſtabliſhed, and godlineſs and virtuous life among her loving ſubjects increaſed and maintained.

And we moſt heartily pray you (right honourable commiſſioners), to be means unto the queen's highneſs, and to her honourable council, that this our humble ſuit may be favourably tendered, and graciouſly heard and granted. And we ſhall not ceaſe day and night to pray unto the heavenly Father long to preſerve her grace and all other magiſtrates in his fear and love, and in proſperous peace and wealth, with long life and honour, Amen.

Your poor ſuppliants, the lovers of Chriſt's true religion in Norfolk and Suffolk.

The Hiſtory of John Harpole of Rocheſter, and Joan Beach, Widow, of Tunbridge, Martyrs.

TOuching the examination of Joan Beach, widow, and of John Harpole, within the dioceſe of Rocheſter, by Maurice, biſhop of the ſaid dioceſe, mention was made before in the ſtory of Nicholas Hall, [p. 306.] wherein was declared the four articles conſiſtorial of the biſhop, objected and laid, as unto the ſaid Nicholas Hall and his company, ſo alſo to this Joan Beach, widow: whereof the firſt was this;

1. That ſhe was of the pariſh of Tunbridge, in the dioceſe of Rocheſter.

2. Item, That all perſons which preach, teach, believe or ſay otherwiſe or contrary to that their mother holy catholic church of Chriſt, are excommunicate perſons and heretics.

3. Item, That the ſaid Joan Beach hath, and yet doth affirm, maintain, and believe contrary to the ſaid mother church of Chriſt, namely, that in the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, under form of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour in ſubſtance, but only a token and memorial thereof; that the very body and blood of Chriſt is in heaven, and not in the ſacrament.

4. Item, That ſhe hath been, and yet is, amongſt the pariſhioners of Tunbridge, openly noted, and vehemently ſuſpected to be a ſacramentary, and heretic.

To which aforeſaid articles her anſwers were theſe:

1. That

1. That ſhe was and is of the ſaid pariſh of Tunbridge in the dioceſe of Rocheſter.

2. That all perſons which do preach and hold otherwiſe and contrary to that which the holy catholic church of Chriſt doth, are to be reputed for excommunicate and heretics; adding withal, that nevertheleſs ſhe believeth not the holy catholic church to be her mother, but believeth only the Father of heaven to be her Father.

3. Thirdly, that ſhe hath, and yet doth verily believe, hold and affirm, in the ſacrament of the altar under forms of bread and wine, not to be the very body and blood of our Saviour in ſubſtance, but only a token and remembrance of his death to the faithful receiver, and this his body and ſubſtance is only in heaven, and not in the ſacrament.

Laſtly, as touching how ſhe hath been or is noted and reputed among the pariſhioners of Tunbridge, ſhe could not tell; however ſhe believed ſhe was not ſo taken and reputed.

The like matter, and the ſame four articles were alſo the ſame preſent time and place miniſtered to John Harpole, by the aforeſaid biſhop Maurice; who after the like anſwers received of him, as of the other before, adjudged and condemned them both together to death, by one form of ſentence, according to the tenor and courſe of their ſeveral ſentence, which may be read before in the ſtory of Mr. Rogers.

John Hullier, Miniſter and Martyr.

JOHN Hullier, miniſter, was firſt brought up in Eton ſchool, from whence he went to King's-college, in Cambridge. He ſuffered under Dr. Thirlby, biſhop of Ely, and his chancellor, for the ſincere preaching of the goſpel. In whoſe behalf it is much to be lamented, that among ſo many freſh wits and ſtirring pens in that univerſity, ſo little matter is left unto us concerning the proceſs of his judgment, and order of his ſuffering, who ſo innocently gave his life in ſuch a cauſe among the midſt of them. By certain letters which he himſelf left behind, it appeared that he was zealous and earneſt in that doctrine of truth, which every true chriſtian man ought to embrace. His martyrdom was about the ſecond day of April.

A Letter of John Hullier to the Chriſtian Congregation, exhorting them faithfully to abide in the Doctrine of the Lord.

IT ſtandeth now moſt in hand (O dear chriſtians) all them that look to be accounted of Chriſt's flock at the great and terrible day, when a ſeparation ſhall be made of the ſort that ſhall be received, from the other which ſhall be refuſed faithfully, in this time of great afflictions to hear our maſter Chriſt's voice, the only true ſhepherd of our ſouls, who ſaith, "Whoſoever ſhall endure to the end ſhall be ſafe." For even now is that great trouble in hand (as here in England we may well ſee), that our Saviour Chriſt ſpake of long before, which ſhould follow the true and ſincere preaching of his goſpel. Therefore in this time we muſt needs either ſhew that we be his faithful ſoldiers, and continue in his battle unto the end, putting on the armour of God, the buckler of faith, the breaſt-plate of love, the helmet of hope and ſalvation, and the ſword of his holy word (which we have heard plentifully) with all inſtance of ſupplication and prayer; or elſe if we do not work and labour with theſe, we are apoſtates and falſe ſoldiers, ſhrinking moſt unthankfully from our gracious and ſovereign lord and captain Chriſt, and leaning to Belial. For as he ſaith plainly, Luke 14. "Whoſoever beareth not my croſs, and followeth me, he cannot be my diſciple." And Matt. 6. "No man can ſerve two maſters: for either he muſt hate the one, or love the other, or elſe he ſhall lean to the one, and deſpiſe the other." Which thing the faithful prophet Elias ſignified when he came to the people, and ſaid, "Why halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him, or if Baal be he, then follow him." 1 Kings 18.

Now let us not think, but that the ſame was recorded in writing for our inſtruction, whom the ends of the world are come upon, as the apoſtle St. Paul ſaith, Rom. 15. "Whatſoever things are written aforehand, they are written for our learning." If Chriſt be that only good and true ſhepherd that gave his life for us, then let us that bear his mark, and have our conſciences ſprinkled with his blood, follow altogether, for our ſalvation, his heavenly voice and calling, according to our profeſſion and firſt promiſe. But if we ſhall not ſo do, certainly (ſay what we can) although we bear the name of Chriſt, yet we be none of his ſheep indeed. For he ſaith very manifeſtly, John 10. "My ſheep hear my voice, and follow me: a ſtranger they will not follow, but will flee from him, for they know not the voice of a ſtranger.

Therefore let every man take heed in theſe perilous days (whereof we have had ſo much warning aforehand) that he be not beguiled by the goodly outward ſhew and appearance, as Eve was of our old ſubtle enemy, whoſe craft and wileneſs is ſo manifold and divers, and ſo full of cloſe windings, that if he cannot bring him directly and the plain ſtraitway to conſent to his ſuggeſtions, then he will allure him in by ſome other falſe ways (as it were by a train) that he ſhall not preceive it, to deceive withal, and to ſteal from him that goodly victory of the incorruptible and eternal crown of glory, which no man elſe can have, but he that fighteth lawfully; as at this preſent day, if he cannot induce him thoroughly, as others do, to favour his deviliſh religion, and of good will and free heart to help to uphold the ſame, yet he will inveigle him to reſort to his wicked and whoriſh ſchool-houſe, and at the leaſt-wiſe to be conſervant and keep company with his congregation there, and to hold his peace and ſay nothing, whatſoever he think, ſo that he be not a diligent ſoldier and a good labourer on Chriſt's ſide, to further his kingdom; by that ſubtle means flattering him that he ſhall both ſave his life, and alſo his goods, and live in quiet. But if we look well on Chriſt's holy will and teſtament, we ſhall perceive that he came not to make any ſuch peace upon earth, nor yet that he gave any ſuch peace to his diſciples; "I leave peace with you (ſaith he) my peace I give you, not as the world giveth it, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, nor fearful. Theſe things have I ſpoken unto you, that in me ye ſhould have peace. In the world ye ſhall have affliction, but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world. The ſervant is not greater than his lord and maſter; if they have perſecuted me, they ſhall alſo perſecute you. If any man come to me, and hateth not his own father and mother, wife, children, ſiſters, yea, and moreover his own life, it is not poſſible for him to be my diſciple. Bleſſed be ye that now weep, for ye ſhall laugh: and wo be unto you that now laugh, for ye ſhall mourn and weep. He that will find his life, ſhall loſe it."

Therefore the God of that true peace and comfort, preſerve and keep us, that we never obey ſuch a falſe flattering, which at length will pay us home once for all, bringing for temporal peace and quietneſs, everlaſting trouble, vexation, and diſquietneſs; for theſe vain and tranſitory goods, extreme loſs and utter damage of the eternal treaſure and inheritance; for this mortal life, deprivation of the moſt joyful life immortal; finally, the entrance into endleſs death moſt miſerable, unmeaſurable pain and torment both of body and ſoul.

Now concerning theſe two ſchoolmaſters together, let us conſider the thing well, and determine with ourſelves which way we ought to take, and not to take the common broad way which ſeemeth here moſt pleaſant, and that the moſt part of the people take. Surely I judge it to be better to go to ſchool with our maſter Chriſt, and to be under his ferula and rod (although it ſeemeth ſharp and grievous for a time) that at the length we may be inheritors with him of everlaſting joy, rather than to keep company with the devil's ſcholars, the adulterous generation, in his ſchool that is all full of pleaſure for a while, and at the end to be paid with the wages of continual burning in the moſt horrible lake which burneth evermore with fire and brimſtone without any end. What ſhall then theſe vain goods and temporal pleaſures avail? Who ſhall then help when we cry inceſſantly, Wo, wo, alas, and weal away, for unmeaſurable pain, grief, and ſorrow? O let us therefore take heed betime, and rather be content to take pains in this world for a time, that we may pleaſe God. Our Saviour Chriſt the true teacher ſaith, "Every branch that bringeth forth not fruit in me, my Father will take away," John 16.

It is alſo not written in vain, Ecclus. 41. "The children of the ungodly are abominable children, and ſo are they that keep company with the ungodly." What doth he elſe, I pray you, that reſorteth to the adminiſtration and ſervice that is moſt repugnant and contrary to Chriſt's Holy Teſtament, there keeping ſtill ſilence, and nothing reproving the ſame, but in the face of the world, by his very deed itſelf, declare himſelf to be of a falſe, fearful, diſſembling, feigned, and unfaithful heart, and to have laid away from him the armour of light, diſcouraging as much as lieth in him all the reſidue of Chriſt's hoſt, and giving a manifeſt offence to the weak, and alſo confirming, encouraging and rejoicing, the hearts the adverſaries in all their evil doing. By which example he doth ſhew himſelf neither to love God, whom he ſeeth to be diſhonoured and blaſphemed of an Antichriſtian miniſter, nor yet his neighbour before whom he ſhould rebuke the evil, as it is expreſly commanded in God's holy law, where it is ſaid, "Thou ſhalt in any wiſe rebuke thy neighbour, that thou bear not ſin for his ſake," Lev. 18. Wherefore let ſuch a one never fancy to deceive himſelf, that his name is regiſter'd in the book of life, to have the ſtipend of Chriſt's ſoldier, except he do the duty, and perform the part of a faithful and right true ſoldier, as others have done before. For ſuch fearfulneſs cometh not from God, as teſtifieth St. Paul, 2 Tim. 1. ſaying, "God hath not given us the ſpirit of fear, but of power and love. Be not aſhamed, ſaith he, to teſtify our Lord, but ſuffer adverſity alſo with the goſpel, through the power of God, which ſaved us, and called us with an holy calling."

To be now fearful, when moſt need is that we ſhould be of ſtrong hearts, is utterly the rejecting of the fear of God, and plain unfaithfulneſs and diſobedience to the expreſs command of our Saviour Chriſt, who ſaith in his holy goſpel, Matt. 10. "Fear not them that kill the body," &c. For what faithfulneſs do we expreſs towards him, when he ſaith thus to us, and yet we declare in our doings the very contrary, being ever fearful, even as the unbelieving Iſraelites, who unfaithfully feared God's enemies the Canaanites, whereas he had oftentimes given them commandment by his true prophet Moſes, to the contrary? For which cauſe all the whole number of that ſect were deſtroyed in proceſs of time in the wilderneſs, and enjoyed not the pleaſant land of promiſe. Which was a bodily figure ſhewed before, and now agreeing to the promiſe of the heavenly inheritance, which ſhall be given to none other, but only to ſuch as with love unfeigned be wholly bent without any fear of man, to fulfil God's holy will and pleaſure. But all they that pertain to the lively faith, to the winning of the ſoul, will faithfully ſtick to the commandment, truſting moſt firmly and faithfully that he that gave the ſame, will alſo give ſtrength plentifully to perform it, even in the weakeſt veſſels of all, even as we have heard and ſeen by divers examples; he only therefore be praiſed.

St. Peter ſaith, 1 Pet. 3. "Fear not, though they ſeem terrible unto you, neither be troubled, but ſanctify the Lord God in your hearts. Only (ſaith St. Paul, Phil. 1.) let your converſation be as becometh the goſpel of Chriſt. Continue in one ſpirit, and in one ſoul, labouring as we do, to maintain the faith of the goſpel, and in nothing fearing your adverſaries, which is to them a token of damnation, and to you of ſalvation, and that of God: for unto you it is given that not only ye ſhould believe in Chriſt, but alſo ſuffer for his ſake." Wherefore let us be right well aſſured, that we ſhall yield a moſt ſtrict account, if we tranſgreſs the ſaid moſt wholeſome precepts given us of our maſter Chriſt, and of his apoſtles, and now in this troubleſome time wherein the goſpel is perſecuted, ſhew ourſelves fearful ſoldiers; as it is manifeſtly declared in the Revelation of St. John, chap. 21. where it is written, "That the fearful ſhall have their part with the unbelieving and abominable, in the lake that burneth with fire and brimſtone, which is the ſecond death." Again, it is written in the ſame book for our warning, chap. 3. "Becauſe thou art betwixt both, and neither cold nor hot, I will ſpew thee out of my mouth."

Now therefore, good chriſtians, theſe true teſtimonies of God's lively word deeply conſidered and weighed, let us chiefly ſtand in awe of his moſt terrible judgments, and be not as they that preſumptuouſly tempt him. Let him always be our fear and dread. He now chaſteneth, he now nurtureth us for our profit, delighteth in us even as a loving father in his beloved child, to make us perfect, and to have us to be partakers of his holineſs. He now judgeth us (not utterly taking away his everlaſting love and mercy from us, as he doth from the malignant and wicked) that we ſhould not be condemned with the wicked world: but if we now refuſe his moſt loving chaſtiſing, and follow the world, we muſt needs have our portion with the world. Wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to deſtruction, and many there be which go in thereat: but ſtrait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. O how much better is it to go this narrow way with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleaſures of ſin for a time?

In conſideration whereof, let us without any more ſlacking and further delays in this great warning by God's loving viſitation, ſubmit ourſelves betime under his mighty hand, that he may exalt us when the time is come. And thus I wholly commit you to him, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build farther, beſeeching you moſt heartily to pray for me, that I may be ſtrong through the power of his might, and ſtand perfect in all things, being always prepared and ready, looking for the mercy of our Lord unto eternal reſt; and I will pray for you as I am moſt bound. So I truſt he will graciouſly hear us for his promiſe ſake made unto all the faithful in his dearly beloved Son Chriſt our alone Saviour, whoſe grace be with your ſpirit, moſt dear chriſtians, for ever. So be it.

By your chriſtian brother John Hullier, a priſoner of the Lord.

John Hullier's Letter to the Congregation of Chriſt's faithful Followers.

John Hullier being of a long time priſoner, and now openly judged to die for the teſtimony of the Lord Jeſus, wiſheth heartily to the whole congregation of God, the ſtrength of his Holy Spirit, to their everlaſting health both of body and ſoul.

I Now, moſt dear chriſtians, having the ſweet comfort of God's ſaving health, and being comfirmed with his free Spirit (he only therefore be praiſed) am conſtrained in my my conſcience, thinking it my very duty to admoniſh you, as ye tender the ſalvation of your ſouls, by all manner of means to ſeparate yourſelves from the company of the pope's hirelings, conſidering what is ſaid in the Revelation of St. John, by the angel of God touching all men: the words be theſe; Rev. 14. "If any man worſhip the beaſt and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the ſame ſhall drink the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured into the cup of his wrath, and he ſhall be puniſhed with fire and brimſtone before the holy angels, and before the Lamb, and the ſmoke of their torment aſcendeth up evermore."

Mark well here, good chriſtians, who is this beaſt and worſhippers that ſhall be partakers of that unſpeakable torment. The beaſt is none other but the carnal and fleſhly kingdom of antichriſt, the pope with his rabble of falſe prophets and miniſters, as it is moſt manifeſt: which to maintain their high titles, worldly promotions and dignities, do with much cruelty, daily more and more ſet forth and eſtabliſh their own traditions, decrees, decretals, contrary to God's holy ordinances, ſtatutes, laws, and commandments, and wholly repugnant to his ſincere and pure religion and true worſhipping.

Now what do they elſe but worſhip this beaſt and his image, who after they had once already eſcaped from the filthineſs of the world, through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, are yet again intangled therein and overcome, uſing diſſimulation unfaithfully for fear of their diſpleaſure, doing one thing outwardly, and thinking inwardly another; ſo having them in reverence under a cloak or colour, to whom they ought not ſo much as to ſay, God ſpeed; and adjoining themſelves to the malignant congregation, which they ought to abhor as a den of thieves and murderers, and as the brothel-houſe of moſt blaſphemous fornicators: whoſe voices being contrary to Chriſt's voice, if they were of his flock, they would not know, but would flee from them; as he himſelf being the good ſhepherd of our ſouls doth full well in his holy goſpel teſtify. Again, what do they elſe I pray you, but receive the beaſt's mark in their foreheads and in their hands, which do bear a fair face and countenance outwardly in ſupporting them as others do, being aſhamed openly to confeſs Chriſt and his holy goſpel? but this feignedneſs and diſſimulation Chriſt and his goſpel will in no wiſe allow. Of whom it is ſaid, Luke 9. "Whoſoever ſhall be aſhamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and ſinful generation, of him alſo ſhall the Son of man be aſhamed, when he ſhall come in the glory of his Father with his holy angels." Therefore ſaith Almighty God by his prophet Malachi, Mal. 1. "Curſed be the diſſemblers." Ye were once enlightened, and taſted of the heavenly gift, and were become partakers of the holy Ghoſt, and taſted of the word of God, and of the power of the world to come. And our Saviour ſaith, Luke 6. "No man that putteth his hand to the plough, and looketh back, is fit for the kingdom of God." Therefore St John the apoſtle uſeth this for a manifeſt token, that the backſliding of the true preachers of God's word declare evidently, that they be not of the number of them. For ſaith he, 1 John 2. "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, no doubt they would have continued with us." Surely ſo long as we uſe diſſimulation, and to play on both hands, we are not in the light. For whatſoever is manifeſt, the ſame is light, as the elect veſſel of God St. Paul witneſſeth in the fourth chapter to the Epheſians.

Wherefore (good chriſtians) for God's moſt dear love, deceive not yourſelves through your own wiſdom, and through the wiſdom of the world, which is fooliſhneſs before God; but certify and ſtay your own conſcience with the ſure truth and faithful word of God, and with the infallible teſtimonies of holy ſcripture. For although God's mercy is over all his works; yet it doth not extend but only to them that hold faſt the confidence and rejoicing of hope unto the end, not being weary in well-doing, but rather waxing every day ſtronger and ſtronger in the inward man. Therefore in the Revelation of St. John, where it is entreated of the beaſt and his image, it is alſo ſaid, "Here is the ſufferance of the ſaints, and here are they that keep the commandments, and the faith of Jeſus Chriſt," Rev. 13. Whereby Almighty God doth ſhew plainly, that he doth uſe thoſe wicked men as inſtruments for a time, to try the patience and faith of his peculiar people, without the performance whereof we can have no part among the living; but as it is ſaid in the ſame Revelation, "The fearful ſhall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimſtone, which is the ſecond death."

But peradventure ye will object and ſay unto me; What ſhall we do? ſhall we caſt ourſelves headlong to death? I ſay not ſo. But this I ſay, that we are all bound (if ever we look to receive ſalvation at God's hand) in this caſe wholly to be obedient to his determinate counſel and fore-knowledge, expreſſed by the gift of the Spirit in holy ſcripture; and then to caſt all our care upon him, who worketh all in all for the beſt unto them that love him; and thus he giveth commandment, ſaying, "Come away from her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her ſins, and that ye receive not of her plagues," Rev. 18. Now who hearing this terrible voice of God, which muſt needs be fulfilled, will not with all ſpeed and diligence apply himſelf to do thereafter, except ſuch as will preſumptuouſly tempt him? and as touching ſuch, the wiſe man ſaith, Eccleſ. 3. "He that loveth peril and danger ſhall periſh therein." But they that be of the faith of Abraham, even as he did, ſo will they in all aſſays and trials be obedient to the heavenly voice, howſoever it ſeemeth contrary to their own natural will and carnal reaſon, according to the ſure word of faith, which ſaith, "Hope thou in the Lord, and keep his way: hold thee ſtill in the Lord, and abide patiently upon him." Let not thy jealouſy alſo move thee to do evil. Come out from among them, and join not yourſelves to their unlawful aſſemblies; yea, do not once ſhew yourſelves with the leaſt part of your body to favour their wicked doings, but glorify God (as moſt right is) as well in your whole body outwardly, as inwardly in your ſpirit, or elſe you can do neither of both well; for your body doth belong to God as well as your ſpirit. At the dreadful day of judgment we ſhall all receive the works of our bodies, according to that we have done, whether it be good or bad.

Therefore whatſoever we do, we may not bring the ſpirit in bondage to the body, but contrariwiſe muſt ſubdue the body and the will of the fleſh to the ſpirit, that the ſpirit may freely accompliſh the will of God in all things; for otherwiſe we ſhall never be partakers of his promiſe, with the true children of Abraham. For, as St. Paul ſaith, "They which are the children of the fleſh, are not the children of God. If we ſhall live according to the fleſh we ſhall die. For to be carnally-minded is death; but to be ſpiritually minded, is life and peace; becauſe that the fleſhly mind is enmity to God: for it is not obedient to the law of God, neither can be. So then they that are in the fleſh cannot pleaſe God." Now chuſe you which way you will take; either the narrow way that leadeth unto life, which Chriſt himſelf, and his faithful followers have gone through before; or elſe the broad path-way that leadeth to deſtruction, which the wicked worldlings take their pleaſure in for a while. I for my part have now written this ſhort admonition unto you of good will (as God is my witneſs) to exhort you to that way, which at length you yourſelves ſhall prove and find to be beſt, yea and rejoice rejoice thereof. And I do not only write this, but I will alſo (with the aſſiſtance of God's grace) ratify and confirm, and ſeal the ſame with the effuſion of my blood, when the full time ſhall be expired that he hath appointed; which (ſo far forth as I may judge) muſt needs be within theſe few days. Therefore I now bid you all moſt heartily farewel in the Lord, whoſe grace be with your ſpirit, Amen. Watch and pray, watch and pray, pray, pray, So be it.

John Hullier.

The martyrdom of ſix conſtant Profeſſors of Chriſt, burned at Colcheſter for the Teſtimony of the Goſpel, the 28th Day of April.

NOT long after the death of Robert Drakes, William Tyms, and the other Eſſex martyrs, who ſuffered in Smithfield, as is before ſpecified, followed in the ſame order likewiſe of martydom, at one fire in the town of Colcheſter, where moſt of them inhabited, ſix other martyrs, whoſe names be theſe:

Chriſtopher Lyſter of Dagneham, Huſbandman. John Mace of Colcheſter, Apothecary. John Spencer of Colcheſter, Weaver. Simon Joyne, Sawyer. Richard Nichols of Colcheſter, Weaver. John Hammond of Colcheſter, Tanner.

With theſe ſix was alſo joined another, whoſe name was Roger Graſbroke, but he afterward ſubmitted himſelf. Of theſe above named, the biſhop, becauſe he (as it ſeemed by the ſhort progreſs recorded by his regiſter) waxed now weary, made a very quick diſpatch. For ſoon after that they were delivered unto one John Kingſtone, bachelor of the civil law, and then commiſſary to the biſhop, by the earl of Oxford and other commiſſioners (as appeareth by a bill indented made between the commiſſioners and the ſaid commiſſary, for the receipt of the ſaid priſoners, dated March the 28th, in the ſecond and third years of the reign of king Philip and queen Mary, which was in the year of our Lord 1556) and by him ſent up unto his lord and maſter, the biſhop cauſed them to be brought unto his houſe of Fulham: where in the open church, judicially were miniſtred unto them the ſame articles that were propounded unto Bartlet Green and others, mentioned before. To which they made their ſeveral anſwers, agreeing altogether in one truth, as by the ſum and effect thereof here enſuing more plainly appeareth.

1. To the firſt article they all conſented and agreed; John Spencer adding further thereto, that the church malignant which is the church of Rome, is no part of Chriſt's catholic church; and that he neither hath nor doth believe the doctrine and religion taught and ſet forth in the ſaid Romiſh and malignant church.

2. To the ſecond they anſwered, That they believed that in the true catholic church of Chriſt there be but two ſacraments; that is to ſay, the ſacrament of baptiſm, and the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt.

3. To the third article they all agreed, confeſſing that they were beptized in the faith and belief of the catholic church, and that their godfathers and godmothers had profeſſed and promiſed for them, as is contained in the ſame article.

4. To the fourth they anſwered, That they always were and yet then did continue in the faith and profeſſion wherein they were baptized; Richard Nichols adding alſo, that he had more plainly learned the truth of his profeſſion by the doctrine ſet forth in king Edward the ſixth's days, and thereupon he had built his faith, and would continue in the ſame to his life's end, God aſſiſting him.

5. To the fifth they anſwered, that they neither ſwerved nor went away from the catholic faith of Chriſt. Howbeit they confeſſed, that within the time articulate (and before) they had miſliked, and earneſtly ſpoken againſt the ſacrifice of the maſs, and againſt the ſacrament of the altar, affirming that they would not come to hear or be partakers thereof, becauſe they had, and then did believe, that they were ſet forth and uſed contrary to God's word and glory. And moreover they did grant, that they had ſpoken againſt the uſurped authority of the biſhop of Rome, as an oppreſſor of Chriſt's church and goſpel, and that he ought not to have any authority in England. For all which ſayings they were no whit ſorry, but rather rejoiced and were glad.

6. To the ſixth they anſwered, that they never refuſed, nor yet then preſently did refuſe to be reconciled to the unity of Chriſt's catholic church: but they ſaid they had, and then did, and ſo ever would hereafter utterly refuſe to come to the church of Rome, or to acknowledge the authority of the ſeat thereof, but did utterly abhor the ſame, for putting down the book of God, the Bible, and ſetting up the Babylonical maſs, with all other of Antichriſt's merchandize.

7. To the ſeventh article, the effect thereof they all granted. And Simon Joyne declared further, that the cauſe of his refuſing to be partaker of their trumpery was, for that the commandments of God were there broken, and Chriſt's ordinances changed and put out, and the biſhop of Rome's ordinances inſtead thereof put in. Moreover, as touching the ſacrament of Chriſt's body, Chriſtopher Lyſter affirmed, that in the ſaid ſacrament there is the ſubſtance of bread and wine, as well after the words of conſecration as before, and that there is not in the ſame the very body and blood of Chriſt really, ſubſtantially and truly, but only ſacramentally and ſpiritually by faith in the faithful receivers; and that the maſs is not propitiatory for the quick or for the dead, but mere idolatry and abomination.

8. To the eighth they ſaid, that they were ſent to Colcheſter priſon by the king and queen's commiſſioners, becauſe they would not come to their pariſh churches, and by them ſent unto the biſhop of London to be thereof further examined.

9. To the ninth they all generally agreed, that that which they had ſaid in the premiſes was true, and that they were of the dioceſe of London.

Theſe anſwers thus made, the biſhop diſmiſſed them for that preſent until the afternoon. At which time having firſt their articles and anſwers read unto them again, and they ſtanding moſt firmly unto their chriſtian profeſſion, they were by divers ways and means eſſayed and tried if they would revoke the ſame their profeſſed faith, and return to the unity of Antichriſt's church.

Which, when they refuſed, the biſhop ſtoutly pronounced the ſentence of condemnation againſt them, committing them unto the ſecular power. Who, upon the receipt of the king and queen's writ, ſent them unto Colcheſter, where the 28th day of April, moſt cheerfully they ended their lives, to the glory of God's holy name, and the great encouragement of others.

Hugh Laverock, an old Man, John Apprice, a blind Man, Martyrs, burned at Stratford the Bow.

IN the diſcourſe of this parcel or part of hiſtory, I know not whether more to marvel at the great and unſearchable mercies of God (with whom there is no reſpect in degrees of perſons, but he chooſeth as well the poor, lame and blind, as the rich, mighty and healthful, to ſet forth his glory) or elſe to note the unreaſonable, or rather unnatural doing of thoſe unmerciful catholics, I mean biſhop Bonner and his accomplices, in whom was ſo ſo little favour or mercy to all ſorts and kinds of men, that they ſpared neither impotent age, neither lame nor blind, as may well appear by theſe poor creatures whoſe names and ſtories here under follow.

Hugh Laverock, of the pariſh of Barking, painter, of the age of 68, a cripple. John Apprice, a blind man.

Theſe two poor and ſimple creatures being belike accuſed by ſome promoting neighbours of theirs, unto the biſhop and other of the king and queen's commiſſioners, were ſent for by their officer; and ſo being brought and delivered into the hands of the ſaid biſhop, were the firſt day of May examined before him in his palace at London; where he firſt propounded and objected againſt them thoſe nine articles, whereof mention is made before, miniſtred as well unto Bartlet Green, as alſo unto many others. To which they anſwered in effect as Chriſtopher Lyſter, John Mace, and others before mentioned had done.

Whereupon they were again ſent to priſon, and beſide other times, the ninth day of the ſame month, in the conſiſtory of St. Paul's were again openly produced, and there (after the old order) travelled withal to recant their opinions againſt the ſacrament of the altar.

Whereunto Hugh Laverock firſt ſaid, I will ſtand to mine anſwers, and to that I have confeſſed; and I cannot find in the ſcriptures, that the prieſts ſhould lift up over their head a cake of bread.

The biſhop then turned unto John Apprice, and aſked what he would ſay.

To whom he anſwered, Your doctrine that ye ſet forth and teach, is ſo agreeable with the world, and embraced of the ſame, that it cannot be agreeable with the ſcripture of God. And ye are not of the catholic church; for ye make laws to kill men, and make the queen your hangman.

At which words the biſhop belike ſomewhat tickled, and therefore very loth to delay their condemnation any longer (ſuch was now his hot burning charity) commanded that they ſhould be brought after him unto Fulham, whither he went before dinner, and there in the afternoon, after his ſolemn manner, in the open church, he pronounced the definitive ſentence of condemnation againſt them, and ſo delivering them into the hands of the temporal officer, thought to diſpatch his hands of them, but could not ſo diſpatch his conſcience before the judgment of God, from the guiltineſs of innocent blood.

The poor men, being now in the temporal officer's hands, might not be ſuffered long to remain there, and therefore the fifteenth day of May, very early in the morning, they were carried in a cart from Newgate to Stratford the Bow, and moſt quietly in the fire praiſing God, yielded up their ſouls into his hands, through a lively faith in Jeſus Chriſt, whom unto the end they did moſt conſtantly confeſs.

At their death, Hugh Laverock, after he was chained, caſt away his crutch, and comforting John Apprice, his fellow-martyr, ſaid unto him: Be of good comfort, my brother, for my lord of London is our good phyſician. He will heal us both ſhortly, thee of thy blindneſs, and me of my lameneſs. And ſo patiently they ſuffered together.

The Martyrdom of Katharine Hut, Elizabeth Thackvel, and Joan Horns, in Smithfield.

THE next day after the martyrdom of this lame and blind man above ſpecified, in the ſaid month of May, were brought to the fire three women, with whom alſo was adjoined another, who being in the ſame conſtancy with them, was likewiſe partaker of the ſame condemnation. Their names were;

Katherine Hut of Bocking, widow. Joan Horns of Billerica, maid. Elizabeth Thackvel of great Burſted, maid. Margaret Ellis of Billerica, maid.

How theſe with divers others were perſecuted and ſent up, eſpecially by Sir John Mordaunt, and Edmund Tyrel, Eſquire, juſtices of peace, the following letter will declare.

A Letter ſent unto Bonner Biſhop of London, from Sir John Mordaunt, Knight, and Edmund Tyrel, Eſq; Juſtices of peace for the County of Eſſex.

OUR humble commendations to your lordſhip: theſe ſhall be to advertiſe you, that we have ſent unto your good lordſhip Joan Potter, the wife of Hugh Potter, James Harris, ſervant of William Harris of Bromhill, and Margaret Ellis, for that they be not formable to the orders of the church, nor to the real preſence of Chriſt's body and blood in the ſacrament of the altar, to uſe your lordſhip's pleaſure with them, as you think good; not doubting, with the puniſhment of theſe and others before ſent to your lordſhip, but that the pariſh of great Burſted and Billerica ſhall be brought to good conformity. Thus, committing your good lordſhip to the tuition of the Almighty God, we take our leave. From great Burſted, this preſent ſecond day of March, 1556.

Your lordſhip's to command,
John Mordaunt, Edmund Tyrel.

After the receipt of theſe letters, Biſhop Bonner entering to examination of theſe four women above named, laid and objected the like articles to them, as after his uſual form he was uſed to adminiſter, and are before expreſſed: whereunto the ſaid women likewiſe agreeing, in the ſame unity of the ſpirit and doctrine, accorded in their anſwers, much agreeing unto the other before them.

1. As firſt, to the article in the firſt place objected, they conſented and granted, believing the ſaid article to be true in every part thereof.

2. To the ſecond, partly they anſwered, they could not tell what a ſacrament is; Elizabeth Thackvel, and Katherine Hut adding moreover, that matrimony, and baptiſm, and the Lord's Supper, were ſacraments ordained in the church: but whether the other ſpecified in this article be ſacraments (as they heard them called) ordained by God or not, they could not tell. Margaret Ellis being examined ſeverally, as the others were, upon the ſame, how many ſacraments there were, anſwered (as a young maid, unſkilled, in her ſimple ignorance) that ſhe could not tell. However ſhe had heard (ſhe ſaid) that there was one ſacrament, but what it was ſhe could not tell, &c.

3. To the third likewiſe they granted, that they were baptized by their godfathers and godmothers, which godfathers and godmothers (ſaid Margaret Ellis) did not then know ſo much as ſhe doth now know: Katherine Hut adding withal, and ſaying, that ſhe was baptized; but what her Godfathers and Godmothers did then promiſe for her in her name, ſhe could not tell, &c.

4. To the fourth article Margaret Ellis and Elizabeth Thackvel did grant thereunto: Katherine Hut ſaid moreover, that ſhe, being of the age of fourteen years, was of the faith wherein ſhe was chriſtened; and yet nevertheleſs the ſaid faith in that age (ſhe ſaid) was but a dead faith, becauſe ſhe did not then underſtand what ſhe did believe. Joan Horns added, that ſhe being eleven years of age, began to learn the faith ſet forth in King Edward's days, in which faith and religion (ſhe ſaid) ſhe had hitherto, and yet doth, and ſo will hereafter continue, God ſo aſſiſting her.

5. To the fifth article they anſwered and confeſſed, according all in this effect, that as touching the maſs, they knew no goodneſs in it; and as touching the ſacrament of the altar, they believed that Chriſt's natural body is in heaven, and not in the ſacrament of the altar: and as concerning the ſee of Rome, they acknowledged no ſuch ſupremacy in that ſee, neither have they any thing to do therewith.

6. In anſwering the ſixth article, they did all generally refuſe to be reconciled or united to the church of Rome, or any other church, contrary to that wherein they now ſtood and did profeſs.

7. To the ſeventh article they anſwered likewiſe, that they had ſo done and ſaid in all things, as it is in this article contained: Katherine Hut adding moreover the reaſon why; for that (ſaid ſhe) neither the ſervice in Latin, maſs, matins, and even-ſong, nor the ſacraments were uſed and miniſtred according to God's word: and furthermore, that the maſs is an idol, neither is the true body and blood of Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar, as they make men believe.

8. The anſwer of the eighth article declared, that they were all and every one ſent up to Bonner by Sir John Mordaunt, knight, and juſtice of peace for Eſſex (the Lord of his mercy ſend us better juſtices I beſeech him) for that they could not affirm the preſence of Chriſt's body and blood to be truly and really in the ſacrament, and for that they came not to their popiſh pariſh church.

9. To the ninth article, they anſwered and confeſſed the premiſes thereof to be true, and denied not the ſame; ſave that Katherine Hut ſaid, that ſhe was of Bocking in Eſſex, of the peculiar juriſdiction of Canterbury, and not of the dioceſe and juriſdiction of London.

After theſe their anſwers received, they were produced again about the thirteenth of April to further examination, and ſo at length to their final judgment; where Katherine Hut, widow, ſtanding before the biſhop, boldly and conſtantly ſtood to that which ſhe had ſaid before, neither yielding to his fair promiſes, nor overthrown with his terror. Who being required to declare her mind concerning the ſacrament, and to revoke herſelf into the fellowſhip of the catholic faith, openly proteſted, ſaying, I deny it to be God, becauſe it is a dumb god, and made with mens hands. Wherein the good and faithful martyr of Chriſt firmly perſiſting, ſo received her ſentence, being condemned to the fire by biſhop Bonner; which ſhe with great conſtancy ſuſtained by the grace and ſtrength of the Lord, and did abide for the cauſe and love of Chriſt.

Joan Horns, maid, produced likewiſe to her judgment and condemnation, with like firmneſs and chriſtian fortitude declared herſelf a true martyr and follower of Chriſt's teſtament, giving no place to the adverſary; but being charged that ſhe did not believe the ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood to be Chriſt himſelf, of which ſacrament (contrary to the nature of a ſacrament) the adverſaries are wont to make an idol ſervice; to this ſhe proteſting openly her mind, ſaid as followeth; If you can make your god to ſhed blood, or to ſhew any condition of a true lively body, then will I believe you: but it is but bread (as touching the ſubſtance thereof) meaning the matter whereof the ſacrament conſiſteth; and that which you call hereſy, I truſt to ſerve my Lord God in, &c.

And as concerning the Romiſh ſee, ſhe ſaid, My lord (ſpeaking to Bonner) I forſake all his abominations, and from them good Lord deliver us. From this her ſtable and conſtant aſſertion, when the biſhop was too weak to remove her, and too ignorant to convince her, he knocked her down with the butcherly axe of his ſentence. And ſo the holy virgin and martyr committed to the ſhambles of the ſecular ſword, was offered up with her other fellows a burnt ſacrifice to the Lord, in the ſavour of a ſweet and pleaſant ſmell.

As touching Margaret Ellis, ſhe likewiſe perſevering in her foreſaid confeſſion, and reſiſting the falſe catholic errors of the papiſts, was by the ſaid Bonner adjudged and condemned; but before the time of her burning came, prevented by death in Newgate, departed and ſlept in the Lord.

No leſs ſtrength in the grace of the Lord appeared in the other maid, Elizabeth Thackvell, whoſe heart and mind the Lord had ſo confirmed in his truth, ſo armed with patience, that as her adverſaries could by no ſufficient knowledge of ſcripture convince her affirmation, ſo by no forcible attempts they could remove her confeſſion. Whereupon ſhe ſtanding to the death, being in like ſort condemned, by the ſaid unbiſhoplike perſecutor, gave her life willingly and mildly for the confirmation and ſealing up of the ſincere truth of God's word.

Theſe three innocent and godly women, thus faſly and wrongfully by men condemned for the juſt quarrel and cauſe of God's goſpel, were had to Smithfield, and there cruelly bound to the ſtake, gave their bodies to the tormenters, their ſpirits they commended to God. For whoſe glory they were willing and ready to ſuffer whatſoever the cruel hands of their enemies ſhould work againſt them, dying more joyfully in the flaming fire, then ſome of them that burned them did peradventure in their beds. Such a Lord is God, glorious and wonderful in all his ſaints. The martyrdom of theſe ſaints of God was the 16th day of May.

Thomas Drowry, a blind Boy, and Thomas Croker, Bricklayer, Martyrs.

A Little before ye have heard of two men, the one blind and the other lame, which ſuffered about the 15th of May. And here is not to be forgotten another as godly a couple, who ſuffered the like paſſion and martyrdom for the ſame cauſe of religion at Glouceſter: of which two, the one was a blind boy, named Thomas Drowry, mentioned before in the hiſtory of biſhop Hooper, [page 121.] whom the ſaid virtuous biſhop confirmed then in the Lord, and in the doctrine of his word.

How long this blind boy was in priſon, and in what year he ſuffered, I am not certain. Of this credible intelligence I have received by the teſtimony of the regiſter then of Glouceſter, named John Taylor, alias Barker, that the ſaid blind boy at his laſt examination and final condemnation, was brought (by the officers, under whoſe cuſtody he had remained) before Dr. Williams then chancellor of Glouceſter, ſitting judicially with the ſaid regiſter in the conſiſtory, near unto the ſouth-door, in the nether end of the church of Glouceſter. Where the ſaid chancellor then miniſtred unto the boy ſuch uſual articles as are accuſtomed in ſuch caſes, and are ſundry times mentioned in this book. Amongſt which, he chiefly urged the article of tranſubſtantiation, ſaying in effect as followeth.

Chancellor. Doſt thou not believe, that after the words of conſecration ſpoken by the prieſt, there remaineth the very real body of Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar?

To whom Thomas Drowry anſwered, No, that I do ot.

Chancellor. Then thou art an heretic, and ſhalt be burned. But who hath taught thee this hereſy?

Drowry. You maſter Chancellor.

Chancellor. Where I pray thee?

Drowry. Even in yonder place; pointing with his hand, and turning towards the pulpit, ſtanding upon the north ſide of the church.

Chancellor. When did I teach thee ſo?

Drowry. When you preached there (naming the day) a ſer-

a ſermon to all men as well as to me, upon the ſacrament. You ſaid the ſacrament was to be received ſpiritually by faith, and not carnally and really, as the papiſts have heretofore taught.

Chancellor. Then do as I have done, and thou ſhalt live as I do, and eſcape burning.

Drowry. Though you can ſo eaſily diſpenſe with yourſelf, and mock with God, the world, and your own conſcience, yet will not I ſo do.

Chancellor. Then God have mercy upon thee, for I will read the condemnation ſentence againſt thee.

Drowry. God's will be fulfilled.

The regiſter being herewith ſomewhat moved, ſtood up and ſaid to the chancellor.

Fie for ſhame, man, will you read the ſentence againſt him, and condemn yourſelf? Away, away, and ſubſtitute ſome to give ſentence and judgment.

Chancellor. No, regiſter, I will obey the law, and give ſentence myſelf according to mine office.

And ſo he read the ſentence condemnatory againſt the boy (with an unhappy tongue, and a more unhappy conſcience) delivering him over to the ſecular power. Who the ſaid 15th day of May, brought the ſaid blind boy to the place of execution at Glouceſter; together with one Thomas Croker a bricklayer, condemned alſo for the like teſtimony of the truth. Where both together in one fire moſt conſtantly and joyfully yielded their ſouls into the hands of the Lord Jeſus.

Perſecution in Suffolk.

AFTER the death of theſe above rehearſed, were three men burnt at Beckles in Suffolk, in one fire, about the 21ſt day of May, Anno 1556. Whoſe names are here ſpecified.

Thomas Spicer of Winſton, labourer: John Denny and Edmund Poole.

This Thomas Spicer was a ſingle man, of the age of nineteen years, and by vocation a labourer, dwelling in Winſton in the county of Suffolk, and there taken in his maſter's houſe in ſummer, about, or ſoon after ſun-riſing (being in his bed) by James Ling and John Keretch of the ſame town, and William Davies of Debnam in the ſaid county.

He was apprehended for not coming to hear maſs, and becauſe he would not receive their idol at the commandment of Sir John Tyrrel, knight, of Gipping-hall in Suffolk, and certain other juſtices there, who ſent both him and them to the dungeon in the town of Eye in Suffolk, from whence they were all three together brought before Dunning, then chancellor of Norwich, and Mr. Mings the regiſter ſitting at the town of Beckles, to be examined.

And there the chancellor endeavoured, but to no purpoſe, to perſuade them from the truth. Wherefore minding in the end to give ſentence on them, he burſt out into tears, intreating them to remember themſelves, and to turn again to the holy mother-church, for that they were deceived and out of the truth, and that they ought not wilfully to caſt themſelves away, with ſuch like words.

As he was thus labouring with them, and ſeemed very loth to read the ſentence (for they were the firſt that he condemned in that dioceſe) the regiſter there ſitting by, being weary belike of tarrying, or elſe perceiving the conſtant martyrs to be at a point, called upon the chancellor in haſte to rid them out of the way, and to make an end. At which words the chancellor read the condemnation over them with tears, and delivered them to the ſecular power.

The articles objected to theſe, and commonly to all others condemned in that dioceſe by Dr. Hopton, biſhop of Norwich, and by Dunning his chancellor were theſe:

1. Firſt, it was articulate againſt them, that they believed not the pope of Rome to be ſupreme head immediately under Chriſt in earth of the univerſal catholic church.

2. Item, That they believed not holy bread and holy water, aſhes, palms, and all other like ceremonies uſed in the church, to be good and laudable for ſtirring up the people to devotion.

3. Item, That they believed not, after the words of conſecration ſpoken by the prieſt, the very natural body of Chriſt, and no other ſubſtance of bread and wine to be in the ſacrament of the altar.

4. That they believed it to be idolatry to worſhip Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar.

5. Item, That they took bread and wine in remembrance of Chriſt's paſſion.

6. Item, That they would not follow the croſs in proceſſion, nor be confeſſed to a prieſt.

7. Item, That they affirmed no mortal man to have in himſelf free-will to do good or evil.

For this doctrine and theſe articles they were all three condemned by Dr. Dunning, and committed to the ſecular power, Sir John Silliard being high ſheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk at the ſame time.

And the next day following they were all burnt together in the town of Beckles. Whereupon it is to be thought, that the writ De Comburendo, was not yet come down, nor could be, the lord chancellor Heath being at London the ſame time. Which, if it be true, then it is plain that both they went beyond their commiſſion, that were the executioners, and alſo the clergy which were the inſtigators thereof, cannot make good what they now pretend: ſaying, that they did nothing but by law. But this let the Lord find out when he ſeeth his time.

In the mean time while theſe good men were at the ſtake, they prayed, and ſaid their belief; and when they mentioned the catholic church, Sir John Silliard ſpake to them; That is well ſaid, Sirs, quoth he, I am glad to hear you ſay, you do believe the catholic church. That is the beſt word I have heard of you yet.

To which his ſayings Edmund Poole anſwered, That though they believe the catholic church, yet do they not believe in their popiſh church, which is no part of Chriſt's catholic church, and therefore no part of their belief.

When they roſe from prayer, they went all joyfully to the ſtake, and being bound thereto and the fire burning about them, they praiſed God in ſuch an audible voice, that it was wonderful to all thoſe that ſtood by and heard them.

Then one Robert Bacon, dwelling in the ſaid Beckles, a very enemy of God's truth, and a perſecutor of his people, being there preſent within hearing thereof, willed the tormentors to throw one faggot to ſtop the breath of the knaves, as he termed them; ſo hot was his burning charity. But theſe good men not regarding their malice, confeſſed the truth, and yielded their lives to death for the teſtimony of the ſame, very gloriouſly and joyfully. Which conſtancy the Lord grant we may imitate, whether it be by death or by life, to glorify the name of Chriſt, Amen.

And foraſmuch as we have here entered into the perſecution of Norfolk and Suffolk, it cometh therefore to mind, by occaſion hereof, briefly to touch by the way, ſome part (for the whole matter cannot be ſo expreſt as it was done) touching the troubles of the towns of Winſon and Mendleſam in Suffolk, raiſed and ſtirred by the ſaid Sir John Tyrrel and other juſtices there of the like affinity. The ſum and effect of which briefly is thus ſignified to me by writing.

The

The Perſecution in the Towns of Winſon and Mendleſam in Suffolk.

BY the procurement of Sir John Tyrrel, knight, and others of his colleagues, there were perſecuted out of the town of Winſon in Suffolk, theſe perſons hereafter following.

Mrs. Alice Twaites, gentlewoman, of the age of threeſcore years and more, and two of her ſervants.
Humphrey Smith and his wife.
William Catchpoole and his wife.
John Mauling and his wife.
Nicholas Burlingham and his wife.
And one Rought and his wife.

Such as were perſecuted and driven out of the town of Mendleſam in the county of Suffolk,

Symon Harlſtone and Katharine his wife, with his five children.
William Whitting, and Katherine his wife.
Thomas Dobſon and his wife.
Thomas Hubbard and his wife.
John Doncon and his wife and maid.
William Doncon.
Thomas Woodward the elder.
—— Konnold's wife.
A poor widow.
One mother Semon's maid.

Beſides thoſe that were conſtrained to do againſt their conſcience by the help of the pariſh prieſt.

Theſe be the chiefeſt cauſes why thoſe above-named were perſecuted.

Firſt, they held and believed the holy word of God to be the ſufficient doctrine unto their ſalvation.

Secondly, they denied the pope's uſurped authority, and did hold all that church of Antichriſt to be Chriſt's adverſaries. And further they refuſed the abuſed ſacraments, defied the maſs and all popiſh ſervice and ceremonies, ſaying, they robbed God of his honour, and Chriſt of his death and glory, and would not come at the church, without it were to the defacing of that they did there.

Thirdly, they did hold that the miniſters of the church by God's word might lawfully marry.

Fourthly, they held the queen to be as chief head, and wicked rulers to be a great plague ſent of God for ſin, &c.

Fifthly, they denied man's free-will, and held that the pope's church did err, and many other in that point with them, rebuking their falſe confidence in works, and their falſe truſt in man's righteouſneſs. Alſo when any rebuked thoſe perſecuted for going ſo openly, and talking ſo freely; their anſwer was, they acknowledged, confeſſed, and believed, and therefore they muſt ſpeak: and that their tribulation was God's good will and providence, and that his judgments were right, to puniſh them with others for their ſins; and that of very faithfulneſs and mercy God had cauſed them to be troubled, ſo that one hair of their heads ſhould not periſh before the time, but all things ſhould work unto the beſt to them that love God, and that Chriſt Jeſus was their life and only righteouſneſs, and that only by faith in him, and for his ſake all good things were freely given them, alſo forgiveneſs of ſins, and life everlaſting.

Many of theſe perſecuted were of great ſubſtance, and had poſſeſſions of their own.

Give God the praiſe.

Foraſmuch as we are now in the month of May, before we overpaſs the ſame, and becauſe the ſtory is not long, and not unworthy peradventure of noting, it ſhall not grieve the ſtudious reader, a little to give the hearing thereof, whereby to learn to marvel and muſe at the great works of the Lord. "They that go down (ſaith the pſalmiſt) into the ſea, labouring upon water, have ſeen the works of the Lord, and his mighty wonders upon the deep." Pſal. 106. The truth whereof may well appear in this following ſtory; which, as it was written to me by the very perſon, himſelf one Thomas Morſe, who was the doer thereof, ſo I thought proper to inſert the ſame in the following manner.

A Story of one Gregory Crow, who was miraculouſly preſerved with his New Teſtament upon the Seas, May 26.

UPON Tueſday in Whitſun-Week, May 26, 1556. (or elſe, as he rather thinketh, in the year immediately before) a certain poor man, named Gregory Crow, dwelling in Maulden, went to Sea, intending to have gone into Kent for fuller's earth, but by the way, being bad weather, was driven upon a ſand, where preſently the boat ſunk, and was full of water, ſo that the men were forced to hold by the maſt of the boat, and all things that would ſwim, did ſwim out of her. Amongſt which Crow ſaw his Teſtament in the water, and caught it, and put it into his boſom. Now it was ebbing water, ſo that within one hour the boat was dry, but ſo broken that they could not ſave her; but they went themſelves upon the ſand (being at leaſt ten miles from the land) and there made their prayers together, that God would ſend ſome ſhip to their aſſiſtance (being in all two men and one boy) for they could ſtay there but half an hour longer before it would be flood. In which time they found their cheſt, wherein was five pounds, ſix ſhillings and eight pence, belonging to the ſaid Crow; which money the other man (whoſe name I know not) took up, and gave it to the owner, who caſt it into the ſea, ſaying, If the Lord will ſave our lives, he will provide us a living, and ſo got upon the maſt, and there hung by the arms and legs for the ſpace of ten hours, in which time the poor boy was ſo weary, and beaten with the ſea, that he fell off and was drowned.

And when the water was gone again, and the ſand dry, Crow ſaid to the other man, It were beſt for us to take down our maſts, and when the flood cometh we will ſit upon them, and ſo it may pleaſe God to bring us to ſome ſhip that may take us up. Which accordingly they did, and ſo at ten of the clock in the night of the ſame Tueſday, the flood did bear up the maſt whereon they ſat.

And upon the Wedneſday in the night the man died, being overcome with hunger and watching. So that there was none left but Crow, who driving up and down in the ſea, called upon God as he could, and might not ſleep for fear that the ſea would have beaten him off.

So at length I myſelf (ſaid Thomas Morſe) being laden to Antwerp with my crayer, going from Lee upon Friday, having within my veſſel, of mariners and merchants, to the number of 46 perſons, and ſo coming to the Foreland, the wind was not very good, ſo that I was conſtrained to go ſomewhat out of my way, being in the afternoon about ſix of the clock, where at the laſt we ſaw a thing afar off, appearing unto us like a ſmall buoy, that fiſhermen do uſe to lay with their hooks.

When we ſaw it, ſome ſaid, let us have ſome fiſh. And I ſaid to him that was at the helm, Keep your courſe away, for we ſhall but hinder the fiſherman, and have no fiſh neither: and ſo at my commandment he did. But at length he at the helm ſtanding higher than all we did, ſaid, Methink, maſter, it is a man. But yet they, being in doubt that it was but a fiſherman's buoy, turned the ſhip from him again to keep their courſe.

Crow beholding the ſhip to turn from him, being then it utter deſpair, and ready now to periſh with watching, famine, and moreover miſerably beaten with the ſeas, at laſt took his mariner's cap from his head, and holding up the the ſame with his arm as high as he could, thought by ſhaking it as well as he might, to give them ſome token of better ſight.

Whereupon the ſteerman more ſenſibly perceiving a thing to move, advertiſed us again, declaring how he did plainly ſee a man's arm; and with that we all beheld him well, and ſo came to him and took him up. And as ſoon as we had him in our ſhip, he began to put his hand in his boſom; and one aſked him if he had money there. No, ſaid he, I have a book here, I think it be wet; and ſo drew out his Teſtament, which we then dried. But the ſea had ſo beaten him, that his eyes, noſe and mouth were almoſt cloſed with ſalt, that the heat of his face and the weather had made. So we made a fire and ſhifted him with dry cloaths, and gave him Aqua compoſita to drink, and ſuch meat as was in the ſhip, and then let him ſleep.

The next day we awaked him about eight of the clock in the morning, and his blood began ſomewhat to appear in his fleſh (for when we took him up, his fleſh was even as though it had been ſodden, or as a drowned man's is) and then we talked with him of all the matter before rehearſed. And ſo ſailed to Antwerp, the merchants which ſaw the thing, publiſhed the ſame in Antwerp; and becauſe it was wonderful, many of the people there, both men and women, came to the ſhip to ſee him. Some gave him a petticoat, and ſome a ſhirt, ſome hoſe, and ſome money (always noting how he caſt away his money and kept his book.)

And many of the women wept when they heard and ſaw him. And maſter governor of the Engliſh nation there had him before him, and talked with him of all the matter: and pitying his caſe, commanded the officer of the Engliſh houſe to go with him to the free Oſte-houſes amongſt the Engliſh merchants, and I with them, and at three houſes there was given him ſix pounds ten ſhillings. And ſo from thence he went with me to Roan, where the people alſo came to him to ſee him, marvelling at the great works of God.

And thus much concerning this poor man with his New Teſtament preſerved in the ſea (which Teſtament the pope's clergy condemneth on the land) ye have heard (as I received by the relation of the party above-named) who was the doer thereof, and yet alive dwelling in Lee, well known to all merchants of London. In which ſtory this by the way underſtand, good reader, (which rightly may be ſuppoſed) that if this poor man thus found and preſerved in the ſea with a New Teſtament in his boſom, had had inſtead of that a Pix with a conſecrated hoſt about him, no doubt it had been rung ere this time all Chriſtendom over for a miracle, ſo far as the pope hath any land.

But to let the pope with his falſe miracles go, let us return again and adjoin another hiſtory of much like condition, teſtified likewiſe by the information of the ſaid Thomas Morſe above-mentioned, to the intent to make known the worthy acts of the Almighty; that he may be magnified in all his wondrous works. The ſtory is thus declared, which happened Anno 1559, about Michaelmas.

Another Story of God's Providence in the Preſervation of three Men at Sea.

THERE was a ſhip (ſaith the ſaid Thomas Morſer whereof I had a part, going toward the Bay ſo ſalt, with two ſhips of Brickleley, which were all together going for ſalt, as before is ſaid. At what time we were within ten miles of the North Foreland, otherwiſe called Tenet, the wind did come ſo contrary to our ſhip, that we were forced to go clean out of the way, and the other two ſhips kept their courſe ſtill, until our ſhip was almoſt out of ſight of them. And then they ſaw a thing driving upon the ſea, and hoiſted up their boat and went unto it; and it was three men ſitting upon a piece of their ſhip which had ſitten ſo two days and two night.

There had been in their ſhip eight men more, which were drowned, being all Frenchmen, dwelling in a place in France, called Olloronne. They had been at Danſwick, and loſt their ſhip about Oxford Nas, as might be learned by their words. They were men that feared God, the one of them was owner of the ſhip. Their exerciſe, while they were in our ſhip, was, that after their coming in, they gave thanks for their deliverance: both morning and evening they exerciſed prayer, and alſo before and after meat; and when they came into France, our ſhips went to the ſame place where theſe men dwelt, and one of them did ſell unto our men their ſhips lading of ſalt, and did uſe them very courteouſly and friendly, and not at that time only, but always whenſoever that ſhip cometh thither, (as ſhe hath been there twice ſince) he always doth for them, ſo that they can lack nothing. I ſhould have noted, that our ſhip had taken up thoſe three men out of the ſea, they had the wind fair preſently, and came and overtook the other two ſhips again, and ſo they proceeded in their voyage together.

For the more credit of this ſtory above recited, to ſatisfy either the doubtful, or to prevent the quarreller, I have not only alledged the name of the party which was the doer thereof, but alſo expreſſed the matter in his own words, as I of him received it; the party and reporter himſelf being yet alive, and dwelling at Lee, a man ſo well known amongſt the merchants of London, that whoſoever heareth the name of Thomas Morſe will never doubt thereof. And again, the matter itſelf being ſo notoriouſly known to merchants as well here as at Antwerp, that though his name were not expreſſed, the ſtory can lack no witneſſes.

The laſt day of the ſaid month of May, in the year aforeſaid, William Slech being in priſon for the ſaid doctrine of the Lord's goſpel, and the confeſſion of his truth, died in the King's-bench, and was buried on the back-ſide of the ſaid priſon, for that the Romiſh catholic ſpiritualty thought him not worthy to come within their pope-holy church-yards, neither in any other chriſtian burial, as they call it.

The Hiſtory of four Men condemned at Lewes, June 6.

IN June next following, about the ſixth day of the ſame month, four martyrs ſuffered together at Lewes, whoſe names are theſe:

Thomas Harland of Woodmancote, carpenter.
John Oſwald of Woodmancote, huſbandman.
Thomas Avington of Ardingly, turner.
Thomas Read.

To Thomas Harland I find in the biſhop of London's regiſters, to be objected for not coming to church. Whereunto he anſwered, That after the maſs was reſtored he never had will to hear the ſame, becauſe (ſaid he) it was in Latin, which he did not underſtand, therefore as good, quoth he, never a whit, as never the better.

John Oſwald denied to anſwer any thing, until his accuſers ſhould be brought face to face before him; and nevertheleſs ſaid, That fire and faggots could not make him afraid: but as the good preachers which were in king Edward's time have ſuffered and gone before, ſo was he ready to ſuffer and come after, and would be glad thereof.

These four, after long impriſonment in the King's-bench, were burned together at Lewes in Suſſex, in one fire.

In the ſame town of Lewes, and in the ſame month likewiſe, were burned Thomas Whood, miniſter, and Thomas Miles, about the three and twentieth day of the ſame month, for reſiſting the erroneous and heretical doctrine of the pretenſed catholic church of Rome.

On the the 24th day of the ſame month likewiſe William Adherall, miniſter, died in the priſon of the King's-bench, and was buried in the back-ſide: Alſo John Clement, wheel-wright, who dying in the ſaid priſon, was buried in like manner upon the dunghill in the back-ſide the day after, viz. the 25th day of June.

The next day following of the ſaid month, we read of a certain young man, a merchant's ſervant, who for the like godlineſs ſuffered cruel perſecution of the papiſts, and was burnt at Leiceſter the 26th day of June.

Thirteen Martyrs burned at Stratford the Bow.

NOT long after the death of the merchant's ſervant before-mentioned, there followed in this bleſſed order of martyrs, burned in one fire at Stratford the Bow by London, eleven men and two women, whoſe dwellings were in ſundry places in Eſſex, and whoſe names hereafter follow.

Henry Adlington.	Lyon Cawch.
Laurence Pernam.	Ralph Jackſon.
Henry Wye.	John Derifall.
William Halliwel.	John Routh.
Thomas Bowyer.	Elizabeth Pepper.
George Searles.	Agnes George.
Edmund Hurſt.

Unto whom the ſixth of June, 1556, Dr. Darbyſhire, biſhop Bonner's chancellor, in form of law miniſtered the ſame articles that were pronounced unto Thomas Whittle and his company, mentioned before [p. 500.] to which they made their ſeveral anſwers, in ſimplicity and in a good conſcience. The ſum and effect whereof enſueth.

To the firſt, they all anſwered affirmatively: but Lyon Cawch added further, that he believed that the true faith and religion of Chriſt is whereſoever the word of God is truly preached.

To the ſecond article they all anſwered in effect, denying that there be ſeven ſacraments: ſome affirming, that in the church of Chriſt there be but two ſacraments, that is to ſay, baptiſm and the Lord's ſupper: Others refering themſelves to believe as the ſcripture teacheth them: And others refuſed to make anſwer becauſe of their ſimplicity.

To the third article they all anſwered affirmatively.

To the fourth article they all anſwered affirmatively, except John Routh, who ſaid he would make no anſwer thereunto. But Lyon Cawch added, that he believed the article to be true: but it was becauſe he had no better knowledge. And Agnes George added, that in the time of king Edward VI. ſhe went from her old faith and religion, and believed in the faith and religion that was then taught and ſet forth.

To the fifth, they all anſwered in effect affirmatively, except John Routh, whoſe anſwer was, That the maſs is ſuch a thing, which neither can nor will enter into his conſcience. And Henry Adlington anſwered, That for nine or ten years before, he miſliked the maſs, and alſo the ſacrament of the altar, becauſe they cannot be proved by the ſcriptures. And as touching the authority of the ſee of Rome, he being but fourteen years of age, took an oath againſt the ſame, which oath, he ſaid, he intended to keep by the grace of God.

To the ſixth they all anſwered affirmatively, except John Routh and William Halliwel, who both refuſed to anſwer, becauſe they knew not what they meant by this article. But the two women added, That they refuſed to be reconciled to the faith and religion that was then uſed in the realm of England. And Laurence Pernam added, that he never refuſed to be reconciled and brought to the unity of the catholic church of Chriſt.

To the ſeventh article they all anſwered affirmatively; but William Halliwel denied that ever he called the maſs idolatry and abomination. And Henry Wye affirming the article to be true; yet he confeſſed his infirmity, that he went to his pariſh church, and received, before he was put in priſon.

To the eighth article Edmund Hurſt, Ralph Jackſon, and George Searles, anſwered affirmatively: Henry Wye ſaid, he was brought before certain juſtices of peace in Eſſex, concerning one Higbed his late maſter, and thereupon he was committed to Colcheſter caſtle, and from thence ſent to London to the biſhop to be further examined. William Halliwel affirmed the like confeſſion as Henry Wye did, only Higbed excepted. John Derifall ſaid he was called before the Lord Rich and Mr. Mildmay of Chelmsford, and was by them ſent to Bonner, biſhop of London, to be further examined by him. Thomas Bowyer ſaid he was brought before Mr. Wiſeman of Felſed, and by him was ſent to Colcheſter caſtle, and from thence was carried to Bonner biſhop of London, to be by him further examined. Lyon Cawch ſaid, that he was ſent to come before the king and queen's commiſſioners, and appearing before them three times, was ſent to biſhop Bonner, to be by him further examined. Henry Adlington ſaid, That he coming to Newgate to ſpeak with one Gratwike, there being priſoner for the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt, was apprehended and brought before Dr. Story, and by him ſent to biſhop Bonner, to be by him further examined. John Routh ſaid, that he was convened before the Earl of Oxford, and by him ſent to the caſtle of Colcheſter, and from thence conveyed to biſhop Bonner, to be by him further examined. Laurence Pernam ſaid, That he was committed to Hertford Priſon, becauſe he would not go to church, and from thence ſent to biſhop Bonner, to be by him further examined. Agnes George ſaid, That ſhe was committed to priſon in Colcheſter at the commandment of one Mr. Maynard, an alderman of the town, becauſe ſhe would not go to church, and from thence was ſent to biſhop Bonner, to be by him further examined. Elizabeth Pepper ſaid, ſhe was apprehended by two conſtables and an alderman, for that ſhe would not come to church, and by them was ſent to Bonner biſhop of London, to be by him further examined.

To the ninth article, they all believed the premiſes to be true above by them confeſſed, and that they were of the dioceſe and juriſdiction of London. But Elizabeth Pepper added, That ſhe was of the town of Colcheſter.

And Agnes George added, That ſhe was of the Pariſh of Barefold. And Lyon Cawch added, That he was then of the City of London, by reaſon that he was at that preſent a merchant there.

Henry Wye, Brewer, was of the pariſh of Stratford le Hore, and of 52 years of age.

William Halliwel was a ſmith, of the pariſh of Waltham Holy-Croſs, and of the age of 24 years, or thereabouts.

Ralph Jackſon was a ſerving man of Chipping Ongar, and of the age of 24 years.

Lawrence Pernam was a ſmith of Hodſdon, within the pariſh of Amwell, in the county of Hertford, and of the age of 22 years.

John Derifall was a labourer, of the pariſh of Rettington in Eſſex, and of the age of 50 years and above.

Edmund Hurſt, labourer, of St. James in Colcheſter, was 50 years of age.

Thomas Bowyer was a weaver of Much Dunmow, and of the age of 36 years.

George Searles was a taylor, between 20 and 21 years of age, of the pariſh of White Nottle, where he was taken and carried to the lord Rich, who ſent him to Colcheſter caſtle, with a commandment that no friend he had in the world ſhould ſpeak with him. There he lay ſix weeks, and was ſent up to London, where he was ſome time in the biſhop's coal-houſe, ſome time in Lollard's tower, and laſt of all in Newgate. He was apprehended in Lent, about a fortnight before Eaſter, in the place aforeſaid.

Lyon Cawch was a broker, born in Flanders, but when he was apprehended he reſided in the city of London, and of the age of 26 years.

Henry Adlington was a ſawyer, and of Greenſted, in the county of Suſſex, and of the age of 30 years.

John Routh was a labourer, and of the pariſh of Wiekes in Eſſex, and of the age of 26 years.

Elizabeth Pepper was the wife of Thomas Pepper, weaver, of the pariſh of St. James, in the town of Colcheſter, and of the age of 20 years, or thereabouts, who when ſhe was burnt at Stratford, was eleven weeks gone with child, as ſhe then teſtified to one Boſom's wife, who then unlooſed her neckerchief, ſaying moreover when ſhe was aſked why ſhe did not tell them; Why, quoth ſhe, they knew it well enough. O! ſuch be the bloody hearts of this cruel generation, that no occaſion can ſtay them from their miſchievous murdering of the ſaints of the Lord, who truly profeſs Chriſt crucified only and alone for the ſatisfaction of their ſins.

Agnes George was the wife of Richard George, huſbandman, of Weſt-Barefold, in the county of Eſſex, and of the age of 26 years. This Richard George had another wife before her, who was burnt in the poſtern at Colcheſter, and himſelf lay in priſon till queen Elizabeth came to the crown, and then he was releaſed.

When theſe thirteen were condemned, and the day appointed they ſhould ſuffer, which was the 27th of June, 1556, they were carried from Newgate in London the ſame day, to Stratford Bow (the place appointed for their martyrdom) and there divided into two parts, in two ſeveral chambers. Afterwards the ſheriff, who there attended upon them, came to the one part, and told them that the other had recanted, and their lives therefore ſhould be ſaved, willing and exhorting them to do the like, and not to caſt themſelves away.

Unto whom they anſwered, that their faith was not built upon man, but on Chriſt crucified. Then the ſheriff perceiving no good to be done with them, went to the other part and ſaid (like a lyar) the like to them, that they with whom he had been before had recanted, and ſhould therefore not ſuffer death, counſelling them to do the like, and not wilfully to kill themſelves, but to play the wiſe men, &c.

Unto whom they anſwered as their brethren had done before, that their faith was not built on man, but on Chriſt and his word, &c.

Now when he ſaw it needleſs to perſuade (for they were, God be praiſed, ſurely grounded on the Rock Jeſus Chriſt) he then led them to the place where they ſhould ſuffer, and being all there together, moſt earneſtly prayed unto God, and joyfully went to the ſtake, and kiſſed it, and embraced it very heartily.

The eleven men were tied to three ſtakes, and the two women looſe in the midſt without any ſtake, and ſo they ſhere all burnt in one fire, with ſuch love to each other, and conſtancy in our Saviour Chriſt, that it made all the lookers on to marvel. The Lord grant us the like grace in the like need, according to the good pleaſure of his will, Amen.

In the company of theſe aforeſaid thirteen, were three more condemned to die, whoſe names are hereunder ſpecified;

Thomas Freeman.
William Stannard.
William Adams.

Theſe three anſwered to the ſame articles that were propounded to the aforeſaid thirteen, in effect as they did. And being thus in the hands of the ſecular power, Cardinal Pool ſent his diſpenſation for their lives, by what occaſion I cannot ſafely ſay, but by means thereof they then eſcaped.

The Sunday after theſe aforeſaid ſixteen were condemned, Fecknam dean of Paul's, preached at Paul's Croſs, where he declared, that they had as many ſundry opinions as they were ſundry perſons. At the hearing whereof they drew out their faith, and ſet to their hands as hereafter followeth, and directed the ſame to their friends, and the faithful congregation, as followeth.

Unto all our dearly beloved Friends, and the holy Congregation of Jeſus Chriſt, even ſo many as love God, Grace be with you, and Peace from God our Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. So be it.

BE it manifeſt to all unto whom this our certificate ſhall be ſeen, that where upon Saturday, being the thirteenth day of June, at Fulham, before the biſhop of London, ſixteen of us (whoſe names hereunder are ſubſcribed) were condemned to die for the moſt pure and ſincere truth of Chriſt's verity; which moſt godly truth hath been from the beginning with the wicked adverſaries thereof continually defaced, and is by the devil and his imps even at this preſent likewiſe daily ſlandered: Upon this occaſion, dearly beloved brethren, we are moved, yea conſtrained, in the ears of all men to manifeſt our belief, and alſo briefly the articles whereof we are condemned, for the avoiding of falſe reports and ſlanderous tongues, which might happen by the moſt ungodly and uncharitable ſermon lately preached at Paul's Croſs, the fourteenth of the ſaid month, being Sunday, by Mr. Fecknam, now dean of the ſame church; where he in that moſt worthy audience defamed us to be in ſixteen ſundry opinions, which were a thing prejudicial to chriſtian verity; and for a teſtimonial thereof, this hereunder written ſhall anſwer our cauſe, and therefore we pray you that are of God to judge.

The firſt, We believe we were baptized into the faith of Chriſt's church, and incorporate unto him, and made members of his church, in which faith we continue. And although we have erred for a certain time, yet the root of faith was preſerved in us by the Holy Ghoſt, which hath reduced us into a full certainty of the ſame, and we do perſiſt, and will by God's aſſiſtance to the end. Now mark, that although the miniſter were of the church malignant, yet his wickedneſs did not hurt us, for that he baptized us in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt.

There was both the word and the element, and our godfathers and godmothers renouncing for us the devil and all his works, and confeſſing the articles of the chriſtian faith for us, and alſo witneſſes that we are baptized, not in the faith of the church of Rome, but in the faith of Chriſt's church.

1. Item, There are but two ſacraments in Chriſt's church, that is, the ſacrament of baptiſm, and the Lord's ſupper. For in theſe are contained the faith of Chriſt his church; that is, the two teſtaments, the law and the goſpel. The effect of the law is repentance, and the effect of the goſpel remiſſion of ſins.

2. Item, We believe there is a viſible church, wherein the word of God is preached, and the holy ſacraments truly adminiſtered, viſible to the wicked world, although it be not credited, and by the death of ſaints confirmed, as it was in the time of Elias the prophet, as well as now.

3. Item, The ſee of Rome is the ſee of Antichriſt, the congregation of the wicked, &c. whereof the pope is head under the devil.

4. Item, The maſs is not only a profanation of the Lord's ſupper, but alſo a blaſphemous idol.

5. Item, God is neither ſpiritually nor corporally in the ſacrament of the altar, and there remaineth no ſubſtance in the ſame, but only the ſubſtance of bread and wine.

For theſe the articles of our belief, we being condemned to die, do willingly offer our corruptible bodies to be diſſolved in the fire, all with one voice aſſenting and conſenting thereunto, and in no point diſſenting or diſagreeing from any of our former articles.

Apparent alſo let it be known, that being examined of the former articles before the bloody biſhop, the ſaid day and time, we affirmed to believe all that he or they would prove by the ſcriptures. But he ſaid that he would not ſtand to prove it with heretics, but ſaid they themſelves were the holy church, and that we ought to believe them, or elſe to be cut off like withered branches.

About the 14th of June, in the ſame year, John Colſtock, who was lately come from London, and now dwelling at Welington, though he did not ſuffer martyrdom, yet ſuſtained ſome trouble, being examined by the biſhop, named Ralph Bane, for his religion, eſpecially for two points, in holding againſt the reality of Chriſt in the ſacrament, and againſt auricular confeſſion to be made to the prieſt. For which cauſe, being compelled to recant, he was enjoined in the church of St. Cedde, to bear a faggot before the croſs bareheaded, having in the one hand a taper, and in the other a pair of beads, &c.

Amongſt divers others which in the ſame dioceſe, and the ſame time were ſuſpected and troubled for the like, was Thomas Flier of Uttoxater, ſhoemaker, Nic. Ball of Uttoxater, Thomas Pyot of Chedull.

Item, Henry Crimes for marrying his wife on Palm-Sunday eve, &c. Some others alſo there were which had the like penance enjoined them, as Thomas Johnſon about the 26th day of this month of June, becauſe he ſware by the holy maſs before the biſhop ſitting in judgment, who for the ſame was driven to go before the croſs with his taper and beads, &c.

In the ſame month of June one Thomas Parret died in the priſon of the King-bench in Southwark, and was buried in the back-ſide the 27th day of the ſaid month.

Alſo Martin Hunt (as is reported) was famiſhed in the ſame priſon the 29th day. At which time likewiſe died in the ſame priſon, as I find recorded, one John Norris, and after the ſame ſort as the other was buried on the back-ſide of the ſaid priſon.

The Martyrdom of Roger Bernard, Adam Foſter, and Robert Lawſon.

WHEN Roger Bernard came before the biſhop, firſt he was aſked whether he had been with the prieſt at Eaſter to be ſhriven, and whether he had received the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, or no? Unto whom Roger Bernard anſwered, No: I have not been with the prieſt, nor confeſſed myſelf unto him, but I have confeſſed my ſins to Almighty God, and I truſt he hath forgiven me: whereof I ſhall not need to go to the prieſt for ſuch matters, who cannot help himſelf.

Biſhop. Surely, Bernard, thou muſt needs go, and confeſs thyſelf unto him.

Bernard. That ſhall I not do, by God's grace, while I live.

Biſhop. What a ſtout boyly heretic is this? How malapertly he anſwereth?

Bernard. My Lord, it grieveth me no whit, I thank God, to be called heretic at your hands: for ſo your forefathers called the prophets and confeſſors of Chriſt long before this time.

At theſe words the biſhop roſe up in a great heat, and bade Bernard follow him. Then the biſhop went and kneeled before what they call the ſacrament of the altar, and as he was in his prayers kneeling, he looked back, and aſked Bernard why he came not and did as he did. Unto whom Bernard anſwered, I cannot tell why I ſhould do ſo. Why, quoth the biſhop, thou lewd fellow, whom ſeeſt thou yonder, pointing to the Pyx over the altar?

Bernard. I ſee nobody there. Do you, my lord?

Biſhop. Why, naughty man, doſt thou not ſee thy maker?

Bernard. My maker? No, I ſee nothing but a few clouts hanging together on a heap.

With that the biſhop roſe up ſore diſpleaſed, and commanded the goaler to take him away, and to lay irons enough on him. For, ſaid he, I will tame him ere he go from me, I think ſo: and ſo he was carried away.

The next day Bernard was brought again before the biſhop, who aſked him if he did not remember himſelf ſince the day before that he was before him.

Bernard. Yes, my lord, I have remembered myſelf very well, for the ſame man I was yeſterday, I am this day, and I hope ſhall be all the days of my life, concerning the matter you talked with me of.

Then one of the guard ſtanding by, ſaid, My lord, I pray you trouble not yourſelf any more with him, but let me have the examining of him, I ſhall handle him after another ſort, I think, and make him a fair child ere he go, you ſhall ſee.

So he was committed to him, and brought by him to an inn, where were a great many prieſts aſſembled together, and there they all fell to flatter him, and perſuaded him with gay enticing words what they could: but when they could not prevail therein, then they began to threaten him with whipping, ſtocking, burning, and ſuch like. Unto whom Bernard ſaid, Friends, I am not better than my maſter Chriſt, and the prophets, which your fathers ſerved after ſuch ſort; and for his name's ſake am content to ſuffer the like at your hands, if God ſo permit, truſting that he will ſtrengthen me in the ſame according to his promiſe, in the ſpite of the devil, and all his miniſters. So when they could not make him to relent or yield, they ſaid, Behold a right ſcholar of John Fortune, whom they had then in priſon. Then they carried him to the biſhop, who immediately condemned him as an heretic, and delivered him to the ſecular power.

This Roger Bernard was a ſingle man, and by his vocation a labourer, dwelling in Framſden in Suffolk, who was taken in the night by Mr. Tamage's men, becauſe he would not go to church to hear their unſavoury ſervice, and ſo by them carried to priſon.

Adam

Adam Foſter.

ADAM FOSTER, of the age of ſix and twenty years, huſbandman, being married, dwelling in Mendleſam, in the county of Suffolk, was taken at home in his houſe, a little before the ſun going down, by the conſtables of the ſaid town, George Revet and Thomas Rouſe, at the commandment of Sir John Tyrrel, of Gipping-hall, in Suffolk, knight, becauſe he would not go to church and hear maſs, and receive at Eaſter, except he might have it after Chriſt's holy ordinance. When they came for him, they told him he muſt go with them unto the juſtice. Unto whom Adam Foſter ſaid, for Chriſt's cauſe, and to ſave his conſcience, he was well contented; and ſo they led him to Sir John Tyrrel, and he ſent him to Eye-dungeon, in Suffolk, from whence at length he was ſent to Norwich, and there condemned by biſhop Hopton.

Now after his apprehenſion, the ſaid Thomas Rouſe and George Revet, were ſtricken with a great fear and ſickneſs, whereby Rouſe pined and conſumed away even unto death, although he was a luſty young man. But George Revet who was the ſaid Rouſe's fellow, and a great reader of the ſcripture, or (as a man may term it), a talkative goſpeller, would not be premoniſhed by the works of God, but ſet his ſon to help the prieſt at maſs, and to be clerk of the ſame town of Mendleſam for lucre ſake; yet was there a fair warning given him of God, although he had not the grace ſo to conſider it, which thing was this:

A young man of the ſame pariſh newly married, called Robert Edgore, being of a ripe wit and ſound, was clerk in the ſaid church before the ſaid Revet ſent his ſon in that room, and executed the office a little, yea alas too long, againſt his own conſcience; whereby at length the Lord ſo took away his wits, that many years after, his poor and woful wife, good woman, was compelled to keep him chained, and bound continually, leſt he ſhould unawares do himſelf or ſome other ſome miſchief, as many times (the more pity) he was ready enough to do.

This (as I ſaid) would not admoniſh Revet, but needs he muſt perſiſt in his wicked purpoſe. Notwithſtanding at the length, as many men were offended with him in the pariſh, ſo honeſt women eſpecially (being mightily grieved at his ungodly doings), came to him and ſaid, Neighbour Revet, are ye not afraid to let your ſon help the naughty prieſt to ſay maſs, and to ſerve that abominable idol? And he ſaid, No.

Then ſaid they, We fear not to go to church and hear maſs, ſeeing you, being a man that ſo much profeſs chriſtianity, will let your ſon help the prieſt to ſay maſs, &c.

At which words Revet waxed angry, and in his rage immediately made his prayer unto God after this manner, or with ſuch like words, ſaying, "O Lord, if it be not thy will, that my ſon ſhould ſo do, then I beſeech thee ſend ſome ſtrange token, to let me underſtand what thy good pleaſure is therein," &c. So according to his petition, within ſhort ſpace after his neighbour's bull came into his paſture, and there he having a very proper gelding, which was his felicity above any thing he had, the bull running upon him, did ſo wound and gore him, that immediately thereof his gelding died, and he thereby nothing amended. For although he knew and confeſſed, that it was the Lord's hand upon him for the ſufferance of his ſon in that wicked vocation; yet would he not take him from it, but permitted him ſtill to uſe and frequent the ſame againſt his own conſcience.

At the laſt the Lord ſent upon him a great ſwelling in his legs, which did ſo grievouſly vex and trouble him by reaſon it ſwelled upward, that at length having thereby brought upon him a very ſtrange ſickneſs, he died moſt miſerably, in ſo impatient manner, that it terrified all good hearts to hear thereof. The Lord grant for Chriſt's ſake, that we may obſerve his judgments better to his glory and our comfort, Amen.

Robert Lawſon.

ROBERT LAWSON was a ſingle man, of the age of thirty years, and by vocation a linen-weaver, who was apprehended in the night by one Robert Kereth, at the command of Sir John Tyrrel of Gipping-hall, in Suffolk, knight, and ſo was immediately carried to the Eye-dungeon in Suffolk, where he remained a certain time, and after was led to Bury. The cauſe of his being taken, was for that he would not go to church to hear maſs, and receive their popiſh idol.

When theſe three aforeſaid martyrs were carried to their death, namely, Roger Bernard, Adam Foſter, and Robert Lawſon, at Bury, after they had made their prayer, being at the ſtake, and the tormentors attending the fire, they moſt triumphantly ended their lives, in ſuch a happy and bleſſed condition, as did notably ſet forth their conſtancy and joyful end, to the great praiſe of God, and their commendation in him, and alſo to the encouragement of others in the ſame quarrel to do the like. The Lord of ſtrength fortify us to ſtand as his true ſoldiers in what ſtanding ſoever he ſhall think it good to place us, Amen.

In the examination of Roger Bernard, ye heard a little before, how he was compared by the prieſts there, to John Fortune, and called his ſcholar. This John Fortune, otherwiſe called Cutler, of Hintleſham in Suffolk, was by his occupation a black-ſmith, whom they had before them in examination a little before, on the 20th day of April. In ſpirit he was zealous and ardent, in the ſcriptures ready, in Chriſt's cauſe ſtout and valiant, in his anſwers marvelous, and no leſs patient in his wrongful ſuffering than conſtant in his doctrine. Whether he was burnt or died in priſon, I cannot certainly find; but rather I ſuppoſe that he was burnt. Certain it is, howſoever he was made away, he never yielded. What his anſwers and examinations were before Dr. Parker and the biſhop, ye ſhall hear him, although not with his own mouth ſpeaking, yet with his own hand written what he did ſay, as followeth.

The Examination of John Fortune before Dr. Parker and Mr. Foſter.

FIRST Dr. Parker aſked me how I believed in the catholic faith.

And I aſked him which faith he meant: whether the faith that Stephen had, or the faith of them that put Stephen to death.

Dr. Parker being moved, ſaid, What a naughty fellow is this? you ſhall ſee anon he will deny the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar.

Then ſaid Mr. Foſter, I know you well enough. You are a buſy merchant. How ſayſt thou by the bleſſed maſs?

And I ſtood ſtill and made no anſwer.

Then, ſaid Foſter, Why ſpeakeſt thou not, and makeſt the gentleman an anſwer?

And I ſaid, Silence is a good anſwer to a fooliſh queſtion.

Then ſaid Dr. Parker, I am ſure he will deny the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar alſo.

And I ſaid, I know none ſuch, but only the ſacrament of the body and blood of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Then ſaid Dr. Parker, You deny the order of the ſeven ſacraments. And why doſt not thou believe in the ſacrament of the altar?

And I ſaid, Becauſe it is not written in God's book.

Then, ſaid he, you will not believe unwritten verities.

And I ſaid, I will believe that thoſe unwritten verities that agree with the written verities be true: but thoſe unwritten verities that be of your own making, and invented of your own brain, I do not believe.

Well, ſaid Mr. Foſter, you ſhall be whipped and burnt for this gear, I trow.

Then ſaid I, If you knew how theſe words do rejoice my heart, you would not have ſpoken them.

Then ſaid Mr. Foſter, Away thou fool, doſt thou rejoice in whipping?

Yes, ſaid I, for it is written in the ſcriptures, and Chriſt ſaith, Thou ſhalt be whipped for my name's ſake: and ſince the time that the ſword of tyranny came into your hands, I heard of none that were whipped. Happy were I, if I had the maiden-head of this perſecution.

Away with him then, ſaid he, for he is ten times worſe than Samuel: and ſo he was carried to priſon again.

The ſecond Examination of John Fortune, before the Biſhop of Norwich.

WHEN I came before the biſhop, he aſked me if I did not believe in the catholic church.

I ſaid, I believe that church whereof Chriſt is the head.

Then ſaid the biſhop, Doſt thou not believe that the pope is ſupreme head of the church?

And I ſaid, No, Chriſt is the head of the true church.

Biſhop. So do I believe alſo: but the pope is God's vicar upon earth, and the head of the church, and I believe that he hath power to forgive ſins alſo.

Fortune. The pope is but a man, and the prophet David ſaith, "That no man can deliver his brother, nor make agreement unto God for him; for it coſt more to redeem their ſouls, ſo that he muſt let that alone for ever."

And the biſhop again fetching about a great circumſtance, ſaid, Like as the belwether weareth the bell, and is the head of the flock of ſheep: ſo is the pope our head. And as the hives of bees have a maſter-bee that bringeth the bees to the hive again: ſo doth our head bring us home again to our true church.

Then I aſked him, whether the pope were a ſpiritual man. And he ſaid, Yea. And I ſaid again, They are ſpiteful men; for in 17 months there were three popes, and one poiſoned another for that preſumptuous ſeat of Antichriſt.

Biſhop. It is maliciouſly ſpoken, for thou muſt obey the power and not the man. And thus was the pope denied to be ſupreme head. Well, what ſayeſt thou to the ceremonies of the church?

And I ſaid, "All things that are not planted by my heavenly Father, ſhall be plucked up by the roots," ſaith our Saviour: for they are not from the beginning, neither ſhall they continue to the end.

Biſhop. They are good and godly, and neceſſary to be uſed.

Fortune. St. Paul called them weak and beggarly.

Biſhop. No, that is a lye.

I hearing that, ſaid, that St. Paul writeth thus in the fourth chapter to the Galatians, "You fooliſh Galations (ſaith he) who hath bewitched you, that ye ſeek to be in bondage to theſe weak and beggarly ceremonies?" Now which of you do lye, you or St. Paul? And alſo it is ſaid, That works inſtituted, and injoined without the commandment of God, pertain not to the worſhip of God, according to the text, Matt. 15. "In vain do men worſhip me with men's traditions and commandments." And St. Paul ſaith, "Wherefore do ye carry us away from the grace of Chriſt to another kind of doctrine?" And Chriſt openly rebuked the ſcribes, lawyers, phariſees, doctors, prieſts, biſhops, and hypocrites, for making God's commandments of none effect, to ſupport their own tradition.

Biſhop. Thou lyeſt, there is not ſuch a word in all the ſcriptures, thou naughty heretic. Thou art worſe than all other heretics: for Hooper and Bradford allow them to be good, and thou doſt not. Away with him.

Here you may perceive how that the catholic church cannot err, but whatſoever they ſay muſt needs be true. And ſo my lord biſhop cannot lye, as it may appear to all men plainly in the text.

The third Examination of John Fortune, before the Biſhop of Norwich.

THE next day I was brought before the ſaid biſhop again, where he made a ſermon upon the ſixth chapter of St. John's goſpel, of Chriſt's words, "I am the bread that came down from heaven," &c. And thereupon had a great bibble babble to no purpoſe. So in the end I was called before him, and he ſaid to me:

Biſhop. How believeſt thou in the ſacrament of the altar? Doſt thou not believe, that after the conſecration, there is the real ſubſtance of the body of Chriſt?

Fortune. That is the greateſt plague that ever came into England.

Biſhop. Why ſo?

Fortune. If I were a biſhop, and you a poor man as I am, I would be aſhamed to aſk ſuch a queſtion: for a biſhop ſhould be apt to teach and not to learn.

Biſhop. I am appointed by the law to teach, ſo are not you.

Fortune. Your law breaketh out very well: for you have burned up the true biſhops and preachers, and maintained lyars to be in their ſtead.

Biſhop. Now you may underſtand that he is a traitor: for he denieth the higher powers.

Fortune. I am no traitor: for St. Paul ſaith, "All ſouls muſt obey the higher powers," and I reſiſt not the higher powers concerning my body, but I muſt reſiſt your evil doctrine wherewith you would infect my ſoul.

Then ſaid a doctor, My lord, you do not well; let him anſwer ſhortly to his articles.

Biſhop. How ſayeſt thou? make an anſwer quickly to theſe articles.

Fortune. St. Paul ſaith, Heb. 10. "Chriſt did one ſacrifice once for all, and ſat him down on the right-hand of his Father," triumphing over hell and death, making interceſſion for ſins.

Biſhop. I aſk thee no ſuch queſtion, but make anſwer to this article.

Fortune. If it be not God before the conſecration, it is not God after: for God is without beginning and without ending.

Biſhop. Lo, what a ſtiff heretic is this! He hath denied all together: how ſayeſt thou? Is it idolatry to worſhip the bleſſed ſacrament or no?

Fortune. God is a Spirit, and will be worſhipped in ſpirit and truth.

Biſhop. I aſk thee no ſuch queſtion, anſwer me directly.

Fortune. I anſwer that this is the God Mauzzim, that robbeth God of his honour.

Biſhop. It is pity that the ground beareth thee, or that thou haſt a tongue to ſpeak.

Then ſaid the ſcribe, Here are a great many more articles.

Then ſaid the biſhop, Away with him: for he hath ſpoken too much.

Another Examination of J. Fortune.

WHEN I came to mine examination again, the biſhop aſked me if I ſhould ſtand unto mine anſwer that I had made before: and I ſaid, yea: for I had ſpoken ſpoken nothing but the truth. And after that he made a great circumſtance upon the ſacrament.

Then I deſired him to ſtand to the text, and he read the goſpel on Corpus Chriſti day, which ſaid, "I am the bread which came down from heaven:" believeſt thou not this? And I ſaid, Yea truly.

And he ſaid, Why doſt thou deny the ſacrament?

Becauſe your doctrine is falſe, ſaid I.

Then ſaid he, how can that be falſe which is ſpoken in the ſcripture? And I ſaid, Chriſt ſaid, "I am the bread;" and you ſay the bread is he. Therefore your doctrine is falſe, ſaid I.

Then, ſaid he, Doſt thou not believe that the bread is he? And I ſaid, No.

Biſhop. I will bring thee to it by the ſcriptures.

Fortune. Hold that faſt, my lord: for that is the beſt argument that you have yet.

Biſhop. Thou ſhalt be burned like an heretic.

Fortune. Who ſhall give judgment upon me?

Biſhop. I will judge an hundred ſuch as thou art, and never be ſhriven upon it.

Fortune. Is there not law for the ſpiritualty, as well as for the temporalty?

And Sir Clement Higham ſaid, Yes, what meaneſt thou by that?

Fortune. When a man is perjured by the law, he is caſt over the bar, and ſitteth no more in judgment. And the biſhop is a perjured man, and ought to ſit in judgment of no man.

Biſhop. How proveſt thou that?

Fortune. Becauſe you took an oath in King Henry's days to reſiſt the pope. So both ſpiritual and temporal are perjured, that here can be no true judgment.

Biſhop. Thinkeſt thou to eſcape judgment by that? No: for my chancellor ſhall judge thee. He took no oath, for he was then out of the realm.

C. Higham. It is time to weed out ſuch fellows as you be, indeed.

Biſhop. Good fellow, why believeſt not thou in the ſacrament of the altar?

Fortune. Becauſe I find it not in God's book, nor yet in the doctors. If it were there I would believe it with all my heart.

Biſhop. How knoweſt thou it is not there?

Fortune. Becauſe it is contrary to the ſecond commandment: and ſeeing it is not written in God's book, why do you then rob me of my life?

Then the biſhop having no more to ſay, commanded the bailiff to take him away.

And thus much touching the examinations of this man. Now whether he died in fire, or was otherwiſe prevented with death, as I ſaid before, I am uncertain.

In the regiſter of Norwich this I do find, that his ſentence of condemnation was drawn and regiſtered; but whether it was pronounced, it is not expreſſed in the ſaid regiſter, according as the uſual manner of the notary is ſo to declare, in the end of the ſentence. Nevertheleſs this is moſt certain, that he never abjured nor recanted, howſoever it pleaſed the Lord by death to call him out of the world.

The Death of John Careleſs in the King's-Bench.

ABOUT the firſt of July, John Careleſs of Coventry, weaver, died in the priſon of the King's-bench: who though he were by the ſecret judgment of Almighty God prevented by death, ſo that he came not to the full martyrdom of his body, yet he is no leſs worthy to be counted in honour and place of Chriſt's martyrs, than others that ſuffered moſt cruel torments; as well becauſe he was for the ſame truth's ſake a long time impriſoned, as alſo for his willing mind and zealous affection he had thereunto, if the Lord had ſo determined it, as may well appear by his examination before Dr. Martin. Which examination, becauſe it contained nothing almoſt but wrangling interrogations, and matters of contention, wherein Dr. Martin would enter into no communication about the articles of his accuſation, but only urged him to detect his fellows, it is not therefore greatly material to expreſs the whole, but only to inſert ſo much as, pertaining to the queſtion of predeſtination, may bring ſome fruit to the reader.

The Effect of John Careleſs's Examination before Dr. Martin, briefly declared.

FIRST, Dr. Martin calling John Careleſs to him in his chamber, demanded what was his name? To whom when the other had anſwered, that his name was John Careleſs, then began Dr. Martin to deſcant at his pleaſure upon that name, ſaying, that it would appear by his condition, by that time he had done with him, that he would be a true Careleſs man indeed. And ſo after other by-talk there ſpent about much needleſs matter, then he aſked him where he was born.

Forſooth, ſaith Careleſs, at Coventry.

Martin. At Coventry? what ſo far, man? How cameſt thou hither? Who ſent thee to the King's-bench priſon?

Careleſs. I was brought hither by a writ, I think, what he was I cannot tell. I ſuppoſe maſter Marſhal can tell you.

Marſhal. In good faith I cannot tell what the matter is; but indeed my lord chief juſtice ſent him from the bar.

Martin. Well, Careleſs, I would thou ſhouldſt play the wiſe man's part. Thou art a handſome man, and it is pity but thou ſhouldſt do well, and ſave that which God hath bought.

Careleſs. I thank your good maſterſhip moſt heartily: and I put you out of doubt, that I am moſt ſure and certain of my ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt; ſo that my ſoul is ſafe already, whatſoever pains my body ſuffer here for a little time.

Martin. Yea marry, you ſay truth. For thou art ſo predeſtinate to life, that thou canſt not periſh in whatſoever opinion thou doſt die.

Careleſs. That God hath predeſtinated me to eternal life in Jeſus Chriſt, I am moſt certain, and even ſo am I ſure that his Holy Spirit (wherewith I am ſealed) will ſo preſerve me from all hereſies and evil opinions, that I ſhall die in none at all.

Martin. Go to, let me hear thy faith in predeſtination. For that ſhall be written alſo.

Careleſs. Your maſterſhip ſhall pardon me herein. For you ſaid yourſelf ere while, that you had no commiſſion to examine my conſcience. I will trouble myſelf with anſwering no more matters than I needs muſt, until I come before them that ſhall have more authority further to examine me.

Martin. I tell thee then I have commiſſion, yea, and commandment from the council to examine thee: for they delivered me thy articles.

Careleſs. Yea, I think indeed that your maſterſhip is appointed to examine me of my articles, which you have there in writing, and I have told you the truth. I do confeſs them to be mine own fact and deed: but you do now examine me of predeſtination, whereof my articles ſpeak nothing at all.

Martin, I tell thee yet again, that I muſt alſo examine thee of ſuch things as be in controverſy between thee and thy fellows in the King's-bench, whereof predeſtination is a part, as thy fellow N— hath confeſſed, and thyſelf doſt not deny.

Careleſs. I do not deny it. But he that firſt told you that, might have found himſelf much better occupied.

Martin. Why, what if he had not told me, thinkeſt thou thou that I would not have known it? Yes, or elſe thou ſhould have withſtood my commiſſion. For I tell thee the truth, I may now examine thee of the bleſſed ſacrament, or any other thing that I liſt, but that I would ſhew the favour, and not be too haſty with thee at the firſt.

Marſhal. Yea, indeed, Careleſs, Mr. Doctor hath commiſſion to examine you or any other of your fellows.

Martin. Yea, marry have I, I tell thee the truth of it.

Careleſs. Then let your ſcribe ſet his pen to the paper, and you ſhall have it roundly, even as the truth is. I believe that Almighty God our moſt dear loving Father, of his great mercy and infinite goodneſs, did elect in Chriſt.

Martin. Tuſh, What need all that long circumſtance? [I believe God elected] and make no more ado.

Careleſs. No, not ſo, Mr. Doctor: it is an high myſtery, and ought reverently to be ſpoken of. And if my words may not he written as I do utter them, I will not ſpeak at all.

Martin. Go to, go to, write what he will. Here is more buſineſs than needeth.

Careleſs. I believe that Almighty God our moſt dear and loving Father, of his great mercy and infinite goodneſs (through Jeſus Chriſt) did elect and appoint in him before the foundation of the earth was laid, a church or congregation, which he doth continually guide and govern by his grace and Holy Spirit, ſo that not one of them ſhall ever finally periſh.

When this was written, Mr. Doctor took it in his hand and read it, ſaying, Why, who will deny this?

Careleſs. If your maſterſhip do allow it, and other learned men when they ſhall ſee it, I have my heart's deſire.

Martin. And do you hold none otherwiſe, than is there written?

Careleſs. No verily, nor ever did.

Martin. Write what he ſaith, Otherwiſe he holdeth not. So that was written.

Martin. It was told me alſo, that thou doſt affirm, That Chriſt did not die effectually for all men.

Careleſs. Whatſoever hath been told you, it is not much material unto me. Let the tellers of ſuch tales come before my face, and I truſt to make them anſwer. For indeed I do believe that Chriſt did effectually die for all thoſe that do effectually repent and believe, and for no other. So that was written alſo.

Martin. Now, Sir, what is Trew's faith of predeſtination? He believeth that all men be predeſtinate, and that none ſhall be damned, doth he not.

Careleſs. No forſooth, that he doth not.

Martin. How then?

Careleſs. Truly I think he doth believe as your maſterſhip and the reſt of the clergy do believe of predeſtination, that we be elected in reſpect of our good works, and ſo long elected, as we do them, and no longer.

Martin. Write what he ſaith, That his fellow Trew believeth of predeſtination as the papiſts do believe, Careleſs. Ah maſter Doctor, did I ſo term you? Seeing that this my confeſſion ſhall come before the council, I pray you place my terms as reverently as I ſpeak them.

Martin. Well, well, write that Trew is of the ſame faith as the catholics be.

Careleſs. I did not ſo call you neither, I wonder what you mean.

Martin. You ſaid the clergy, did you not, Careleſs?

Careleſs. Yes, forfooth did I. So then it was written of the clergy.

Martin. Now, Sir, what ſay you more?

Careleſs. Forſooth I have no further to ſay in this matter.

Martin. Well, Careleſs, I pray thee prove thyſelf a wiſe man, and do not caſt away thy life wilfully.

Careleſs. Now the Lord he knoweth, good Mr. Doctor. I would gladly live, ſo that I might do the ſame with a ſafe conſcience. And your maſterſhip ſhall right well perceive that I will be no wilful man, but in all things that I ſtand upon I will have ſure ground.

Martin. Now the Lord knoweth, good Careleſs, that I would gladly make ſome means to preſerve thy life. But thou ſpeakeſt ſo much of the Lord, the Lord; wilt thou be content to go with my Lord Fitzwater into Ireland? methinks thou art a goodly tall fellow to do the queen ſervice there. How ſay'ſt thou?

Careleſs. Verily Mr. Doctor, whether I be in Ireland, France, or Spain, or any place elſe, I am ready to do her grace the beſt ſervice that I can, with body, goods and life, ſo long as it doth laſt.

Martin. That is honeſtly ſaid, I promiſe thee, every man will not ſay ſo. How ſay you, Mr. Marſhal? this man is meet for all manner of ſervice. Indeed thou art worthy, Careleſs, to have the more favour.

Careleſs. Indeed Sir, I hope to be meet and ready unto all things that pertain unto a true chriſtian ſubject to do. And if her grace or her officers under her do require me to do any thing contrary to Chriſt's religion, I am ready alſo to do my ſervice in Smithfield for not obſerving it, as my bed-fellow and other brethren have done, praiſed be God for them.

Martin. By my troth thou art a pleaſant fellow as ever I talked with of the proteſtants, except it were Tomſon. I am ſorry that I muſt depart from thee ſo ſoon; but I have ſuch buſineſs now, that I can tarry with thee no longer. Well, yet thou canſt not deny, but you are at jar among yourſelves in the King's-bench, and it is ſo throughout all your congregation; for you will not be a church.

Careleſs. No, maſter Doctor, that is not ſo. There is a thouſand times more variety in opinions among your doctors, which you call of the catholic church, yea and that in the ſacrament, for which there is ſo much blood ſhed now-a-days, I mean of your latter doctors and new writers; as for the old they agree wholly with us.

Martin. No, Careleſs, this is not ſo; there thou art deceived.

Careleſs. Verily it is ſo, maſter Doctor, I am not deceived therein any thing at all, as it hath been, and is evidently proved by ſuch as God hath indued with great learning.

Then he turned to the marſhal, and whiſpered with him a while.

Turning to me again, he ſaid, Farewel, Careleſs: for I can tarry no longer with thee now, my buſineſs is ſuch.

Careleſs. God be with you, good maſter Doctor, the Lord give your maſterſhip health of body and ſoul.

Martin. God have mercy, good Careleſs, and God keep thee from all errors, and give thee grace to do as well as I would wiſh myſelf.

Careleſs. I thank your good maſterſhip, I pray God I may do always that is acceptable in his ſight. Whereunto they all ſaid, Amen. And ſo I departed with a glad heart; God only have the whole praiſe, Amen.

It appeareth by the examination of the ſaid John Careleſs, that he ſuffered two whole years impriſonment, having a wife and children. When he was in Coventry gaol, he was in ſuch credit with the keeper, that upon his word he was let out to play the pageant about the city with his companions, punctually returning to priſon again at his hour appointed.

After that, being brought to London, he was indued with ſuch patience and conſtant fortitude, that he longed for for nothing more earneſtly, than the promotion of dying in the fire for the profeſſion of his faith; but it pleaſed God to prevent him with death in the priſon, and was buried in the fields in a dunghill.

While he was priſoner in the King's-bench, he happened to be very much troubled in conſcience, whereupon he wrote to Mr. Philpot, then in biſhop Bonner's coal-houſe: upon occaſion whereof Mr. Philpot ſent him an epiſtle of conſolation, which is inſerted before among Mr. Philpot's letters. [page 486.] Upon which epiſtle John Careleſs made the following anſwer.

A Letter to Mr. John Careleſs, in anſwer to the loving Epiſtle ſent to him by Mr. John Philpot.

A faithful Friend is a ſtrong Defence, whoſo findeth ſuch a one, findeth a Treaſure.

A faithful Friend hath no Peer, the Weight of Gold and Silver is not to be compared to the Goodneſs of his Faith.

A faithful Friend is a Medicine of Life, and they that fear the Lord, ſhall find him, Eccleſ. 6.

THE Father of mercy, and God of all conſolation, comfort you with his eternal Spirit (my moſt dear and faithful loving friend, good maſter Philpot) as you have comforted me by the mighty operation of the ſame; the everlaſting God therefore be praiſed for ever, Amen.

Ah my dear heart and moſt loving brother, if I ſhould do nothing elſe day and night ſo long as the days of heaven do endure, but kneel on my knees, and read pſalms, I can never be able to render unto God condign thanks, for his great mercy, fatherly kindneſs, and moſt loving compaſſion extended unto me moſt vile, ſinful, wicked, and unworthy wretch. O that the Lord would open my mouth, and give me a thankful heart, that from the bottom of the ſame might flow his continual praiſe. O that my ſinful fleſh (which is the cauſe of ſorrow) were clean ſeparated from me, that I might ſing pſalms of thankſgiving unto the Lord's name for ever; that with good Samuel's mother I might continually record this noble verſe following, which by the good experience I have found moſt true, praiſed be my God therefore.

"The Lord (ſaith that good woman) killeth and maketh alive; he bringeth down to hell, and fetcheth up again. Praiſed be the Lord for ever, yea and praiſed be his name for that he hath given me true experience and lively feeling of the ſame. Bleſſed be the Lord God, whoſe mercy endureth for ever, which hath not dealt with me according to my deſerts, nor deſtroyed me in his diſpleaſure when I have juſtly deſerved it. O what reward ſhall I give again unto the Lord for all the great benefits that he hath done for my ſoul? I will gladly receive the cup of ſalvation at his hand, and will worſhip his name with prayer and with praiſe."

Ah my dear heart, yea moſt dear to me in the Lord, think not this ſudden change in me to be ſome fickle fantaſy of my fooliſh head (as indeed ſome others would ſurely ſuſpect it to be) for doubtleſs it is the marvellous doing of the Lord, moſt merciful unto me his unworthy creature. God for his great mercies ſake give me grace to be more thankful unto him than I heretofore have been, and keep me that I never fall forth of his favour again.

And now my dear brother, and moſt bleſſed meſſenger of the Lord, whoſe beautiful feet have brought much glad tidings to my ſoul, what ſhall I do or ſay unto you in the leaſt part to recompenſe the fatherly affection and godly care that you continually keep for me? O that God would give me the ſpirit of fervent prayer, that I might yet that way ſupply ſome little part of my duty toward you. Ah my true loving friend, how ſoon did you lay aſide all other buſineſs, to make a ſweet plaiſter for my wounded conſcience, yea, and that out of a painful pair of ſtocks, which place muſt needs be uneaſy to write in? but God hath brought you into a ſtrait place, that you might ſet my ſoul at liberty. Out of your pinching and painful ſeat, you have plentifully poured upon me your precious nard, the ſweet ſavour whereof hath greatly refreſhed my tired ſoul. The Lord likewiſe refreſh you, both body and ſoul, by pouring the oil of his gracious Spirit in your ſweet heart.

Ah good Jeremy, hath Phaſſor put thee in the ſtocks? why, now thou haſt the right reward of a prophet. Thy glory never began to appear until now. I doubt not but ſhortly, inſtead of Ahikam the ſon of Shapham, JESUS the Son of the living God will come and deliver thee forth of the hands of all thine enemies, and will alſo make good, againſt them and their Antichriſtian Synagogue, all the words that thou haſt ſpoken in his name. The Lord hath made thee this day a ſtrong defenced tower, an iron pillar, and a brazen wall againſt the whole rabble of Antichriſt, and though they fight againſt thee never ſo fiercely, yet ſhall they not overcome thee, for the Lord himſelf is with thee, to help and deliver thee: and he will rid thee out of the hands of the wicked, and will deliver thee out of the hands of the tyrants. And in that you are not buſy in caſting pearls before ſwine, nor in giving the holy things unto dogs, you are much to be commended in my ſimple judgment. And ſure I am that your circumſpect and modeſt behaviour hitherto hath been as much to God's glory, and to the ſhame and confuſion of your enemies, as any mens doings that are gone before you.

Wherefore mine advice and moſt earneſt deſire is, with all other of your loving friends, that you ſtill keep that order with thoſe blood-thirſty biteſheeps, biſhops I ſhould ſay, that you have begun. For though in concluſion they will ſurely have your blood, yet ſhall they come by it with ſhame enough, and to their perpetual infamy whilſt the world doth endure. They would indeed condemn you in huggermugger, to darken God's glory, if it might be: but Satan's thoughts are not unknown to you, and the depth of his ſubtilty is by you well foreſeen. Therefore let them do whatſoever God ſhall ſuffer them to do: for I know all things ſhall turn to your beſt. Though you lie in the dark, ſullied with the biſhop's black coal-duſt; yet ſhall you be ſhortly reſtored to the heavenly light, and be made as white as ſnow in Salmon, and as the wings of a dove that is covered with ſilver wings, and her feathers like gold. You know the veſſel, before it be made bright, is ſoiled with oil, and other things, that it may ſcour the better.

O happy be you that you be now in the ſcouring-houſe: for ſhortly you ſhall be ſet upon the celeſtial ſhelf as bright as angels. Therefore, my dear heart, I will now according to your loving requeſt, caſt away all care, and rejoice with you, and praiſe God for you, and pray for you day and night; yea, I will now with God's grace ſing pſalms of praiſe and thankſgiving with you. For now my ſoul is turned to her old reſt again, and hath taken a ſweet nap in Chriſt's lap. I have caſt my care upon the Lord, which careth for me, and will be Careleſs, according to my name, in that reſpect you would have me. I will leave out my unſeemly addition as long as I live; for it can take no place where true faith and hope is reſident. So ſoon as I had read your moſt godly and comfortable letter, my ſorrows vaniſhed away as ſmoke in the wind, and my ſpirit revived, and comfort came again, whereby I am ſure the Spirit of God was author of it.

O my good Mr. Philpot, which art a principal Pot indeed filled with moſt precious liquor, as it appeareth by the plenteous pouring forth of the ſame: O Pot moſt happy, of the high Potter ordained to honour, which doſt contain ſuch heavenly treaſure in the earthen veſſel: O Pot thrice happy, in whom Chriſt hath wrought a great miracle, altering thy nature, and turning water into wine, and that of the beſt, whereout the maſter of the feaſt hath filled my cup ſo full, that I am become drunken in the joy of the Spirit through the ſame. When martyrdom ſhall break thee (O veſſel of honour) I know the fragrant ſavour of thy precious nard will much rejoice the heavy hearts of Chriſt's true members, although the Judaſſes will grudge and murmur at the ſame; yea, and burſt out into words of ſlander, ſaying, It is but loſt and waſte.

Be not offended, dear heart, at my metaphorical ſpeech; for I am diſpoſed to be merry, and with David to dance before the ark of the Lord: And tho' you play upon a pair of organs not very comely or eaſy to the fleſh, yet the ſweet ſound that came from the ſame, cauſeth me thus to do. O that I were with you in body, as preſent I am in ſpirit, that I might ſing all care away in Chriſt: for now the time of comfort is come. I hope to be with you ſhortly, if all things happen right. For my old friends of Coventry have put the council in remembrance of me, not ſix days ago, ſaying, I am more worthy to be burned than any that was burned yet. God's bleſſing on their hearts for their good report. God make me worthy of that dignity, and haſten the time that I may ſet forth his glory.

Pray for me, dear heart, I beſeech you, and deſire all your company to do the ſame, and I will pray God for you all, ſo long as I live. And now farewel in Chriſt, thou bleſſed of God's own mouth. I will for a time take my leave, but not my laſt farewel. Bleſſed be the time that ever I came into the King's-bench, to be joined in love and fellowſhip with ſuch dear children of the Lord. My good brother Bradford ſhall not be dead while you be alive: for verily the ſpirit of him doth reſt on you in moſt ample wiſe. Your letters of comfort to me in each point do agree, as though the one were the copy of the other. He hath planted in me, and you do water, and the Lord give good increaſe. My dear brethren and fellow-priſoners here, have them humbly and heartily commended unto you and your company, mourning for your miſery, but yet rejoicing for your plenteous conſolation and comfort in Chriſt. We are all cheerful and merry under our croſs, and do lack no neceſſaries, praiſed be God for his providence and great mercy towards us for evermore, Amen.

To his Wife.

AS by the great mercy of God, at the time of his good will and providence appointed (my dearly beloved wife) you and I were joined together in the holy and chriſtian ſtate of godly matrimony, as well to our great joy and comfort in Chriſt, as alſo to the increaſe of his bleſſed church and faithful congregation, by having lawful children by and in the ſame, with which God of his mercy hath bleſſed us, praiſed be his name therefore: even ſo now by his merciful will and divine ordinance, the time is come (ſo far as I can perceive) wherein he will, for his glory and our eternal comfort, diſſolve the ſame, and ſeparate us aſunder again for a time. Wherefore I thought it good, yea and my bounden duty, by this ſimple letter to provoke, ſtir, and admoniſh you, to behave yourſelf in all your doings, ſayings, and thoughts, moſt thankfully unto our good God for the ſame. And therefore (my dear wife) as you have heartily rejoiced in the Lord, and oftentimes given God thanks for his goodneſs, in bringing us together in his holy ordinance: even ſo now I deſire you, when this time of our ſeparation ſhall come, to rejoice with me in the Lord, and to give him moſt hearty thanks, that he hath (to his glory, and our endleſs advantage) ſeparated us again for a little time, and hath mercifully taken me unto himſelf, forth of this miſerable world into his celeſtial kingdom; believing and hoping alſo aſſuredly, that God of his goodneſs, for his Son Chriſt's ſake, will ſhortly bring you, and your dear children thither to me, that we may moſt joyfully together ſing praiſes unto his glorious name for ever. And yet once again I deſire you for the love of God, and as ever you loved me, to rejoice with me, and to give God continual thanks for doing his moſt merciful will upon me.

I hear ſay, that you do oftentimes repeat this godly ſaying, "The Lord's will be fulfilled." Doubtleſs, it rejoiceth my poor heart to hear that report of you; and for the Lord's ſake uſe that godly prayer continually, and teach your children and family to ſay the ſame day and night: and not only ſay it with your tongues, but alſo with your heart and mind, and joyfully ſubmit your will to God's will in very deed, knowing and believing aſſuredly, that nothing ſhall come to you or any of yours otherwiſe than it ſhall be his Almighty and Fatherly good will and pleaſure, and for your eternal comfort and advantage. Which Thing to be moſt true and certain, Chriſt teſtifieth in his holy Goſpel, ſaying, "Are not two little ſparrows ſold for a farthing, and yet not one of them ſhall periſh without the will of our heavenly Father?" And he concludeth, ſaying, "Fear not ye therefore, for ye are better than many ſparrows." As though he ſhould have ſaid, If God have ſuch reſpect and care for a poor ſparrow, which is not worth one farthing, that it ſhall not be taken in the lime-twig, not, nor pitfall, unleſs it be his good will and pleaſure; you may be well aſſured, that not one of you (whom he ſo dearly loveth, that he hath given his only dear Son for you) ſhall periſh, or depart forth of this miſerable life without his Almighty good will and pleaſure.

Therefore, dear wife, put your truſt and confidence wholly and only in him, and ever pray that his will be fulfilled, and not yours, except it be agreeing to his will; which I pray God it may ever be, Amen. And as for worldly things, take you no care, but be you well aſſured the Lord your dear God and Father will not ſee you nor yours lack, if you continue in his love and childly fear, and keep a clear conſcience from all kind of idolatry, ſuperſtition, and wickedneſs, as my truſt is that you will do, although it be with the loſs and danger of this temporal life. And good Margaret, fear not them that can but kill the body (and yet can they not do that until God give them leave) but fear to diſpleaſe him that can kill both body and ſoul, and caſt them into hell-fire. Let not the remembrance of your children keep you from God. The Lord himſelf will be a father and a mother, better than either you or I could ever have been unto them. He himſelf will do all things neceſſary for them. He hath given his angels charge over them, therefore commit them unto him. But if you may live with a clear conſcience (for elſe I would not have you to live) and ſee the bringing up of your children yourſelf, look that you nurture them in the fear of God, and keep them far from idolatry, ſuperſtition, and other kind of wickedneſs; and for God's ſake help them to ſome learning, if it be poſſible, that they may increaſe in virtue and godly knowledge, which ſhall be a better dowry to marry them withal, than any worldly ſubſtance; and when they be come to age, provide them ſuch huſbands as fear God, and love his holy word. I charge you take heed that you match them with no papiſts; and if you live, and marry again yourſelf (which thing I would wiſh you to do, if need require, or elſe not) good wife take heed how you beſtow yourſelf, that you and my poor children be not compelled to wickedneſs. But if you ſhall be able to live God's true widow, I would counſel you to live ſo ſtill, for the more quietneſs of yourſelf and your poor children. Take heed, Margaret, and play the wiſe woman's part. You have warning by others, if you will take an example. And thus I commit you and my ſweet children unto God's moſt merciful defence. The bleſſing of God be with you, and God ſend us a merry meeting together in heaven. Farewel in Chriſt, farewel, mine own dear hearts all. Pray, pray.

To

To my good Brother, Mr. Bradford.

THE peace of God in Jeſus Chriſt, the eternal comfort of his ſweet Spirit, which hath ſurely ſealed you unto eternal ſalvation, be with you, and ſtrengthen you in your joyful journey towards the celeſtial Hieruſalem (my dear friend, and moſt faithful brother, Mr. Bradford) to the ſetting forth of God's glory, and to your eternal joy in Chriſt, Amen.

Ever ſince that good Mr. Philpot ſhewed me your laſt letter (my dear heart in the Lord) I have continued in great heavineſs and perplexity; not for any hurt or diſcommodity that I can perceive coming towards you, unto whom doubleſs death is made life and great felicity, but for the great loſs that God's church here in England ſhall ſuſtain by the taking away of ſo godly, worthy, and neceſſary an inſtrument as the Lord hath made you to be. O that my life, and a thouſand more of ſuch wretched lives, might go for yours. O why doth God ſuffer me and ſuch other caterpillars to live, that can do nothing but conſume the alms of the church, and take away you, ſo worthy a workman and labourer in the Lord's vineyard? but woe be to our ſins and great unthankfulneſs, which is the greateſt cauſe of the taking away ſuch worthy inſtruments of God, as ſhould ſet forth his glory, and inſtruct his people. If we had been thankful unto God, for the good miniſters of his word, we had not been ſo ſoon deprived both of it and them. The Lord forgive our great ingratitude and ſins, and give us true repentance and faith, and hold his hand of mercy over us, for his dear Son Chriſt's ſake. Take not away all thy true preachers out of this realm, O Lord, but leave us a ſeed, leſt England be made like to Sodom and Gomorrah, when thy true Lots be gone.

But what go I about to mingle your mirth with my mourning, and your juſt joy with my deſerved ſorrow? if I loved you indeed, as I have pretended, I ſhould ſurely rejoice with you moſt heartily, and praiſe God on your behalf from the very bottom of my heart; I ſhould praiſe God day and night for your excellent election in and through his great mercy, and ſhould give him moſt humble thanks for your vocation by his goſpel, and your true knowledge in the ſame; I ſhould earneſtly praiſe him for your ſweet juſtification, whereof you are moſt certain by God's grace and Spirit, and ſhould inſtantly pray unto him for your glorification, which ſhall ſhortly enſue; I ſhould rejoice and be glad to ſee you ſo dignified by the crown of martyrdom, and to be appointed to that honour, to teſtify his truth, and to ſeal it with your blood; I ſhould highly extol the Lord, who hath given you a glorious victory over all your enemies viſible and inviſible, and hath given you grace and ſtrength to finiſh the tower that you have begun to build. Finally, if I loved you, I ſhould moſt heartily rejoice and be glad to ſee you delivered from this body of ſin, and vile priſon of the fleſh, and brought into that heavenly tabernacle where you ſhall be ſafely kept, and never offend him more.

This and much more ſhould I do, if I had a good heart towards God, or you his dear child. But (alas) I am an hypocrite, and do ſeek nothing but mine own advantage. I would have God's everlaſting providence give place to my peeviſh will and purpoſe, although it were to the hinderance of his glory, and your ſweet comfort. God forgive me my horrible ingratitude, ſins and offences againſt him: and good brother, do you forgive me my great negligence and unthankfulneſs towards you, and henceforth I promiſe you, I will put my will to God's will, and pray that the ſame may be fulfilled in you, as long as you be on this earth; and when you are taken hence, I will moſt heartily praiſe the Lord for you, ſo long as I have my being in this world. Ah, my dear heart, now I muſt take my leave of you, and as I think, my laſt farewel in this life, but in the life to come I am right well aſſured we ſhall merrily meet together, and that ſhortly I truſt. And in taking of my leave of you (my dear heart in the Lord) I ſhall deſire you faithfully to remember all the ſweet meſſages that the Lord our good God, and moſt dear loving Father, hath ſent you by me, his moſt unworthy ſervant, which, as they are moſt true, ſo ſhall they be moſt truly accompliſhed upon you eternally; and for the more aſſurance and certificate thereof to your godly conſcience, he hath commanded me to repeat the ſame unto you again, in his own name and word.

Therefore now give ear and faithful credence. Hearken, O ye heavens, and thou earth give ear, and bear me witneſs at the great day, that I do hereby faithfully and truly the Lord's meſſage unto his dear ſervant, his ſingularly beloved and elect child John Bradford. John Bradford, thou man ſo ſpecially beloved of God, I pronounce and teſtify unto thee in the word and name of the Lord Jehovah, that all thy ſins, whatſoever they be, be they never ſo many, ſo grievous or ſo great, be fully and freely pardoned, releaſed and forgiven thee, by the mercy of God in Jeſus Chriſt thine only Lord and ſweet Saviour, in whom thou doſt undoubtedly believe. Chriſt hath cleanſed thee with his blood, and cloathed thee with his righteouſneſs, and hath made thee, in the ſight of God his Father, without ſpot or wrinkle; ſo that when the fire doth its appointed office, thou ſhalt be be received (as a ſweet burnt ſacrifice) into heaven, where thou ſhalt joyfully remain in God's preſence for ever, as the true inheritor of his everlaſting kingdom, unto which thou waſt undoubtedly predeſtinate and ordained by the Lord's infallible purpoſe and decree, before the foundation of the world was laid. And that this is moſt true that I have ſaid, I call the whole Trinity, the Almighty and Eternal Majeſty of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, to my record at this preſent; whom I humbly beſeech to confirm and ſtabliſh in thee the true and lively feeling of the ſame, Amen.

Now with a merry heart and joyful ſpirit, ſomething mixed with lawful tears, I take my farewel of you, mine own dear brother in the Lord; who ſend us ſhortly a merry meeting in his kingdom, that we may both ſing praiſes together unto him with his holy angels and bleſſed ſpirits for ever and ever. Farewel, thou bleſſed in the Lord, farewel in Chriſt, depart unto thy reſt in the Lord; and pray for me for God's ſake.

As I had made an end of this ſimple letter, I heard ſome comfort both of good Mr. Philpot's ſervant and your's; but, alas, I do ſcarcely believe them. Well, I will hope in God, and pray all night that God will ſend me ſome comfort to-morrow, and if the Lord give you ſparing to-morrow, let me hear four words of comfort from you, for God's ſake. The bleſſing of God be with you now and for ever, Amen.

Yours for ever in the Lord Jeſus,
J. Careleſs, living in hope againſt hope.

In reading this letter of John Careleſs to Mr. Bradford above prefixed, wherein he maketh ſo much mention of a certain letter of his ſent to him, and of the great exceeding conſolation he received of the ſame, thou wilt wiſh peradventure (good loving reader) in thy mind, to have ſome ſight alſo of the ſaid letter of Mr. Bradford. Wherein to ſatisfy thy deſire, or rather to prevent thy petition, I have hereunto annexed the ſame, to the intent thou mayſt not only underſtand the contents thereof, but alſo receive fruit thereof to thy conſolation likewiſe. The purport of the letter here followeth.

Mr. Bradford to Mr. Careleſs.

ALmighty God our dear Father, through and for the merits of his dearly beloved Son Jeſus Chriſt, be merciful unto us, pardon us our offences, and under the wings of his mercy protect us from all evil, from henceforth and for ever, Amen.

Dear brother Careleſs, I heartily pray you to pray to God for me, for the pardon of my manifold ſins and moſt grievous offences, which need none other demonſtration unto you than this, namely, that I have behaved myſelf ſo negligently in anſwering your godly triple letters, which are three witneſſes againſt me. God lay not them, nor any other thing to my charge to condemnation, though to correction, not my will, but his be done. Concerning your requeſt of abſolution (my deareſt brother), what ſhall I ſay, but even as truth is? that the Lord of all mercy, and Father of all comfort, through the merits and mediation of his dear Son thy only Lord and Saviour, hath clearly remitted and pardoned all thy offences whatſoever they be, that ever hitherto thou haſt committed againſt his majeſty: and therefore he hath given to thee as to his child (dear brother John Careleſs), in token that thy ſins are pardoned; he (I ſay) hath given thee a penitent and believing heart, that is, a heart which deſireth to repent and believe: For ſuch a one is taken of him, he accepting the will for the deed, for a penitent and believing heart indeed.

Wherefore, my good brother, be merry, glad, and of good cheer, for the Lord hath taken away thy ſins; thou ſhalt not die. Go thy ways; the Lord hath put away thy ſins. The Eaſt is not ſo far from the Weſt, as the Lord hath now put thy ſins from thee. Look how the heavens be in compariſon of the earth, ſo far hath his mercy prevailed towards thee his dear child, John Careleſs, through Chriſt the beloved. Say therefore with David, Praiſe the Lord, O my ſoul, and all that is within me praiſe his holy name: for he hath forgiven thee all thy ſins; as truly he hath. And hereof I deſire to be a witneſs. God make me worthy to hear from you the like true meſſage for myſelf. Mine own dearly beloved, you have great cauſe to thank God moſt heartily that he hath given you ſuch repentance and faith; the Lord increaſe the ſame in you and me a moſt miſerable wretch, whoſe heart is harder than the adamant ſtone, or elſe I could not thus long have ſtaid from writing unto you. If I live and may, I purpoſe and promiſe you to make amends. Pray for me, my moſt dear brother, I heartily beſeech you, and forgive me my long ſilence. God our Father be with us for ever, Amen.

Yours in the Lord, J. Bradford.

To my moſt dear and faithful Brethren in Newgate, condemned to die for the Teſtimony of God's everlaſting Truth.

[Of the martyrdom of Mr. Tyms, Mr. Drakes, &c. ſee p. 559.]

THE everlaſting peace of God in Jeſus Chriſt, the continual joy, ſtrength and comfort of his moſt pure, holy and mighty Spirit, with the increaſe of faith and lively feeling of his eternal mercy, be with you, my moſt dear and faithful loving brother Tyms, and with all the reſt of my dear hearts in the Lord, your faithful fellow-ſoldiers, and moſt conſtant companions in bonds, yea of men condemned moſt cruelly for the ſincere teſtimony of God's everlaſting truth, to the full finiſhing of that good work, which he hath ſo graciouſly begun in you all, that the ſame may be to his glory, the advantage of his poor afflicted church, and to your everlaſting comfort in him, Amen.

Ah my moſt ſweet and loving brethren, and deareſt hearts in the Lord, what ſhall I ſay, or how ſhall I write unto you, in the leaſt point or part to utter the great joy that my poor heart hath conceived in God, through the moſt godly example of your chriſtian conſtancy and ſincere confeſſion of Chriſt's verity? Truly my tongue cannot declare, nor my tongue expreſs the abundance of ſpiritual mirth and gladneſs, that my mind and inward man hath felt, ever ſince I heard of your hearty boldneſs and modeſt behaviour before that bloody butcher, in the time of all your crafty examinations, eſpecially at your cruel condemnation, in their curſed conſiſtory place. Bleſſed be God the Father of all mercy, and praiſed be his name, for that he hath ſo graciouſly performed upon you his dear darlings, his moſt ſweet and comfortable promiſes, in not only giving you the continual aid, ſtrength and comfort of his holy and mighty Spirit to the faithful confeſſion of his Chriſt, for whoſe cauſe (O moſt happy men!) ye are condemned to die: but alſo in giving you ſuch a mouth and wiſdom, as all your wicked enemies were not able to reſiſt, but were fain to cry, Peace, peace, and not ſuffer you to ſpeak. As truly as God liveth, my dear brethren, this is not only unto you a moſt evident probation that God is on our ſide, and a ſure certainty of your everlaſting ſalvation in him, but alſo to your cruel adverſaries, or rather God's curſed enemies, a plain demonſtration of their juſt eternal woe and damnation, which they ſhall be full ſure ſhortly to feel, when ye ſhall full ſweetly poſſeſs the place of felicity and pleaſure prepared for you from the beginning.

Therefore, my dearly beloved, ceaſe not ſo long as ye be in this life, to praiſe the Lord with a luſty courage, for that of his great mercy and infinite goodneſs, he hath vouched you worthy of this great dignity, to ſuffer for his ſake, not only the loſs of goods, wife, and children, long impriſonment, cruel oppreſſion, &c. but alſo the very deprivation of this mortal life, with the diſſolution of your bodies in the fire; which is the greateſt promotion that God can bring you or any other unto in this vale of miſery, yea ſo great an honour, as the higheſt angel in heaven is not permitted to have; and yet hath the Lord for his dear Son Chriſt's ſake reputed you worthy of the ſame, yea and that before me and many others, who have both long looked and longed for the ſame.

Ah my moſt dear brother Tyms, whoſe time reſteth altogether in the hands of the Lord, in a full happy time cameſt thou into this troubleſome world, but in a much more bleſſed hour ſhalt thou depart out of the ſame: ſo that the ſweet ſaying of Solomon, or rather of the Holy Ghoſt, ſhall be full well verified upon thee, yea, and all thy faithful fellows, "Better is the day of death (ſaith he) than the day of birth," Eccleſ. 7. This ſaying cannot be verified upon every man, but upon thee, my dear brother, and ſuch as thou art, whoſe death is moſt precious before God, and full dear ſhall your blood be in his ſight. Bleſſed be God for thee my dear brother Tyms, and bleſſed be God again that I ever knew thee, for in a moſt happy time I came firſt into thy company. Pray for me, dear brother, pray for me, that God will once vouchſafe me worthy of that great dignity whereunto he hath brought you.

Ah my loving brother Drakes, whoſe ſoul now draweth nigh unto God, of whom ye have received the ſame, full glad may you be that God ever gave you a life to leave for his ſake: full well will he reſtore it to you again in a thouſand fold more glorious. Praiſe God, good brother, as you have a great cauſe, and pray for me, I beſeech you, who am ſo unworthy (ſo great are my ſins) of that great dignity whereunto the Lord hath called you and the reſt of your godly brethren, whom I beſeech you to comfort in the Lord, as you can full well; praiſed be God for his gifts, which you have heartily applied to the ſetting forth of his glory, and the profit of his poor afflicted church. Which thing ſhall ſurely redound to your everlaſting joy and comfort, as you ſhall moſt effectually feel ere it be long, though the wicked world judge far otherwiſe.

Ah, mine own hearts, and moſt dearly beloved brethren, Cavel, Ambroſe, and both the Spurges; bleſſed be the Lord on your behalf, and praiſed be his name, who hath given you ſuch a glorious victory; full valiant have have you ſhewed yourſelves in the Lord's fight, and as faithful in your painful ſervice. Faint not, but go on forward as ye have moſt godly begun, for great ſhall your reward be at the end of this your travail. Ah my good faithful brethren all, what ſhall I ſay, or what ſhall I write unto you? but even the ſame that good Elizabeth did ſay to her godly kinſwoman Mary the bleſſed mother of Chriſt, "Happy art thou (quoth that good woman) which haſt believed: for all things which the Lord hath ſpoken to thee, ſhall be fulfilled," Luke 1. So I ſay to you, my dear hearts in the Lord, happy are ye all, yea twice happy ſhall you be for evermore, becauſe ye have ſtedfaſtly believed the moſt ſweet promiſes which God the Father hath made unto you with his own mouth, in that he hath promiſed you (who are the faithful ſeed of the believing Abraham), that ye ſhall be bleſſed ever world without end. The promiſes of God your moſt ſweet Father as ye do believe, ſo do ye bear record that God is true. The teſtimony whereof ye have full worthily borne to the world, and ſhortly will full ſurely ſeal the ſame with your blood, yea even to-morrow I do underſtand.

O conſtant chriſtians! O valiant ſoldiers of the high captain Jeſus Chriſt! who for your ſake hath conquered the devil, death, ſin and hell, and hath given you full victory over them for evermore. O worthy witneſſes, and moſt glorious martyrs, whoſe invincible faith hath overcome that proud, ſturdy, bragging prince of the world, and all his wicked army, over whom ye ſhall ſhortly triumph for evermore. Ah my ſweet hearts, the everlaſting treaſures are full ſurely laid up for you in heaven. The never-fading and moſt glorious crown of victory is already made and prepared for you, to be ſhortly clapt upon all your happy heads. The holy angels of your heavenly Father are already appointed to conduct your ſweet ſouls into Abraham's boſom. All the heavenly hoſt rejoiceth already, for that they ſhall ſhortly receive you with joy and felicity into their bleſſed fellowſhip, Selah.

Rejoice with double joy, and be glad, my dear brethren, for doubtleſs ye have more cauſe than can be expreſſed. But, alas, I that for my ſins am left behind, may lie and lament with the holy prophet, ſaying, "Woe is me that the days of my joyful reſt are prolonged." Ah curſed Satan, which hath cauſed me ſo ſore to offend my moſt dear loving Father, whereby mine exile and baniſhment is ſo much prolonged. O Chriſt my dear advocate, pacify thy Father's wrath which I have juſtly deſerved, that he may take me home to him in his ſweet mercy. O that I might now come home unto thee with thy bleſſed brethren. Well, thy will, O Lord, be effectually fulfilled, for it is only good, and turneth all things to the beſt, for ſuch as thou in thy mercy haſt choſen.

And now farewel my dear hearts, moſt happy in the Lord: I truſt in my good God, yet ſhortly to ſee you in the celeſtial city, whereof undoubtedly the Lord hath already made you free citizens. Though you be yet with us for a little time, your very home is in heaven, where your treaſure doth remain with your ſweet Lord and Redeemer Jeſus Chriſt, whoſe calling you have heard with the ears of your hearts, and therefore ye ſhall never come into judgment, but paſs from death to life. Your ſins ſhall never more be remembered, be they never ſo many, ſo grievous, or ſo great: for your Saviour hath caſt them all into the bottom of the ſea; he hath removed them from you, as far as the Eaſt is from the Weſt, and his mercy hath much more prevailed over you, than is diſtance between heaven and earth; [Pſal. 103.] and he hath given you for everlaſting poſſeſſion of the ſame, all his holineſs, righteouſneſs, and juſtification, yea and the Holy Ghoſt into your hearts, wherewith ye are ſealed unto the day of redemption, to certify you of your eternal election, and that ye are his ſure adopted ſons, whereby ye may boldly cry unto God, Abba dear Father, for evermore: ſo that now no creature in heaven, earth nor hell, ſhall be able to accuſe you before the throne of the heavenly King. Satan is now caſt out from you; he himſelf is judged, and hath no part in you. [Gen. 2.] He will once more bite you by the heel, and then he hath done, for at that time you ſhall ſqueeze his head through your own good Chriſt, and ſo have you final victory for evermore. In joyful triumph whereof ye ſhall ſweetly aſcend into the place of eternal reſt, whither your elder brother Chriſt is gone before you to take poſſeſſion for you, and to prepare your place under the holy altar, with Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Rogers, Hooper, Saunders, Farrar, Taylor, Bradford, Philpot, with many others, who will be full glad of your coming, to ſee ſix more of their appointed number, that their blood may ſo much the ſooner be revenged upon them that dwell on the earth.

Thus I make an end, committing you all to God's moſt merciful defence, whoſe quarrel ye have defended, whoſe cauſe ye have promoted, whoſe glory ye have ſet forth, and whoſe name ye have conſtantly confeſſed. Farewel for a while my dear hearts in the Lord, I will make as much haſte after you as I may. All our dear brethren ſalute you. They pray for you, and praiſe God for you continually. [Rev. 11.] "Bleſſed be the dead that die in the Lord, for they reſt from their labours, ſaith the Holy Ghoſt, and their works follow them."

Your own, John Careleſs.

You heard before the letter of Thomas Whittle, written to John Careleſs, [page 507.] wherein he yieldeth great thanks unto him for the ſingular joy and conſolation received by his letters. A copy of which is here inſerted.

To Mr. Green, Mr. Whittle, and certain other Priſoners in Newgate, condemned, and ready to be burnt for the Teſtimony of our Lord Jeſus.

THE everlaſting peace in Jeſus Chriſt, the continual comfort of his moſt pure and Holy Spirit, be with you my dear and faithful brethren and ſiſters of Newgate, the Lord's appointed ſheep unto the ſlaughter, to the good performance of the great and noble work of the Lord, which he hath ſo graciouſly begun in you all; that the ſame may redound to the ſetting forth of his glory, the advantage of his church, and to your own everlaſting comfort in him. So be it.

Ah my dear hearts, and moſt faithful brethren and ſiſters in the Lord, what high lauds and praiſe, yea what humble and continual thanks am I bound to give to God our Father for you and on your moſt happy behalf, who ſo mightily hath magnified himſelf in you thus far forth, in giving you his holy and mighty Spirit, to the conſtant confeſſing of Chriſt's verity, even to the cruel condemnation, and I doubt not but he will do the ſame to the death. O happy and bleſſed are you that ever you were born, that the Lord will vouch you worthy of this great dignity to die for his ſake. Doubtleſs it is the greateſt honour that God can give you in this life. [Rev. 11.] Yea if they be ſo bleſſed of God that die in the Lord, as the Holy Ghoſt ſaith they be; how much more bleſſed and happy then are you that die not only in the Lord, but alſo for the Lord? O that it were the good will of God, that the good hour were now come, that I might go with you. Ah that my ſins made me not unworthy of ſuch an excellent dignity.

Be thankful dear hearts, be thankful and rejoice in the Lord: for mighty is his mercy towards you, and great is your reward in heaven, which you like faithful perſons have plucked to you with a godly violence of an invincible faith. O worthy warriors of the moſt high captain! O conſtant confeſſors of the everlaſting verity! How glorious a crown of victory ſhall you ſhortly receive, which is prepared for all ſuch as do continue to the end? O you ſweet ſaints of the Lord, how precious ſhall your death be in his ſight! O how dear are your ſouls to your Redeemer, in whoſe hand they ſhall moſt joyfully reſt, and the pains of death ſhall never touch you! O how bleſſed ſhall you be, when Chriſt ſhall appear, at which time you ſhall receive your bodies again full of immortality! O how joyful ſhall you be, when Chriſt according to his promiſe ſhall acknowledge you before his Father and his holy angels, as you have moſt conſtantly confeſſed him to be your Lord and only Saviour before men.

O bleſſed Green, [ſee p. 508.] thou meek and loving lamb of the Lord, how happy art thou to be appointed to die for his ſake! Freſh and green ſhalt thou be in the houſe of the Lord, and thy fruits ſhall never whither nor decay. Although thou here go forth ſowing thy good fruit with tears, the time ſhall come that thou ſhalt reap with joy and gladneſs the fruits of everlaſting life, and that without ceaſing. Be merry therefore and fear not, for it is thy Father's will to give thee a kingdom, whereunto he hath choſen thee before the foundations of the world were laid.

O happy miniſter, thou man of God, how glad mayſt thou be of God's moſt gracious favour, which hath prevented thee in the day of thy trial? O happy Peter, whoſe part thou haſt well played; therefore thy reward and portion ſhall be like unto his. Now haſt thou good experience of man's infirmity, but much more proof and taſte, yea ſenſe and feeling of God's abundant bottomleſs mercy. Although Satan deſired to ſift thee, yet Chriſt thy good captain prayed that thy faith ſhould not fail. God's ſtrength is made perfect by thy weakneſs, and his grace is ſufficient for thee his dear child. Thine example did ſo encourage and ſtrengthen thy poor brethren, that God is every way glorified by thee, and ſhortly will he glorify thee with himſelf, with that glory which he hath prepared for thee his elect dearling before the world was made. Therefore rejoice and be glad, for thou haſt good occaſion, in finding ſuch favour in his ſight.

This is moſt true, O my other brethren, whom I do not know, neither have I heard much of you; happy are you that ever you were born, and bleſſed be our God who hath given you ſuch victory over the bloody beaſt; ſhortly ſhall you be cloathed in large white garments, and fine robes of righteouſneſs, and ſo ſhall you follow the Lamb on Mount Sion with new ſongs of mirth and melody, for your delivery from Satan's power and tyranny. God for evermore be bleſſed for you, and ſtrengthen you to the end, as I doubt not but he will; for he never failed them that put their truſt in him.

O my dear and faithful ſiſter Joan Warne, [ſee p. 517.] what ſhall I ſay to thee; Thy trial hath been great; thy victory in Chriſt hath been made notable. Thou haſt overcome many a ſharp ſhower and ſtorm. Shortly ſhalt thou arrive at the haven of quiet reſt, and receive a reward due to a conſtant martyr. Thou ſhalt go home to thy heavenly Father, and poſſeſs for ever the inheritance which Chriſt hath purchaſed for thee, where thy earthly parents be ſtill looking for thee, who have triumphed over Antichriſt moſt victoriouſly. O bleſſed parents of happy children, who have ſhewn ſuch an example as the like hath been ſeldom ſeen! I ſalute thee, dear ſiſter of like conſtant mind, [Iſabel Foſter] whoſe conſtant example is worthy of continual memory. Praiſed be God for you mine own ſweet ſiſters, who hath made you play ſuch wiſe virgins parts. He hath plentifully poured the oil of his Spirit into the lamp of your faith, ſo that the light thereof ſhall never be extinct. You ſhall enter with your bridegroom into everlaſting joy, whereunto you were choſen in him from the beginning.

O my dear brethren and ſiſters, you bleſſed ſaints of the Lord, how much, and how deeply am I bound to praiſe God for you both day and night. Pray, pray for me my dear hearts, for the tender mercy of God, that I may be made worthy to follow your ſteps. O that I had run the race of my life as far as you have done yours, and were as nigh my journey's end as you be to yours. But alas, I lie like the lame man at the pool's ſide by Solomon's porch, and every man goeth into the place of health before me. But God will appoint me one, one day to put me in. I truſt my lord of London's coal-houſe is empty, and all his officers idle. Therefore they muſt ſhortly fetch more ſheep to the ſhambles; for he is the common ſlaughter-ſlave of all England. But happy are you that are paſſed through the pikes, and delivered out of his hands, and from all the angels of the darkneſs of this world, which long tempted you in the wilderneſs of the ſame: but now ſhall the angels of God come and miniſter unto you; for they are your ſervants to hold you up in their hands, that you ſhall not hurt your foot, no nor one hair of your head ſhall periſh. They ſhall carry you up to heaven in a fiery chariot, though you leave your mantle behind you for a time, until God reſtore the ſame again in a more ample and glorious manner.

Thus in haſte, as it doth appear, I am conſtrained to make an end, committing you all to God's moſt merciful defence, who ever have you in his bleſſed keeping, deſiring you all to remember me in your godly and faithful prayers, as I will not forget you in mine, by God's grace. The bleſſing of God be with you all my dear brethren and ſiſters. All our brethren and fellow-priſoners here have them moſt heartily commended unto you, and pray for you without ceaſing. God ſend us a merry meeting in his kingdom, Amen.

By your brother and unfeigned lover, John Careleſs, priſoner, abiding his moſt merciful will and pleaſure. Pray, pray, pray.

To my dear and faithful Brother William Tyms, priſoner in Newgate.

THE everlaſting peace of God in Jeſus Chriſt, with the continual joy, comfort and ſtrength of his ſweet Spirit, be multiplied, and daily more and more increaſed in your good heart (my moſt faithful and dear brother Tyms), to the full quieting of your conſcience, and beating back all the fiery darts of the wicked, that you may ſhortly receive the glorious crown of victory, and in the ſame triumph over all your enemies, for evermore, Amen.

I cannot expreſs the exceeding great joy and conſolation of my poor heart, conſidering the marvellous works of God moſt graciouſly wrought upon you, not only in proving you and trying your faith by his great and huge croſſes both inwardly and outwardly, but alſo in giving you ſo great conſolation and conſtancy in the midſt of the ſame. Faithful is God, and true of his promiſes, who hath ſaid, "That he will never ſuffer his choſen children to be tempted above their ſtrength, but in the midſt of their temptation will make an out-ſcape for them," by ſuch means as may make to his glory and their everlaſting conſolation. My dear heart, great cauſe have you to be of good comfort, I ſee in you as lively a token of God's everlaſting love and favour in Jeſus Chriſt, as ever I perceived in any man. In reſpect whereof, I do even in my heart love, honour and reverence you, beſeeching God for his glorious name's ſake, in the bowels and blood of our Lord and only Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, to finiſh his good work in you, as I doubt not but he will do, according to his infallible promiſes, yea I am well aſſured thereof, foraſmuch as you have ſo effectually received his Holy Spirit into your heart, as a pledge and ſure ſeal of your eternal redemption, and a teſtimony of your adoption in Chriſt Jeſus. For which cauſe Satan ſo ſore envieth you, that he hath now bent all his fierce ordinance againſt you, thinking thereby utterly to deſtroy the invincible fort of your faith, founded moſt firmly upon upon the immoveable rock Chriſt, againſt which neither the devil, ſin, nor hell-gates ſhall ever prevail.

Therefore mine own bowels in the Lord, be not diſcomforted for this your conflict, which doubtleſs ſhall greatly increaſe your crown of glory, triumph and victory; but take a good heart unto you, and buckle boldly with Satan, both in himſelf and his ſubtle members. It is the very divine ordinance of God, that all his regenerate people ſhall be tempted, proved, and tried, as we ſee by the example of our Saviour Chriſt; who as ſoon as he was baptized, was ſtraitways led by the Holy Ghoſt into the wilderneſs, there to be tempted of the devil. But there got he ſuch a glorious victory over Satan, that he could never ſince finally prevail againſt any of his poor members, but in every aſſault that he maketh, either inwardly or outwardly getteth a foil, and taketh ſhame; ſo that now he rageth with all the ſpite poſſible, eſpecially becauſe he knoweth his time is but ſhort. St. James teſtifieth that he is but a very coward, that will ſoon flee if he be faithfully reſiſted. And as for his tempting tools, the Lord hath made them manifeſt unto us, ſo that he cannot deceive us though he aſſault us; for as St. Paul ſaith, "his very thoughts are not unknown to us," as it doth in you largely appear, praiſed be the Lord's name therefore.

You ſee (dear brother) that now to moleſt you and ſuch as you are, that be even paſſing from this vale of miſery, he hath but two ways, or two pieces of ordinance to ſhoot at you, with which he cannot hurt you, becauſe you have two bulwarks to defend you. The firſt of theſe terrible guns that Satan hath ſhot at you, is the very ſame that he continually ſhooteth at me, that is to ſay, fear and infidelity; for the uglineſs of death and horror of my ſins, which be ſo many, grievous, and great. But this pellet is eaſily put away with the ſure ſhield of faith, in the moſt precious death and blood-ſhedding of our dear Lord and only Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, whom the Father hath given unto us wholly to be ours for evermore, and with him hath given us all things, as St. Paul ſaith; ſo that though we be never ſo great ſinners, yet Chriſt is made unto us holineſs, righteouſneſs, and juſtification. He hath cloathed us with all his merits, mercies, and moſt ſweet ſufferings, and hath taken unto him all our miſery, wretchedneſs, ſin, and infirmity. So that if any ſhould now be condemned for the ſame, it muſt needs be Jeſus Chriſt, which hath taken them upon him. But indeed he hath made ſatisfaction for them to the uttermoſt jot, ſo that for his ſake they ſhall never be imputed to us, if they were a thouſand times ſo many more as they be. This do you moſt effectually feel and know (dear brother) a great deal better than I can tell you, bleſſed be God therefore.

And now Satan, ſeeing that he cannot prevail with his boiſterous battery againſt this bulwark of faith, which doth ſo quench all his fiery darts, that they can do you no harm, but rather do you good ſervice to caſt you down, under the mighty hand of God, that he may take you up by his only grace and power, and ſo you may render him all the glory by Jeſus Chriſt (which thing the enemy can in no wiſe abide) therefore he ſhooteth off his other piece moſt peſtilent, to provoke you to put ſome part of your truſt and confidence in yourſelf, and in your own holineſs and righteouſneſs, that you might that way rob God of his glory, and Chriſt of the honour and dignity of his death.

But bleſſed be the Lord God, you have alſo a full ſtrong bulwark to beat back this peſtiferous pellet alſo, even the pure law of God, which proveth the beſt of us all damnable ſinners in the ſight of God, if he would enter into judgment with us according to the ſeverity of the ſame, and that even our beſt works are polluted and defiled in ſuch ſort as the prophet deſcribeth them. With which manner of ſpeaking our free will phariſees are much offended; for it felleth all man's righteouſneſs to the ground (I had like to have ſaid to the bottom of hell) and extolleth only the righteouſneſs of Jeſus Chriſt, which is allowed before God, and is freely given to all thoſe that firmly believe, as bleſſed be God you do.

Ah my good brother Tyms, Satan hath put his hand in a wrong box when he beginneth to tempt you either to vain-glory or miſtruſt; for you are an old beaten ſoldier, and have had good experience of theſe manner of temptations, both by yourſelf and others, whom you know well were beloved of God. Be of good cheer therefore dear heart, be of good cheer, for now Satan hath wrought all his malice, he hath done all that he can, and hath ſhot off all his laſt pieces, wherewith he had thought to have done moſt miſchief; but now he ſeeth he cannot prevail (the ſtrong tower of our faith being ſo invincible) he will pluck up all his tents, and get him to ſome other place to practiſe the like aſſaults, and then will the angels of God come and miniſter unto you the moſt ſweet and heavenly conſolations of the Holy Ghoſt. To him therefore who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we can deſire or think, I do moſt heartily commit you, with all the reſt of your godly fellow priſoners, who comfort, ſtrengthen, and defend you with his grace and mighty operation of his Holy Spirit, as he hath hitherto done, that you having a moſt glorious victory over the ſubtle ſerpent, and all his wicked ſeed, may alſo receive the crown of glory and immortality prepared for you before the foundations of the world were laid, and is ſo ſurely kept for you in the hands of him whoſe promiſe is infallible, that the devil, ſin, death, or hell, ſhall never be able to deprive you of the ſame. The bleſſing of God be with you now and for evermore, Amen. Pray, pray, pray for me.

Your own for ever,
John Careleſs.

To my dear and faithful Brother, Auguſtine Bernher.

THE peace of God in Jeſus Chriſt, the help, comfort, and aſſiſtance of his eternal Spirit be with you my dear and faithful brother Auguſtine, and with all the reſt of my good brethren and ſiſters of the houſes of Baxterley and Manceter (which mourn for the miſery of God's people), to your everlaſting conſolation in him, Amen.

Right glad I am to hear (my dear and faithful brother Auguſtine) that God of his great mercy and infinite goodneſs hath yet ſo graciouſly delivered and preſerved you out of your enemies hands, beſeeching Almighty God alſo from the bottom of my heart, to be your continual defence unto the end, as hitherto he hath moſt graciouſly been, that you may live and die both to God's glory, the advantage of his church, and to the increaſe of your own everlaſting joy and comfort in him.

Know you (dear brother) that I have received your letter, for which I heartily thank you. Indeed I think it very ſhort, although it ſeemeth ſomething ſharply to rebuke me in the beginning, for the breach of my promiſe in not writing to you of this long time. Well brother, I am content to bear it with patience, conſidering that you are troubled otherwiſe (the Lord comfort you and all heavy hearts); neither will I ſpend ink and paper for my purgation in this point. God he knoweth whether I be ſo mindleſs of my promiſe as it appeareth in your ſight I am. Your requeſt I will truly perform to the uttermoſt of my power, as gladly as any poor wretch ſhall do in the world, and I thank God I have done no leſs of long time. And as my poor prayer ſhall be a handmaid to wait upon you which way ſoever you ride or go; ſo I beſeech you that my ſimple counſel may take ſome place in you, in this time of your pilgrimage, which you paſs in no ſmall peril. God keep and preſerve you for his name's ſake.

I do not diſallow, but much praiſe and commend your hearty boldneſs in putting yourſelf in preſs, when any one of God's people needeth your help in any point. But yet yet I would not have you thruſt yourſelf in danger, when you can do them no good, or at leaſtwiſe, when they may well enough ſpare that good you would do them: for if you ſhould then chance to be taken, you ſhall not only be no comfort unto them, but alſo a great diſcomfort, adding ſorrow unto their ſorrow.

I do not perſuade you to abſent yourſelf from any place where your preſence of neceſſity is required; for in all ſuch places I know God will preſerve you as he hath hitherto wonderfully done, praiſed therefore be his name: or if it ſhall pleaſe him to permit you in any ſuch place to be taken, I know he will moſt ſweetly comfort your conſcience with this conſideration, that it is the very providence and appointment of God, that you ſhould there and then be taken up for a witneſs of his truth unto the world: but I cannot allow, nor be contented that you ſhould raſhly or negligently thruſt yourſelf into that place where your wicked enemies do continually haunt, yea, and lay wait for you, when no neceſſity of yourſelf, nor of any other of God's people doth require your company. If they need any of your godly counſel, you may write unto them that thing that you think good; which I dare ſay will be ſufficient unto them. For (continual thanks and praiſes be given unto the everlaſting God) there is none of thoſe that be cruelly condemned for God's truth, that now be weaklings; for they have manfully paſſed through the pikes; and they have boldly ſtood in the brunt of the battle, and therefore I reckon the worſt is paſt with them already. So that now and then a godly letter from you to them ſhall do as much good as your company can do, and perchance more too; for writing ſticketh longer in the memory than words do, yea though your letters were as ſhort to them as your laſt was to me, ſo that the ſame were ſomething ſweeter, and not altogether ſo ſharp.

This, dear brother, is the ſimple counſel which I would gladly have you obſerve, partly for that I heartily pray for your preſervation for the advantage of Chriſt's church, and partly for that I unfeignedly wiſh the peace, comfort, and tranquillity of your own conſcience, which I know will be quickly ready to accuſe you, if you do any thing wherein you have not the word of God for your warrant. For as in a glaſs that is clear, a ſmall mote will ſoon appear: even ſo the good conſcience of God's choſen children, being more clear than cryſtal, will ſoon accuſe them at the leaſt fault they do commit; whereas the wicked worldlings have their conſcience ſo clogged and corrupted through the cuſtom of ſin, that they cannot once ſee or perceive their ſhameful deeds and wicked works, until God ſet the ſame before them for their utter deſtruction, and then they immediately deſpair. But ſeeing that God hath given you a clear conſcience, and a pure, ſharp, quick and lively ſight in your ſoul, I would wiſh you to beware that you do nothing unadviſedly, but upon a good ground. For an accuſing conſcience is a ſore thing when death doth approach, and then Satan will not ſtick to tell you that you have too much tempted God, when peradventure you have done nothing ſo at all. For this cauſe, I ſay, partly I have thought it good to admoniſh you (as I have done often) to be circumſpect according to the counſel of Chriſt, which biddeth you to beware of men. Other things I have not to write, for I know this bearer can certify you of all things at large, better than I can declare it by writing.

I beſeech you, good Auguſtine, help me forwards with your hearty prayers, for I truſt I have but a ſmall time to tarry in this troubleſome world. Dr. Story told our marſhal that we ſhall all be diſpatched ſo ſoon as he came from Oxford, whither he and other bloody butchers be gone to make ſlaughter of Chriſt's ſheep that lie there appointed to be ſlain. God for Chriſt's ſake put them and ſuch like beſide their cruel purpoſe, if it be his good will and pleaſure, Amen, good Lord. I pray you do my moſt hearty commendations to my dear ſiſter and faithful friend, good Mrs. Mary Glover. I beſeech God to be her comfort, as I doubt not but he is. I am very glad to hear that ſhe doth ſo joyfully and ſo patiently bear this great croſs that God hath laid upon her. I pray God ſtrengthen her, and all his other dear ſaints, to the end, Amen. Commend me unto my dear and faithful ſiſter Elizabeth B. I thank her moſt heartily for my napkin, and ſo I do your dear brother for my ſhirt. Truly that day that we were appointed to come to our anſwer before the commiſſioners (who had ſent word the ſame morning that they would come to the King's-bench by eight of the clock, and the houſe and all things were trimmed and made ready for them) I got that ſhirt on my back, and that napkin in my hand, and methought they did help to harneſs me, and arm me well to go fight againſt that bloody beaſt of Babylon. And truſt me, truly if they had come, I would have ſtruck three ſtrokes the more for your two ſakes, as well as God would have enabled me to ſet them on, as by God's grace I will not fail to do at the next ſkirmiſh that I come to. Wherefore I pray you pray for me, that I may be ſtrong and hardy to lay on good load. Oh that I might ſo ſtrike him down, that he ſhould never be able to riſe again. But that ſtroke belongeth only unto the Lord, to ſtrike at his coming, which I truſt will be ſhortly. O haſten it, good Lord, and ſhorten theſe ſorrowful and ſinful days, for thy great mercies ſake.

Farewel, my dear and faithful loving brother. The Lord defend, keep, and preſerve you from the power of your enemies viſible and inviſible, and ſend us a moſt joyful and merry meeting here or elſewhere, as it ſhall pleaſe his goodneſs to appoint us.

In the mean time I ſhall moſt earneſtly deſire you to pray for me, for I never had more need in my life, and doubtleſs you ſhall never want my poor prayer, if it ſhall pleaſe God to accept the prayer of ſo ſinful a wretch as I am. The Lord impute not my ſins to me, for Jeſus Chriſt's ſake; unto whoſe moſt merciful defence I do moſt heartily commit you. The bleſſing of God be with you now and ever, Amen. I pray you do my moſt hearty commendations unto Mr. John Glover. I do not forget him in my daily prayers, and I truſt he doth remember me.

Your poor brother, always mindful of you in my prayer, John Careleſs, priſoner, abiding God's pleaſure.

To my dear Brother, Henry Adlington, Priſoner in Lollard's Tower.

THE everlaſting peace of God in Jeſus Chriſt, the continual aid, ſtrength, joy, and comfort of his moſt pure, holy, and mighty Spirit, with the increaſe of faith and lively feeling of his mercies be moſt effectually wrought in your heart, my dear and faithful loving brother Adlington, and in the hearts of all your other godly fellow-priſoners, to the full finiſhing of that good work which the Lord hath moſt graciouſly begun in you; that the ſame may be to the advancing and ſetting forth of his glory, the advantage of his poor afflicted church, and to your own eternal joy and comfort in him, Amen.

My moſt dear and faithful loving brother in the Lord, I with all the reſt of my loving brethren here with me, do moſt humbly and heartily commend us unto you, with all faithful remembrance of you in our daily prayers, giving God earneſt thanks on your moſt happy behalf, for that he hath given you ſuch hearty boldneſs and chriſtian conſtancy in the faithful confeſſion of his everlaſting verity. Bleſſed be God for thee, my dearly beloved brother, who hath vouchſafed thee worthy of ſo great dignity, as to ſuffer for his ſake, and ſetting forth of his glory. Oh glad in heart mayſt thou be, to whom it is given, not only to believe in thy Lord and Chriſt Chriſt moſt lively, but alſo to ſuffer for his ſake, as one of his ſilly ſheep appointed to the ſlaughter. Be of good comfort therefore my good brother, for your calling unto the croſs of Chriſt was after a marvellous manner. Surely, it was only the Lord's appointment, and therefore he will perform his own work in and upon you, to the great magnifying of his glory, and comfort of your brethren, whoſe hearts are mightily refreſhed, to hear how heartily you have behaved yourſelf hitherto.

This preſent day I received a letter from you, at the reading whereof my brethren and I were not a little comforted, to ſee your conſcience ſo quieted in Chriſt, and your continuance ſo ſtedfaſt in him; which things be the ſpecial gifts of God, not given unto every man, but to you his dear darling, elect and choſen in Chriſt, and ſuch as you be. And whereas you do require to know my ſimple mind concerning your anſwer unto Dr. Story and the Chancellor; truly I ſay, you did anſwer them very well: for there are but two ſacraments indeed, that is to ſay, the ſacrament of baptiſm, and the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt, as you have full well anſwered them, praiſed be God for his good gifts, who chuſeth the weak to confound the ſtrong, and the fooliſh to confound the worldly wiſe. If, when you come before them again, they do aſk you what a ſacrament is; ſay you, that a ſacrament, being adminiſtered according to Chriſt's inſtitution, is a viſible ſign of an inviſible grace, and hath the promiſe of God's mercy annexed unto it, available to all ſuch as do worthily receive it, and not unworthily worſhip it, as they would have us to do, contrary to God's commandment. And theſe properties belonging to Chriſt's true ſacraments, cannot be applied unto any one of thoſe five ſacraments which they have invented of their own brain, ſince Antichriſt began to reign, and blind the people withal.

I perceive (dear heart) that upon Friday they do intend to condemn you, and give you your judgment. Therefore I think they will have no great reaſoning with you, but bid you anſwer them directly, either yea or nay, to all ſuch things as they have to charge you withal, which they have gathered of you ſince you came into their cruel hands. But if they will needs make many words with you, becauſe you are but a ſimple man, and therefore perchance they will be the buſier with you to trouble you with many queſtions, to encumber your knowledge, and then ſeem to triumph over you, and that truth that you do hold; if (I ſay) they do this, as perchance for ſome evil purpoſe they will, then be you ſo plain and as ſhort as you can, ſaying roundly unto them theſe or ſuch like words, as nigh as you can.

Be it known unto you, that I in all points do believe as it becometh a true chriſtian, and as I have been truly taught in the days of that good king Edward, of ſuch godly preachers and prophets ſent of God, as have ſealed their doctrine with their blood, from whom I will diſſent in no point: for I am a poor man without learning, but am commanded of God to follow the counſel of his conſtant preachers, and ſo do I intend to do, God giving me grace and aſſiſtance thereto,

As for you, I know you to be none of Chriſt's ſhepherds, but ravening wolves, which come to kill and ſcatter the flock of Chriſt, as the Lord ſaid you ſhould; and doth will to beware of you, and your poiſoned doctrine, bidding us to judge you according to your fruits, whereby all men may ſee and know what ye be, that will not be wilfully blind. But the good ſhepherds have given their lives for the defence of Chriſt's flock; and I am commanded to follow their faithful and godly example, and to confeſs with them one truth, even to the fire, if God ſhall ſee it good; and this as a true chriſtian I have hitherto done, and henceforth by God's grace intend to do.

And if the ſame God ſhall ſuffer you to take away my life, as you have done theirs, I am contented therewith: his will be done, for that only is good. But of this be ye ſure, the Lord will ſhortly call you to account for all the innocent blood that is ſhed within this realm; which you have brought into a moſt woful caſe, and made many a heavy heart in the ſame, and more I perceive you will make, ſo long as the Lord for our ſins will ſuffer you to proſper, until the time that your iniquities ſhall be full ripe. But then be you ſure the Lord will ſit in judgment upon you, as well as you do now upon his ſaints, and will reward you according to your deſervings; to whom with my whole heart I commit my cauſe, and he will make anſwer for me, when the full time of my refreſhing cometh.

In the mean ſpace, I will keep ſilence with this that I have ſaid, truſting that I have ſufficiently diſcharged my conſcience in confeſſing my faith and religion to you, declaring of what church I am, even of the catholic church of Jeſus Chriſt, which was well known to be here in England in our late good king Edward's days, by two ſpecial tokens which cannot deceive me, nor yet ſuffer me to be deceived; that is to ſay, the pure preaching of his holy word, and the due adminiſtration of his holy ſacraments, which is not to be ſeen in your Romiſh church, and therefore it cannot juſtly be called the church and ſpouſe of Chriſt. I believe in the Holy Trinity, and all the other articles of the chriſtian faith contained in the three creeds; and finally all the canonical ſcripture to be true in every ſentence. And I deteſt all ſects both of the Arians and Anabaptiſts, or any other that divide themſelves from the true church of Chriſt, which is his myſtical body, the ground and pillar of truth, and the very houſe of the living God. And if for theſe things you take away my life, and make yourſelves guilty of my blood, you may: for I am in your hands as the ſheep brought to the ſhambles, abiding the grace of the butcher. And be you ſure your judgment ſleepeth not, but when you cry peace, peace, and all is ſafe, then ſhall your plagues begin like the ſorrow of a woman travailing with child, according to Chriſt's infallible promiſe.

This kind of anſwer, my dear heart, it will be beſt for you to make; and by God's grace I do intend to take the ſame order myſelf in time to come, when the Lord ſhall vouchſafe me worthy of that great dignity, whereunto he hath called you. And if they ſhall laugh you to ſcorn, as I know they will, ſaying, Thou art a fool, and an unlearned aſs-head, and art able to make anſwer to nothing, &c. care you not for it, but ſtill commit your cauſe unto God, who will make anſwer for you; tell them that they have been anſwered again and again of divers godly and learned men; but all will not help: for you have one ſolution of all manner of queſtions, even a fair fire and faggots, this will be the end of your diſputations. Therefore I pray you trouble me no more, but do that which you are appointed, when God ſhall permit the time. I am no better than Chriſt, his apoſtles, and others of my good brethren that are gone before me.

This kind of anſwer will cut their combs moſt, and edify the people that ſtand by, ſo that the ſame be done coldly, with ſobriety, meekneſs, and patience; as I heard ſay our ſweet brethren Thomas Harland and John Oſwald did at Lewes in Suſſex, to the great rejoicing of the children of God that were in thoſe parts: and I hear ſay, that they were diſſolved from this earthly tabernacle at Lewes on Saturday laſt, and were condemned but the Wedneſday before, ſo that we may perceive the papiſts have quick work in hand, that they make ſuch haſte to have us home to our heavenly Father. Therefore let us make ourſelves ready to ride in the fiery chariot, leaving theſe ſorry mantles and old cloaks behind us for a time, which God ſhall reſtore to us again in a more glorious wiſe.

My good brother Henry, you ſhall underſtand that bragging John T—— has beguiled his keepers (who truſted him too well) and is run away from them, and hath brought the poor men into great danger by the ſame. The one of them is caſt by the council into the Gate-houſe at Weſtminſter, the other is fled out of the country for fear.

That you may ſee the fruits of our free-will men, that made ſo much boaſt of their own ſtrength. But that houſe which is not built ſurely upon the unmoveable Rock, will not long ſtand againſt the boiſterous winds and ſtorms, that blow ſo ſtrongly in theſe days of trouble.

But my dearly beloved brother, bleſſed be God for you, and ſuch as you, who have played the parts of wiſe builders. You have digged down paſt the ſand of your own natural ſtrength, and beneath the earth of your own worldly wiſdom, and are now come to the hard ſtone, and unmoveable Rock Chriſt, who is your only keeper; and upon him alone have you built your faith moſt firmly, without doubting, miſtruſt, or wavering. Therefore neither the ſtorms nor tempeſts, winds nor weathers that Satan and all his wily workmen can bring againſt you, with the very gates of hell to help them, ſhall ever be able once to move your houſe, much leſs to overthrow it; for the Lord God himſelf, and no man is the builder thereof, and hath promiſed to preſerve and keep the ſame for ever. Unto his moſt merciful defence therefore I do heartily commit you and all your good company, deſiring him, for his ſweet Son Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, to confirm and ſtrengthen you all, that you may be conſtant unto the very end; that after the final victory is once gotten, you may receive the never-fading crown of glory, of God's free gift, through his great mercy in Jeſus Chriſt our only Saviour. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour, glory, praiſe, thanks, power, rule, and dominion for ever and evermore, Amen. The bleſſing of God be with you all.

John Careleſs.

A Letter of Mr. John Careleſs, returning Thanks to a faithful Friend of his, by whom he had received much Comfort in his inward Troubles.

BLeſſed be God the Father of all mercy, for the great comfort and chriſtian conſolation which he hath ſo mercifully miniſtered unto my poor afflicted heart by your means, my moſt dear and faithful brother. Truly methinketh your words, or rather God's words, by you uttered, have a wonderful power and efficacy working in my heart at the hearing and reading of them. Rejoice therefore, my dear brother, and be thankful unto God; for verily he both is and will be mightily magnified in you, and that divers and many ways, both to the ſtrengthening of them that ſtand in his truth, and alſo to the raiſing of ſuch as are fallen from the ſame. God make me thankful for you, and on your behalf: for verily great is the goodneſs of God towards me, in giving me acquaintance in faithful love and amity with you; God's name therefore be praiſed for ever, and he perform all his merciful promiſes unto you, as I doubt not but he will, for his ſake in whom you truſt.

I thank my God moſt heartily, and alſo you, my good brother, for that you are careful for me in your faithful prayers, remembering my juſt deſerved ſorrows, as tho' they were your own, and labouring ſo much to ſolace the ſame. Ah my gracious good God, what am I, for whom thou and thy dear children ſhould be ſo careful! O ſweet Lord, forgive me my great ingratitude and ſin, and grant that I never abuſe thy great benefits. O let the love of thine, who love me for thy ſake, be a ſure ſign and token, yea a moſt firm teſtimony and ſeal to my ſinful conſcience of thine everlaſting love and mercy towards me in Chriſt; as verily it would and ought to be, if mine infidelity did not hinder it. O circumciſe therefore the foreſkin of my heart, that I may with a lively faith behold thy great love towards me in all thine elect, that I may always be thankful for the ſame, and love thee and them again moſt heartily and unfeignedly.

Ah my dear heart, how ſweetly and how truly, yea how godly and how comfortably have you rehearſed the ſweet ſaying of Solomon concerning proſperity with true and godly friends! I will join with it the ſentence that goeth a little before, for doubtleſs it may be well verified on you. "A ſure friend (ſaith the wiſe man in Ecclus. 6.) will be unto thee even as thine own ſoul, and deal faithfully with thy houſhold-folk. If thou ſuffer trouble and adverſity, he is with thee, and hideth not his face from thee. A faithful friend is a ſtrong defence: whoſo findeth ſuch an one findeth a treaſure. A faithful friend hath no peer: the weight of gold is not to be compared to the goodneſs of his faith. A faithful friend is a medicine of life, and they that fear the Lord ſhall find him, &c." Lo (my dear heart in the Lord) here is a lively image or deſcription of you; for verily ſuch an one have I always found you unto me, not only ſorrowing for my great ſorrowing, but alſo oftentimes making me merry and joyful, with ſuch joys as the world cannot feel. Now let the world brag of its feigned friendſhip; but I will boaſt of this true friendſhip in God, and eſteem it a greater treaſure than all tranſitory things. And as for my mourning, dear brother, God hath made you to turn it unto mirth; for God hath put you inſtead of them to be my comfort, whom he hath in his great mercy taken away. I truſt henceforth to leave the mourning for my great loſs, and to praiſe God for gaining unto himſelf ſo great glory by his choſen children. God make me a true mourner of Sion, both for mine own ſin and wickedneſs, and alſo to ſee his honour defaced, that I may be made meet and apt to bear the joyful and comfortable meſſage that your beautiful feet ſhall bring me. God bleſs thee, my dear heart, and faithful loving brother, and increaſe his good gifts of grace in thee, as he hath moſt happily begun, that you may daily more effectually feel and lively perceive the certainty of God's grace wherein you ſtand, and firmly teſtify the ſame to the converſion or confuſion of all gainſayers, and to the comfort and confirmation of all God's dear children, Amen. Farewel, mine own ſweet brother, farewel as mine own heart.

Your own in Chriſt,

John Careleſs.

In the letters of William Tyms, [p. 562, 563.] ye heard much mention made of Agnes Glaſcock. This Agnes Glaſcock through infirmity, and her huſband's perſuaſions, was allured to go to maſs. For which cauſe ſhe falling into great ſorrow and repentance, was raiſed up again by the comfortable letters of William Tyms and John Careleſs, as before you may read; and after that was conſtant in the ſincere profeſſion of the verity, and in danger of perſecution for the ſame; unto whom John Careleſs writeth this following letter.

A Letter of John Careleſs to Agnes Glaſcock.

THE everlaſting peace of God in Jeſus Chriſt, the continual aid, ſtrength, and comforts of his moſt pure holy and mighty Spirit, be with you my dear and faithful ſiſter Glaſcock, to the good performance of that good work which God hath ſo graciouſly begun in you, to his glory, the profit of his poor afflicted church, and to your own eternal comfort to him, Amen.

In our Lord I have my moſt humble and hearty commendations unto you, may dear ſiſter and moſt faithful mother Glaſcock, with all remembrance of you in my daily prayers, giving God moſt hearty laud, praiſe and thanks thanks for you, and on your behalf, in that he of his great mercy hath hitherto ſo mightily ſtrengthened you, conſtantly to cleave unto your captain Chriſt, notwithſtanding the great aſſaults and manifold temptations that you have had to the contrary. Doubtleſs, dear heart, it cannot be expreſſed what joy and comfort it is unto my very ſoul, to ſee how mightily the Lord hath magnified himſelf in you, whom he will ſhortly glorify with himſelf, as he hath done others of his ſweet ſaints that are gone before you. Rejoice therefore and be glad; for verily you have good cauſe, if you diligently conſider the great dignity that God hath called you unto, even now in your old age, to be one of his worthy witneſſes unto the world: and I think you ſhall with me and other your brethren in bonds, ſeal the Lord's verity with the teſtimony of your blood. Surely, ſweet ſiſter, this is the greateſt promotion that God can bring you or any other unto in this life; and an honour that the higheſt angel in heaven is not permitted to have.

Therefore happy are you, O faithful daughter of Abraham, that the Lord will now prefer you before many others, O faithful and virtuous matron, which wilt not be moved from the ſure rock Chriſt, upon whom you have ſo firmly built your houſe, that neither ſtorms nor tempeſts, neither yet hell gates, or any other temptations, ſhall ever be able to prevail againſt it. Full well doth it appear by your conſtant continuance, that you have played the part of a wiſe builder, in counting coſt beforehand, belonging to the finiſhing up of your tower. And I doubt not but through God's gift, you have ſufficient to the performance thereof, that the hypocrites of their part ſhall have no juſt cauſe to triumph againſt you, or to mock you, ſaying, Lo, this woman began to build, but is not able to make an end. Therefore go on boldly and fear not; for God is faithful, as St. Paul ſaith, who will not ſuffer you to be tempted above your ſtrength, but either he will give you grace and ſtrength to ſtand unto the death (which is the gate and entrance into life) or elſe he will make ſuch an outſcape for you, as ſhall be to the ſetting forth of his glory; which above all other things, we that are his choſen children ought to ſeek, yea even with the loſs of our own lives, being yet well aſſured that the ſame ſhall not be ſhortened one minute of an hour before the time that God hath appointed.

Caſt therefore, dear ſiſter, all your care upon the Lord, who, as St. Peter ſaith, careth for you. Great is his providence for you, and mighty in his love and mercy towards you. With his grace he will defend you, and with his Holy Spirit, he will evermore guide you, wherewith he will ſurely ſeal you unto the day of redemption; he hath alſo given you the recovery of the purchaſed poſſeſſion, which he hath prepared for you before the foundation of the world was laid. Be ſtrong therefore, and take a good heart, as I hear ſay you be. God for ever be bleſſed for you, who hath ſo grafted his love in your good heart, that nothing is able to ſeparate you from the ſame, but will rather chuſe to ſuffer adverſity with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleaſure of ſin for a little ſeaſon. O happy woman, that canſt find in thy heart to eſteem the rebukes of Chriſt to be greater riches than all the treaſures of the world, as good Moſes did. Doubtleſs great it your reward in heaven; which you ſhall receive of his free gift, and not of any deſerving.

Thus, dear mother Glaſcock, I have been bold to trouble you with my rude and ſimple letters, deſiring you to take them in good worth, being done in great haſte, as it doth appear, but yet proceeding from a poor heart which floweth over in love towards you, as my daily prayer for you can teſtify; which I truſt ſhall ſupply that part of my duty towards you, that my pen now wanteth. I thank you, dear heart, for all your loving tokens, and for the great kindneſs you have hitherto ſhewed unto my poor brother Tyms and his wife and children, with all others of God's people, to whom you daily do good: the Lord recompenſe the ſame ſevenfold into your boſom, as I doubt not but he will, according to his infallible promiſes. I pray you have my hearty commendations unto your huſband. I beſeech the Lord to ſtrengthen him in the confeſſion of his truth (as my truſt is that he will) that we may all joyfully reſt with Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob in the kingdom of God; unto which he brings us, that with his moſt precious blood hath bought us. The bleſſing of God be with you now and ever, Amen.

John Careleſs.

A brief Admonition written to Mrs. Agnes Glaſcock, in a Book of hers, when ſhe came to the Priſon to viſit him.

THERE is nothing that the holy ſcripture throughout doth ſo much commend unto us, as true faith and ſtedfaſt truth in the promiſes of God's eternal mercies towards us in Jeſus Chriſt. For from the ſame, as forth of the chief fountain and well-ſpring of life, do flow all kind of virtues and godly fruits, eſpecially true love towards God, in which we ought purely to ſerve him all the days of our life; and alſo chriſtian charity towards our neighbours, as well to help them at all needs, as alſo not to hurt them by any means. Therefore pray earneſtly for the increaſe of faith and lively feeling of God's mercy: for all things are poſſible unto him that can undoubtedly believe. Faith is that thing which aſſureth us of God's mercy, and whereby we vanquiſh all the fiery darts of the devil; our victory that overcometh the world; the knife that killeth and mortifieth the fleſh: and finally that which ſetteth us at peace with God, and quieteth our conſciences always before him, and maketh us merry and joyful under the croſs, with many more things than I can now expreſs. Pray therefore for faith. And for the Lord's ſake beware of popery and popiſh idolatry, the idol of the wicked maſs, and other idolatrous ſervice. Make not your body, which is a member of Chriſt, a member of Antichriſt. Remember that we ſhall receive of God according to that we do in the body, be it good or evil. Therefore glorify God in your body, which is dearly bought. Betray not the truth, leſt the Lord deny you. If God be God, follow him. You cannot ſerve two maſters. I write not this as doubting you, but by the way of admonition. God keep you from all evil.

My ſiſter dear, God give you grace,
With ſtedfaſt faith in Chriſt his name.
His goſpel ſtill for to embrace,
And live according to the ſame.
To die therefore think it no ſhame,
But hope in God with faithful truſt;
And he will give you praiſe with fame,
When you ſhall riſe out of the duſt.
For which moſt ſweet and joyful day,
To God with faith your prayer make:
And think on me I do you pray,
Who now hath wrote this for your ſake.
And thus to God I you betake,
Who is your caſtle and ſtrong rock;
He'll keep you ſleeping or awake,
Farewell dear miſtreſs A. Glaſcock.

Another Letter of Mr. John Careleſs to Mrs. A. G. to comfort her in her Repentance, after ſhe had been at Maſs, comfortable to be read by all thoſe who have fallen, and are willing to riſe again.

THE peace of God in Jeſus Chriſt, the eternal comforts of his ſweet Spirit be with you, and ſtrengthen and comfort you, my dear and faithful ſiſter, Amen.

Although the perilous days be come, whereof Chriſt propheſied, that if it were poſſible the very elect ſhould be deceived; yet let the true faithful chriſtian rejoice and be glad, knowing that the Lord himſelf is their keeper, who will not ſuffer one hair of their heads to periſh without his almighty good will and pleaſure, neither will he ſuffer them to be further tempted than he will give them ſtrength to bear; but will in the midſt of their temptation make a way for them to eſcape out; ſo good and gracious a God is he to all his choſen children. And though ſometimes he do let his elect ſtumble and fall, yet (no doubt) he will raiſe again to the further increaſe of their comfort, and to the ſetting forth of his glory and praiſe. Which thing (my dear and faithful loving ſiſter) I truſt ſhall be well verified on you. For I do hear ſay, that by the manifold allurements, inticements, procurements, yea, and enforcements, that you dear heart have had, your foot hath chanced to ſlip out of the way, to the great diſcomfort of your ſoul, and the heavineſs of your heart: But my good ſiſter, be of good cheer, for the Lord will not ſo leave you, but he will raiſe you up again, and make you ſtronger than ever you were; ſo that your fall ſhall turn to his glory and your profit. For if you had not by this proved the experience of your own ſtrength, or rather your own weakneſs, you would have ſtood too much in your own conceit, or perchance have gloried in yourſelf, and have deſpiſed and condemned other weak perſons that have committed the like offence. Therefore now you may ſee what the beſt of us all can do, if God leaves us to ourſelves. Which thing ought to move you to be diligent to call earneſtly upon God for his grace and the ſtrength of his Holy Spirit (without which we are not able to ſtand one hour) and to be moſt thankful for the ſame when you have it, and then to be more circumſpect in time to come.

Therefore (dear ſiſter) ſeeing that you have done otherwiſe than the word of God and your own conſcience would allow: yet dear heart, do not think that God will caſt you clean away, but know that he hath mercy enough in ſtore for all them that truly repent and believe in him, although the ſins of them were as many in number as the ſands in the ſea, and as great as the ſins of the whole world. It is a greater ſin to miſtruſt the mercy and promiſes of God, than to commit the greateſt offence in the world. Therefore, good ſiſter, beware in any wiſe, that you do not once miſtruſt the promiſes of God's mercy towards you; but know for a very ſurety, that all your ſins be utterly forgiven you, for Chriſt's ſake, be they never ſo many, ſo grievous, or ſo great.

But now, dear heart, take heed, and beware that you do not cloak that ſin, and increaſe the ſame daily, in communicating with the wicked in their idolatry, and deviliſh doings at their den of thieves. Do not, I ſay, dear ſiſter, be at any of their Antichriſtian ſervice, leſt by little and little you utterly loſe a good conſcience, and at length eſteem it for no offence; as alas, a great number do at this day, to the great peril of their ſouls. The Lord be merciful to them, and give them grace to repent in time, and turn to the Lord, and then they ſhall be ſure to find mercy at the Lord's hand, as doubtleſs you have done, praiſed therefore be is name.

Ah, my dear ſiſter, you may now ſee the words of Chriſt verified upon yourſelf, that a man's greateſt foes ſhall be they of his own houſhold; for your huſband hath gotten you to do that, which all the tyrants in the world could never have made you to do. Doubtleſs he may be ſorry for it. God give him grace to repent, or elſe, without doubt, it will be laid to his charge one day, when he would not by his will hear it for all the goods in the world. Well, I think my brother Tyms will write him a letter ſhortly that ſhall touch his conſcience, if he have conſcience at all.

But now again to you, dear ſiſter. The thing that is done cannot be undone, and you are not the firſt that have offended; neither are you ſo good and holy, as hath at any time ſlipt out of the way. Therefore I would not have you to be ſo much diſcomforted as I hear ſay you be, as though God were not as able to forgive his dear ſaints that offended him in times paſt; or as though God were not as merciful now, as ever he was. Whereas in very deed, there is with the Lord (as the prophet ſaith) mercy and plentiful redemption, and his mercy far ſurmounteth all his works; and he never faileth any that put their whole truſt and confidence in him, how great an offender, or how wicked a treſpaſſer ſoever he be: no, he maketh their falls and backſlidings many times to turn to their greater profit and advantage, and to the ſetting forth of his glory; as doubtleſs, dear ſiſter, yours ſhall do, if you put your whole faith, hope, and truſt, only in his infinite and eternal ſweet mercies.

O what a ſubtle, crafty, lying ſerpent is that Satan our old enemy! that when he ſeeth that he cannot make us to continue in our wickedneſs to do him ſervice, would then bring us into a doubting and miſtruſting of the mercy of God, which is the greateſt offence that can be; yea, infidelity is the root and original of all other ſins. Therefore (my ſweet ſiſter) give no place to that cruel adverſary of mankind, who hath been a lyar and a murderer from the beginning, but ſtedfaſtly believe the Lord, who hath ſent you word by me his moſt unworthy ſervant, that all your ſins be pardoned, forgiven, and clean releaſed for Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, our only Lord and Saviour. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour, glory, praiſe, thanks, power, rule, and dominion for ever, Amen. Farewel, my dear ſiſter, be of good cheer. Believe in the Lord, and you ſhall live for ever. The Lord increaſe your faith, Amen, Amen.

Your poor brother, and daily faithful orator,
John Careleſs, priſoner of the Lord. Pray for me.

Another Letter of Mr. John Careleſs to a faithful Miniſter of the Lord, containing certain fruitful Precepts of Matrimony.

I Beſeech the ſame everlaſting Lord (my dear and faithful brother) that bleſſed young Tobias with his wife Sarah, and brought them together in due time with reverence and fear, preſerve and bleſs you both, and your ſeed after you, that they may increaſe the number of the faithful by thouſands and thouſands. And as the Lord of his great mercy and fatherly providence hath been always careful for you, and now hath for your comfort accompliſhed his good work in coupling you with a faithful mate; ſo ſee that you be thankful for his providence towards you, that it may every way in you be an increaſe of love and godlineſs, yea, of chriſtian joy and gladneſs in theſe ſorrowful days; but yet ſo, that you mourn with the true mourners of Sion, and be ſorry (yet in meaſure) for the hurt of the ſame. Pray alſo in faith for her proſperity, that the Lord may build up the walls of Jeruſalem again,

Oh, that the Lord would turn Sion's captivity as the rivers into the ſouth: Then ſhould our hearts be made glad, and our mouths filled with laughter. Then would the heathen hypocrites ſay, The Lord hath done much for them. O, the Lord hath done great things for us already, whereof let us heartily rejoice and praiſe his name therefore. For though we now ſow in tears, yet we ſhall be ſure to reap with gladneſs: and as we now go forth weeping, bearing forth good ſeed, ſo ſhall we come again with joy, and bring our ſheaves full of corn. Yea, the death of the martyrs (which is moſt precious in his ſight) ſhall be the life of the goſpel, in ſpite of the papiſts hearts.

Pray for me (dear heart) that I may be counted worthy to ſow ſome ſeed amongſt the ſweet ſaints of the Lord, that I may reap the ſame again, without ceaſing, at the harveſt. It is now ſowing-time of the year, men ſay in the the country, and I think I ſhall make an end of ſowing before all March be paſt; for I hear ſay I ſhall prove how my plough will enter into the ſtony ground of the hard hearted papiſts, within theſe four days. I hope to hold faſt, and not to look back, neither for fear nor flattery, until I have made an end of ſowing, and then will I ſet me down and reſt me, aſk them all no leave, and look for the lively fruit and increaſe thereof with joy and gladneſs.

My dear brother, the time approacheth near (for which I praiſe God) that I muſt put off this ſinful tabernacle, and go home to my heavenly Father, where divers of my dear brethren are already looking and wiſhing for me. I beſeech you therefore that you will help me forward with your faithful prayers as I know you do, for I do feel the comfort and advantage thereof.

That you have obſerved my ſimple counſel I am right glad; and I truſt in the Lord God, you ſhall find comfort in the ſame. And that you may ſo do indeed, I have been ſo bold to write theſe few words unto you, becauſe I ſhall ſee you no more in this corruptible life; therefore mark them well. Firſt, and above all things, you muſt be very circumſpect to keep the band of love, and beware that there never ſpring up the root of bitterneſs between you. If at any time there happens to ariſe any cauſe of unkindneſs between you, as it is impoſſible always to be free from it, ſee that you weed up the ſame with all lenity, gentleneſs, and patience, and never ſuffer yourſelf nor your wife to ſleep in diſpleaſure.

If you have cauſe to ſpeak ſharply, and ſometimes to reprove, beware that you do not the ſame in the preſence of others, but keep your words until a convenient time (which is the point of a wiſe man, ſaith Solomon) and then utter them in the ſpirit of meekneſs, and the groaning ſpirit of perfect love; which you muſt alſo let ſometimes to cover faults, and wink at them if they be not intolerable. Whatſoever loſs and miſchance ſhall happen unto you, take it patiently, and bear it merrily; and though the ſame ſhould come partly through your wife's negligence, yet let it rather be a loving warning to take heed in time to come, than a cauſe of ſorrow for that which is paſt, and cannot be holpen. I know by mine own experience, that we are in this life ſubject to many inconveniences, and that of nature we are prone to diſpleaſure and ready to think unkindneſs for every little trifle, and eſpecially with our beſt friends, yea, ſooneſt with our loving wives, who be moſt loth to diſpleaſe us.

But let us beware of this cankered corruption, and conſider that we ought moſt of all in love to bear with them according to Chriſt's example towards his congregation, for whom he gave himſelf, to cleanſe it, &c. I had thought to have treated this matter at large, but even now I am intermitted, and otherwiſe hindered. I doubt not but you know your duty therein a great deal better than I can declare it unto you; and as you know it, ſo will do it: but I love to be bold with you. I intend to write to your wife very ſhortly, and ſo take my laſt farewel of you for ever in this world. And thus in great haſte I am now conſtrained to make an end. The bleſſing of God be always with you.

Your own for ever, John Careleſs.

Pray, pray, pray with faith.

Another Letter of Mr. John Careleſs, to Elizabeth. Wife of the aforeſaid Miniſter, containing certain godly Precepts of Matrimony pertaining to her Duty.

THE everlaſting peace of God in Jeſus Chriſt, the continual, aid, ſtrength, and comfort of his moſt holy and mighty Spirit, with increaſe of knowledge, faith, and perfect feeling of God's eternal mercy, be with you my dear and faithful loving ſiſter, and with your godly loving huſband and my dear and faithful brother, to the full performance of that good which he hath ſo graciouſly begun in you, that in all things you may be made rich and bleſſed in him, and your ſeed after you, now and ever, Amen.

As I have been long deſirous to write unto you (my dear heart in the Lord) not only being thereto bound of duty, but alſo often provoked by him to whom I owe myſelf and all that I am able to do (I mean even that bleſſed of the Lord's own mouth, whom God hath joined with you in that holy and chriſtian ſtate of matrimony) even ſo at laſt I have obtained time and occaſion in ſome part to perform that which I have long purpoſed. And foraſmuch as the Lord of his great mercy and fatherly care and providence over you his dear child, hath now graciouſly accompliſhed that good work amongſt many others, which I (as a friend of the bridegroom) have full heartily wiſhed, and often prayed for; I think it good, yea, and my bounden duty, to treat of ſuch things as may be profitable to preſerve mutual love and faithful amity between you, which I know Satan will chiefly labour to diminiſh, if he cannot altogether deſtroy the ſame, leſt by many joyful occaſions you ſhould be provoked continually to praiſe God for his good gift, which that enemy hath by all means ſought to hinder from you.

As for all other things I know you are ſufficiently inſtructed, and alſo have a moſt learned companion, who is well able further to teach you if need do require: But in this particular I know my experience is more than his. Therefore (my good ſiſter) firſt and before all things ſee that you diligently conſider, that as every good and perfect gift pertaining to ſoul and body, is given from above, and cometh down from the Father of Lights: even ſo to whomſoever the Lord dealeth any of his benefits, of them he doth chiefly require always a thankful heart for the ſame; for elſe he will either take away his good gifts again, or turn the ſame to their great diſadvantage, and in the end to the increaſe of their damnation: ſo deteſtable in his ſight is the ſin of ingratitude. But to ſuch as be thankful for his benefits, he doth not only to the old ever add new, but alſo maketh the goodneſs of his former gifts ever more and more to increaſe, until by them they are fully perſuaded and thoroughly certified of his everlaſting love in Chriſt Jeſus, which is eternal life itſelf: ſo much doth he of his great mercy delight in a thankful heart.

Therefore I do yet once again earneſtly require you, that above all things you be thankful to God for his benefits; not only for your election, creation, redemption and preſervation; but alſo for his other temporal gifts, wherewith he hath indued you: amongſt which the chief and moſt excellent is (as teſtifieth the Holy Ghoſt) your good, faithful and loving huſband. For (as the wiſe man ſaith) goods and poſſeſſions may come to a man by the death of his friends, but a good wife is the gift of God, which the Lord will give for a good portion to ſuch as fear him.

And the like is of a good huſband, as the Lord hath now given you, praiſed be his holy name. He hath not given you an ignorant, froward, churliſh, brawling, waſteful, rioting, drunken huſband, wherewith he hath plagued many others (as he might alſo have done you) but he hath given you a moſt godly, learned, gentle, loving, quiet, patient, thrifty, diligent, and ſober huſband, by whom he will nouriſh, cheriſh, keep and defend you, inſtruct and teach you, yea care and provide for you and your children (which he will alſo by him give you) ſuch things as be neceſſary for you. He hath not dealt ſo with every body; and yet he hath done this much more for you, my dear ſiſter, and will thereto increaſe love and joy between you. For as he delighteth in the love and godly agreement of man and wife together; ſo it is he only that maketh them and all the whole houſhold to be of one mind. Unto which his gracious work he requireth your diligence, and will uſe you as his inſtrument and mean, and more effectually to accompliſh the ſame. And therefore I now require you to obſerve this my ſimple counſel, which I have here written as a teſtimonial of my good will towards you, becauſe I think in this life I ſhall never more ſee you.

Now as I have ſhewed you how you ſhould be thankful unto God for his good gifts, ſo I exhort you, and, as much as in me lieth, charge you to be evermore thankful unto your dear loving huſband, who hath given himſelf unto you; who is a more precious jewel in the church of God, than perchance you are yet aware of. Think yourſelf unworthy to be matched with ſuch an inſtrument of God; and alſo reverence evermore the gifts of God in him, and ſeek with true obedience and love to ſerve him, in recompenſe of his true and painful heart towards you. Be loth in any wiſe to offend him, yea rather be careful and diligent to pleaſe him, that his ſoul may bleſs you. If at any time you ſhall chance to anger him, or to do or ſpeak any thing that ſhall grieve him, ſee that you never reſt until you have pacified him and made him merry again.

If at any time he ſhall chance to blame you without a cauſe, or for that you cannot do therewith (which thing happeneth ſometimes to the beſt man living), ſee that you bear it patiently, and give him no uncomely or unkind word for it; but always look upon him with a loving and chearful countenance, and rather take the fault upon you than ſeem to be diſpleaſed.

Be always merry and chearful in his company, but not with too much lightneſs. Beware in any wiſe of ſwelling, pouting or lowring, for that is a token of a cruel and unloving heart; except it be in reſpect of ſin, or in the time of ſickneſs.

Be not ſorrowful for any adverſity that God ſendeth; but beware that nothing be ſpilt or go to waſte through your negligence. In any wiſe ſee that you be quick and cleanly about his meat and drink, and prepare him the ſame according to his diet in due ſeaſon. Go cleanly and well-favouredly in your apparel, but beware of pride in any wiſe.

Finally, in word and deed ſhew yourſelf wiſe, humble, merry and loving towards him, and alſo towards ſuch as he doth love, and then ſhall you lead a bleſſed life. I could ſpeak of many things, which I have learned and proved true by experience; but I know that you will do in all things much better than I can teach you, becauſe you have that anointing that teacheth you all things, who hath alſo given you an heart to obey and ſerve him. Yet I truſt you will not be offended for this which I have written, but rather except my good will towards you whom I love in the Lord, as well as I do my daughter Judith.

Thus as mine own ſoul I commend you both to God, deſiring him to bleſs you with all manner of ſpiritual bleſſings in heavenly things, and alſo with the dew of heaven, and fatneſs of the earth, that in all things you may be made rich in Jeſus Chriſt our Lord and only Saviour. The Lord increaſe and bleſs the fruit of your bodies, that your children may ſtand round about your table, thick, freſh, and luſty, like the olive branches. God give you both a long life, that you may ſee and bleſs your children's children, unto the third and fourth generation, and teach them the true fear and love of God, and that faith for which they ſhall be accepted in his ſight.

God let you ſee the proſperity of Sion, for whoſe lying in the duſt let your hearts mourn. The Lord make perfect your love together in him, and always increaſe the ſame, and bring you both in peace to your graves, at a good age. And now I bid you both moſt heartily farewel; and I think I ſhall now take my leave of you for ever in this life. I beſeech you both to aid me with your continual prayers (as I will not forget you in mine) that I may have a joyful victory through Jeſus Chriſt: To whoſe moſt merciful protection I do moſt heartily for ever commend you to be kept unblameable unto his coming. Which I beſeech him to haſten for his mercies ſake.

Your own unfeigned, John Careleſs, priſoner of the Lord.

The Hiſtory and Martyrdom of Julius Palmer, a learned and virtuous young man, ſometime Fellow of Magdalen-College, in Oxford; with two other Martyrs, named John Gwin, and Thomas Aſkin, burnt together at a Place called the Sand-pits, in Newbury, about the 16th Day of July.

Of Julius Palmer.

AS all the works of God are wonderful in calling all ſorts of men to confirm his truth, and to bear witneſs to his aſſured and infallible word, which the adverſaries have depraved and corrupted with their falſe gloſſes, to eſtabliſh the fleſhly kingdom of Antichriſt, and to purchaſe ſecurity in the world, which poſſeſſion they ſeek, and by all poſſible means endeavour to keep; rather curſing with the thunderbolt of excommunication, burning, hanging, drowning, racking, ſcourging, and perſecuting, by ſecret practice, and open violence the ſimple ſheep of our Saviour Chriſt, than that their falſe forged packing ſhould be detected, their eſtimation impaired, their kitchen cooled, and their rents, revenues, goods, lands and poſſeſſions abated: I ſay, as God's work be admirable in chuſing ſome of all ſorts to confeſs his goſpel; ſo there is no one example, in the whole godly fellowſhip of martyrs, more remarkable and amazing than this, That a perſon, who in all the days of king Edward, was a papiſt in the univerſity of Oxford, ſo rigid and obſtinate, that he utterly abhorred all godly prayer, and ſincere preaching; and he himſelf as little reſpected, and, as it were, pointed at, by almoſt all thoſe with whom he lived: That ſuch a perſon, I ſay, ſhould ſuffer perſecution and death by the papiſts for the truth of the goſpel in the reign of queen Mary (as he readily and zealouſly did) is very admirable and ſurpriſing.

He was born in Coventry, where alſo his parents dwelt. His father had ſometime been mayor of the city, and occupied merchandize, although he was an upholſterer by his myſtery. How he was brought up in his young and tender years, from his firſt entering, we know not, but as we have learned, he was ſometime ſcholar to Mr. Harley of Magdalen-college in Oxford; by whoſe diligence, and the goodneſs of his own capacity, he became a toward young ſcholar in proſe and verſe. For he had a very prompt and ready memory, a wit ſharp and pregnant. He ſpake Latin with great facily and utterance, and wanted not competent knowledge in the Greek tongue; inſomuch that divers times he ſupplied the room of the Greek reader in his houſe. He was a ſubtle diſputer, both in the public ſchools, and alſo at home. He uſed to ſay, that he was never ſo pleaſantly occupied, as when he came to the hard debating of profound queſtions in philoſophy; ſo that he hath oftentimes watched and ſpent the whole night in the diſcuſſing and ſearching out the truth of deep and diffuſe queſtions. And this he uſed to do ſundry times with divers of his equals.

In familiar talk he greatly delighted, for the exerciſe of his learning, to defend the contrary to that which was affirmed, yet with modeſty, and without all oſtentation. For he greatly abhorred all overthwart cavilling, all frivolous talk, and unſavoury brabbling. He was captious, but would reaſon ſo ſoberly, and with ſuch probability, that even his adverſaries would no leſs marvel at the dexterity of his invention, than at his comely and decent behaviour in proſecuting the ſame.

And although he applied divinity very lately, it appeareth that he recompenſed the ſmall time of his ſtudy with the greatneſs of his diligence beſtowed in the ſame, and and his late coming to the truth with his earneſt and zealous proceeding therein. For by the ſecret inſpiration of God's Holy Spirit inwardly working in his heart, he gave an apparent ſignification in his young years, that if God had ſpared his life to age, he would have grown to ſuch maturity and ripeneſs of judgment, as whereby he ſhould have been an ornament to Chriſt's church, and an honour to his country.

And ſomewhat to ſpeak of his civil behaviour; he was of manners courteous without curioſity; of countenance cheerful, without high looks; of ſpeech pleaſant, without affectation; he was affable and lowly as any child, and yet quick-ſpirited, and vehement in reaſoning. He practiſed no deceit towards any man, for he was of ſuch ſimplicity, that he was apter to be deceived than to deceive, and he was ſo great a contemner of all reproaches, that he would ſay, None were to be counted valiant, but ſuch as could deſpiſe injury.

In private ſtudy he was ſo indefatigable, that he aroſe ordinarily every morning at four of the clock, and went not to bed before ten at night. Inſomuch that as he grew in years and underſtanding, ſo he came to be a batchelor of art, and at length, for the hope appearing in him, to the preferment of a fellowſhip in Magdalen college, where alſo he was admitted to the office of a reader in logick, anno 1550. Now if he had at the firſt favoured ſincere religion, ſo much as he followed his book, then had we the leſs matter to note in him. But indeed he was ſo much (as is before ſaid) addicted to the Romiſh faith, that his company and converſation in the ſame houſe was altogether with ſuch as were utter enemies to the goſpel of Chriſt. If he came to common prayer at any time, it was by violence and compulſion, for otherwiſe he came not. Sermons would he hear none himſelf, nor yet ſuffer his ſcholars to reſort unto them by his good will: for he was fully perſuaded, that they might be better occupied at home. The preachers themſelves he did both diſdain and deſpiſe, and all ſuch as were ſetters forth of ſound doctrine beſide. For which contumacy and ſtubborneſs he was ſo oft called before the officers of the college, and puniſhed ſometimes by the purſe, ſometimes by the lack of his commons, and otherwhile by certain taſks, and exerciſes of learning enjoined unto him, that divers ſuppoſed him to have endeavoured, of ſet purpoſe, continually to ſeek occaſion, whereby he might be accounted a ſufferer for the fantaſied religion of the Romiſh church.

In the end, not long before the death of king Edward, certain ſlanderous libels and railing verſes were privily fixed to the walls and doors in ſundry places of the college againſt the preſident, which was then Dr. Haddon, whereby was admitted further matter of trouble to Palmer. For whereas it was well known that he and ſome of his companions had a very little time before ſpoken contumelious words againſt the preſident, it could not be now avoided, but that thereby aroſe a vehement ſurmiſe and ſuſpicion, that he conſpiring with others, had contrived, made and ſcattered abroad, the ſaid ſlanderous writings. Great inquiſition was made in the college, to ſearch out the author of ſo malicious and deſpiteful a deed, but nothing could be found and proved againſt Palmer or any of his companions. Now Palmer being hereupon examined by the officers, did not only with ſtout courage deny the fact to have been his, but alſo ſpake further many reproachful words touching the ſaid officers, and ſet the ſame to them in writing, whereby he was by them adjudged to be an unworthy member of that ſociety. And ſo for this and other popiſh pranks (continuing obſtinate ſtill) he was expelled the houſe.

After he was thus expelled, he was obliged for his own maintenance to apply himſelf to be a teacher to children in the houſe of Sir Francis Knolles, in which trade he continued until the coming in of queen Mary. And when her viſitors were ſent to Magdalen college, under a title of reformation (whereas all things were better before) I mean to diſplace ſeveral of the fellows that were learned, and to put right catholics (as they called them) in their rooms; then came this Julius Palmer, waiting to be reſtored to his living again, of which he had been deprived before, thinking by good right to be reſtored by them, whoſe faith and religion (as he ſaid) he did to the uttermoſt of his power defend and maintain. And indeed at length he obtained the ſame. Then after he was reſtored again to his houſe in queen Mary's reign, God dealt ſo merciful with him, that in the end he became of an obſtinate papiſt, an earneſt and zealous proteſtant.

Concerning whoſe converſion to the truth, for the more credit to be given to the ſame, we have here inſerted a letter written by one Mr. Bullingham, fellow in ſome part of king Edward's time with the ſaid Palmer, then alſo with the ſame religion with him, and towards the latter end of the ſaid king's reign a voluntary exile in France for popery. In queen Mary's days likewiſe a chaplain unto Stephen Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter. And after the coming in of queen Elizabeth, ſuch an one as for his obſtinacy was diſcharged from all his livings by her majeſty's commiſſioners. And yet now (God be praiſed for it it) a moſt conſtant profeſſor and earneſt teacher of the word of God. This man at the requeſt of a certain friend of his in London, being deſirous to know the certain truth thereof, wrote unto him concerning this Julius Palmer. The copy of which letter we thought good here to inſert, becauſe the parties being alive can teſtify the ſame to be true, if any man ſhall doubt thereof.

Mr. Bullingham's Letter to his Friend.

MAſter Bullingham, I wiſh you and all yours continual health in the Lord. Hitherto have I not written any thing unto you concerning Julius Palmer, that conſtant witneſs of God's truth, for that his doings and ſayings known unto me, were worn out of my remembrance; and to write an untruth, it were rather to deface and blemiſh, than to adorn and beautify him. After his converſion to the moſt holy goſpel, I never ſaw his face. Wherefore the leſs have I to certify you of. But ſo much as ſeemeth to me to ſerve moſt unto the purpoſe, here I commend unto you; and in witneſs that my ſayings are true, I ſubſcribe my name, willing, praying, and beſeeching you to publiſh the ſame to the whole world, &c. At what time I Bullingham intended to forſake England, and to fly into France for the wicked pope's ſake, (which came to paſs indeed, for in Roan I was for a time) this Julius Palmer and Richard Duck brought me onwards in my journey till we came to London: where on a day Julius Palmer and I walked to St. James's the queen's palace; and as we leaned at the great gate of that place, Palmer ſpake thus unto me.

Bullingham, you know in what miſery and calamities we are fallen for the pope and his religion. We are young men abhorred of all men now preſently, and like to be abhorred more and more. Let us conſider what hangeth over our heads. You are departing into a ſtrange country, both friendleſs and moneyleſs, where I fear me you ſhall taſte of ſourer ſauces than hitherto you have done. And as for me, I am at my wits end. The face of hell itſelf is as amiable unto me, as the ſight of Magdalen college; for there I am hated as a venemous toad. Would God I were raked under the earth. And as touching our religion, even our conſcience bear witneſs that we taſte not ſuch an inward ſweetneſs in the profeſſion thereof, as we underſtand the goſpellers to taſte in their religion: yea, to ſay the truth, we maintain we know not what, rather of will than of knowledge. But what then; rather than I will yield unto them I will beg my bread. So Palmer bequeathed himſelf to the wide world, and I paſſed over into Normandy. At my return into England, my chance was to meet Palmer in Paul's, where a rood was ſet up. (This our meeting was in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, and our miſerable departing not long before the end of king Edward's days.) Then after our greeting, thus ſaid Palmer: Bullingham, is this our God, for whom we have ſmarted? No, Palmer (quoth I) it is an image of him. An image! (quoth he) I tell thee plainly Bullingham, John Calvin, whoſe inſtitutions I have peruſed ſince our departure, telleth me plainly by God's word, that it is an idol, and that the pope is Antichriſt, and his clergy the filthy ſink-hole of hell, and now I believe it; and now I feel it ſenſibly. O that God had revealed theſe matters unto me in times paſt. I would have bequeathed this Romiſh religion, or rather irreligion, to the devil of hell, from whence it came. Believe them not, Bullingham. I will rather have theſe knees pared off, than I will kneel to yonder jackanapes (meaning the rood.) God help me I am born to trouble and adverſity in this world. Well, Palmer (ſaid I) is the wind in that corner with you? I warrant you it will blow you to little eaſe, at the end. I will never have to do with you again. So I left Palmer walking in Paul's, who through the element of fire is exalted above the elements, where eternal reſt is prepared for perſecuted martyrs. Thus much is true, and let it be known that I Bullingham affirm it to be true. More I have not to ſay. In theſe words and deeds it appeareth that God had elected him.

By me, John Bullingham.

When he was by the viſitors reſtored to his college, although he began ſomething to ſavour and taſte of God's truth, by conference and company of certain godly and zealous men abroad, in time of his expulſion, eſpecially at the houſe of Sir Francis Knolles; yet was he not thoroughly perſuaded, but in moſt points continued for a while either blind, or elſe doubtful. Neither could he chuſe but utter himſelf in private reaſoning from time to time, both in what points he was fully reſolved, and alſo of what points he doubted. For ſuch was always his nature, both in papiſtry and in the goſpel, utterly to deteſt all diſſimulation, inſomuch that by the means of his plainneſs, and for that he could not flatter, he ſuffered much trouble, both in King Edward's, and alſo in queen Mary's time. Whereas he might at the firſt have lived in great quietneſs, if he could have diſſembled, and both done and ſpoken againſt his conſcience, as many ſtirring papiſts then did. And likewiſe he might have eſcaped the flames in queen Mary's time, if he would either have ſpoken, or kept ſilence againſt his conſcience, as many goſpellers did. But Palmer could in no wiſe diſſemble.

Now within a ſhort time God ſo wrought in his heart, that he became very inquiſitive to hear and underſtand how the martyrs were apprehended, what articles they died for, how they were uſed, and after what manner they took their death. Inſomuch that he ſpared not at his own charges to ſend over one of his ſcholars, in the company of a bachelor of that houſe, to Glouceſter, to ſee and underſtand the whole order of biſhop Hooper's death, and to bring his true report thereof. Which thing ſome think he rather did, becauſe he was wont in king Edward's time to ſay; that none of them all would ſtand to death for their religion. Thus he learned with what great, extreme and horrible cruelty the martyrs of God were tried, and how valiantly they overcame all kind of torments to the end. Whereof he himſelf did ſee more experience afterwards, at the examination and death of thoſe holy confeſſors and martyrs which were burnt at Oxford before his eyes; inſomuch that the firſt hope which the godly conceived of him, was at his return from the burning of biſhop Ridley, and biſhop Latimer. At which time, in the hearing of divers of his friends, he brake out into theſe, or ſuch like words, O raging cruelty! O tyranny tragical, and more than barbarous!

From that day forward he ſtudiouſly endeavoured to underſtand the truth, and therefore with all ſpeed he borrowed Peter Martyr's commentaries on the firſt to the Corinthians, of one of the Magdalen's yet alive, and other good books of other men. And ſo through hearty prayer, and diligent ſearch and conference of the ſcriptures, at length he believed and embraced the truth with great joy; and ſo profited in the ſame, that daily more and more he declared it both in word and deed: inſomuch that ever afterwards he loved the truth as much as he before hated it, when it pleaſed God to open his eyes, and to reveal unto him the light of his word. And now again when he ſhould come to church, in thoſe days of popery, there to be occupied among the reſt, in ſinging of reſponds, reading of legends, and ſuch like ſtuff allotted to him, he had as much pleaſure, he ſaid, to be at them, as a bear to be baited and worried with dogs. When he came, it was (as it appeared) more to avoid diſpleaſure and danger, than for any good will, and ready affection.

At length through God's grace, he grew up to ſuch maturity and ripeneſs in the truth, that he ſpared not to declare certain ſparks thereof in his outward behaviour. For when he ſhould keep his bowing meaſures at Confiteor (as the cuſtom there was) in turning himſelf to and fro, ſometimes eaſtward, ſometimes weſtward, and afterwards knock his breaſt at the time of elevation, againſt theſe idolatrous adorations his heart did ſo vehemently riſe, that ſometimes he would abſent himſelf from them, and ſometimes being there, he would even at the ſacring time (as they termed it) get him out of the church, to avoid thoſe ungodly geſtures, and idolatrous adorations. To be ſhort, perceiving after a while, that he was greatly ſuſpected as well as diſreſpected by Mr. Cole, the preſident then being, and divers others who before had been his friends, and finding great torment of conſcience daily growing upon him, in his converſation with idolaters; and alſo ſeeing that his new life and old way of living could not well nor quietly ſtand together, he addreſſed himſelf to depart the houſe. For he thought it not beſt to abide the danger of expulſion, as he did at firſt; ſeeing the heat of the times increaſing apace. And being demanded at that time by a particular friend (who would gladly have perſuaded him to ſtay there longer) whither he would go, or how he would live, he made this anſwer, [Domini eſt terra, & plenitudo ejus] that is, The earth is the Lord's, and the fulneſs thereof. Let the Lord work, I will commit myſelf to God, and the wide world.

Here I think it expedient, before I write of the painful ſurges that he ſuffered after he came abroad into the perilous gulphs, and deep ſea of this wretched wide world, firſt, to rehearſe one or two examples of this outward behaviour, at ſuch times as he had recourſe to the college, after his laſt departure, whereby the reader may yet better underſtand of his ſimplicity and plainneſs, and how far wide he was from all cloaked diſſimulation in God's cauſe, which certain godleſs perſons have ſought maliciouſly to charge him withal. Being at Oxford a certain time in Magdalen-college, and having knowledge that the Spaniſh friar John (who ſucceeded Dr. Peter Martyr in the office of Divinity Lecturer) would preach there that preſent Sunday, he would not at the firſt grant to be preſent at it. At length a friend of his, a fellow of that houſe, perſuaded ſo much with him, that he was content to accompany his ſaid friend to the church. But ſuddenly as the friar vehemently inveighed againſt God's truth, in defending certain popiſh hereſies, Palmer, having many eyes bent and directed towards him, departed from amongſt the midſt of the auditory, and was found in his friend's chamber weeping bitterly.

After-

Afterwards being demanded why he ſlipped away on ſuch a ſudden; Oh, ſaid he, if I had not openly departed, I ſhould openly have ſtopped mine ears. For the friar's blaſphemous talk, in diſproving, or rather deproving the verity, made mine ears not to glow, but mine heart worſe to ſmart, than if mine ears had been cut from my head.

It chanced another time, that the ſame friend of his, named Mr. Shipper, being then butler of the houſe, bade him to dinner in his chamber. Palmer not knowing what gueſts were alſo thither invited and bidden, happened there (contrary to his expectation) to meet with the aforeſaid friar, with whom were preſent Dr. Smith, Dr. Treſham, and divers other papiſts, whoſe company Palmer could not well bear: and therefore whiſpering his friend in the ear, he ſaid he would be gone, for that was no place for him: I will, ſaith he, to the butler's table in the great hall. The butler, underſtanding his mind, deſired him of all friendſhip not ſo to depart, alledging that it were the next way to betray himſelf, and as it were of purpoſe to caſt himſelf into the briars, with many other perſuaſions, as the ſhortneſs of time would permit. In the end he condeſcended to his requeſt, and tarried. Now as he came to the fire ſide, the friar ſaluted him cheerfully in Latin, for he could not ſpeak Engliſh. Palmer with an amiable countenance gently returned it; but when the friar offered him his hand, he caſting his eye aſide, as though he had not ſeen it, found matter of talk to another ſtanding by, and ſo avoided it: which thing was well marked by ſome, not without great grudge of ſtomach.

After they were ſat, and had well eaten, the friar with a pleaſant look, offering him the cup, ſaid, [Propino tibi, juvenis erudite] that is, I drink to you, learned young man. Palmer at that word bluſhing as red as ſcarlet, anſwered [Non agnoſco nomen, domine] that is, I acknowledge no ſuch name, O Sir. And therewith taking the cup at his hand, he ſet it down by him, as though he would have pledged him anon, but in the end it was alſo well marked, that he did it not. When dinner was done, being ſharply rebuked by the ſaid butler his friend, for his ſo unwiſe, uncivil and unſeemly behaviour (as he termed it) he made anſwer for himſelf, and ſaid, [Oleum eorum non demulcet, ſed frangit caput meum.] The oil of theſe men doth not ſupple, but breaketh my head.

Another time, which was alſo the laſt time of his being at Oxford, not long before his death, one Barwick, an old acquaintance of his, being ſometime clerk of Magdalen's, and then fellow of Trinity college, a rank papiſt, began to reaſon with him in his friend's chamber aforeſaid, and perceiving him to be zealous and earneſt in the defence of the verity, he ſaid unto him in the hearing of Mr. Thomas Parry, and others then preſent. Well, Palmer, well, now thou art ſtout and hardy in thine opinion, but if thou wert once brought to the ſtake, I believe thou wouldſt tell me another tale. I adviſe thee beware of the fire, it is a ſhrewd matter to burn. Truly, ſaid Palmer, I have been in danger of burning once or twice, and hitherto, I thank God, I have eſcaped it. But I judge verily it will be my end at the laſt, welcome be it, by the grace of God. Indeed it is a hard matter for them to burn, that have the mind and ſoul linked to the body, as a thief's foot is tied in a pair of fetters: but if a man be once able, through the help of God's Spirit, to ſeparate and divide the ſoul from the body, for him it is no more maſtery to burn, than for me to eat this piece of bread.

Thus much by the way concerning his plainneſs, without diſſimulation, and how he feared not openly to ſhew himſelf more grieved in heart to hear the word of God blaſphemed, than to ſuffer any worldly pains. Now let us proceed in our ſtory, and faithfully declare both the occaſion and manner of his death.

Within a ſhort time after he had yielded up his fellowſhip in Oxford, he was through God's providence (who never faileth them that firſt ſeek his glory) placed ſchoolmaſter by patent in the grammar-ſchool of Reading, where he was well accepted by all thoſe that feared God, and favoured his word, as well for his good learning and knowledge, as alſo for his earneſt zeal and profeſſion of the truth. But Satan, the enemy of all godly attempts, envying his good proceedings, and proſperous ſucceſs in the ſame, would not ſuffer him long there to be quiet. Wherefore he ſtirred up againſt him certain double-faced hypocrites, who by diſſimulation and crafty inſinuation had crept in, to underſtand his ſecrets, under pretence of a zeal to the goſpel. Which men he (ſuſpecting no deceit) right joyfully embraced, making them privy to all his doings. For as he himſelf was then fervently inflamed with the love of heavenly doctrine, ſo he had an incredible deſire by all means poſſible to allure and encourage others to the profeſſion of the ſame.

Theſe faithful and truſty brethren, ſo ſoon as they had found good opportunity, ſpared not in his abſence to riſle his ſtudy of certain godly books and writings; amongſt which was his Replication to Morewine's verſes, touching Wincheſter's epitaph, and other arguments both in Latin and Engliſh, written by him againſt the popiſh proceedings, and eſpecially againſt their unnatural and bruti ſh tyranny, executed towards the martyrs of God. When they had thus done, they were not aſhamed to threaten him that they would exhibit the ſame to the council, unleſs he would without delay depart out of their coaſts, and give over the ſchool to a friend of theirs. The truth of this ſtory appeareth in part by a letter written with his own hand, out of priſon, eight days before he was burnt: which, becauſe it is of certain credit, and came to our hands, therefore we are the bolder to avouch it for a truth.

Then was this ſilly young man, for the ſafeguard of his life, forced to depart on a ſudden from Reading, leaving behind him in the hands of his enemies his goods, and one quarter's ſtipend, and ſo he took his journey towards Enſham, where his mother then dwelt, hoping to obtain at her hands certain legacies due to him by his father's laſt will, which he ſhould have received certain years before; and taking his journey by Oxford, he requeſted certain of his friends to accompany him thither. His mother underſtanding his ſtate and errand by Mr. Shipper and his brother (whom he had ſent before to intreat for him) as ſoon as ſhe beheld him on his knees, aſking her bleſſing, as he had been accuſtomed to do: Thou ſhalt, ſaid ſhe, have Chriſt's curſe and mine whereſoever thou goeſt. He pauſing a little, as one amazed at ſo heavy a greeting, at length ſaid, O mother, your own curſe you may give me, which God knoweth I never deſerved, but God's curſe you cannot give me, for he hath already bleſſed me. Nay, ſaid ſhe, thou didſt go from God's bleſſing into the warm ſun, when thou wert baniſhed for an heretic out of that worſhipful houſe in Oxford, and now for the like knavery art driven out of Reading too. Alas, mother, ſaid he, you have been miſinformed. I was not expelled nor driven away, but freely reſigned of mine own accord. And heretic I am none, for I ſtand not ſtubbornly againſt any true doctrine, but defend it to my power. And you may be ſure, they uſe not to expel nor baniſh, but to burn heretics (as they term them). Well, quoth ſhe, I am ſure thou doſt not believe as thy father and I, and all our forefathers have done; but as we were taught by the new law in king Edward's time, which is damnable hereſy.

Indeed I confeſs, ſaid he, that I believe that doctrine which was taught in king Edward's days, which is not hereſy but truth, neither is it new, but as old as Chriſt and his apoſtles. If thou art at that point, ſaid ſhe, I require thee to depart from my houſe, and out of my ſight, and never take me more for thy mother hereafter. As for money and goods I have none of them, thy father bequeathed nought for heretics. Faggots I have to burn thee, more thou getteſt not at my hands. Mother, ſaid he, whereas you have curſed me, I again pray God to bleſs you, and proſper you all your life long. And with like ſoft talk, ſweet words, and abundance of tears trickling down his cheeks, he departed from her, wherewith he ſo mollified her hard heart, that ſhe hurled an old angel [a gold coin, worth about ten ſhillings] after him, and ſaid, Take that to keep thee a true man.

Thus poor Palmer, being deſtitute of worldly friendſhip, and cruelly repelled by her whom he took to have been his ſureſt friend, knew not which way to turn his face.

Soon after, when he had bethought himſelf, it came to his mind to return ſecretly to Magdalen college, upon the aſſured truſt and affiance, that he had a ſecret friend or two in that houſe. At which time, by the ſuit of one Alane Cope, then fellow of the houſe, he obtained letters commendatory from Mr. Cole, preſident there, for his preferment to a ſchool in Glouceſterſhire. So he getteth him away, committed by his friends to God's divine protection, of whom ſome accompanied him as far as Enſham Ferry, and ſome to Burford.

Afterward as he went alone muſing and pondering of matters, it came in his head (as he writeth in an epiſtle to one of his friends) to leave his appointed journey, and to return privately to Reading, truſting there by the help of friends to receive his quarter's ſtipend, and convey his goods to the cuſtody of ſome truſty body. To Reading he cometh, and taketh up his lodging to the Cardinal's Hat, deſiring his hoſteſs inſtantly to aſſign him a cloſe chamber, where he might be alone from all reſort of company. He came not ſo cloſely, but that this viperous generation had knowledge thereof. Wherefore without delay they laid their heads together, and conſulted what way they might moſt ſafely proceed againſt him, to bring their old cankered malice to paſs. And ſoon it was concluded, that one Mr. Hampton (who then bare two faces under one hood, and under the colour of a brother played the part of a diſſembling hypocrite) ſhould reſort to him under the pretence of friendſhip, to feel and fiſh out the cauſe of his repair to Reading.

Palmer, as he was a ſimple man, and without all wrinkles of cloked deceit, opened to him his whole intent. But Hampton earneſtly perſuaded him to the contrary, declaring what danger might enſue if this was attempted. Againſt his counſel Palmer replied very much, and as they waxed hot in talk, Hampton flung away in a fury, and ſaid, As he had fiſhed, ſo he ſhould fowl for him. Palmer not yet ſuſpecting ſuch deviſed miſchief, as by this crooked and peſtiferous generation was now in brewing againſt him, called for his ſupper, and went quietly to bed. But quietly he could not long reſt there. For within a ſhort ſpace after, the officers and their retinue came ruſhing in with lanthorns and bills, requiring him in the king and queen's name to make himſelf ready, and quietly to depart with them: and led him away as a lamb to the ſlaughter, aud committed him to ward, whom the keeper, as a ravening wolf, greedy of his prey, brought down into a vile, ſtinking, and vile dungeon, prepared for thieves and murderers, and there he left him for a time, hanging by the hands and feet in a pair of ſtocks, ſo high, that well-near no part of his body touched the ground. In this cave or dungeon he remained about ten days under the tyranny of this unmerciful keeper.

After this he was brought before the mayor of Reading, and there by the procurement of certain falſe brethren, divers grievous and enormous crimes were laid to his charge, as treaſon, ſedition, ſurmiſed murder, and adultery.

To whom Palmer anſwered, that if ſuch horrible and heinous crimes might be proved againſt him, he would patiently ſubmit himſelf to all kind of torments that could be deviſed. But O ye cruel bloodſuckers (ſaith he) ye follow the old practices of your progenitors, the viperous and wolfiſh generation of phariſees and papiſts: but be ye well aſſured, that God already ſeeth your ſubtle devices and crafty packing, and will not ſuffer the outrageous fury of your venomous tongues and fiery hearts to eſcape unpuniſhed.

All this while no mention was made of hereſy or heretical writings.

Their greateſt proofs againſt him were theſe:

FIRST, That Palmer ſaid, the queen's ſword was not put in her hand to execute tyranny, and to kill and murder the true ſervants of God.

Item, That her ſword was too blunt towards the papiſts, but towards the true chriſtians it was too ſharp.

Item, That certain ſervants of Sir Francis Knolles and others, reſorting to his lectures, had fallen out among themſelves, and were like to have committed murder, and therefore he was a ſower of ſedition, and a procurer of unlawful aſſemblies.

Item, That his hoſteſs had written a letter unto him (which they had intercepted) wherein ſhe required him to return to Reading, and ſent him her commendations, by the token that the knife lay hid under the beam, whereby they gathered that ſhe had conſpired with him to murder her huſband.

Item, That they found him alone with his hoſteſs by the fire-ſide in the hall, the door being ſhut to them forſooth.

When the evidence was given up, the mayor diſmiſſed them, and went to dinner, commanding Palmer to the cage, to make him an open ſpectacle of ignominy to the eyes of the world. It being given out, that he was ſo puniſhed for his evil life and wickedneſs already proved againſt him.

In the afternoon Palmer came to his anſwer, and did ſo mightily and clearly deface their evidence, and defend his own innocency, proving alſo that the ſaid letters were forged by themſelves, that the mayor himſelf was much ſhamed that he had given ſuch credit to them, and ſo much borne with them, ſo that he ſought means how they might convey him out of the country privily.

But here among other things this is not to be paſſed over in ſilence, that one John Galant, a zealous profeſſor of the goſpel, a little after this came to the priſon, and found him ſomewhat better treated than before. When he beheld him, O Palmer, ſaith he, thou haſt deceived divers mens expectation: for we hear that you ſuffer not for righteouſneſs ſake, but for your own demerits.

O brother Galant, ſaith he, theſe be the old practices of that Satanical brood. But be you well aſſured, and God be praiſed for it, I have ſo purged myſelf, and detected their falſhood, that from henceforth I ſhall be no more moleſted therewith. And there having pen and ink, he wrote ſomewhat whereby part of his ſtory here rehearſed is well confirmed. But now to theſe bloody adverſaries.

After this, when they ſaw the matter frame ſo ill-favouredly, fearing that if he ſhould eſcape ſecretly, their doing would tend no leſs to their ſhame and danger, than to the mayor's diſhoneſty: they deviſed a new policy to bring to paſs their long hidden and feſtered malice againſt him, which was by this extreme refuge. For whereas before they were partly aſhamed to accuſe him of hereſy, ſeeing they had been counted earneſt brethren themſelves; and partly afraid, becauſe they had broken up his and committed theft: yet now, leſt their iniquity ſhould have been revealed to the world, they put off all fear and ſhame aſide, and began to rip up the old ſore, the ſcar whereof had been but ſuperficially cured, as you have heard; and ſo to colour their former practices with the pretence of his reformation in religion, they charged him with the writings that they had ſtolen out of his ſtudy.

Thus Palmer was once again called out of the priſon to appear before the mayor, and Bird the official, and two other juſtices, to render an account of his faith before them, and to anſwer to ſuch articles and informations as were laid againſt him. And when they had gathered of his own mouth ſufficient matter to intrap him, they deviſed a certificate, or bill of inſtructions againſt him, to be directed to Dr. Jeffery, who had determined to hold his viſitation the next Tueſday at Newbury, which was the 16th of July. And thus were the falſe witneſſes and bloody accuſers winked at, and the innocent delivered to the lion to be devoured. When it was therefore concluded that Palmer ſhould be ſent over to Newbery, the ſaid letters teſtimonial were conveyed over together with him; the contents whereof ſhall partly appear hereafter; in the mean time I think it good here to rehearſe one example among others, both of charitable affection towards him, and of his modeſty correſpondent to the ſame.

Mr. Rider of Reading, a faithful witneſs of God's truth, hearing how cruelly Palmer had been dealt withal in the priſon, and pined away for lack of neceſſaries, and how evidently he had proved himſelf innocent before the officers of ſuch crimes as were objected againſt him, he ſent to him his ſervant ſecretly the night before his departure to Newbery, with a crooked groat in token of his good heart towards him, requiring him to let him underſtand if he lacked neceſſaries, and he would provide for him. Palmer anſwered, The Lord reward your maſter for his benevolence towards me a miſerable object in this world, and tell him, that (God be praiſed) I lack nothing.

In the morning before they took their journey, Thomas Aſkin, alias Roberts, being fellow-priſoner with him in Chriſt's cauſe, ſitting at breakfaſt, and beholding Palmer very ſad leaning to a window in a corner of the houſe, aſked why he came not to breakfaſt. Becauſe I lack money, ſaid Palmer, to diſcharge the ſhot. Come on man, quoth he, God be praiſed for it, I have enough for us both. Which thing when Mr. Rider heard of, it cannot be expreſſed, how much it grieved him that Palmer had deceived him with ſo modeſt an anſwer.

Thus to Newbery they came on Monday night, and forthwith they were committed to the comfortable hoſtry of the blind houſe, where they found John Guin, their faithful brother in the Lord. Now when they came before the conſiſtory of Dr. Jeffrey, and how Palmer was examined, it doth in part appear by this examination hereunto annexed, which, although it be not perfectly and orderly penned, as the report goeth it was ſpoken, nor perchance altogether in ſuch form of words, yet as exactly as we are able to compact and diſpoſe it, being gathered out of ſeveral notes of Richard Shipper, John Hunt, John Kirry of Newbery, Richard White of Marlborough, who were eye-witneſſes, and preſent at the hearing thereof.

The ſecond Examination of Julius Palmer, at Newbery, in the Hearing of more than three hundred Perſons.

ON the 16th of July, in the year 1556, four or five ſeats were prepared in the choir of the pariſh church of Newbery for the viſitors, whoſe names here enſue. Dr. Jeffrey for the biſhop of Sarum, Sir Richard Abridges knight, and then high ſheriff of the county, Sir William Ramsford, knight, John Winchcomb, eſquire, and the parſon of Inglefield. After the priſoners were preſented, the commiſſion read, and other things done in order accordingly, Dr. Jeffrey called to Palmer, and ſaid, Art thou that jolly writer of three-half-penny books that we hear of?

Palmer. I know not what you mean.

Jeffrey. Have you taught Latin ſo long, that now you underſtand not Engliſh?

To this he anſwered nothing.

Then Dr. Jeffrey ſtanding up, ſaid, We have received certain writings and articles againſt you, from the right worſhipful the mayor of Reading, and other juſtices, whereby we underſtand, that being convented before them, you were convict of certain hereſies.

Firſt, That you deny the ſupremacy of the pope's holineſs.

Secondly, That there are but two ſacraments.

Thirdly, That the prieſt ſheweth up an idol at maſs; and therefore you went to no maſs, ſince your firſt coming to Reading.

Fourthly, That there is no purgatory.

Laſt of all, That you be a ſower of ſedition, and have ſought to divide the unity of the queen's ſubjects.

Sheriff. You were beſt ſee what he will ſay to his own handy-work.

Jeffrey. Ye ſay truth. Tell me, Palmer, art thou he that wrote this fair volume? Look upon it.

Palmer. I wrote it indeed, and gathered it out of the ſcripture.

Jeffrey. Is this doggiſh rhime yours alſo? Look.

Palmer. I wrote this, I deny not.

Jeffrey. And what ſay you to theſe Latin verſes, entituled Epicedion, &c. Are they yours too?

Palmer. Yea, Sir.

Jeffrey. Art thou not aſhamed to affirm it? it came of no good ſpirit, that thou didſt both rail at the dead, and ſlander a learned and catholic man yet alive.

Palmer. If it be a ſlander, he hath ſlandered himſelf: for I do but report his own writing, and open the folly therein declared. And I reckon it not railing to inveigh againſt Annas and Caiaphas being dead.

Jeffrey. Sayeſt thou ſo? I will make thee recant it, and wring Peccavi out of thy lying lips, ere I have done with thee.

Palmer. But I know, that although of myſelf I be able to do nothing, yet if you, and all mine enemies, both bodily and ghoſtly, ſhould do your worſt, you ſhall not be able to bring that to paſs, neither ſhall ye prevail againſt God's mighty Spirit, by whom we underſtand the truth, and ſpeak it ſo boldly.

Jeffrey. Ah, are you full of the Spirit? Are you inſpired with the Holy Ghoſt?

Palmer. Sir, no man can believe, but by the inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt. Therefore, if I were not a ſpiritual man, and inſpired with God's Holy Spirit, I were not a true Chriſtian [Qui Spiritum Chriſtum non habet, hic non eſt ejus] that is, He that hath not the Spirit of Chriſt is none of his.

Jeffrey. I perceive you lack no words.

Palmer. Chriſt hath promiſed not only to give us ſtore of words neceſſary, but with them, ſuch force of matter, as the gates of hell ſhall not be able to confound, or prevail againſt it.

Jeffrey. Chriſt made ſuch a promiſe to his apoſtles, I hope you will not compare yourſelf with them.

Palmer. With the holy apoſtles I may not compare, neither have I any affiance in mine own wit and learning, which I know is but ſmall: yet this promiſe I am certain pertaineth to all ſuch as are appointed to defend God's truth againſt his enemies, in the time of their perſecution for the ſame.

Jeffrey. Then it pertaineth not to thee.

Palmer. Yes, I am right well aſſured, that through his grace it appertaineth at this preſent to me, as it ſhall (I doubt not) appear, if you give me leave to diſpute with you you before this audience, in defence of all that I have there written.

Jeffrey. Thou art but a beardleſs boy, yeſterday an upſtart out of the ſchools, and dareſt thou preſume to offer diſputation, or to encounter with a doctor?

Palmer. Remember Mr. Doctor, "The Spirit breatheth where it pleaſeth him, &c." And again, "Out of the mouth of babes haſt thou ordained ſtrength." And in another place, "Thou haſt hid theſe things from the wiſe and prudent, and haſt revealed them unto babes." God is not tied to time, wit, learning, place nor perſon. And although your wit and learning is greater than mine; yet your belief in the truth, and zeal to defend the ſame, is no greater than mine.

Regiſter, Sir if you ſuffer him thus impudently to trifle with you, he will never have done.

Jeffrey. Well, ye ſhall underſtand, that I have it not in commiſſion at this preſent to diſpute with you, neither were it meet that we ſhould call again into queſtion ſuch articles as are already diſcuſſed, and perfectly defined by our mother the holy church, whom we ought to believe without why or wherefore, as the creed telleth us. But the cauſe why ye be now called hither, is that ye might be examined upon ſuch articles as are adminiſtered againſt you, and ſuch matter as is here contained, in your hand-writing, that ye may be ſeen whether you will ſtand to it, or nay. How ſaw you to this?

Palmer. By your holy church you mean the ſynagogue of Rome, which is not univerſal, but a particular church of ſhavelings. The catholic church I believe, yet not for her own ſake, but becauſe ſhe is holy, that it to ſay, a church that grounded her belief upon the word of her ſpouſe Chriſt.

Jeffrey. Leave railing, and anſwer me directly to my queſtion. Will you ſtand to your writing, or will you not.

Palmer. If you prove any ſentence therein comprized not to ſtand with God's word, I will preſently recant it.

Jeffrey. Thou impudent fellow, have I not told thee, that I came not to diſpute with thee, but to examine thee?

Here the parſon of Inglefield pointing to the Pyx, ſaid, What ſeeſt thou yonder.

Palmer. A conopy of ſilk broidered with gold.

Parſon. Yea, but what is within it?

Palmer. A piece of bread in a clout, I ſuppoſe.

Parſon. Thou art as froward an heretic as ever I talked withal.

Here was much ſpoken of Confiteor, and other parts of the maſs.

Parſon. Do you not believe that they which receive the holy ſacrament of the altar, do truly eat Chriſt's natural body?

Palmer. If the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper be adminiſtered as Chriſt did ordain it, the faithful receivers do indeed ſpiritually and truly eat and drink in it Chriſt's very natural body and blood.

Parſon. The faithful receivers? Ye cannot blear our eyes with ſuch ſophiſtry. Do not all manner of receivers, good and bad, faithful and unfaithful, receive the very natural body in form of bread?

Palmer. No, Sir.

Parſon. How prove you that?

Palmer. By this place, He that eateth me ſhall live for me.

Parſon. See that fond fellow, whilſt he taketh himſelf to be a doctor of the law, you ſhall ſee me prove him a ſtark fooliſh daw. Do you not read likewiſe, Whoſoever invocateth the name of the Lord ſhall be ſaved? Ergo, Do none but the godly call upon him? Therefore you muſt mark how St. Paul anſwereth you. He ſaith, that the wicked do eat the true body to their condemnation.

As Palmer was bent to anſwer him at the full, the parſon interrupted him, crying ſtill, what ſayeſt thou to St. Paul?

Palmer. I ſay that St. Paul hath no ſuch words.

Parſon. See, the impudent fellow denieth the plain text: He that eateth and drinketh the body of the Lord unworthily, is guilty of judgment.

Palmer. I beſeech you lend me your book.

Parſon. Not ſo.

The Sheriff. I pray you lend him your book.

So the book was given over to him.

Palmer. Your own book hath, [Qui manducat hunc panem, &c.] He that eateth this bread.

Parſon. But St. Jerome's tranſlation hath [Corpus] Body.

Palmer. Not ſo, Mr. Parſon, and God be praiſed that I have in the mean ſeaſon ſhut up your lips with your own book.

Jeffrey. It is no matter whether ye write Bread or Body, for we be able to prove that he meant the Body. And whereas you ſay, they eat it ſpiritually, that is but a blind ſhift of deſcant.

Palmer. What ſhould I ſay elſe?

Jeffrey. As holy church ſaith, really, carnally, ſubſtantially.

Palmer. And with as good ſcripture, I may ſay groſly or monſtrouſly.

Jeffrey. Thou ſpeakeſt wickedly. But tell me, Is Chriſt preſent in the ſacrament or no?

Palmer. He is preſent.

Jeffrey. How is he preſent?

Palmer. The doctors ſay, [Modo ineffabili] in a manner not to be expreſſed. Therefore why do ye aſk me? Would God ye had a mind ready to believe it, or I a tongue able to expreſs it unto you.

Jeffrey. What ſay you to the baptiſm of infants?

Palmer, I ſay that it ſtandeth with God's word, and therefore ought of neceſſity to be retained in the church.

Jeffrey. Ye have forgotten yourſelf I believe, for ye write that children may be ſaved without it.

Palmer. So I write, and ſo I ſay.

Jeffrey. Then it is not neceſſary to be frequented and continued in the church.

Palmer. Your argument is not good, Mr. Doctor.

Jeffrey. Will you ſtand to it?

Palmer. Yea, Mr. Doctor, God willing.

Jeffrey. Note it, regiſter.

More of his examination in that time and place is not yet come to our hands; whenſoever God ſendeth it, I will impart and communicate the ſame to the reader. In the mean ſeaſon we are credibly informed of this, that Sir Richard Abridges, the ſame day after dinner, ſent for him to his lodging, and there, in the preſence of divers perſons yet alive in Newbery and elſewhere, friendly exhorted him to revoke his opinion, to ſpare his young years, wit and learning. If thou wilt be conformable, and ſhew thyſelf corrigible and repentant, in good faith, ſaid he, I promiſe thee before this company, I will give thee meat and drink, and books, and ten pound yearly, ſo long as thou wilt dwell with me. And if thou wilt ſet thy mind to marriage, I will procure thee a wife and a farm, and help to furniſh and fit thy farm for thee. How ſayeſt thou?

Palmer thanked him very courteouſly, and made him further anſwer concerning his religion ſomewhat at large, but very modeſtly and reverently; concluding in the end, that as he had already in two places renounced his living for Chriſt's ſake, ſo he would with God's grace be ready to ſurrender and yield up his life alſo for the ſame, when God ſhould ſend time.

When Sir Richard perceived that he would by no means relent: Well Palmer, ſaith he, then I perceive one of us twain ſhall be damned. For we be of two faiths, faiths, and certain I am there is but one faith that leadeth to life and ſalvation.

Palmer. O Sir, I hope that we both ſhall be ſaved.

Sir Richard. How may that be?

Palmer. Right well, Sir. For as it hath pleaſed our merciful Saviour, according to the goſpel's parable, to call me at the third hour of the day, even in my flowers, at the age of four and twenty years, even ſo I truſt he hath called, and will call you at the eleventh hour of this your old age, and give you everlaſting life for your portion.

Sir Richard. Sayſt thou ſo? Well, Palmer, well, I would I might have thee but one month in my houſe, I doubt not but I would convert thee, or thou ſhould'ſt convert me.

Then ſaid Mr. Winchcomb, Take pity on thy golden years, and pleaſant flowers of luſty youth, before it be too late.

Palmer. Sir, I long for thoſe ſpringing flowers, that ſhall never fade away.

Winchcomb. If thou be at that point, I have done with thee.

Then was Palmer commanded again to the Blind-houſe, but the other two men were led again the ſame afternoon to the conſiſtory, and there were condemed, and delivered to the ſecular power of the ſheriff there preſent, Sir Richard Abridges.

It is reported alſo, that Dr. Jeffrey offered Palmer a good living if he would outwardly ſhew himſelf conformable, keeping his conſcience ſecret to himſelf, or at leaſt declare that he doubted which was the trueſt doctrine. But I cannot affirm it for a ſurety.

The next morning the 16th of July, Palmer was required to ſubſcribe to certain articles, which they had drawn out, touching the cauſe of his condemnation; In the front whereof, were heaped together many heinous terms, as horrible, heretical, damnable, deviliſh, and execrable doctrine. To theſe words Palmer refuſed to ſubſcribe, affirming that the doctrine which he profeſſed, was not ſuch, but good and ſound doctrine.

Jeffrey. Ye may ſee, good people, what ſhifts theſe heretics ſeek, to eſcape burning, when they ſee juſtice adminiſtered unto them. But I tell thee, this ſtyle is agreeable to the law, and therefore I cannot alter it.

Palmer. Then I cannot ſubſcribe to it.

Jeffrey. Wilt thou then crave mercy, if thou likeſt not juſtice, and revoke thy hereſy?

Palmer. I forſake the pope and his popelings, with all popiſh hereſy.

Jeffrey. Then ſubſcribe to articles.

Palmer. Alter the Epithethons, and I will ſubſcribe.

Jeffrey. Subſcribe, and qualify the matter with thine own pen. So he ſubſcribed. Whereupon Dr. Jeffrey proceeded to read the popiſh ſentence of his cruel condemnation, and ſo was he delivered to the charge of the ſecular power, and was burnt the ſame day in the afternoon, about five of the clock.

Within one hour before they went to the place of execution, Palmer, in the preſence of many people, comforted his companions with theſe words. Brethren, ſaid he, be of good cheer in the Lord, and faint not. Remember the words of our Saviour Chriſt, where he ſaith, "Happy are you when men revile you and perſecute you for righteouſneſs ſake. Rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven. Fear not them that kill the body, and be not able to touch the ſoul. God is faithful, and will not ſuffer us to be tempted further than we ſhall be able to bear it." We ſhall not end our lives in the fire, but make a change for a better life. Yea for coals, we ſhall receive pearls. For God's Holy Spirit certifieth our ſpirit, that he hath even now prepared for us a ſweet ſupper in heaven for his ſake who ſuffered firſt for us.

With theſe and ſuch like words, he did not only comfort the hearts of his weak brethren that were with him appointed as ſheep to be ſlain, but alſo wreſted out plentiful tears from the eyes of many that heard him. And as they were ſinging a pſalm, came Sir Richard Abridges the ſheriff, and the bailiffs of the town, with a great company of armed men, to conduct them to the fire. When they were come to the place appointed for their ſuffering, they all three fell to the ground, and Palmer, with an audible voice pronounced the 31ſt pſalm, but the other two made their prayers ſecretly to Almighty God.

And as Palmer began to ariſe, there came behind him two popiſh prieſts, exhorting him yet to recant and ſave his ſoul. Palmer anſwered and ſaid, Away, away, tempt me no longer. Away, I ſay, from me all ye that work iniquity; for the Lord hath heard the voice of my tears. And ſo forthwith they put off their raiment, and went to the ſtake and kiſſed it. And when they were bound to the poſt, Palmer ſaid, Good people, pray for us, that we may perſevere to the end. And for Chriſt's ſake beware of popiſh teachers for they deceive you.

As he ſpake this, a ſervant of one of the bailiffs threw a faggot at his face, that the blood guſhed out in divers places. At which the ſheriff was very angry, and called him a cruel tormentor, and with his walking-ſtaff broke his head, that the blood likewiſe ran down about his ears. When the fire was kindled, and began to take hold upon their bodies, they lifted up their hands towards heaven, and quietly and cheerfully, as though they had felt no ſmart, they cried, Lord Jeſus ſtrengthen us, Lord Jeſus aſſiſt us, Lord receive our ſouls. And ſo they continued without any ſtruggling, holding up their hands, and knocking their hearts, and calling upon Jeſus until they had ended their mortal lives.

It was very remarkable that when their three heads by force of their devouring flames were fallen together in a lump, inſomuch that the ſpectators thought they were all certainly dead, Palmer, as a man awaked out of ſleep, moved his tongue and jaws, and was heard to pronounce this word Jesus. So being diſſolved into aſhes, he yielded to God as joyful a ſoul (confirmed with the ſweet promiſes of Chriſt) as any one that ever was called beſide to ſuffer for his bleſſed name. God grant us all to be moved with the like Spirit, working in our hearts conſtantly to ſtand in defence and confeſſion of Chriſt's holy goſpel to the end, Amen.

On the Martyrdom of Julius Palmer.

WHILST for Chriſt's Sake, Palmer endures the Flame,
Like the famed Tree that bears this Hero's Name,
Which higher ſhoots the more they it oppreſs,
The ſtrengthened Flames his ſtronger Faith confeſs.
Henceforth amidſt the heavenly Hoſts he'll bear
That Palm of Righteouſneſs he died for here.

The Juſt ſhall flouriſh as the Palm-Tree.

A memorable Story of Agnes Wardall in the Town of Ipſwich, perſecuted for the true Faith of Chriſt's Goſpel.

ABOUT the month of July, in this preſent year, 1559, there was one Richard Argentine, alias Sexten, a doctor of phyſic, with certain others dwelling in the town of Ipſwich, not many in number, but maliciouſly bent upon the deſtruction of the goſpel, and the favourers of the ſame. Among whom were Philip Ulmes, Edmund Leach, John Steward, and Matthew Butler, apothecary, a curious ſinging-man, a fine player on the organs, a perfect papiſt, and a diligent perſecutor of good men. This Butler being then conſtable in the the town of Ipſwich, as he was on the watch by night upon Cornhill, Dr. Argentine came to him in great haſte, giving him intelligence of one Agnes Wardall, being then lately come home to her houſe in Ipſwich. Whereupon immediately ſuch a way was contrived between them, that the ſaid Agnes Wardall forthwith ſhould be apprehended: but God, in whoſe providence the direction of all things conſiſteth, by whoſe diſpoſition they have their operation, ſo graciouſly provided for his ſervant, and ſo prevented their malignant devices, that they came to nought, notwithſtanding all their zeal and diligence; as by the further relation of the ſtory you ſhall find.

This Agnes Wardall was a woman that lived in God's fear, and defied the popiſh traſh, deſiring rather with hard fare and bad lodging to be abroad, than to be at home in her houſe, and among the tents of the ungodly: her huſband alſo being a man living in the fear of God, and for the teſtimony of his conſcience being alſo hunted, by force of the law was conſtrained to avoid his houſe, and got into a crayer with an honeſt man, ſerving as a ſailor, an occupation which till now he had been a ſtranger to, and alſo what rendered him the more incapable was his having a ſtumped foot, which prevented his ready climbing to top and yard; yet it pleaſed God to enable him with ſtrength that he did good ſervice, as they can well witneſs that were of his company.

The ſaid Agnes Wardall happened one day to come home to her houſe to ſee her poor children, who were under the management of a young maid, and being eſpied, the news was ſoon brought to Dr. Argentine, who immediately went to the conſtable, the apothecary as aforeſaid, and told him what a notable cure was to be wrought on Wardall's wife in the apprehending of her. Which was more like to ſpeed than miſs, had not the good province of God otherwiſe ordered it.

The watch was ſpeedily charged, and each company ſent to its place. Argentine and the conſtable took a good number with them, and forth they went to the houſe of this poor woman to lay hands upon her, which they beſet on both ſides, ſome lying in the open fields, and others were ſent to the houſe of Wardall's mother, which was not far from his houſe. This done one knocked at the ſtreet-door where Argentine and Butler were with one of their weapons, and no anſwer was made; the ſecond time ſomewhat harder, but had no anſwer. In the mean time they fearing that ſome conveyance was made, knocked the third time harder than before.

There was not far from the door where they knocked, a certain day-window, where one might look out and ſpeak: and ſo at the third knocking, a woman who at that time was tenant to Robert Wardall's mother, and had but two nights before lain in the houſe, ſpeaking out hard by their ears, aſked who was there?

Ah ſirrah, ſaid Argentine, are you ſo nigh and will not ſpeak? How fortuned it that ye ſpake not at the firſt, being ſo nigh?

How fortuned it? ſaid the woman; marry I ſhall tell you: I am but a ſtranger here, and I have heard ſay, that there be ſpirits walking hereabout, which if a man do anſwer at the firſt call or ſecond, he ſtands in great danger, and I was never ſo afraid in my life. At this her anſwer they laughed, and commanded her to open the door in the queen's name, for they were the queen's watch.

Agnes Wardall being at that time in bed in an inner chamber, having her maid with her, and her two children, ſhe being at that time very heavy aſleep, heard not the knocking. Her maid hearing at the ſecond knock, called and jogged her dame, and with much ado awaked her, and ſaid, The watch is at the door. What, thou lyeſt, ſaid ſhe. Yes truly, ſaid the maid, and hath knocked twice. With that ſhe aroſe with all ſpeed, and put on her cloaths very ſlightly, and took with her a buckram apron, which afterward ſhe caſt on her head when ſhe was fain to creep in a ditch with nettles, and ſo paſſed down into a parlour, wherein ſtood a cupboard with a fair preſs, into which the maid did lock her.

And immediately went up to a chamber which was hard by the ſtreet, where ſhe might ſee and ſpeak to the watch, and ſaid, Who is there? Then they bade her open the door. And ſhe ſaid, We have no candle. And they ſaid, Open the door, or we will lay it on the floor. With that ſhe came down and opened the door. Then aſked they the maid, who is within? And ſhe ſaid, None but a woman that dwelleth with us, and two children. Then ſaid they, Where is thy dame? Truly, ſaid ſhe, I cannot tell, ſhe is not within. She was here in the evening, ſaid they. Yea, ſaid the maid, but ſhe went forth I know not whither. Notwithſtanding they charged her that ſhe knew where ſhe was, which ſhe denied. Then got they a candle lighted at one of the neighbour's houſes, and came in, and in the entry met the woman which had anſwered them at the window, and ſaid ſhe was afraid of ſpirits. Argentine looking upon her, clapped her on the back, and ſaid, Thou art not the woman whom we ſeek for.

So they entered the houſe, and ſearched a parlour next the ſtreet where the women lay which was his mother's tenant, and a young child that ſucked on her breaſt, and not only in the bed, but alſo under bed, behind the painted cloaths, and in the chimney, and up into the chimney; and finding the bed hot, ſaid, Who lay here in the bed? The woman ſaid, I and the child. And none elſe? quoth they. No, ſaid the woman. When they could find nothing there for their purpoſe, from thence they went into an inner parlour, in which ſtood the cupboard wherein ſhe was, and ſearched the parlour, which was but a little one. And one of the company laying his hand on the cupboard, ſaid, This is a fair cupboard, ſhe may be here for any thing that is done. That is true, ſaid another of them. Notwithſtanding they looked no farther, but went from that into the chamber above, wherein the ſaid Agnes had lain with her maid and children, with all other rooms and chambers.

At length they came down into the yard, where they found a horſe tied at a pale eating of ſhorn graſs. Then aſked they the maid, Whoſe horſe is this? She anſwered, It is her horſe indeed, and ſhe came in before night, and went abroad again, but I know not whither. Then were they in good hope to find their prey, and beſtirred them with ſpeed, and went into an out-chamber that was in the yard, in which was a boy in bed of twelve or fourteen years old. And being in his dead ſleep, they ſuddenly awaked him and examined him for his dame. Who anſwered, He knew not where ſhe was; and unto that ſtood firmly, although their threats were vehement, not only to the poor ſilly boy, but alſo to the good ſimple plain maid. Then they cauſed him to ariſe and dreſs him, and ſent both maid and boy up to the cage, where they put the maid, but kept the boy among their truſty ſoldiers, ſo that one of them ſhould not ſpeak with another.

Now while ſome were on the corn-hill, and others ſearching the neighbours houſes, and backſides, the wife of Wardall being in the preſs faſt locked up, and almoſt ſmothered for want of breath, deſired the woman her mother's tenant, when ſhe heard her in the parlour, to let her out. She aſked her where the keys were, who anſwered, they were in a hamper, which ſhe found, and endeavoured to unlock the preſs, but could not, though ſhe tried a long time. Then ſhe deſired her to break it open; for (ſaid ſhe) I had rather fall into their hands, than to kill myſelf. Then ſhe ſought for her huſband's hammer and chiſſel, but could not find them, to break it open withal, and came again and told her ſhe could find nothing for the purpoſe.

Then, ſaid ſhe, try once more, for I truſt God will give power to open it. And being within in great extremity, ſhe heartily prayed to God, who heard her prayer, and helped her: for at the firſt turn of the key it opened eaſily. When ſhe came out, ſhe looked as pale and as bleak as if ſhe had been dead and laid out, and as ſhe herſelf looked afterwards when ſhe was really dead, as the ſame woman reported who then let her out, and was alſo at her death long after in queen Elizabeth's reign, and ſhe was all in a violent ſweat like drops of rain.

Then ſhe went out into the backſide, where, towards the fields, were pales fixed for the defence of the garden, one or two of which being looſe, both ſhe and her huſband had often gone out and came in that way, out ſhe got into the fields, and paſſing one little field, and over a ſtile, ſhe hid herſelf in a deep ditch full of nettles, and covered her head with the buckram apron beforementioned, and ſo crept low, and lay in the ditch. After long ſearch to no purpoſe in the town, ſome of the watch returned again to the field's ſide; among whom was one George Manning, and John Bate the crier of the ſame town, coming together. This Manning was an honeſt plain man, but Bate a very enemy, and one that in queen Mary's time would have been a prieſt, as it was reported, if he had not been married.

Manning eſpying where ſhe lay, gave a Hem, and made a noiſe with his bill, he being before Bate; at which ſhe lay ſtill, at laſt they departed to the ſtreet ſide to the conſtable. All this time the maid was in the cage, and the boy with the reſt of the watch until perfect day-light. Then went they up and let out the maid, and ſent her home, and the boy alſo; but they made the maid believe they had found her dame. Who anſwered, If ye have her, keep her faſt.

On the morrow Manning ſent her word to beware that ſhe hid herſelf no more ſo near.

Thus by the might and power of God was his faithful ſervant delivered from their cruelty, and they known to be his adverſaries, not only at that time, but divers times before and after. Notwithſtanding, the ſaid Argentine, at his firſt coming to Ipſwich, came in a ſerving-man's coat. And then being in the days of king Henry the eighth, he would accuſtomably uſe the reading of lectures himſelf; in which he was well commended at that time. Afterwards he obtained the office of uſher of the free grammar ſchool, and the maſter dying, got to be maſter himſelf. And being married to a very honeſt woman remained there the days of king Edward; and when God took him from us for our juſt deſerved plague, and queen Mary came to the crown, none more hot in all popery and ſuperſtition than he, painting the poſts of the town with Vivat Regina Maria, and in every corner.

Furthermore, after the death of his wife (who was an honeſt woman) he was made a prieſt, taking upon him divers times to preach (but never without his white minerver-hood) ſuch doctrine as was ſhamful to hear, ſaying maſs, and carrying about the Pyx in high proceſſions. Furthermore, leading the boy S. Nicholas with his minerver-hood about the ſtreets for apples and belly-cheer. And whoſo would not receive him he made them heretics, and ſuch alſo as would not give his faggot to the bonfire for queen Mary's child. And thus continued he at Ipſwich the moſt part of queen Mary's days, moleſting their good men, ſome for not going to the church, ſome for not being confeſſed, ſome for not receiving, &c. till at length, toward the end of queen Mary's reign he came to London, and in queen Elizabeth's time began to ſhew himſelf again a perfect proteſtant. And thus much of the famous Dr. Argentine.

The Trouble of Peter Moon and his Wife, and of other godly Proteſtants, at Biſhop Hopton's Viſitation at Ipſwich.

IN the year 1556, a viſitation was held by Dr. Hopton, then biſhop of Norwich, and Miles Dunnings his chancellor, at Ipſwich in Suffolk, where divers godly proteſtants, through the accuſation of evil men, were much troubled; among whom were Peter Moon, a taylor, and his wife: they were accuſed of diſobedience to the law, in not coming to church, and refuſing to partake of ſuch Romiſh obſervances as at that time were uſed.

And firſt the ſaid Peter Moon was commanded to come before the biſhop, where he was examined of three ſeveral articles, viz. 1, Whether the pope were ſupreme head. 2. Whether king Philip and Mary were right heirs to the crown. 3. And whether in the ſacrament of the altar was the very body of Chriſt ſubſtantially and really there preſent.

Unto which the ſaid Peter Moon being timorous and weak, fearing more the face of man than the heavy wrath of God, affirmed, and in a manner granted unto their demands. Whereupon the biſhop being in good hope, that although he had not come to church, nor received the ſacrament of the altar, nor been ready to do his duty as the law had commanded, yet there ſhewing his mind, ſaid, that he liked the man well: for ſuch as have been, ſaid he, earneſt in evil things, will alſo be earneſt in that that is good and godly, if once they be won.

Thus as the ſpiritual father was commanding his carnal child, and rather preferring him to hell fire, than unto the ſincere word and commandments of God, it happened amongſt many others in the chamber, was one of the portmen of the ſame town, named Smart, an earneſt member of their Romiſh law, doing of a very good conſcience what he did, who after the death of queen Mary lived not many years, but rendered his life in godly repentance, proteſting that if God ſhould ſuffer him to live, he would never be the man he had been before, what laws ſoever ſhould come again: ſo that before the time of his ſickneſs he frequenting earneſtly the ſermons in the ſame town, made by divers godly learned men, would weep as it had been a child, being notwithſtanding of courage as ſtout as any man in Ipſwich, Such is the marvellous mercy of God in calling to his kingdom, whom, and when he pleaſeth.

This portman aforeſaid, perceiving the biſhop thus, as it were at an end with the ſaid Moon, and ſo he like to be diſcharged, ſaid unto the biſhop, My lord, I have a good opinion of the man, and that he will be conformable: but my lord, he hath a perilous woman to his wife. For I will tell you, my lord, ſhe never came to church yet ſince the queen's reign, except it were at even-ſong, or when ſhe was churched, and not then till maſs were done. Wherefore your good lordſhip might do a good deed to cauſe her to come before you, and to ſee if you could do any good. And therefore I beſeech your good lordſhip to command him to pray her to come before your lordſhip.

At which words Moon was ſomewhat moved, in that he ſaid, Command him to pray her to come before your lordſhip. And he ſaid unto him, Under my lord's correction I ſpeak, I am as able to command her to come before my lord, as ye are to command the worſt boy in your houſe. Yea, my lord, ſaid the other, I cry your lordſhip mercy: I have informed your lordſhip with an untruth, if this be ſo. But if he be ſo able as he ſaith, he might have commanded her to have come to church in all this time, if it had pleaſed him. Well, ſaid the biſhop, look you come before me at the afternoon, and bring your wife with you; I will talk with her.

As

As my lord's dinner at this time was ſerving up, Moon departed, and tarried not to take part thereof, having ſuch an hard breakfaſt given him before to digeſt. At afternoon Moon delayed and waited his time, bethinking when he might moſt conveniently come, eſpecially when his accuſer and his wife's ſhould not have been there. And according to the commandment came with his wife, which was not ſo ſecretly done, but his accuſer had knowledge thereof, and came with all expedition in ſuch poſt-ſpeed, that he was in a manner breathleſs when he entered the biſhop's chamber.

The biſhop hearing that Moon and his wife were come, called for them, and ſaid to Moon, Is this your wife, Moon? Yea, my lord, ſaid he. O good Lord, ſaid the biſhop, how a man may be deceived in a woman! I promiſe you a man would take her for as honeſt a woman, by all outward appearance as can be. Why, my lord, ſaid Moon's wife, I truſt there is none that can charge me with any diſhoneſty, as concerning my body; I defy all the world in that reſpect.

Nay, quoth the biſhop, I mean not as concerning the diſhoneſty of thy body: but thou hadſt been better to have given the uſe of thy body unto twenty ſundry men, than to do as thou haſt done. For thou haſt done as much as in thee lieth, to pluck the king and the queen's majeſties out of their royal ſeats through thy diſobedience, in ſhewing thyſelf an open enemy unto God's laws, and their proceedings.

Then the biſhop began to examine the ſaid Moon again with the aforeſaid articles, and his wife alſo. And ſhe hearing her huſband relent, did alſo affirm the ſame, which turned to their great trouble of mind afterward; but yet neither were they like thus to eſcape, but that in the mean time Dunning the biſhop's chancellor came up in great haſte, and brought news to the biſhop, that there were ſuch a number of heretics come, of which ſome came from Boxford, ſome from Lanham, and about from the cloth-country, that it would make a man out of his wits to hear them: and there are among them both heretics and anabaptiſts, ſaid he. And thus Doctor Dunning with his bluſtering words interrupting Moon's examination, went down again, as the devil had driven him, to keep his ſtir among them, and to take order what ſhould be done with them.

The biſhop beginning to bewail the ſtate of the country, in that it was ſo infected with ſuch a number of heretics, and rehearſing partly their opinions to thoſe that were at that time in the chamber, Moon's wife had a young child which ſhe nurſed herſelf, and the child being brought into the yard under the biſhop's chamber, cried; ſo that ſhe heard it; and then ſaid, My lord, I truſt ye have done with me. My child crieth beneath, I muſt go give my child ſuck, with ſuch like words. And the biſhop being (as it were) out of wind to talk with them any more, ſaid, Go your way, I will talk with you in the morning; look ye, be here again in the morning: with this they both departed.

And beneath in the ſtone-hall of the ſame houſe, the chancellor Dunning being very buſy about his bloody buſineſs, eſpied Moon and his wife coming, and muſt needs paſs by the place where he ſtood, and ſaid: Nay, ſoft, I muſt talk with you both; for ye are as evil as any that are here to-day. To whom Moon's wife anſwered, My lord hath had us in examination, and therefore ye ſhall have nought to do with us. Nay, quoth he, ye ſhall not ſo eſcape, I muſt talk with you alſo. Unto whom Moon anſwered, In the preſence of the greater, the leſs hath no power: my lord hath taken order with us, and therefore we are as his lordſhip hath appointed, and muſt repair again before him to-morrow. At which he let them go, although he was earneſtly importuned by the party above ſpecified to have ſhewed his quality, which was nothing elſe than tyranny.

So departed Moon and his wife without hurt of body: but afterwards when they, with Peter the apoſtle, beheld the face of Chriſt, they were ſore wounded in their conſciences, aſhamed of their doings, and alſo at the door of deſperation. Inſomuch that when he came home to his houſe, and entering into a parlour alone by himſelf, conſidering his eſtate, and ſeeing where a ſword of his did hang againſt a wall, he was earneſtly allured by the enemy Satan to have taken it down, and therewith to have ſlain himſelf: but God, who caſteth not away the penitent ſinner repenting his fall with a ſincere heart, defended his unworthy ſervant from that temptation, and hath (I truſt) left him to the amendment of life by the aſſiſtance of his Holy Spirit, and to make him one among the elect that ſhall be ſaved.

The morrow they both remained and kept houſe with no ſmall grief of conſcience, waiting and looking with fear when to be ſent for to the biſhop, rather than offering their diligence to keep the biſhop's appointment: but God ſo wrought, that when the time drew near that they feared the biſhop's call, the bells rung for his departure out of town. For which they were not only glad, but alſo many a good heart in Ipſwich rejoiced, and gave thanks to God. God for his mercy grant that our ſin may never deſerve to provoke God's anger, leſt the like days may come again. And if they ſo do, God make them, with all other weaklings, ſtrong and worthy ſoldiers to encounter with the ghoſtly enemies, the world, the fleſh, and the devil; and boldly to ſtand to the confeſſion of Chriſt, and of his goſpel, ſaying with the apoſtles, "Whether it be right in the ſight of God, that we ſhould obey you more than God, judge ye?"

A tragical and moſt lamentable Hiſtory, full of cruel and tyrannical Murder, done upon three Women and an Infant, viz. the Mother, her two Daughters, and the Child, in the Iſle of Garnſey, July the 18th, 1556.

OF all the ſingular and tragical hiſtories in this book, nothing can be more barbarous, if any thing can come up to the inhumanity of this execution upon three women and one infant, whoſe names be theſe following;

Katherine Cawches, the mother.
Guillemine Gilbert, the daughter.
Perotine Maſſey, the other daughter.
An infant, the ſon of Perotine.

Before I come to the ſtory itſelf, it will be neceſſary, for the better explaining of it, to relate the circumſtances from whence this cruelty did originally ſpring, which was as followeth.

The 17th day of May, in the year 1556, in the iſle of Garnſey (which is a member of England) in a town there called St. Peter's Port, was a naughty woman, named Vincent Goſſet, who being evil diſpoſed, went (the day aforeſaid) to the houſe of one Nicholas le Conronney, dwelling in the town of the ſaid St. Peter's Port, about ten of the clock at night, and there taking the key of the houſe (lying under the door) entered into a chamber toward the ſtreet, where ſhe eſpying a cup of ſilver within a cupboard, took it away, and ſo conveyed herſelf out of the houſe again. Who immediately after this fact was done (whether by counſel or by what occaſion elſe I know not) brought the cup to the aboveſaid Perotine Maſſey, an honeſt woman, dwelling in the ſaid town, deſiring her to lend her ſix-pence upon the ſame.

Perotine ſeeing the cup, and ſuſpecting (as the truth was) the ſame to be ſtolen, anſwered, that ſhe would not take it: yet nevertheleſs, having knowledge of the owner thereof, took it to reſtore it again to whom it did belong; and to the end ſhe ſhould not carry it to another, gave her ſix-pence then preſently. Where moreover is to be noted, that Thomas Effart ſaith and teſtifieth, that knowledge was given by the ſaid Perotine to Conronney, touching the ſtealing of this piece, who ſoon upon the miſliking thereof, attached the ſaid Vincent Goſſet of the treſpaſs; who being apprehended and examined upon the ſame, immediately confeſſed the fact, deſiring to have one ſent with her (which was Collas de Loutre) with ſix-pence to fetch the cup again, which he accordingly did.

The next day following, the king's officers being informed of the premiſes by one Nicholas Cary, of the ſaid town, conſtable, aſſembled the juſtices there to enquire and examine further, as well upon the fact of Vincent Goſſet, as upon other griefs and things there amiſs. So that after declaration made by the officers and conſtable before the juſtice, for that the ſaid conſtable did report to have found a certain veſſel of pewter in the houſe of the aforeſaid Perotine Maſſey (who then dwelt with her mother Katherine Cawches, and her ſiſter Guillemine Gilbert) which veſſel did bear no mark, and eſpecially for that there was a pewter diſh, whereof the name was ſcraped out, their bodies upon the ſame were attached, and put in priſon, and their moveable goods taken by inventory. Within a few days after theſe things thus done and paſt, theſe three ſilly women, abiding thus in durance in the caſtle, made their ſupplication to the juſtices to have juſtice miniſtered unto them, viz. If they had offended the law, then to let them have the law; if not, beſeeching to grant them the benefit of ſubjects, &c. which ſupplication put up, they were thereupon appointed to come to their anſwer the fifth day of June, in the year aforeſaid. Upon which day, after ſtrict examining of the matter, and the honeſt anſwering of the cauſe by the ſaid good women, at laſt they ſubmitted themſelves to the report of their neighbours, that they were no thieves, nor evil diſpoſed perſons, but lived truly and honeſtly, as became chriſtian women to do, notwithſtanding the falſe report of their accuſers.

So the cauſe being thus debated, after the enquiry made by the king's officers, they were found by the ſaid neighbours not guilty of what they were charged with, but had always lived as honeſt women among them; ſaving only that to the commandments of holy church they had not been obedient, &c. Upon this trial and verdict of their neighbours, it was in fine adjudged, firſt, that the ſaid Vincent Goſſet, being attainted of felony, and condemned for the ſame, ſhould be whipped, and after her ear being nailed to the pillory, ſhould ſo be baniſhed out of the iſle without further puniſhment. And as touching the other three women, the mother with her two daughters, for their not coming to church, they were returned priſoners again into the caſtle the firſt of July. And thus far concerning the true diſcourſe of this matter, with all the circumſtances and appurtenances of the ſame in every point as the caſe ſtood, according to the faithful tenor and teſtimony of the Garnſey men, written with their own hands both in the French and Engliſh tongue. Wherein you ſee what falſe ſurmiſed matter was pretended againſt theſe women, and nothing proved, and how by the atteſtation of their neighbours they were fully cleared of the fact, and ſhould by the temporal court have been diſmiſſed, had not the ſpiritual clergymen picked matter of religion againſt them, exerciſed ſuch extremity in perſecuting theſe miſerable priſoners, that in no caſe they ſhould eſcape their bloody hands, till at length they had brought them (as you ſhall hear) to their end. For after the time of this declaration above-mentioned made by the neighbours, whereby they were purged of all other things, and being then known of their not coming to church, the bailiff's lieutenant and the juſtice thinking the matter not to pertain to them, but to the clergy, forthwith wrote their letters or mandate undate under their ſignets to the dean, whoſe name was Jaques Amy, and curates of the ſaid iſle: The contents whereof here follow.

No. 45.

A Letter ſent from the Bailiffs, Lieutenant, and Jurates of St. Peter's Port, to the Dean and Curates of the Iſle of Garnſey.

MAſter Dean and juſtices in your court and juriſdiction, after all amicable recommendations, pleaſeth you to know that we are informed by the depoſition of certain honeſt men, paſſed before us in manner of an enquiry; in which enquiry, Katherine Cawches and her two daughters have ſubmitted themſelves in a certain matter criminal: Wherein we be informed, that they have been diſobedient to the commandments and ordinances of the church, in contemning and forſaking the maſs, and the ordinances of the ſame, againſt the will and commandment of our ſovereign lord the king and queen. Whereof we ſend you the ſaid matter, foraſmuch as the matter is ſpiritual, to the end you may proceed therein after your good diſcretions, and as briefly as you can poſſible, and alſo that it pertaineth to your office, recommending you to God, who give you grace to do that which pertaineth to right and juſtice. Written the firſt day of the month of July, in the year of our Lord 1556.

After theſe letters and information thus addreſſed to Jaques Amy dean, and the other clergy, the ſaid women were again convented before the juſtice aforeſaid with his aſſiſtants. In the preſence of whom they being examined of their faith, concerning the ordinances of the Romiſh church, made their anſwer, that they would obey and keep the ordinances of the king and queen, and the commandments of the church, notwithſtanding that they had ſaid and done the contrary in the time of king Edward the ſixth, in ſhewing obedience to his ordinances and commandments before. After which anſwer taken, they were returned again to priſon, until the other had an anſwer of their letter from the dean and his accomplices. During which time, the dean and curate gave their information touching the ſaid women, and delivered the ſame to the bailiff and jurates, condemning and reputing them for heretics, the women neither hearing of any information, neither yet being ever examined at any time before of their faith and religion. Whereupon when the ſaid bailiff and jurates underſtood that the ſaid dean and curates had not examined the women of their faith, they would not ſit in judgment on that day, but ordained the women to come firſt before the dean and curates, to be examined of their faith. And ſo the officers, at the commandment of the juſtices, did fetch and preſent them before the ſaid dean and curates; which being done, they were examined apart, and then returned to priſon again.

The fourteenth day of the ſaid month of July, in the year aforeſaid, after the examination abovementioned before Elier Goſſeline bailiff, in the preſence of Thomas Devicke. Pierres Martin, Nicholas Cary, John Blundel, Nicholas de Liſle, John Loverchaunt, John le Fever, Pierres Bonamy, Nicholas Martin, John de la March, jurates; Sir Jaques Amy, dean, and the curates, did deliver before the juſtice, under the ſeal of the dean, and under the ſigns of the curates, a certain act and ſentence, the ſum whereof was, that Katherine Cawches and her two daughters were found heretics, and ſuch they reputed them, and have delivered them to juſtice, to do execution according to the ſentence; the tenor of which here followeth.

" In the year of our Lord 1556, July 13, at the church of St. Peter's Port, in the iſle of Garnſey, enquiry being made by us the dean and curates, concerning the catholic faith and the ſacraments of the church, viz. of baptiſm, confirmation, penance, orders, marriage, euchariſt, and extreme unction, as alſo about eccleſiaſtical ceremonies, and the honour and worſhip of the virgin Mary and the ſaints, alſo of the maſs and its efficacy; where Katherine Cawches, and her two daughters Perotine and Guillemine, being called together, and ſeparately, according to law; and although often deſired and exhorted to confeſs their faults, and aſk pardon, yet they obſtinately denied whatever they had formerly ſaid vilely and diſhoneſtly againſt the catholic faith, the ſacraments of the church, and other eccleſiaſtical ceremonies: wherefore their denial, atteſtation and depoſition, being heard, and we ſeeing, conſidering, and well weighing the evidence againſt them; as alſo the opinions of the curates and vicars there aſſiſting, have found and do declare the ſaid Katherine and Perotine, as alſo Guillemine, to be guilty of hereſy, wherefore we command them back from whence they came.

Thomas le Coll, John Alles, William Panquet, Peter Tardiſe, and John Manatiel.

When this was done the king's officers were commanded to go to the caſtle to fetch the ſaid women, to hear the ſentence againſt them in the preſence aforeſaid. And they appearing before them, ſaid in the ears of all the auditory, that they would ſee their accuſers, and know them that have depoſed againſt them, becauſe they might make anſwers to their ſayings and perſonages, and to have their libel accordingly; for they knew not that they had offended the majeſties of the king and queen, nor of the church, but entirely would obey, ſerve and keep the ordinances of the king and queen, and of the church, as all good and true ſubjects are bound to do. And for any breach of the king's and queen's laws that they had done, they required juſtice. Notwithſtanding all which their reaſons and alligations, the ſaid poor women were condemned, and adjudged to be burnt until they were conſumed to aſhes: according to a ſentence given by Elier Goſſeline, bailiff: of which ſentence the ſubſtance here followeth.

"Katherine Cawches, Perotine Maſſey, and Guillemine Gilbert, are all condemned and judged this day to be burned, until they be conſumed to aſhes in the place accuſtomed, with the confiſcation of all their goods, moveables and heritages, to be in the hands of the king's and queen's majeſties, according and after the effect of a ſentence delivered in juſtice by Mr. Dean and the curates, the 13th day of July, 1556, in which they have been approved heretics. In the preſence of Thomas Devicke, Pierres Martin, Nicholas Cary, John Blundel, Nicholas Deviſe, John le Merchant, &c. jurates."

After which ſentence pronounced, the ſaid women appealed unto the king and queen, and their honourable council, ſaying, That againſt reaſon and right they were condemned, and for that cauſe they made their appeal; notwithſtanding they could not be heard, but were delivered by the ſaid bailiff to the king and queen's officers, to ſee the execution done on them according to the ſaid ſentence.

The time then being come when theſe innocents ſhould ſuffer, in the place where they ſhould conſummate their martyrdom were three ſtakes ſet up. At the middle poſt was the mother, the elder daughter on the right hand, the youngeſt on the other. They were firſt ſtrangled, but the rope brake before they were dead, and ſo the poor women fell in the fire. Perotine, who was then great with child, did fall on her ſide, where happened a rueful ſight, not only to the eyes of all that ſtood there, but alſo to the ears of all true-hearted chriſtians that ſhall read this hiſtory. For as the belly of the woman burſt aſunder by the vehemency of the flame, the infant, being a fair man child, fell into the fire, and being immediately taken out by one W. Houſe, was laid upon the graſs.

Then was the child carried to the provoſt, and from him to the bailiff, who gave order, that it ſhould be carried back again and caſt into the fire. And ſo the infant baptized in his own blood, to fill up the number of God's innocent ſaints, was both born and died a martyr, leaving behind to the world, which it never ſaw, a ſpectacle wherein the whole world may ſee the Herodian cruelty of this graceleſs generation of popiſh tormentors, to their perpetual ſhame and infamy.

Now foraſmuch as this ſtory, perhaps for the horrible ſtrangeneſs of the fact, will be hardly believed by ſome, but rather thought to be forged, or elſe more amplified by me than the truth will bear me out, therefore to diſcharge my credit herein, I have not only foretold thee a little before, how I received this ſtory by the faithful relation both of the French and Engliſh, of them which were there preſent witneſſes, and lookers on, but alſo have hereto annexed the true ſupplication of the ſaid inhabitants of Garnſey, and of the brother of the ſaid two ſiſters, complaining to the queen and her commiſſioners, concerning the horribleneſs of the act; which ſupplication, for the more evidence, hereunder followeth.

To the Right Honourable the Queen's moſt gracious Commiſſioners, for the hearing and determining of Matters of Religion and Cauſes Eccleſiaſtical.

MOST lamentably and wofully complaining, ſheweth unto your gracious and honourable lordſhips, your poor and humble orator Matthew Cawches, of the iſle of Garnſey, that where Jaques Amy clerk, dean of the iſle aforeſaid, aſſiſted by the curates there, againſt all order, law, and reaſon, by colour of a ſentence of hereſy, pronounced againſt Katherine Cawches, the ſiſter of your honour's ſaid ſupplicant, and Perotine and Guillemine her two daughters, did cauſe the ſaid Katherine, being a poor widow, and her ſaid two daughters moſt cruelly to be burned, although the ſaid perſons, nor any of them, did hold, maintain, or defend any thing directly againſt the eccleſiaſtical laws then in place, under the reign of the late queen Mary, but in all things ſubmitted themſelves obediently to the laws then in force: and yet the cruelty of the ſaid dean and his accomplices, in perpetrating ſuch murder as aforeſaid, raged ſo far, that whereas, whilſt the ſaid perſons did conſume with violent fire, the womb of the ſaid Perotine being burnt, there did iſſue from her a goodly man-child, which by the officers was taken up and handled, and after in a moſt deſpiteful manner thrown into the fire, and there alſo with the innocent mother crüelly burnt: in tender conſideration whereof, and foraſmuch as this bloody murder was not in due order of any law, or in any manner according to juſtice, but of mere malicious hatred, as the true copy of the whole proceedings in this matter, by the ſaid dean and his accomplices, here ready to be ſhewed to your honours, will make very plain and manifeſt: May it therefore pleaſe your good and gracious lordſhips, of the zeal that you bear to juſtice, and for our Lord Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, to have due conſideration in juſtice, of ſuch horrible murder, ſo cruelly committed as aforeſaid, according to the right demerit thereof. And that it may pleaſe your honourable lordſhips to order and decree alſo, that all the goods of all the ſaid parties, by pretence aforeſaid wrongfully taken as confiſcate, may be delivered your ſaid poor beſeecher, to whom of right they do belong: And your honours ſaid ſupplicant will dailyp ray to God for your long preſervation, to his glory, and your everlaſting health.

This ſupplication being preſented in manner aforeſaid to the queen's honourable commiſſioners, in the year 1562, ſuch order therein was taken, that the matter being returned again down to the ſaid country, further to be examined, the dean was committed to priſon, and diſpoſſeſſed of all his livings. So that in concluſion, both he, and all other partakers of that bloody murder, whether of conſcience, or for fear of the law, were driven to acknowledge their treſpaſs, and to ſubmit themſelves to the queen's mercy. The tenor of whoſe ſeveral ſubmiſſion, as they are left in the Rolls, I thought here to publiſh to the world, for a memorial of the more truth of this ſtory.

The ſeveral Submiſſion of certain Garnſey Men, confeſſing their Treſpaſs in the wrongful Condemnation of the three Women above ſpecified.

ELier Goſſeline, of the pariſh of St. Peter le Port in Garnſey, merchant, Nicholas Cary the elder, John Merchant, Peter Bonamy, of the pariſh of St. Martin, and Nicholas Martin, ſon of John, humbly ſubmitted themſelves to the queen's moſt excellent majeſty, acknowledging their erroneous judgments, as well againſt Katherine Cawches, and Guillemine and Perotine her two daughters, and the infant of the ſaid Perotine, executed by fire for ſuppoſed hereſy, as alſo for the acquitting of Nicholas Norman, a wilful murderer; and other matters contained in their ſeveral ſubmiſſions; pray the pardon of the queen's majeſty for the ſaid crimes and others committed in their ſeveral ſubmiſſions.

John Blundel the elder, of the pariſh of St. Saviour, within the iſle of Garnſey, upon like ſubmiſſion, and acknowledging of his offence, prayeth like grace and pardon for his conſent given to the execution of the ſaid three women.

Richard Devicke, of the pariſh of St. Peter le Port, merchant, prayeth like grace and pardon for his conſent and judgment given for the acquitting of the ſaid Norman, according to his ſupplication and ſubmiſſion late preſented by Peter Bonamy, the ſame Devicke, and Peter Pelley, of the pariſh of St. Peter le Port, merchants.

The ſaid Peter Pelly prayeth the benefit of the ſaid pardon to be extended unto him, according to his ſubmiſſion in the ſaid ſupplication.

Jaques Amy clerk, prayeth the benefit of the ſaid pardon for his ſentence with the clergy againſt the ſaid women, according to his ſubmiſſion.

Thomas Effart, of the pariſh of St. Peter le Port, humbly prayeth, as procurator lawfully conſtituted by the chapter, bailiff and jurates, that the ſame pardon may extend to acquit all the inhabitants of the ſaid Iſle, of the arrearages, &c.

The Copy of the Queen's Pardon to them of Garnſey.

THE QUEEN, to all unto whom theſe preſents ſhall come, greeting. Be it known unto you, that We of Our ſpecial favour, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have pardoned, remitted, and forgave; and for Us, Our heirs, and ſucceſſors, by theſe preſents do pardon, remit, and forgive, Elier Goſſeline of the pariſh of St. Peter's Port, within Our iſland of Garnſey, merchant; John Blundel the elder, of the pariſh of St. Saviour in the aforeſaid iſland of Garnſey, merchant; Nicholas Cary the elder, of the aforeſaid pariſh of St. Peter's Port, within the ſaid iſle of Garnſey, merchant; John Merchant of the ſaid pariſh and iſland, gentleman; Nicholas Martin, ſon of John, of the ſaid pariſh of St. Peter's Port within the aforeſaid iſland of Garnſey, merchant; Richard Devicke of the ſaid pariſh of St. Peter's Port, within the aforeſaid iſland of Garnſey, merchant; Peter Pelley, of the ſaid pariſh of St. Peter's Port, in the aforeſaid iſland of Garnſey, merchant; and James Amy of the pariſh of St. Saviour, within the ſaid iſland of Garnſey, clerk; and to all of them jointly and ſeparately, whether by any other name or names, ſirnames or additional name or ſirname of trades, arts, or places, the ſame Elier, Nicholas Cary, John, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard, Peter and James, are known, called, or named, or lately was known, called or named, or by any other name, ſirname, or additional name, or ſirname of degree, trade, art, or place any of the ſaid Elier, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard, Peter and James are known, called, or named, or lately were known, called, or named, all and all manner of murder, manſlaughter, felony, and felonious killings of Katherine Cawches, and Guillemine and Perotine, daughters of the ſaid Katherine, of every one of theſe, and the acceſſaries of them, and all and ſingular felonies, inſultings, ſtrikings, woundings, burnings, tranſgreſſions, offences, riots, routs, unlawful meetings, aſſemblings, gatherings together, plottings, conſpiracies, acceſſary helps, combinings, procurings, abettings, ſtrengthenings and ſupportings, concealments, forfeits, contempts, aſſaultings, neglects, and whatever other evil deeds done appertaining to the murder, manſlaughter, and felonious killing of the aforeſaid Katherine, Guillemine and Perotine, or any of them, in any part or concern by the aforeſaid Elier, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard, Peter, and James, or any one or more of them, before this preſent day, howſoever done, practiſed, committed, or perpetrated, and all and every flight and flights whatever by the aforeſaid Elier, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, and James Amy, or any one or more of them, by reaſon or occaſion of the murder, manſlaughter, or felonious killing of the aforeſaid, done or practiſed, and that ſo fully and entirely, and in ſo ample a manner and form, as if every one of the aforeſaid Elier Goſſeline, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, and James Amy, had ſeparately Our letters patent of pardon.

Alſo We have pardoned, remitted, and forgave, and by theſe preſents do pardon, remit, and forgive, for Us, Our heirs and ſucceſſors, the aforeſaid Elier Goſſeline, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, James Amy, and every one of their heirs, executors, adminiſtrators and aſſigns, their neglects, all and all manner of encroachments, breakings, and enterings, by all or ſome of them, or by the proxies, agents, or miniſters of all or any of them, in all and ſingular our manors, lands, tenements, poſſeſſions, and hereditaments whatſoever and whereſoever, lying within the aforeſaid iſland of Garnſey, lately chantries, guilds, cloiſters, or colleges of Ours, or any one or more of Our predeceſſors, before the 17th of November, in the firſt year of Our reign, done, performed, or committed, and all and ſingular debts, returns, accounts, arrears, collections, receivings, detainings, and duties of grain, and other returns, outgoings, or profits whatſoever, to Us or any one of Our predeceſſors for the ſaid chantries, guilds, cloiſters, or colleges, one or all of them, in whatever manner, before the aforeſaid 17th day of November, in the firſt year of Our reign, owing, belonging, or appertaining.

We have pardoned, remitted, and forgave, and of Our ſpecial favour, certain knowledge, and mere motion to the aforeſaid, for Us, Our heirs and ſucceſſors, by theſe preſents do pardon, remit, and forgive the aforeſaid Elier Goſſeline, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, and Richard Devicke, and each of them, the freedom, flight, eſcape, and reſtoring to his liberty Nicholas Norman, lately of the pariſh of St. Saviour, within the aforeſaid iſland, yeoman, of manſlaughter or murder lately judged, attainted, and convicted, being for the killing or murder of John Breghault, of the pariſh of St. Saviour, within the iſland aforeſaid, huſbandman, but all and all manner of felonies, crimes, offences, puniſhments, deaths, penalties, forfeits, contempts, neglects, ignorance, and other faults and offences whatſoever, touching or in any manner concerning the aforeſaid eſcape, flight, and ſetting at liberty of the aforeſaid Nicholas Norman, by the aforeſaid Elier Goſſeline, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, and Richard Devicke, or any one or more of them, before this preſent day, after what manner ſoever practiſed, done, committed, or happened.

Alſo we have pardoned, remitted, and forgave, and by theſe preſents, of Our certain knowledge and mere motion, for Us, Our heirs and ſucceſſors, do pardon, remit, and forgive the aforeſaid Elier Goſſeline, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, and James Amy, all and all manner of riots, routs, unlawful meetings, and gatherings together, to the diſturbance of Our peace, by the aforeſaid Elier, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, and James Amy, or any one or more of them, before this in whatſoever manner within the aforeſaid iſland, practiſed, committed, done, or perpetrated, &c.

A Defence of the aforeſaid Hiſtory of Garnſey againſt Mr. Harding.

THUS have you the true narration of this hiſtory, diſcourſed without corrupting or falſifying any part or ſentence thereof, no leſs faithfully on my part reported, than I received of them, who dwelling in the ſame iſle, and being preſent the ſame time, were beſt acquainted with the matter, and have given ſufficient evidence not only to me, but alſo to the queen's highneſs's commiſſioners, concerning the ſame, as both by the letter of the bailiff, by the ſentence of the dean, by the ſupplication of the plaintiff, and ſubmiſſion of the parties, and likewiſe by the queen's pardon granted unto them, may well appear.

By all which proofs and circumſtances thus debated, it remaineth manifeſt for all men to perceive, what cruelty and wrong was wrought againſt theſe poor women above ſpecified, and no leſs matter offered, in a caſe ſo unjuſt, juſtly to expoſtulate, or rather to wonder at the hard hearts of theſe men, but eſpecially of the Romiſh clergy of Garnſey, who profeſſing the goſpel of peace and charity, ſhould after the example of Chriſt, walk in the ſteps of meekneſs and mercy, and yet contrary, not only to all chriſtian charity and good nature, but alſo againſt all order of equity or humanity, were ſo extreme and rigorous to condemn them to the burning fire, under the pretenſed colour of hereſy. Who, if they had been heretics indeed, yet mercy would have corrected the error, and ſaved life; equity would have conſidered man's frailty and weakneſs, at leaſt true juſtice would have heard both the parties adviſedly, and alſo ſubſtantially ſurveyed the cauſe, and not have thundered out the ſentence of death ſo haſtily as they did: yea, and though they had been heretics indeed, yet true chriſtian charity would have ſtretched farther, and at leaſt have given them leiſure and reſpite of time to reclaim themſelves. But now what is here to be ſaid? they being no heretics at all, as neither it could then, nor yet can be proved. For if king Edward's religion (which was objected to them) were hereſy, yet were they then no heretics, when they revoked the ſame; and if queen Mary's religion were hereſy, then were they much more heretics themſelves, who condemned them for hereſy.

But moſt of all we have herein to wonder at Mr. Harding, who in his late Rejoinder, written againſt the biſhop of Saliſbury, notwithſtanding all theſe evidences and demonſtrations ſo certain and manifeſtly appearing, yet goeth about firſt to deny the ſtory, terming it to be a fable; and afterwards being forced to fly from denying it, to admit the ſtory, he ſtrives to turn it another way; and ſeeking by all means to clear the clergy from the ſpot of cruelty, transferreth the whole blame only upon the women that ſuffered, but principally upon poor Perotine, whom he ſpecially chargeth with two capital crimes, viz. Whoredom and murder.

And firſt, touching his accuſation of whoredom, let us hear how he proveth this matter: "Becauſe (ſaith he) by ſtory it is granted, that ſhe was with child: and yet the hiſtoriographer doth not declare (neither durſt for ſhame) who was her huſband, or father to the child, &c." As though that hiſtoriographers, being occupied in ſetting forth the perſecution of God's people, ſuffering death for religion and doctrine of Chriſt, were bound, or had nothing elſe to do but to play the ſumner, and to bring forth who were huſbands to their wives, and fathers to their children; which new-found law of hiſtory being never required before, nor obſerved by any writers, if Mr. Harding now ſhall exact of me, firſt let him begin with himſelf, and ſhew us (as wiſe as he is) who was his own father, if he can. And yet I think not contrary, but his mother was an honeſt woman. And no leſs alſo do I think of this Perotine aforeſaid; whereof more ſhall be ſaid (God willing) hereafter.

But in the mean time here cometh in the cavilling objection of Mr. Harding, who beareth the reader in hand, as though "for ſhame I durſt not, or of purpoſe would not expreſs it, &c." My anſwer whereunto is this: Firſt, to expreſs every minute matter in every ſtory occurrent, what ſtory-writer in the world is able to perform it? Secondly, although it might be done, what reaſonable reader will require it? Thirdly, albeit ſome curious readers would ſo require it, yet I ſuppoſe it neither requiſite nor convenient to obſerve it. And Fourthly, what if it were not remembered by the author? what if it were to him not known? what if it were of purpoſe omitted, as a matter not material to the purpoſe? Many other cauſes beſides might incur, which the reader knoweth not of. And ſhall it then by and by be imputed to to ſhame, whatſoever in every narration is not expreſſed? or doth Mr. Harding himſelf, in all his ſermons, never omit any thing that might conveniently be inferred? Who was the huſband of this Perotine, the hiſtoriographer hath not expreſſed; I grant: and what thereof? Ergo, thereupon concludeth he, That for ſhame I durſt not. Nay, I may marvel rather, that he durſt for ſhame utter ſuch untidy arguments, or ſo aſſeverently pronounce of another man's mind and purpoſe, which is as privy to him, as then it was to me unknown what was her huſband's name. And though it had been known, what was that material in the ſtory to be uttered? or what had it relieved the cruel parts of them, who burned both the mother and infant together, though the infant's father had been expreſſed? And how then did I for ſhame conceal that which was not in my knowledge at that time (if I would) to expreſs, nor in my ſuſpicion to miſdeem?

Nevertheleſs, if he be ſo greatly deſirous (as he pretendeth) to know of me who was this infant's father, I will not ſtick with Mr. Harding, although I cannot ſwear for the matter, yet to take ſo much pain for his pleaſure to go ſo near as I may. For preciſely and determinately to point out the right father, either of this or any child, I ſuppoſe neither will Mr. Harding require it of me, neither is he able peradventure himſelf, being aſked, to demonſtrate his own. And yet, as much as I may, to ſatisfy his dainty deſire herein, and partly to help the innocency of the woman concerning this demand, Who ſhould be the infant's father? Who, ſay I, but his own mother's huſband: the name of which huſband was David Jores, a miniſter, and married to the ſaid Perotine in king Edward's time, in the church of our Lady's Caſtle pariſh at Garnſey; the party which married them being named Mr. Noel Regnet, a Frenchman, and yet alive, witneſs hereunto, and now dwelling in London, in St. Martins le Grand.

Thus then, after my knowledge, I have ſhewed forth, for Mr. Harding's pleaſure, the right huſband of this Perotine, Perotine, and what was his name, who was alſo alive, his wife being great with child, and partaker of the perſecution of the ſame time, and a ſchoolmaſter afterward in Normandy, &c. Now if Mr. Harding can take any ſuch advantage hereof to diſprove what I have ſaid; or be ſo privy to the begetting of this child, that he can prove the ſaid David Jores, who was the right huſband to this wife, not to be the right father to this infant, let him ſhew herein his cunning by what mighty demonſtrations he can induce us to think the contrary; and as I ſhall ſee his reaſon, I ſhall ſhape him an anſwer, in ſuch ſort (I truſt) that he will perceive, that whoredom, whereſoever I may know it, ſhall find no bolſtering by me; I wiſh it might find as little amongſt the chaſte catholics of Mr. Harding's church.

From this I proceed now to the ſecond part of his infamous accuſation, wherein he chargeth her of murder. A ſtrange caſe, that ſhe which was murdered herſelf with her child, and died before him, ſhould yet be accuſed to murder the child. Murder doubtleſs is an horrible iniquity in any perſon; but the mother to be murderer of her own infant, is a double abomination, and more than a monſter, ſo far diſagreeing from all nature, that it is not lightly to be ſurmiſed of any, without vehement cauſes of manifeſt probation.

Wherefore, to try out this matter more thoroughly touching this murdering mother, let us ſee: Firſt, What hand did ſhe lay upon the child? None. What weapon had ſhe? None. Did ſhe then drown it, or caſt it in ſome pond, as we read of the ſtrumpets at Rome, whoſe children's heads were taken up in pope Gregory's mote by hundreds, when prieſts began firſt to be reſtrained of a lawful wedlock? Or elſe did ſhe throw it by the walls into ſome private corner, as I am credibly certified, that in the eighth year of queen Elizabeth, certain ſcalps and other young infants bones were found, and taken out with a ſtick in the hole of a ſtone wall, in Lenton Abbey, by certain gentlemen within the county of Nottingham, James Baruſſe, Richard Loveit, and W. Lovelace, walking in the prior-chamber; witneſs the ſaid W. Lovelace, with others who ſaw the bones aforeſaid? Or otherwiſe did ſhe take any hurtful drink, to importionate the child within her, as commonly it is reported few nunneries to have been in England, wherein ſuch a tree hath not been growing within their ground, meet for practiſing of ſuch a purpoſe? Neither ſo, nor ſo. What then? did ſhe purpoſely and wittingly thruſt herſelf in jeopardy, to the deſtruction of her child, when ſhe needed not, as pope Joan, when ſhe might have kept her bed, would needs adventure forth in proceſſion where both ſhe herſelf and her infant periſhed in the open ſtreet?

Well then, thus much by this hitherto alledged and granted, we have gotten this woman here to be accuſed of murdering her child, who neither laid hand upon it, nor uſed weapon againſt it; neither uſed any other practice in drowning, hanging, breaking, burying, poiſoning, or any other wilful means, whereby to deſtroy it. And how then? by what manner of way was this woman a murderer of her young babe? Forſooth (ſaith Mr. Harding) when ſhe was accuſed, and condemned to be burnt, ſhe did not claim the benefit of her belly, whereby the life both of herſelf for the time might have been delayed, and the child preſerved.

Whether ſhe did or no, I have not perfectly to ſay; no more, I ſuppoſe, hath Mr. Harding. Howbeit this is certain, and by witneſs known, that ſhe uttered no leſs to her ghoſtly father in confeſſion. And what if ſhe had opened the ſame to the judges? They would (ſaith he) have ſpared her life for the time, and ſo the innocent had been preſerved. And how is Mr. Harding ſure of this, more than was the life ſpared of the young lady and miſtreſs ſometime of Mr. Harding, [lady Jane] who ſuffered, notwithſtanding ſhe was reported of ſome to be with child; becauſe the law (ſaith he) is beneficial to women in her caſe, claiming the benefit thereof.

The law ſo giveth, I grant. But it followeth not therefore, whatſoever the law giveth or preſcribeth, the ſame to be put in execution.

But many times the law goeth as it pleaſeth them which have the handling of the law. As for example; the law willeth none to be condemned by ſentence of death for hereſy, which the firſt time revoke their opinion, and yet contrary to this law they condemned her unlawfully. Again, the like law, none to be executed for hereſy, before the writ be ſent down De Comburendo, and yet contrary to this law, without any ſuch writ, (as far as I yet underſtand) they burnt her moſt cruelly. And what law then was here to be looked for of theſe men, who in their doings herein ſeemed neither to obſerve law, nor to regard honeſty, nor much to paſs for charity? And albeit ſhe had claimed never ſo much the privilege of the law, what had that availed with thoſe men, whoſe hunting altogether (as by their own proceedings may appear) ſeemed to be for the houſhold goods of theſe women, which after their death they immediately encroached into their own hands.

But be it admitted, that ſhe neither demanded this benefit of the law, nor that the judges would ever have denied her, if ſhe had ſo done; yet it had been the part of a grave accuſer, before he had deſcended into ſuch a railing action of murder againſt a poor woman now dead and gone, firſt to have adviſed wiſely with himſelf, whether it might be, that ſhe had no ſuch intelligence what benefit the law ſhould have given, in caſe it had been required. For not unlike it is, and well may be thought, rather yea than no, that the ſimple woman, brought up all her life long in her mother's houſe, in an obſcure iſland, and in ſuch an out-corner of the realm, far off from the court, and practice of Engliſh laws, never heard before of any ſuch benefit of the law; and therefore upon mere ſimplicity, and for want of ſkill, required it not, becauſe ſhe knew not what to require. Peradventure alſo her ſenſes might be ſo aſtoniſhed with the greatneſs and ſuddenneſs of the fear, that it was out of her remembrance. Certainly it had been the duty of the judges, which knew the law, and having the woman before them, could not be ignorant of her caſe, to have queſtioned with her thereof, and to have helped her ſimplicity in that behalf. Or at leaſt, if they had diſdained, yet it had been the prieſt's part, who was her ghoſtly father, and made privy thereunto, either to have inſtructed her, or to have ſtayed the execution of her death for ſafeguard of the child.

But all this denieth Mr. Harding, and to aggravate the matter, inferreth, that ſhe, not of any ſimple unſkilfulneſs of the law, "but only of mere wilfulneſs, for avoiding of worldly ſhame, concealed her own turpitude, and ſo became a murderer of her babe, &c." Theſe be the words of Mr. Harding, written by him not of any ſure ground, but only upon his catholic conjecture; for other demonſtration certainly to prove this true, he bringeth none. Wherefore to anſwer conjecture by conjecture, thus I reply to him again, That in caſe ſhe had been aſked the queſtion of the judges and inquiſitors, whether ſhe had been with child, and then denied the ſame; or elſe if ſhe by any other colourable means, had cloaked her being with child, whereby it ſhould not appear, this accuſer might have ſpoken probable advantage againſt the woman. Now, as ſhe was never demanded of their parts any ſuch queſtion, nor did ever deny any ſuch matter; ſo to anſwer this man with as good probability, I hold, that in caſe they had required that matter of her, ſhe would never have denied it. And therefore whereas ſhe is accuſed for her not uttering of her being with child; why may ſhe not, by as good reaſon again be defended for not denying the ſame?

But ſhe ſhould have uttered it, ſaith he. It had been well done, ſaid I: and I would wiſh ſhe had: but yet that is not the queſtion between him and me, what ſhe ſhould have done, but why ſhe did it not. Mr. Harding wandering in his blind ſurmiſes, fancieth the cauſe only to be, "for hiding her diſhoneſty, and for that ſhe would not ſhame the goſpel." To this effect tendeth all his accuſation.

Perotine being big with child, at her condemnation did not ſhew it to the judges:

Ergo, She did it to conceal her turpitude, and becauſe ſhe would not ſhame the goſpel.

But here this accuſer muſt underſtand, if he have not forgot his logic, that ſuch arguments which do truly hold a Signis, do always preſuppoſe, that the ſigns which go before the things ſignified, muſt be neceſſary, perpetual and firm, as is between cauſes natural, and their effects. Otherwiſe, if the ſigns be doubtful, voluntary, or accidental, there is no firm conſequent can proceed thereof,

Now, if the ſaid accuſer ſhould be put to his proof, how to juſtify this his ſequel to be true by evident demonſtration, that ſhe did it only for covering her diſhoneſty, I ſuppoſe verily he ſhould be found to ſay more than he is able to make good, and in concluſion ſhould be brought into the like caſe as were the phariſees, who coming to accuſe the adultereſs before Chriſt, went away mute, with as much ſhame out of the temple, as the woman herſelf came in, having not one word to anſwer. For a man to pronounce aſſuredly upon the ſecret cogitation and intent either of man or woman, farther than by utterance of ſpeech is to him ſignified, paſſeth his capacity, and is to be left only to him, who is a God ſearching the heart and the reins.

But foraſmuch as Mr. Harding worketh, as I ſaid, by ſurmiſes, confirming every thing to the worſt, let us ſee what may be ſurmiſed as much again to the contrary, concerning the quality of this ſurmiſed murder; wherein divers things are to be conſidered, as hereunder followeth.

The firſt conjecture is this, That ſuch manner of women, who for worldly ſhame are diſpoſed to murder their children, have other ways to compaſs that wickedneſs, than by ſilence keeping. Now, as touching this Perotine going to be burnt, neither could this ſilence ſave her, if ſhe would, from worldly ſhame; neither is it to be thought any ſuch intent ever to be in her, to murder her child; as might well appear in her mother's houſe, where, if ſhe might have continued her whole time out, ſhe intended no leſs but honeſtly to be brought to bed, and to nurſe up her child, neither caring for ſhame of the world, nor fearing any ſlander to the goſpel. Whereby may be argued, that no ſuch intent of murder was ever in her thought.

For how is it like that ſhe, which had gone ſo long with child, almoſt to the full time of her deliverance, and never thought nor wrought any hurt to the infant all that time, ſhould now, going to her own death, mind more hurt to her child, than ſhe did before hoping herſelf to live.

Secondly, How knoweth Mr. Harding to the contrary, but that ſhe was known in the town to be with child, and went boldly abroad without note of any ſhame, before the time ſhe came in trouble? Which being true, ſhame then could be no cauſe why ſhe ſhould conceal her child more now after her condemnation, than ſhe did before ſhe was condemned.

Thirdly, Admit the caſe it was not known before, what advantage thereby ſhould riſe to her being now appointed to die, by concealing her being with child? She ſhould have avoided (ſaith Mr. Harding) the public ſhame and obloquy of the world, in that none ſhould have known her to be with child. Firſt, what ſhame was it for a married wife to be noted to be with child? Again, what gain had that been to her, to avoid the ſhame and fame of the world, who had not to live in the world, being now condemned to die?

Fourthly, How is it like, that for ſhame ſhe meant to conceal that from the world, which both knew ſhe ſhould not live in the world, and alſo ſuffer that kind of death whereby her child could not be hidden from the ſight of the world, though ſhe had gone about herſelf never ſo much to conceal it?

Fifthly, How is it to be thought, that any woman going to ſuch a ſharp puniſhment of fire to be conſumed, would let for any worldly ſhame to reſcue her own life from ſo bitter torment, at leaſt ſo long as ſhe might, beſide the ſafeguard alſo of her child, if by any means ſhe had known any remedy.

Sixthly, Foraſmuch as Mr. Harding doth ſo heinouſly charge her with the wilful murdering of her own natural child, let all indifferent conſciences this conſider with themſelves, what was the cauſe that moved her ſo willingly to recant as ſhe did, but partly to ſave her own life, and eſpecially the poor innocent? Whereby it is manifeſt to be underſtood, what a motherly affection ſhe had to ſave her infant, if the fathers of the ſpirituality had not been ſo cruel, againſt all order of law, to caſt both her and her child away, all this her ſaid recantation notwithſtanding.

Seventhly and laſtly, when Mr. Harding hath inveighed all that ever he can againſt this poor woman, yet is all the ſame but a by-matter from this principal purpoſe pretended, ſuppoſing thereby, through his depraving of her, to juſtify and excuſe the pope's holy clergy, who wrought her death. Which will not be: For whatſoever her life was beſides, yet forſomuch as the cauſe of her death and condemnation was neither for theft, whoredom, nor murder, but only and merely for religion, which deſerved no death; I therefore having in my ſtory no further to deal, as I ſaid before, I do ſo ſay again, that the cauſe of her condemning was wrongful, her death was cruel, the ſight of the babe was rueful, the proceeding of the judges was unlawful, the whole ſtory is pitiful, and of all this the prieſts and clergy were the authors principal. All which being conſidered and well expended, Mr. Harding, I truſt, may ſtand ſufficiently contented. Or if he thinks murder to be a thing which ought not (as it ought not indeed) lightly to be paſſed over, let him then find out murder where it is, and tell us truly, without affection of partiality, where the true murder lieth, whether in the poor woman, who together with her child was murdered, or in them, who without all law and conſcience brought them both to death.

Briefly and finally to conclude with this man, whatſoever the woman was, ſhe is now gone. To bite ſo bitterly againſt the dead is little honeſty. And though the accuſation had in it ſome truth, yet this accuſation here needed not. Now the ſame being falſe, is too much unmerciful. At leaſt being doubtful, and to him unknown, charity would have judged the beſt; humanity would have ſpared the dead, and if he could not afford her his good word, yet he might have left her cauſe unto the Lord, who ſhall judge both her and him. To pray for the dead he findeth in his maſs, but to backbite the dead, he neither findeth in his maſs, matins, nor evenſong: and no doubt in his Dirge and commendations he commendeth many a one, leſs deſerving to be commended than this woman, let catholic affection be ſet aſide. And though the merits of her cauſe deſerved not his commendations, yet did ſhe never deſerve at Mr. Harding's hand to give her ſuch a Kyrie eleiſon (as they ſay) after her departure. Cruelty ſhe ſuffered enough alive, though Mr. Harding had not added this cruel invective to her former afflictions: wherein notwithſtanding he hurteth not her, but hurteth peradventure himſelf, neither ſo much diſtaineth her honeſty, as he blemiſheth his own. It hath been the manner of learned men in time paſt, with their oration ever to be more ready to defend fend, than to accuſe. And if they did at any time accuſe, yet never but inforced; neither did they accuſe any but ſuch only as were alive, and that neither but in ſuch matters, wherein either the commonwealth or themſelves were vehemently touched.

Now if this grieve him ſo greatly, that in my ſtory I have termed her to be a martyr, let him conſider the cauſe wherefore ſhe ſuffered, which was neither for felony, murder, nor whoredom, but only for the religion in king Edward's time received; and when he hath confuted that religion, I ſhall croſs her out of the book and fellowſhip of martyrs. In the mean time my exhortation to Mr. Harding ſhall be this.

Firſt, That if he will needs become a writer in theſe ſo furious and outrageous days of ours, he will ſeaſon his vein of writings with more mildneſs and charity, and not give ſuch example of railing to others.

Secondly, That he will moderate his judging and condemning of others with more equity and indifferency, and not to be ſo raſh and partial. For if ſhe be to be accounted a murderer, who ſo carefully went about by recantation to ſave both herſelf and her child from the fire; what is to be ſaid of them who ſo cruelly condemned her, and cauſed both her and her infant to be burned, notwithſtanding that ſhe for ſafeguard of their lives had (as I ſaid) recanted. And yet ſo partial is he, that in all this invective, crying out ſo intemperately againſt the woman and the child that were burned, he ſpake never a word of their condemners and true murderers indeed.

Thirdly, forſomuch as Mr. Harding is here in hand with infanticide, and with a caſting away young children's lives, I would wiſh, that as he hath ſifted the doings of this woman to the uttermoſt, who was rather murdered than a murderer; ſo he would with an indifferent eye look on the other ſide a little upon them of his own clergy, and ſee what he could find there amongſt thoſe wilful contemners of immaculate marriage. Not that I do accuſe any of incontinency whoſe lives I know not, but there is one above that well knoweth and ſeeth all things, be they never ſo ſecret to man, and moſt certainly at length will pay home with fire and brimſtone when he ſeeth his time.

I ſay no more, and not ſo much as I might, following herein the painters, who when their colours will not ſerve to expreſs a thing that they mean, they ſhadow it with a vail. But howſoever the matter goeth with them, whether they may or may not be ſuſpected touching this crime aforeſaid of infanticide; moſt ſure and manifeſt it is that they are more than worthily to be accuſed of homicide in murdering the children and ſervants of God, both men and women, wives and maids, old and young, blind and lame, mad and unmad, diſcreet and ſimple innocents, learned with the unlearned, and that of all degrees, from the high archbiſhop to the clerk and ſexton of the church, and that moſt wrongfully and wilfully, with ſuch effuſion of innocent chriſtian blood, as crieth up daily to God for vengeance.

And therefore Mr. Harding, in my mind ſhould do well, to ſpare a little time from theſe his invectives, wherewith he impeacheth the poor proteſtants of murder, whom they have murdered themſelves, and exerciſe his pen with ſome more fruitful matter, to exhort theſe ſpiritual fathers firſt to ceaſe from murdering their own children, to ſpare the blood of innocents, and not to perſecute Chriſt ſo cruelly in his members as they do: And furthermore, to exhort in like manner theſe Agamiſts, and wilful rejecters of matrimony, to take themſelves to lawful wives, and not to reſiſt God's holy ordinance, nor encounter his inſtitution with another contrary inſtitution of their own deviſing, leſt perhaps they prevented by fragility, may fall into danger of ſuch inconveniences above hinted: which if they be not in them I ſhall be glad: but if they be, it is neither their railing againſt the poor proteſtants, nor yet their ſecret auricular confeſſion, that ſhall cover their iniquities from the face of the Lord, when he ſhall come to reveal the hidden things of darkneſs, and judge the world by fire.

And thus, for lack of further leiſure, I end with Mr. Harding; having no more at this time to ſay unto him, but wiſh him to fear God, to embrace his truth, to remember himſelf, and to ceaſe from his uncharitable railing, eſpecially againſt the dead, which cannot anſwer him; or if he will needs continue ſtill to be ſuch a vehement accuſer of others, yet that he will remember what belongeth to the part of a right accuſer: Firſt, That his accuſation be true; Secondly, That no blind affection of partiality be mixed with it; Thirdly, Whoſoever taketh upon him to carp at, and impeach the crimes of others, ought themſelves to be ſincere and upright, and to ſee what may be written in their own foreheads.

Whoredom and murder be grievous offences, and worthy to be accuſed: but to accuſe of murder the parties that were murdered, and to leave the other perſons untouched that were the true murderers, it is the part of an accuſer, which deſerveth himſelf to be accuſed of partiality.

As verily I think by this woman, that if ſhe had been a catholic papiſt, and a devout follower of their church, as ſhe was a proteſtant, ſhe had neither been condemned then alive of them, nor accuſed, being dead, of Mr. Harding. But God forgive him, and make him a good man if it be his will.

Three Martyrs burnt at Greenſtead in Suſſex.

NEAR about the ſame time that theſe three women with the infant, were burnt at Garnſey, ſuffered other three likewiſe at Greenſtead in Suſſex, two men and one woman; the names of whom were Thomas Dungate, John Foreman, and mother Tree, who for righteouſneſs ſake gave themſelves to death and torments of the fire, patiently abiding what the furious rage of man could ſay or work againſt them, at the ſaid town of Greenſtead ending their lives the 18th of July, and in the year aforeſaid.

The Martyrdom of Thomas Moor in the Town of Leiceſter, June 26, 1556.

AS the bloody rage of this perſecution ſpared neither man, woman, nor child, wife, nor maid, lame nor blind, and ſo through all men and women, as there was no difference either of age or ſex conſidered, ſo neither was there any condition or quality reſpected of any perſon; but whoſoever he were that held not as they did on the pope and the ſacrament of the altar, were he learned or unlearned, wiſe or ſimple innocent, all went to the fire, as may appear by this ſimple poor creature and innocent ſoul, named Thomas Moor, retained as a ſervant in a man's houſe in the town of Leiceſter, about the age of 24 years, and after the manner of an huſbandman, who for ſpeaking certain words, that his Maker was in heaven, and not in the Pix, was thereupon apprehended in the country, being with his friends. Who coming before his ordinary, firſt was aſked, whether he did not believe his Maker there to be, pointing to the high altar. Which he denied.

How then, ſaid the biſhop, doſt thou believe?

The young man anſwered, As my creed doth teach me.

Then ſaid the biſhop, And what is yonder that thou ſeeſt about the altar?

He anſwered, Forſooth, I cannot tell what you would have me to ſee. I ſee there fine cloaths, with golden taſſels, and other gay matters hanging about the pix, what is within I cannot ſee.

Why,

Why, doſt thou not believe, ſaid the biſhop, Chriſt to be there, fleſh, blood and bone? No, that I do not, ſaid he.

Whereupon the ordinary making ſhort with him, read the ſentence, and ſo condemned the faithful ſervant of Chriſt to death in St. Margaret's church in Leiceſter; who was burnt, and ſuffered a joyful and glorious martyrdom for the teſtimony of righteouſneſs, in the ſame town, about the 26th day of June, 1556.

To this Thomas Moor, we have alſo annexed the examination and anſwers of one John Jackſon, before Dr. Cook one of the commiſſioners, for that it belongeth much unto the ſame time.

The Examination of John Jackſon before Dr. Cook, March 11, 1556.

FIRST when I came before him, he railed on me, and called me heretic.

I anſwered and ſaid, I am no heretic.

Cook. Yes thou art. For Mr. Read told me, that thou wert the rankeſt heretic of all them in the King's-bench.

Jackſon. I know him not.

Cook. No? Yes, he examined thee at the King's-bench.

Jackſon. He examined five others, but not me.

Cook. Then anſwer me: what ſayeſt thou to the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar? Tell me.

Jackſon. It is a diffuſe queſtion, to aſk me at the firſt daſh, you promiſing to deliver me.

Cook. What an heretic is this?

Jackſon. It is eaſier to call a man heretic, than to prove him one.

Cook. What church art thou of?

Jackſon. What church? I am of the ſame church that is built on the foundation of the prophets and the apoſtles, Jeſus Chriſt himſelf being the head corner-ſtone.

Cook. Thou art an heretic.

Jackſon. How can that be, ſeeing that I am of that church? I am ſure that you will not ſay that the prophets and apoſtles were heretics.

Cook. No. But what ſayeſt thou to the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar again? Tell me.

Jackſon. I find it not written.

Cook. No? Keeper, away with him.

Yet I tarried there long, and did talk with him; and I ſaid, Sir, I am content to be tractable, and obedient to the word of God.

Dr. Cook anſwered and ſaid to me, that I knew not what the word of God meant, not yet whether it were true or not.

Jackſon. Yea that I do.

Cook. Whereby?

Jackſon. Hereby, ſaid I. Our Saviour Chriſt ſaith; "Search the ſcriptures; for in them you think to have eternal life. For they be they that teſtify of me."

Cook. This is a wiſe proof.

Jackſon. Is it ſo? What ſay you then to theſe words that the prophet David ſaid? Whatſoever he be that feareth the Lord, he will ſhew him the way that he hath choſen: his ſoul ſhall dwell at eaſe, and his ſeed ſhall poſſeſs the land. The ſecrets of the Lord are among them that fear him, and he ſheweth them his covenant."

Cook. Well, you ſhall be rid ſhortly one way or other.

Jackſon. My life lieth not in man's hands; therefore no man ſhall do more unto me than God will ſuffer him.

Cook. No? Thou art a ſtubborn and naughty fellow.

Jackſon. Ye cannot ſo judge of me, except you did ſee ſome evil by me.

Cook. No? Why may not I judge thee, as well as thou and thy fellows judge us, and call us papiſts.

Jackſon. Why, that is no judgment: but Chriſt ſaith, "If you refuſe me and receive not my word, you have one that judgeth you. The word that I have ſpoken unto you now, ſhall judge you in the laſt day."

Cook. I pray thee tell me, who is the head of the congregation?

Jackſon. Chriſt is the head.

Cook. But who is head in earth.

Jackſon. Chriſt hath members here in earth.

Cook. Who are they?

Jackſon. They that are ruled by the word of God.

Cook. You are a good fellow.

Jackſon. I am that I am.

Then Dr. Cook ſaid to my keeper, Have him to priſon again.

I am contented with that, ſaid I; and ſo we departed.

I anſwer no further in this matter, becauſe I thought he ſhould not have my blood in a corner. But I hope in the living God, that when the time ſhall come, before the congregation I ſhall ſhake their building after another manner of faſhion. For they build but upon the ſand, and their walls be daubed with untempered mortar, and therefore they cannot ſtand long.

Therefore (good brothers and ſiſters) be of good cheer: for I truſt in my God, I and my other priſon fellows ſhall go joyfully before you, praiſing God moſt heartily, that we are counted worthy to be witneſſes of his truth. I pray you accept my ſimple anſwer at this time, committing you unto God.

Of this John Jackſon, beſides theſe his foreſaid anſwers and examination before Dr. Cook one of the commiſſioners, no more came to our hands.

The Martyrdom of Joan Waſte, a blind Woman, in the Town of Derby.

THE firſt day of Auguſt, ſuffered likewiſe at the town of Derby, a poor honeſt woman, being blind from her birth, and unmarried, about the age of 22, named Joan Waſte, of the pariſh of Alhallows. Of them that ſate upon this innocent woman's blood, the chiefeſt was Ralph Bain, biſhop of the dioceſe, Dr. Draicot his chancellor, Sir John Port knight, Henry Vernon eſquire, Peter Finch official of Derby, with the aſſiſtance alſo of divers others, Richard Ward and William Bembridge the ſame time being bailiffs of the town of Derby, &c.

Firſt, After the abovenamed biſhop and Dr. Draicot had cauſed the ſaid Joan Waſte to be apprehended in the town of Derby, ſuſpecting her to be guilty of certain hereſies, ſhe was divers times privily examined, as well in priſon as out of priſon, by Peter Finch the official: after that brought to public examination before the biſhop; at laſt, was there burnt in Derby, as is aboveſaid. Concerning whoſe life, bringing up, and converſation, ſomewhat more amply we mind to diſcourſe, as by faithful relation hath come to my hands.

Firſt, This Joan Waſte was the daughter of William Waſte, an honeſt poor man, a barber, who ſometimes alſo uſed to make ropes. His wife had the ſame Joan and one other at one birth, and ſhe was born blind. And when ſhe was about twelve or fourteen years old ſhe learned to knit hoſe and ſleeves, and other things, which in time ſhe could do very well. Furthermore, as time ſerved, ſhe would help her father to turn ropes, and do ſuch other things as ſhe was able, and in no caſe would be idle. Thus ſhe continued with her father and mother during their lives. After whoſe deceaſe ſhe lived with her brother Roger Waſte, and in the time of king Edward the ſixth of bleſſed memory, gave herſelf daily to hear divine ſervice read in the vulgar tongue. And thus by hearing homilies and ſermons, ſhe became marvelloufly well affected to the religion then taught. So at length having ſaved ſo much money as would buy her a New Teſtament, ſhe cauſed one one to be provided for her. And although ſhe was of herſelf unlearned, and by reaſon of her blindneſs unable to read, yet for the great deſire ſhe had to underſtand, and have imprinted in her memory the ſayings of the holy ſcriptures contained in the New Teſtament, ſhe acquainted herſelf chiefly with John Hurt, then priſoner in the common-hall of Derby for debts.

The ſame John Hurt being a grave ſober man, of the age of threeſcore and ten years, by her earneſt intreaty, and being a priſoner, and many times idle and without company, did for his exerciſe daily read unto her ſome one chapter of the New Teſtament. And if at any time he were otherwiſe occupied or hindered through ſickneſs, ſhe would repair unto John Pemerton clerk of the pariſh church of All-Saints in the ſame town of Derby, or to ſome other perſon which could read, and ſometimes ſhe would give a penny or two (as ſhe might ſpare) to ſuch perſons as would not freely read unto her, appointing unto them beforehand how many chapters of the New Teſtament they ſhould read, or how often they ſhould repeat one chapter upon a price.

Moreover in the ſaid Joan Waſte this was notorious, that ſhe being utterly blind, could notwithſtanding, without a guide, go to any church within the ſaid town of Derby, or to any other place or perſon, with whom ſhe had any ſuch exerciſe. By which exerciſe ſhe ſo profited, that ſhe was able not only to recite many chapters of the New Teſtament, but alſo could aptly diſprove, by divers places of ſcriptures, as well ſin, as ſuch abuſes in religion, as then were too much in uſe in divers and ſundry perſons.

As this godly woman thus daily increaſed in the knowledge of God's holy word, and no leſs in her life expreſſed the virtuous fruits and exerciſe of the ſame: not long after, through the fatal death of bleſſed king Edward, followed the woful ruin of religion in the reign of queen Mary his ſiſter. In which alteration notwithſtanding the general backſliding of the greateſt part and multitude of the whole realm into popery again, yet this poor blind woman, continuing in a conſtant conſcience, proceeded ſtill in her former exerciſe, being both zealous in that ſhe had learned, and alſo refuſing to communicate in religion with thoſe, which taught contrary doctrine to that ſhe had before learned in king Edward's time.

For which ſhe was called and convented before the aforeſaid biſhop and Dr. Draicot, with divers others called in to bear witneſs.

The articles miniſtered unto her, and wherewith ſhe was charged, were theſe; Firſt, that ſhe did hold the ſacrament of the altar to be but only a memory or repreſentation of Chriſt's body, and material bread and wine, but not his natural body, unleſs it were received. And that it ought not to be reſerved from time to time over the altar, but immediately to be received, &c.

Item, That ſhe did hold, in receiving of the ſacrament of the altar, ſhe did not receive the ſame body that was born of the virgin Mary, and ſuffered upon the croſs for our redemption, &c.

Item, She did hold, that Chriſt at his laſt ſupper did not bleſs the bread that he had then in his hands, but was bleſſed himſelf, and by the virtue of the words of conſecration, the ſubſtance of the bread and wine is not converted and turned into the ſubſtance of the body and blood of Chriſt.

Item, That ſhe did grant that ſhe was of the pariſh of Allhallows in Derby, &c.

Item, That all and ſingular the premiſes are true and notorious by public report and fame, &c.

Whereunto ſhe anſwered, that ſhe believed therein ſo much as the holy ſcripture taught her, and according to that ſhe had heard preached unto her by divers learned men. Whereof ſome ſuffered impriſonment, and others ſuffered death for the ſame doctrine: among whom ſhe named, beſides others, Dr. Taylor, who, ſhe ſaid, took it of his conſcience, that the doctrine which he taught was true, and aſked of them, if they would do ſo in like caſe for their doctrine: which if they would not, ſhe deſired them for God's ſake not to trouble her, being a blind, poor, and unlearned woman, with any further talk, ſaying, that by God's aſſiſtance, ſhe was as ready to yield up her life in that faith, in ſuch ſort as they ſhould appoint.

And yet notwithſtanding being preſt by the ſaid biſhop and Dr. Draicot, with many arguments of Chriſt's omnipotency, as, Why was not Chriſt able as well to make the bread his body, as turn water into wine, raiſe Lazarus from the dead, and ſuch other like arguments, and many times being threatened with grievous impriſonments, torments, and death. The poor woman thus being as it were half aſtoniſhed through their terrors and threats, and probably deſirous to prolong her life, offered to the biſhop then preſent, that if he would before that company, take it upon his conſcience, that the doctrine which he would have her to believe concerning the ſacrament was true, and that he would at the dreadful day of judgment anſwer for her therein (as the ſaid Dr. Taylor in divers of his ſermons did offer) ſhe would then further anſwer them.

Whereunto the biſhop anſwered, he would. But Dr. Draicot his chancellor hearing that, ſaid, My lord, you know not what you do, you may in no caſe anſwer for an heretic. And he immediately aſked the poor woman whether ſhe would recant or no, and ſaid ſhe ſhould anſwer for herſelf. Unto whoſe ſayings the biſhop alſo conformed himſelf.

The poor woman perceiving this, anſwered again, that if they refuſed to take of their conſcience that it was true they would have her to believe, ſhe would anſwer no farther, but deſired them to do their pleaſure; and ſo after certain circumſtances, they pronounced ſentence againſt her, and delivered her to the bailiffs of the ſaid town of Derby aforenamed; who after they had kept her about a month or five weeks, there came unto them a writ De Heretico Comburendo; by virtue whereof they were appointed by the ſaid biſhop to bring her to the pariſh church of All-Saints at a day appointed, where Dr. Draicot was to make a ſermon.

When the time was come that this innocent martyr ſhould ſuffer, firſt came to the church Dr. Draicot, accompanied with divers gentlemen, as Mr. Thomas Powthread, Mr. Henry Vernon, Mr. Detick of Newal, and divers others. This done, and all things now in a readineſs, at laſt the poor blind creature and ſervant of God was brought and ſet before the pulpit, where the ſaid doctor being entered into his ſermon, and there inveighing againſt many matters, which he called hereſies, declared unto the people that that woman was condemned for denying the ſacrament of the altar to be the very body and blood of Chriſt really and ſubſtantially, and was thereby cut off from the body of the catholic church; and ſaid, that ſhe was not only blind of her bodily eyes, but alſo blind in the eyes of her ſoul. And he ſaid, As her body ſhould be preſently conſumed with material fire, ſo her ſoul ſhould be burned in hell with everlaſting fire, as ſoon as it ſhall be ſeparated from the body, and there remain without end: and ſaid it was not lawful for the people to pray for her: and ſo with many terrible threats he made an end of his ſermon, and commanded the bailiffs and thoſe gentlemen to ſee her executed. Then this bleſſed ſervant of God was carried away from the church, to a place called the Windmill Pit, near to the ſaid town; and holding Roger Waſte her brother by the hand ſhe prepared herſelf, and deſired the people to pray with her, and ſaid ſuch prayers as ſhe before had learned, and cried upon Chriſt to have mercy upon her as long as life ſerved. In this mean ſeaſon the ſaid Dr. Draicot went to his inn, for great ſorrow of her death, and there laid him down and ſlept, during all the time of her execution. And thus much of Joan Waſte.

Now, foraſmuch as I am not ignorant (faithful reader) that this and other ſtories ſet forth of the martyrs, will not want carpers and markers enow, ready to ſeek all holes and corners how to defame the memory of God's good ſaints, and to condemn theſe hiſtories of lies and untruths, eſpecially hiſtories wherein they ſee their ſhameful acts and unchriſtian cruelty detected and brought to light; therefore for the better confirmation of this hiſtory above written, and to ſtop the mouths of ſuch momes, this ſhall be to admoniſh all and ſingular readers hereof, that the diſcourſe of this poor blind woman's life and death, in ſuch ſort as is above perfixed, hath been confeſſed to be very true, by divers perſons of worthy credit, and yet living; and alſo hath been carefully peruſed and examined by W. Bambridge, before mentioned, bailiff then of Derby; who as well of his own knowledge, as by ſpecial enquiry and conference by him made, with divers others, hath certified us the ſame to be undoubted; beſide the teſtimony of John Cadman, curate of the ſaid town, and of others alſo, upon whoſe honeſty well known, and their report herein nothing differing from ſuch as were beſt acquainted with that matter, I have been here the more bold to commit this ſtory to poſterity, for all good men to conſider and judge upon.

Of Edward Sharp, John Hart, Thomas Ravenſdale, a Shoemaker, a Currier, a Carpenter, John Horn, and a Woman.

ON the 8th day of September (which was the next month following) a certain godly, aged, devout perſon, and zealous of the Lord's glory, born in Wiltſhire, named Edward Sharp, of the age of forty years, or thereabouts, was condemned at Briſtol to the like martyrdom, where he conſtantly and manfully perſiſting in the juſt quarrel of Chriſt's goſpel, for miſliking and renouncing the ordinances of the Romiſh church, was tried as pure gold, and made a lively ſacrifice in the fire: in whoſe death, as in the death of all his other ſaints, the Lord be glorified and thanked for his great grace of conſtancy; to whom be praiſe for ever, Amen.

On the 24th of the ſame month, 1556, John Hart, Thomas Ravenſdale, a ſhoemaker and a currier, ſuffered at Mayfield in Suſſex: who being at the place where they ſhould ſuffer, after they had made their prayers, and were at the ſtake, ready to undergo the force of the fire, they conſtantly and joyfully yielded their lives for the teſtimony of the glorious goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, unto whom be praiſe for ever and ever, Amen.

The day following, which was the 25th of the ſaid month, a young man, by trade a carpenter (whoſe name we have not) was put to death for the like teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt, at Briſtol, where he yielded himſelf to the torments of the fire, gave up his life into the hands of the Lord, with ſuch joyful conſtancy and triumph, as all the church of Chriſt have juſt cauſe to praiſe God for him.

On the 27th of the ſame month of September, John Horn and a woman ſuffered death by fire at Wotton-underedge, in Glouceſterſhire, and died very glorioufly in a conſtant faith, to the terror of the wicked, and comfort of the godly. So glorioufly did the Lord work in them, that death unto them was life, and life with a blotted conſcience was death.

The unmerciful Handling of William Dangerfield and Joan his Wife, being in Childbed, taken out of her Houſe, with her ſucking Infant of fourteen Days old, and laid in the common Gaol among Thieves and Murderers.

WHEN I had written and finiſhed the ſtory of the three Garnſey women, with the young infant there burned with them, and alſo had paſſed the burning of the poor blind woman Joan Waſte at Derby, I well hoped I ſhould have found no more ſuch ſtories of unmerciful cruelty ſhewed upon innocent women with their children and young infants: but now coming the perſecution in Glouceſterſhire, about the parts of Briſtol, I find another ſtory of ſuch unmercifulneſs ſhewed againſt a woman in childbed, as far from all charity and humanity, as any other ſtory that hath hitherto been rehearſed, as by the ſequel hereof may appear.

In the pariſh of Wotton-underedge, not far from Briſtol, dwelt William Dangerfield, an honeſt poor man, who by his wife Joan had nine children, and ſhe now lying in childbed of the tenth. This William, after he had been abroad from his houſe a certain ſpace for fear of perſecution, hearing that his wife was brought to bed, repaired home to viſit her, as natural duty required, and to ſee his children, ſhe being delivered four days before.

The return of this man was no ſooner known to ſome of his unkind and uncharitable neighbours, but they, incenſed with the ſpirit of popery, immediately beſet the houſe, and apprehended him, and carried him to priſon, and ſo at length he was brought to the biſhop, Dr. Brooks, in whoſe cruel handling he remained ſo long, till his legs almoſt were fretted off with irons.

After the apprehenſion of the huſband, the wife likewiſe was taken, with her young-born child, being but fourteen days old, out of her childbed, and carried into the common goal, and there confined amongſt thieves and murderers; where ſhe and her innocent babe found ſo little charity, that ſhe could never come to any fire, but was driven to warm the cloaths that ſhe ſhould put about the child in her boſom.

In the mean ſeaſon while the huſband and wife lay thus incloſed in ſeveral priſons, the biſhop began to practiſe not with the woman firſt, as the ſerpent did with Eve, but with the man, craftily deceiving his ſimplicity with fair gloſſing words, falſly perſuading him that his wife had recanted, and aſking him, wherefore he ſhould more ſtand in his own conceit, than ſhe, being as well learned as he; and ſo ſubtily drew out a form of recantation, wherewith he deceived the ſimple ſoul. Whereunto after that he had once granted that he would conſent, although he had not yet recanted, they ſuffered him to go to his wife, where ſhe lay in the common-goal.

Then they with melting hearts opening their minds one to another, when he ſaw his wife not releaſed, and perceiving he had not done well, he declared unto her the whole matter, how falſly he was circumvented by the ſubtle flatterings of the biſhop, telling him that ſhe had certainly recanted: and thus deceiving me, ſaid he, brought this unto me, and ſo plucked out of his boſom the copy of the recantation, whereunto he had granted his promiſe. At the ſight whereof the wife hearing what her huſband had done, her heart cleft aſunder, ſaying, Alack, thus long have we continued one, and hath Satan ſo prevailed, to cauſe you to break your firſt vow made to Chriſt in baptiſm? And ſo departed the ſaid William and Joan his wife, with what hearts the Lord knoweth. Then began he greatly to bewail his promiſe made to the biſhop, and to make his prayer to Almighty God, deſiring him that he might not live ſo long as to call evil good, and good evil; or light darkneſs, or darkneſs light; and ſo he departed toward his houſe: where by the way homeward (as he affirmed) he took his death, and ſhortly after departed, according to his prayer, after he had been in priſon twelve weeks.

After this, Joan his wife continued ſtill in priſon with her tender infant, till at laſt ſhe was brought before that biſhop to be examined. Whereunto, what her anſwers were, it is not certainly known. Howbeit moſt like it is whatſoever they were, they pleaſed not the biſhop, as appeared by his anger increaſed againſt the poor woman, and her long continuance in the priſon, together with her tender babe, which alſo remained with her in the gaol, partaker of her martyrdom, ſo long as her milk would ſerve to give it ſuck, till at length the child, being ſtarved for cold and famine, was ſent away when it was paſt all remedy, and ſo ſhortly after died: And not long after the mother alſo followed. Beſides, the old woman, which was mother of the huſband, of the age of eighty years and upward, who being left in the houſe after their apprehenſion, for lack of comfort, there periſhed alſo.

And thus have ye in one ſtory the death of four together; firſt of the old woman, then of the huſband, after that of the innocent child, and laſtly of the mother. What became of the other nine children, I am not perfectly ſure, but that I partly underſtand that they were all undone by the ſame.

This ſtory is reported and teſtified as well by others, as namely by Mrs. Bridges dwelling in the ſame town, and partaker then of the like afflictions, and hardly eſcaped her life.

In the month of October following, was burnt at the town of Northampton a ſhoemaker, a true witneſs and diſciple of the Lord, who according to the grace of God given unto him, cleaving faſt to the ſound doctrine and preaching of God's word, renounced the untrue and falſe coloured religion of the Romiſh ſee, wherein many a good man hath been drowned.

After whom, not long after in the ſame month of October, died alſo in the caſtle of Chicheſter three godly confeſſors, being there in bonds for the like cauſe of Chriſt's goſpel, who alſo ſhould have ſuffered the like martyrdom, had not their natural death, or rather (as it is to be ſuſpected) the cruel handling of the papiſts, made them away before, and afterwards buried them in the fields.

I read moreover, that in this preſent year, to wit, 1556, one named Hooke, a true witneſs of the Lord's truth, was burnt at Cheſter.

Five Perſons famiſhed in Canterbury Caſtle, by the unmerciful Tyranny of the Papiſts, about the beginning of November.

AS among all the biſhops, Bonner biſhop of London, principally excelled in perſecuting the poor members and ſaints of Chriſt; ſo of all archdeacons, Nicholas Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury (as may evidently appear) was the foreſt, and of leaſt compaſſion (only Dunning of Norwich excepted) by whoſe unmerciful and ſurly diſpoſition very many were put to death in that dioceſe of Canterbury, not only in the bloody time of queen Mary, but ſome alſo in the beginning of the reign of our renowned and moſt gracious queen Elizabeth, as by the grace of Chriſt hereafter ſhall appear.

Of thoſe that ſuffered in the dioceſe of Canterbury in the time of queen Mary, ſome be recited already, with the order and form of ſuch articles as then were moſt commonly adminiſtered to the examiners by Thornton, ſuffragan of Dover, and the ſaid Nicholas Harpsfield, and others, as before-mentioned.

Now to proceed in order and courſe of time where we left, next followeth the month of November.

In the beginning whereof fifteen godly and innocent martyrs, were together in the caſtle of Canterbury, of which number not one eſcaped with life, but either were burnt, or elſe famiſhed in priſon: of which two ſorts, which is the eaſier death, God knoweth, is hard to judge. Notwithſtanding, the truth is, that of theſe fifteen, ten ſuffered in the fire, of whom in the next book more (God willing) ſhall be ſaid: the other five pined, and were moſt cruelly famiſhed in the cloſe priſon, of whom we ſhall now treat. The names of whom were theſe.

1. John Clark.
2. Dunſton Chittenden. } theſe were yet uncondemned.
3. William Foſter of Stone.
4. Alice Potkins.
5. John Archer of Crambroke, weaver. } Theſe three were condemned to be burnt.

Of theſe five priſoners, the firſt two were uncondemned, the other three were condemned, and ſhould have been burnt, but ſuffered no leſs torments than if they had abode the fire, being pined to death by famine. What their articles and anſwers were I need not here recite, ſeeing all they in the time of queen Mary commonly ſuffered for one manner of cauſe, that is, for holding againſt the ſeven ſacraments, againſt the reality of Chriſt's being in his ſupper, for ſpeaking againſt the church of Rome, and determinations of the ſame, againſt images ſet up and worſhipped in the church, for not coming to church, &c.

Firſt, William Foſter anſwering to theſe and like articles, ſaid, That he believed well in all the articles of the creed; but to believe that there be more ſacraments than two, and to pray to ſaints either to profit us, or to pray for ſouls in purgatory to profit them, that faith and works do juſtify, or to allow the popiſh ceremonies in the church, that he denied. Moreover he ſaid, to carry candles upon Candlemas-day, it were as good for him as to carry a dung-fork; and that it is as neceſſary to carry the gallows about, if his father were hanged, as the croſs. To come to the church he could not, he ſaid, with a falſe conſcience. Concerning fiſh-days and fleſh-days, he granted it good to put difference therein, except where neceſſity required the contrary.

This William Foſter was a labouring man, of the age of forty years. He was apprehended and impriſoned by Sir Thomas Moyle, knight.

Alice Potkins for the like confeſſion, was condemned to be burnt, for that ſhe was not, neither would be confeſſed to the prieſt, for that ſhe received not the ſacrament of the altar, becauſe ſhe would not pray to ſaints, nor creep to the croſs, &c. Being demanded of her age, ſhe ſaid ſhe was forty-nine years old, according to her old age; and according to her young age, ſince ſhe learned Chriſt, ſhe was of one year's age, and was committed to priſon by Mr. Roberts.

The anſwer and confeſſion of John Archer of Crambroke was much in like ſort. And although ſome of theſe upon ignorant ſimplicity ſwerved a little in the number of ſacraments, ſome granting one ſacrament, that is, the body of Chriſt hanging upon the croſs, ſome more, ſome leſs, &c. yet in the principal matter concerning the doctrine of ſalvation for faith to ſtay upon, and in diſagreeing from the dreaming determinations of the popiſh church, they moſt agreed. Concerning the not praying to ſaints, and for the dead in purgatory, for not creeping to the croſs, for faith only to juſtify, for taking of an oath, and other ſuch like, he granted as the other had done. This father Archer, by his occupation a weaver, of the town of Crambroke, of the age of fifty years, was impriſoned by Sir John Gilford knight.

And thus have ye the cauſe and impriſonment of theſe five priſoners. Now as touching the cruelty of their death, that ye ſhall not ſurmiſe the ſuſpicion or relation thereof to proceed of myſelf, you ſhall hear their own teſtimony by their own letter, thrown out of the priſon, concerning the unmerciful dealing of the popiſh tyrants in famiſhing them, as is aforeſaid. The copy of their letter is this:

The Copy of a Letter written and caſt out of the Caſtle of Canterbury by the Priſoners there in Bonds for God's Word, declaring how the Papiſts went about to famiſh them to death; of which Company five were already moſt cruelly famiſhed among them.

BE it known unto all men that ſhall read or hear read theſe our letters, that we the poor priſoners of the caſtle of Canterbury for God's truth, are kept and lie in cold irons, and our keepers will not ſuffer any meat to be brought to us to comfort us. And if any man do bring us any thing, as bread, butter, cheeſe, or any other food, the ſaid keeper will charge them that ſo bring us any thing, except money or raiment, to carry it them again; or elſe if he do receive any food of any for us, he doth keep it for himſelf, and he and his ſervants do ſpend it, ſo that we have nothing thereof; and thus the keeper keepeth away our victuals from us: inſomuch that there are four of us priſoners there for God's truth, famiſhed already, and thus is it his mind to famiſh us all: and we think he is appointed appointed thereunto by the biſhops and prieſts, and alſo of the juſtices, ſo to famiſh us, and not only us of the ſaid caſtle, but alſo all other priſoners in other priſons for the like cauſe to be alſo famiſhed: notwithſtanding we write not theſe our letters, to that intent we might not afford to be famiſhed for the Lord Jeſus' ſake, but for this cauſe and intent, that they, having no law to famiſh us in priſon, ſhould not do it privily, but that the murderers hearts ſhould be openly known to all the world, that all men may know of what church they are, and who is their father. Out of the caſtle of Canterbury.

The Perſecution of divers good People in the Dioceſe of Litchfield.

THESE aforeſaid months of September, November, and December, as they were troubleſome to many other places, and eſpecially to the dioceſe of Canterbury, by reaſon of the archdeacon above-named; ſo likewiſe they brought no little buſineſs in the country to Litchfield and Coventry, by a cruel biſhop there, named Ralph Baine, and a more cruel chancellor called Dr. Draicot, through the fierce inquiſition of whom great ſtir was there among the people, being called to examination of their faith, and many cauſed to bear faggots. Who, although they were not put to the torment of death, yet becauſe it may appear what a number there is in the countries of England abroad, who in their hearts have a miſliking of the pope's Romiſh laws and religion, if for fear they durſt utter their minds, I thought to make a rehearſal of their names, which in the aforeſaid dioceſe of Conventry and Litchfield were taken in ſuſpicion, and examined for their religion.

And firſt amongſt them that were detected and enjoined to the popiſh penance, that is, to bear a faggot, candle, and beads about in proceſſion, were Agnes Foreman, detected, examined, and by witneſs convicted, and bare a faggot the 12th of September. Likewiſe Margery Kirry, Thomas Norris, Thomas Stiffe, William Kaime, Robert Katrenes, Tho. Smith, John Borſley the younger. Item, John Waterhouſe, againſt whom came in witneſs and accuſers Richard Canterbanke, J. Edge, William Smith, Robert Cooke, laying againſt him for ſeldom coming to church, for giving no reverence at the elevation of the ſacrament, but looking upon his book, for not kiſſing the pix, &c. Robert Biſſel, Leonard Weſt, Richard Baily of the pariſh of Whitacre.

Theſe were deprived.

Nicholas Cartwright, doctor; Richard Jurdian, prieſt; Edmund Crokel, prieſt; Thomas Whitehead, prieſt; William Taylor, prieſt; Anſelme Sele, prieſt; Richard Slavy, prieſt, married; Edward Hawkes, prieſt, married; Robert Aſton, prieſt, deprived; Henry Tecka, prieſt, deprived; Robert Moſſey, prieſt, married and deprived.

There were divers others beſides theſe, who in like manner were detected, accuſed and examined, although they bare no faggot, but were diſmiſſed; as Richard Kempe, John Franklin, William Marler, Julius Dudley, Euſtache Byſacre, William Shene, Anthony Afterwhittle, Thomas Steilbe, Henry Birdlim, William Moſeley, John Leach, John Richardſon, Anthony Jones alias Pulton, Thomas Wilſon, Thomas Lynacres and Hugh Lynacres his ſon, Iſabel Parker, Martin Newman, William Enderby, Cicely Preſton, Thomas Saltar, John Stamford ſhoemaker, Richard Woodburne, Thomas Arnal ſhoemaker, John Robinſon, Hugh Moore ſhoemaker, John Adale, Thomas Arch, Frances Ward, John Avines, Richard Foxal, Thomas Underdonne, Richard Weaver.

Theſe forenamed perſons, with many more following in the next year after, although they did ſubſcribe and relent through fear of death; yet for this cauſe I do here recite them, that by them it might appear what a number there were not only in the country of Litchfield, but alſo in other parts, in heart ſet againſt the pope's proceedings, if that fear rather than conſcience had not compelled them to the contrary.

Thus have ye the whole perſecution of this year declared, with the names of all them which ſuffered martyrdom within the compaſs of the year 1556: the number of all which, ſlain and martyred in divers places of England at ſundry times this year, came to above 84 perſons, whereof many were women, wives, widows and maidens; beſides thoſe who by ſecret practices were otherwiſe made away, or driven from their goods, out of their houſes, or out of the realm, or elſe within the realm were put to penance, and coacted by forcible violence to recant, ſave only that I have omitted the ſtory of Sir John Cheeke, knight, and ſchoolmaſter ſome time to king Edward. The worthineſs of which man deſerveth much to be ſaid of him; but his fall ſhould rather be covered in ſilence and oblivion. Only to note a word or two of a few things to the preſent ſtory moſt principally appertaining, it ſhall ſuffice.

Sir John Cheeke being in the country of Germany, out of all danger of perſecution, with many more of his own countrymen and acquaintance, was not only in ſafety, but alſo with reputation accordingly eſteemed among the Germans, and alſo well placed in the city of Straſbourg. Where if he had contented himſelf to have remained, rather giving place to time, than to preſume upon adventures, peradventure it had been better for him. But what fatal inſtigation wrought in his mind I know not. In the end ſo it fell, that he would needs take his journey with Sir Peter Carew, from High Germany to Bruſſels, and that (as I have credibly heard of them which knew ſomewhat) not without the forecaſting of his adventured journey by the conſtellation of the ſtars, and diſpoſition of the heavens above. For as he was a man famouſly expert, and travelled in the knowledge of ſundry arts and ſciences, ſo was he a little too much addicted to the curious practiſing of this ſtar-divinity, which we call aſtrology. But howſoever it was, or whatſoever it was that the ſtars did promiſe him, truth was, that the men here on earth kept little promiſe with him. For having, as it is ſaid, king Philip's ſafe conduct to paſs and repaſs, and that by the means as I find of the Lord Paget, and Sir John Maſ. pledging for his ſafeguard king Philip's fidelity, he came to Bruſſels, to ſee the queen's ambaſſadors: and having brought the lord Paget on his way toward England, in the return between Bruſſels and Antwerp, he was taken with Sir Peter Carew by the Provoſt Marſhal, ſpoiled of their horſes, and clapped into a cart, their legs, arms, and bodies tied with halters to the body of the cart, and ſo ſhipped, being blindfold under the hatches, and ſo brought to the Tower of London.

Thus the good man being entrapped, and in the hands now of his enemies, had but one of theſe two ways to take, either to change his religion, or to change his life, other remedy with thoſe holy catholics there was none. Neither could his conſcience excuſe him, nor truth defend him, nor his learning help him.

However Mr. Fecknam, whether ſuborned by the queen, or upon his own devotion and friendſhip toward his old acquaintance, took upon him the defence and commendation of Sir John Cheeke, ſpeaking in his behalf: yet no mercy could be had with the queen, but he muſt needs recant, and ſo he did.

Then after this recantation, he was through the crafty handling of the papiſts, allured firſt to dine and accompany with them, at length drawn unawares to ſit in place where the poor martyrs were brought before Bonner and other biſhops to be condemned; the remorſe whereof ſo mightily wrought in his heart, that not long after he left this mortal life. Whoſe fall, although it was full of infirmity, yet his riſing again by repentance was great, and his end comfortable, the Lord be praiſed.

An

THE END OF THE SECOND BOOK.

An Account of the Sufferings and Death of the Proteſtants in the Reign of Queen MARY the Firſt.

BOOK III.

The Order and Manner of Cardinal Poole's Viſitation in Cambridge, with the condemning, taking up, and burning the Bones and Books of Martin Bucer, and Paulus Phagius, January 7, 1559.

CARDINAL Poole, three years after his return into England, having ſomewhat withdrawn his mind from other affairs of the realm, and having in all points eſtabliſhed the Romiſh religion, began to have an eye to the univerſity of Cambridge, which place, among others, eſpecially ſeemed to have need of reformation out of hand. To perform this charge were choſen Cuthbert Scot, not long before conſecrated biſhop of Cheſter, Nicholas Ormanet, an Italian, arch-prieſt of the people of Bodolon, in the dioceſe of Vernon, profeſſed in both the laws, and bearing the name of the pope's datary, Thomas Watſon, elected biſhop of Lincoln, Chriſtopherſon, elected biſhop of Chicheſter, and Henry Cole, provoſt of the college of Eton. There was good cauſe why the matter was eſpecially committed to theſe perſons; for as touching Ormanet, it is well known that he was a man of much eſtimation with Julius the third, and at that time biſhop of Rome, and was appointed to come into England with cardinal Poole, becauſe without his knowledge (as in whom he put his chief truſt and confidence) the biſhop would have nothing done that was of any importance or weight.

Theſe perſons thus appointed (in the mean while as the viſitors were addreſſing themſelves to the journey) ſent their letters with the cardinal's citation before to Dr. Andrew Perne, then vice-chancellor of Cambridge, with the other commiſſioners aſſociate, commanding him to warn all the graduates of the univerſity, in their name, to be in readineſs againſt the 11th day of January, betwixt eight and ten of the clock, in the church of St. Mary the virgin; willing him eſpecially to be there himſelf in preſence, and alſo to ſet forward all the reſidue, to whoſe charge it belonged, that they ſhould ſearch out all ſtatutes, books, privileges, and monuments appertaining to the univerſity, or to any of the colleges, or finally to any of themſelves, and theſe to preſent the ſame before them at the day appointed, and every man to appear there perſonally; for they would not fail being there at the ſame time, to lay before them ſuch things as ſhould ſeem neceſſary to this charge of reforming the univerſity, and further to give charge of all ſuch things as ſhould ſeem moſt for the profit and behoof of the ſame, together with ſuch things as were to be done on their part, according as ſhould ſeem moſt agreeable to the decrees of the canon law.

This citation of the cardinal, being brought to Cambridge by Mr. Bullock, was firſt exhibited in the convocation-houſe of regents, and there openly read by the orator of the univerſity the 11th of December.

After this, upon the 24th of December, which was Chriſtmas Eve, the vice-chancellor, with the heads of the houſes, meeting together in the ſchools, it was there concluded, that the viſitors' charges ſhould be born by the univerſity and colleges (which then coſt the univerſity an hundred pound) and alſo that no maſter of any college ſhould ſuffer any of the fellows, ſcholars, or miniſters, to go forth of the town, but to return before the viſitation.

On Friday the eighth of January the queen's commiſſioners, namely, Dr. Perne, vice-chancellor, Dr. Sedgwick, Dr. Harvy, Mr. Frank, Kuſt, and another who is here nameleſs, and alſo Sir James Dyer the recorder, Mr. Chapman, and Evered ſitting together in the hall, ſome were there called by the appointment of L. Hawes, and charge given what ſhould be done. And firſt the commiſſion was read. Then were all the high-conſtables called to bring in their precepts, and ſworn. Alſo two of every pariſh of ten or twelve hundreds, were ſworn to enquire of hereſy, lollardy, conſpiracy, ſeditious words, tales, and rumours againſt the king and queen. Item, For heretical and ſeditious books, for negligences, and miſdemeanors in the church, for obſervation of ceremonies, for ornaments, and ſtock of the church.

We ſaid at the firſt, that the cardinal thought the univerſity to have need of reformation. The reaſon why he ſhould think ſo was this; either becauſe the ſame of long continuance had caſt off the biſhop of Rome, and cleaved to the wholeſome doctrine of the goſpel; or elſe by reaſon that both for the late ſchiſm, not yet worn out of memory, and for the doctrine of Martin Bucer, who not long before openly in the ſaid univerſity interpreted holy ſcripture, they ſaw many ſo ſore corrupted and ſpotted with this infection, that (even as when fire is ſpread in a town) unleſs a ſpeedy remedy were applied out of hand, it were not poſſible to their thinking, to quench it many years after. Who alſo feared (if it were not looked to in time) leſt this miſchief would take root, and by little and little infect all the members next unto it, which yet were whole and ſound.

This was in the year 1556. To the intent therefore to make a ſalve for this ſore, the inquiſitors, of whom we ſpake before, came unto Cambridge the ninth day of January. And as they were yet in their journey, and far from the town, divers of the maſters and preſidents of the colleges met them, and brought them courteouſly, firſt into the town, and after to their lodgings. They were entertained in Trinity college by Mr. John Chriſtopherſon, maſter of the ſaid houſe, and a little before elected biſhop of Chicheſter. Notwithſtanding they were deſired, ſome to one place, and ſome to another, as occaſion ſerved, either to do their duties, or to ſhew their good wills: Dr. Cole to the King's college, and Dr. Watſon to St. John's. But whether it were for the acquaintance of Chriſtopherſon, or for the largeneſs of the houſe, which ſeemed moſt convenient for their purpoſe, they all took up their lodgings in the ſaid college with Mr. Chriſtopherſon.

At their coming thither an oration was made by a fellow of the houſe, who in the name of all the reſt, with long proteſtation declared, that they were moſt heartily welcome thither, and that he and his fellows gave them great thanks, that it had pleaſed their lordſhips to have ſo good opinion of them, as to chooſe their houſe eſpecially to lodge in, whereby they had both encouraged them to ſtand in hope of ſome further benevolence towards them, and alſo done great honour to their college by their being there: wherefore they ſhould look at their hand again for as much duty and reverence as lay in their power to perform.

To this oration Dr. Watſon made anſwer, That this forward and earneſt good-wills and minds of theirs, in doing ſuch courteſy, was right thankfully taken both of him and his, exhorting them to continue ſtedfaſtly in the ſame, and to proceed alſo when need ſhould require: for it was ſo far from any of their thoughts, to ſtop them in this or that race, that they would rather haſte them forward to run through more ſpeedily, being not without good cauſe perſuaded to conceive good hope of their benevolence towards them, in as much as they would do for them whatſoever might turn to their profit and advantage.

This day, foraſmuch as it was towards evening ere they came, and the ſun was going down, nothing elſe was done. The next day, being the tenth of January, they beſtowed in recreating themſelves after their journey, and in ſetting other things at a ſtay. Nevertheleſs, to the intent the ſame ſhould not eſcape altogether without doing ſomewhat, they interdicted the two churches, namely, St. Mary's, where Mr. Bucer, and St. Michael's, where Paulus Phagius, lay buried.

Theſe men were dead a good while before, Paulus Phagius had ſcarce yet ſhewed the proof of his wit and learning when he departed to God, 1549. Bucer lived but a little after. During which time ſomewhat by writing, but chiefly by reading and preaching openly (wherein the old man, being painful in the word of God, never ſpared himſelf, nor regarded his health) he brought all men into ſuch admiration of him, that neither his friends could ſufficiently praiſe him, nor his enemies in any point find fault with his ſingular life and ſincere doctrine. A moſt certain token whereof may be his ſumptuous burial, ſolemnized with ſo great aſſiſtance and gladneſs of all the degrees of the univerſity, that it was not poſſible to deviſe more to the ſetting out and amplifying of the ſame. The whole manner and order of the doing whereof being written by Mr. Nicholas Carre, a learned man, in a little treatiſe to Sir John Cheeke, knight, with an epiſtle full of conſolation, as concerning his departure added thereunto, was ſent afterward unto Peter Martyr, then abiding at Oxford.

From the burial of Bucer and Phagius, unto the coming of theſe viſitors, three or four years were paſſed. And from the time of the deceaſe of king Edward the ſixth, unto that day, the prieſts celebrated their maſſes, and other kind of ceremonies, in thoſe places, and that without ſcruple of conſcience, as far as men could perceive. But after the time that theſe commiſſioners came thither, thoſe things that before were accounted for ſacred and holy, began to be denounced for prophane and unholy. For they commanded that all thoſe aſſemblies that ſhould hereafter be made for the executing of holy ceremonies, ſhould be removed to the King's Chapel, which is a place far more ſtately than all the other.

Now was come the 11th day, in which the vice-chancellor of the univerſity, with the maſters and preſidents of colleges, and all the other graduates of every houſe, were commanded to appear before the ſaid commiſſioners in their habits. It was commanded, that the ſcholars alſo ſhould come in their ſurplices, but that was not done. They aſſembled in great numbers to Trinity college, having the univerſity croſs borne before them, and in the Gatehouſe a form was ſet, and covered with cuſhions and carpet on the ground for the viſitors; where the vice-chancellor, having on a tiſſue cope, ſprinkled holy-water on them, and purpoſed to cenſe them, but they refuſed it there, which notwithſtanding afterward in the Queen's college, and elſewhere, they refuſed not.

There Mr. John Stokes, common orator of the univerſity, made a Latin oration in the name of all the reſt: A copy whereof, now rendered into Engliſh, here followeth.

Mr. Stokes's Oration to Queen Mary's Viſitors at Cambridge, Jan. 11, 1557.

THIS univerſity, moſt reverend fathers, has been a long time ſolicitous about your coming, now greatly pleaſed freely beholds your honours; and as a teſtimony of her willingneſs, pours out herſelf and all her treaſures. Aſſembled here ſee all the Cambridge ſcholars, all orders preſent, who I aſſure your lordſhips upon my own knowledge, one and all congratulate your much wiſhed arrival. For we are all perſuaded that the buſineſs of this day, through God's aſſiſtance, and your excellencies, will prove auſpicious to the common benefit of this univerſity; nor, in a matter ſo neceſſary to the common good, will your help be wanting. And by many things I am confirmed in this opinion, but I ſhall mention only thoſe that ſo nearly relate to the buſineſs in hand, that they cannot poſſibly be omitted; and theſe truly in number are certain and finite, but in their virtue and power ſo immenſe, that no faculty of ſpeech is able to expreſs; becauſe, as I ſaid before, the joy this univerſity received from your coming was very great, I beſeech you, while briefly I relate the manner, to grant a favourable ear.

The moſt reverend father in Chriſt, cardinal Poole, legate, who hath reſtored oppreſſed religion, ſupported the ruins of his country, brought back from exile our laws, he, I ſay, that Engliſh Poole, and our true Moſes, was the author of your viſitation, from whoſe excellent virtue many bleſſings have redounded to all parts of his country. Yet there was a ſtricter and nearer cauſe than the bond of neceſſity, ſeeing we were part of that republic, which he had ſeparately taken the government on himſelf. For the year before he moſt kindly took on himſelf the government of this univerſity, which he managed with ſo much prudence, that he not only removed whatever might impede our ſtudies, but alſo added ſuch ornaments, as greatly increaſed the glory of our univerſity; theſe things confirmed our former hopes, and now brings ſo freſh to our minds, that we cannot chuſe but think all his kindneſs to be collected in this viſitation, from which we expect all thoſe things which the remarkable love of our great chancellor, who looked on our univerſity as his proper pupil, promiſed. And I wiſh truly that he himſelf, was it not detrimental to the public, could have been here at this time; that he with his rays might have illuminated this univerſity, involved in darkneſs and a profound night, with the glory of the true religion. But this our deſire is repugnant to the public good, and the intereſt of the moſt holy apoſtolic ſee; the legate therefore has appointed you his ſubſtitutes, whoſe natural parts for wiſdom, whoſe perſons for worth, and whoſe minds for knowledge, he judged moſt fit for this employment: I can therefore aſſure you truly, we all eſteem you, as men whoſe religion we love, virtue we honour, and on whoſe good will, belief, and counſel for the public good we depend on. For after by the ſingular and extraordinary virtue of the legate, cardinal Poole, from the darkneſs and night of former times, we began to review the light in public, together with a clearer ſight of our former unhappineſs, to the greatneſs of which our ignorance of it contributed not a little; for, in my opinion, we ought to be accounted ſo much the more miſerable, who labouring under ſo damnable an hereſy, yet ſaw not the danger we were in. As that diſtemper is by much the worſe, which deſtroys nature without being perceived to afflict the ſenſes; and the man is often dead before he knew he was ſick. This was the diſeaſe of our univerſity, which however ſharp-ſighted other ways, in this caſe of religion, the head of the church being hurt (whence ſprings all the power of judging) became ſtupid, lethargic, and as it were without any ſenſe; till about three years ago, the divine compaſſion of the moſt holy father Julius, to us Engliſh almoſt dead, again incorporated us in his moſt holy church, again reſtored health to our bodies, and peace to our minds. How eaſy was it then for Britannia to ſee how near ſhe had approached the jaws of hell, this univerſity eſpecially plainly diſcerned, how our nation was miſerably afflicted with this deſolation and ſchiſm of religion. There is no need here to repeat the diſſolution of the monaſteries, the robbing the church, the ſlaying the prieſts, the murdering the nobles, the riots and tumults of the people, the impoveriſhing the whole kingdom, theſe things might poſſibly have happened, and we blameleſs, but here the judgment was ſo remarkable, that we muſt needs look on it as a puniſhment for our ſins and wickedneſs. But granting theſe things only the ſport of chance, we ſuffered worſe in our religion and conſcience. Piety towards God was vaniſhed, the chaſtity of the prieſts was turned into open proſtitution, the ſoul lay as it was aſleep, no religious ceremonies to awaken it; the mind by the variety of opinions ſo diſtracted, ſo differing from itſelf, that it embraced an infinity of errors, among which there were two principal fountains, of the ſtreams of which this univerſity drinking a little too much, we confeſs became intoxicated. The firſt owed its birth from the unnatural ſeparation from the unity of the catholic church, not unlike what of old Menenius Agrippa mentions of the members and the belly. The ſecond aroſe from Wickliffe's mud and mire, which made the celebration of the ſacrament of the altar an abomination.

For the truth of which let any man conſult himſelf: for we, imitating philoſophers, and thoſe none of the beſt, have borrowed a light to ſcriptures from the ſchool of the Epicureans. For whereas Chriſt (in the truth of theſe words is placed the foundation of our faith) affirms every where, diſtinctly, and without exception, the true and perpetual preſence of his body, yet we are truly to interpret theſe expreſſions as if they were imperfect, or had another meaning, unleſs we had recourſe to the atomes of Epicurus, and that the true body and blood of Chriſt was only as it were the body and blood. But this is not a time to make particular mention of all the things that have paſt, no, I rather wiſh they could be eternally forgot, that no remembrance of them might be handed down to our poſterity. Yet I thought myſelf obliged to ſay ſomething in the general, as a confeſſion of our paſt errors: ſtill remembering, that as this univerſity received her wounds from her former viſitors, ſo from you here preſent, ſhe may be reſtored to her former health. And here ſhe promiſes both for herſelf and hers, by her unwearied preaching of repentance, to bring back to the true religion all her erring children, and make them ſo diligent in the preſent, as to redeem the time paſt. For they that are firſt in this race, contend ſo earneſtly, as makes it plainly appear they voluntarily entered it; and they that came in laſt, and as it were at the eleventh hour, ſhew ſuch zeal for their religion, as well witneſſes they left it raſhly, and not on mature judgment and deliberation; our univerſity thus reſtored, the deſired religions ſeems more to pleaſe, than had her precepts been conſtantly obeyed, and her glory ne'er obſcured.

Wherefore this univerſity, ſuppliant and proſtrate, firſt begs pardon and peace of the eternal God, and that he will preſerve the right faith of her and hers, and cauſe this univerſity once more to flouriſh and abound. Then for her and hers, all and ſingular ſhe offers this petition to your highneſſes, that the induſtry of her preſent ſons may make amends for the errors and offences of her former. For the reſt ſhe ſubmits wholly to the ſentence your great wiſdom and ſingular love ſhall pronounce, hoping your juſtice will find her cauſe good, or your mercy make it ſo: Either will be an equal benefit, whether you judge this univerſity innocent from the juſtice of her cauſe, or whether you make her ſo by the abundance of your love. Now to return you thanks, we again promiſe you, the greateſt regard to things ſacred, unwearied diligence in ſearching the ſcriptures and fathers, a perpetual love of the true religion, and an eternal remembrance of your favours.

When he made an end of ſpeaking, the biſhop of Cheſter anſwered thereunto:

That they took in right good part, that the mother the univerſity had made ſo open a declaration of her good will toward them: for which he gave moſt hearty thanks, deſiring her to perform in deed, and in her works, the things that ſhe had ſo largely promiſed of herſelf in words and communication.

As concerning their good wills, there was no cauſe to miſtruſt. For their coming thither was not to deal any thing roughly with ſuch as fell to their amendment: but both the cardinal himſelf, and they alſo, were fully minded to ſhew favour, deviſing how to bring all things to peace and tranquillity, deſiring nothing more earneſtly, than that they which have erred and gone aſtray, ſhould return into the right path again. The right reverend father, the lord cardinal, whom he wiſhed to have been preſent, wiſhed the ſelf ſame thing alſo, deſiring nothing ſo much as he with his own hands to ſuſtain and hold up, now ready to fall, or rather raiſe up already fallen to the ground, the univerſity of his ward: for he gladly taketh upon him the name and duty of her guardian, whom it greatly grieved, that the infections of the time paſt had ſpread abroad ſo grievous diſeaſes, that even the univerſity itſelf was touched with the contagious air thereof. For he would more gladly have come thither to viſit and ſalute it, than to correct it, if the weighty affairs of the realm would have permitted it. But now ſeeing he could not ſo do, he had appointed this commiſſion, in which he had aſſigned them to be his deputies, which (becauſe they knew him to ſet ſo much ſtore by the univerſity) ſhould extend the more favour to it, and (becauſe they themſelves had been there brought up) would the more earneſtly embrace it. The chief matter that they came for, tended to this end, that ſuch as had erred ſhould confeſs their faults, and return into the right way again. For they were in good forwardneſs of healing, that acknowledged themſelves to have offended. And therefore it was wiſely propounded on his part, that he would not altogether excuſe the faults of the univerſity, nor of other men, but confeſs and acknowledge the crime, as that there were many things had need to be corrected and amended.

The cauſe why they were ſent thither, was to raiſe up them that were fallen, and to receive into favour ſuch as were ſorry and would amend, wherein, if (contrary to their expectation) they ſhould not be able to do ſo much with ſome men as they would, yet notwithſtanding, according to their duty, they would ſhew themſelves ſo diligent for their part, as that no lack might be found in them. For it was more openly known, than that it could be denied, that many men did divers things of a froward wilfulneſs, and took ſtoutly upon them: wherewith as they were greatly moved and grieved, as reaſon was, ſo they coveted to remedy the miſchief. Againſt whom, if any thing ſhould ſeem hereafter to be ſtraightly determined, it was to be imputed to their own deſerts, and not to the wills of them. Neither ought ſuch as are whole and ſound, to be moved at the chaſtiſement of others, forſomuch as it pertained not only to the wiping out of the foul blot which now ſticked on the univerſity, but alſo to the health of many others, which had taken much hurt by the infection of them. For their own parts, they more inclined unto mercy than rigour. Howbeit, conſidering that ſo great diſeaſes could not by gentle medicines be healed, they were driven of neceſſity to to uſe ſtronger. And yet if they would be contented to be brought again to their right minds, which thing they chiefly coveted (for they wiſhed that all ſhould amend, and be led by wholeſome counſel) and yet would at length wax weary of their errors, and inſtead of them frequent again the ancient cuſtoms of themſelves, and of their forefathers, they might boldly look for all kind of humanity and gentleneſs at their hands, in all this their buſineſs of reformation, which they had now entered and begun, requeſting no more of the univerſity but to do as became them: which being performed, he promiſed that their benevolence, neither in any public nor in any private perſon's caſe, ſhould in any wiſe be behind them.

Theſe things being finiſhed, they were brought in proceſſion to the King's college, by all the graduates of the univerſity, where was ſung a maſs of the Holy Ghoſt with great ſolemnity, nothing wanting in that behalf that might make to the ſetting forth of the ſame. In this place it was marked, that Nicholas Ormanet, commonly ſirnamed Datary, (who, albeit he was inferior in eſtate unto Cheſter, being a biſhop, yet was ſuperior to them all in authority) while the maſs was celebrating, ſometimes ſtanding, anon ſitting, and afterwards kneeling on his knees, obſerved certain ceremonies, which afterward were required to be obſerved of all others, as in proceſs hereof was to be ſeen.

From thence they all attended upon the legates to St. Mary's church, which we declared before to have been interdicted. In which place, foraſmuch as it was ſuſpended, although no maſs might be ſung, yet there was a ſermon made in open audience by Mr. Peacock in the Latin tongue, preaching againſt hereſies and heretics, as Bilney, Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, &c. Which being ended, they immediately proceeded to the viſitation: where firſt Dr. Harvy did, in the cardinal's name, exhibit the miſſion to the biſhop of Cheſter, with a few words in Latin. Which being accepted, and by Maſter Clerk openly read to the end, then the vice-chancellor with an oration did exhibit the certificate under his ſeal of office, with the cardinal's citation annexed, containing every man's name in the univerſity and colleges, with the officers and all the maſters of houſes. Among whom was alſo Robert Braſſey, maſter of King's college, a worthy old man, both for his wiſdom, and his hoary hairs: Who hearing his own name recited next after the vice-chancellor's, ſaid, He was there preſent as all the others were: nevertheleſs, foraſmuch as the reformation of his houſe was wholly reſerved to the biſhop of Lincoln, not only by the king's letters patents, but alſo by grant of confirmation from the biſhop of Rome himſelf, under a penalty if he ſhould ſuffer any ſtrangers to intermeddle, he openly proteſted, in diſcharge of his duty, that unleſs their commiſſion gave them authority and juriſdiction upon the college, either by expreſs words, or manifeſt ſenſe, he utterly exempted himſelf from being preſent.

This his exception they all took in great diſpleaſure; alledging that they were fully authorized for the order of the matter by the cardinal, out of whoſe juriſdiction no place nor perſons was exempted: wherefore he had done evil to call into queſtion their authority, ſo well known to all men. The biſhop of Cheſter ſeemed to be more moved with the matter than all the others; and that was becauſe Braſſey had a little before obtained the worſhip of that room, even utterly againſt his will, he doing the worſt he could againſt him.

After the formal ſolemnity of theſe things thus accompliſhed, the commiſſion being read, and the citation exhibited, all the maſters of houſes being openly cited, every man for a while departed home to his own houſe, with command to be at the common ſchools of the ſaid univerſity, at one of the clock the ſame day. When the degrees of the univerſity, commonly called regents and non-regents, were aſſembled thither, they ſpent the reſt of the day in reading over the charters granted to the univerſity by kings and princes, in ſearching out of bulls and pardons from the pope, and in peruſing of other monuments pertaining to the univerſity.

The next day following, being the 12th of January, they reſorted to the King's-college to make inquiſition, either becauſe the ſame, for the worthineſs thereof, was chief and ſovereign of all the reſidue, or elſe becauſe that that houſe eſpecially before all others had been accounted, time out of mind, never to be without an heretic (as they termed them) or twain. And at that preſent time, albeit that many now of late had withdrawn themſelves from thence, yet they judged there were ſome ſtill remaining. The order and manner how they would be entertained of every college, when they ſhould come to make inquiſition, they themſelves appointed, which was in this ſort.

They commanded the maſter of every houſe, together with the reſidue, as well fellows as ſcholars, apparelled in prieſt-like garments (which they call habits) to meet them at the uttermoſt gate of their houſe toward the town. The maſter himſelf to be dreſſed in like apparel as the prieſt when he dreſſeth himſelf to maſs, ſaving that he ſhould put on uppermoſt his habit, as the reſt did.

The order of their going they appointed to be in this wiſe: The maſter of the houſe to go foremoſt; next unto him every man in his order, as he was of degree, ſeniority, or of years. Before the maſter ſhould be carried a croſs, and holy water, to ſprinkle the commiſſioners withal, and then after that the commiſſioners to be cenſed. And ſo after this meeting, and mumbling of a few devotions, they determined with this pomp and ſolemnity to be brought to the chapel.

Many thought they took more honour upon them than belonged to the ſtate of man. Others (foraſmuch as at that time they not only pretended the juriſdiction of the cardinal, but alſo repreſented the power and authority of the biſhop of Rome himſelf, who was accounted to be more than a mortal man) ſaid; It was far leſs than of duty appertained to his holineſs, in that the honour that was done to his legates, was not done to them, but to his holineſs.

Now was the hour come, at which they appointed to meet: and being entered the King's-college gate, where they looked for the maſter and fellows of the houſe, ſeeing no man came to meet them, they proceeded to the church door, where they ſtayed. There perceiving how the maſter and the reſt of the houſe were dreſſing themſelves as faſt as they could, in ſuch order as was appointed before, they came in ſuddenly upon them, before they had ſet out any foot out of their places.

Then the maſter firſt excuſed himſelf, that he was ready no ſooner, acknowledging that it had been his duty to have been in a readineſs. Secondly, he ſaid he was very glad of their coming, promiſing firſt in his own name, and after in the name of all the reſt, as much reverence as might be, in all matters concerning their common utility, which he doubted not but ſhould be performed at their hands, according to his expectation. But, like as he had done the other day in St. Mary's church, the ſame exception be made to them now alſo; which his doing he beſought them not to be offended withal. For ſeeing he did it only for the diſcharge of his duty, he had juſter cauſe to be held excuſed.

He had ſcarcely yet finiſhed his tale, but the biſhop of Cheſter, with a frowning look, and an angry countenance, interrupted him in his talk; and ſaid, he needed not to repeat the things he had proteſted before, nor they to make anſwer any more to thoſe things wherein they had ſufficiently informed him before. He rather feared, that their quarrel was not good, that they made ſuch ado about it, and ſought ſuch ſtarting holes. For ſo were diſeaſed perſons oftentimes wont to do, when for the pain and grief they are not able to abide a ſtrong medicine. As though that any man were able to grant ſo ſo ſtrong a privilege as to withſtand the pope's authority. As for the pope's letters, he ſaid, muſt needs make on his ſide, and with ſuch as were with him, and could not in any wiſe be alledged againſt him. Therefore he admoniſhed him to deſiſt from his unprofitable altercation, and to conform himſelf and his, to ſuch things as then were doing.

After this they went to maſs. Which finiſhed, with great ſolemnity, firſt they went to the high altar of the church, and having there ſaluted their Gods, and ſearching whether all were well about him or no, they walked thorough all the inner chapels of the church. The church goods, the croſſes, the chalices, the maſs-books, the veſtments, and whatſoever ornaments were beſides, were commanded to be brought out unto them. When they had ſufficiently viewed all things, and had called forth by name every fellow and ſcholar of the houſe, they went to the maſter's lodging, where firſt and foremoſt ſwearing them upon a book, to anſwer to all ſuch interrogatories as ſhould be propounded unto them (as far as they knew) they examined firſt the maſter himſelf, and afterward all the reſidue, every man in his turn. But there were ſome that refuſed to take this oath, becauſe they had given their faith to the college before, and alſo becauſe they thought it againſt all right and reaſon to ſwear againſt themſelves: For it was contrary to all law, that a man ſhould be compelled to bewray himſelf, and not be ſuffered to keep his conſcience free, when there is no manifeſt proof to be laid to his charge; but much more unjuſt it is, that a man ſhould be conſtrained perforce to accuſe himſelf. Nevertheleſs, theſe perſons alſo, after ſuch altercation, at length (conditionally, that their faith given before to the college were not impeached thereby) were contented to be ſworn.

Three days long laſted the inquiſition there. This was now the third day of their coming, and it was thought that the caſe of Martin Bucer and Phagius was delayed longer than needed. For they looked to have had much wrangling and buſineſs about the matter. Now foraſmuch as the preſent ſtate of the caſe required good deliberation and advice, the vice-chancellor and the maſters of the colleges aſſembled at the common ſchools, where every man gave his verdict, what he thought meet to be done in this matter of Bucer. After much debating, they agreed all together in this determination.

That foraſmuch as Martin Bucer, while he lived, had not only ſowed pernicious and erroneous doctrine among them, but alſo had himſelf been a ſectary and famous heretic, erring from the catholic church, and giving others occaſion to fall from the ſame likewiſe; a ſupplication ſhould be made to the lords commiſſioners, in the name of the whole univerſity, that his dead carcaſe might forthwith be digged up (for ſo it was needful to be done) to the intent that inquiſition might be made as touching his doctrine, which being brought in examination, if it were not found to be good and wholeſome, the law might proceed againſt him: for it was againſt the rule of the holy canons, that his body ſhould be buried in chriſtian burial. Yea, and beſides that, it was to the open derogation of God's honour, and the violating of his holy laws, with the great peril of many men's ſouls, and the offence of the faithful, eſpecially in ſo difficult and contagious a time as that was. Wherefore it was not to be ſuffered, that they, which utterly diſſented from all other men in the trade of their living, laws, and cuſtoms, ſhould have any part with them in the honour of burial. And therefore the glory of God, firſt and before all things, ought to be defended, the infamy (which through this thing riſeth on them) with all ſpeed put away, no room at all left for thoſe perſons to reſt in, who even in the ſame places where they lay, were injurious and noiſome to the very elements; but the place ought to be purged, and all things ſo ordered as might be to the ſatisfying the conſciences of the weak. In executing whereof ſo notable an example ought to be given to all men, that no man hereafter ſhould be ſo bold to attempt the like.

They gave the ſame verdict by common conſent againſt Phagius alſo.

Unto this writing they annexed another, by which they lawfully authorized Andrew Perne, the vice-chancellor, to be the common factor for the univerſity. He was a man fitteſt for the purpoſe, both for the office that he bare, and alſo becauſe that by the teſtimony of Mr. Chriſtopherſon, he was judged to be the moſt catholic of all others. This ſupplication, confirmed by the conſent of all the degrees of the univerſity, and ſigned with their common ſeal, the next day, which was the 13th day of January, the vice-chancellor put up to the commiſſioners.

Note here, good reader, what a ſeat of conveyance this was, to ſuborn the univerſity under a colourable pretence, to deſire this thing of them by way of petition. As who ſhould ſay, if they had not done ſo, the other would never have gone about it of themſelves.

But this gloſs was ſoon found out. For the commiſſioners had given the vice-chancellor inſtructions in writing before. But now peradventure they thought by this to remove the envy of this act from themſelves.

Thus the vice-chancellor came unto the commiſſioners, according to the appointment made the day before, about ſeven of the clock in the morning. He had ſcarce declared the cauſe of his coming, but that he had not only obtained his ſuit, but alſo even at the very ſame time received the ſentence of condemnation, for taking up Bucer and Phagius, fair copied out by Ormanet datary himſelf. This was to be confirmed by the conſent of the degrees of the univerſity. Whereupon a ſolemn convocation, called Congregatio Regentium & non Regentium, for the ſame purpoſe was appointed to be at nine of the clock; where the graduates being aſſembled together, the demand was propounded concerning the condemnation of Bucer and Phagius, and the grace aſked, which was this:

Pleaſeth it you that Martin Bucer, for the hereſies now recited, and many others by him written, preached and taught, wherein he died without repentance, and was buried in chriſtian burial, may be exhumate and taken up again, &c.

Immediately after this grace was granted the ſentence of condemnation being drawn by the datary, was openly read, and another grace aſked, that the ſame might be ſigned with the common ſeal. Which requeſt was very eaſily obtained: and it was no marvel.

For after the death of king Edward, when the realm was governed by queen Mary, all ſuch perſons were driven away as had rejected the Romiſh religion (in whom alone well nigh reſted whatſoever wit and learning was in the whole univerſity beſides) and ſuch a ſort of men were put in their room, that all places now ſwarmed with unlearned chaplains: To whom nothing was greater pleaſure, than to cauſe all men to ſpeak reproachfully of Bucer. There were divers yet left among them to ſpeak againſt their demands. But they (becauſe as it commonly cometh to paſs, that might overcometh right) could nothing avail, For this is a common cuſtom in all ſuch matters and ordinances, that what the greater number decreeth, is publiſhed in the name of all: and that which the better part diſallowеth, ſeemeth as though no man at all diſallowed it.

The next day, being the 14th of January, all the viſitors (Mr. Chriſtopherſon only excepted) came to the King's college: where firſt going into the church, and there making their prayers at the greeſings, they ſo proceeded into the ſtalls, there ſitting all the maſs time, the company ſtanding in their copes, and ſinging a ſolemn reſpond in honour of the viſitors. After the reſpond done, the provoſt made to them his proteſtation, unto whom the biſhop of Cheſter made anſwer alſo in Latin, declaring that he could not perceive to what purpoſe his proteſtation was, notwithſtanding they would accept it, and bear with him. Then went they to maſs, which ended, the catholic viſitors approached up to the altar, and took down the ſacrament, and ſearched the Pyx, but firſt the two biſhops cenſed the ſacrament.

Then they went unto the veſtry, and opened the chalices, corporas caſes and chryſmatory, and viewed all thoſe things: and ſo returning into the provoſt's chamber, divided themſelves in examination of the provoſt, vice-provoſt, and the reſt of the company. The ſame day Dr. Bacon, maſter of Gonvil-hall, invited the vice-chancellor, Dr. Young, Dr. Harvy, Swineborn, Maptide, with others, home to dinner. Theſe men immediately after dinner, cauſed the common ſeal of the univerſity to be put to the foreſaid inſtrument of condemnation, according as was determined the day before by the general conſent of the graduates of the univerſity: and afterwards they carried the ſame to the commiſſioners to their lodging. Which when they had received and carefully peruſed, it pleaſed them not in all points, and therefore they raſed out ſome things, ſome they interlined, others they changed: ſo that in fine, they were fain to take the pains to engroſs it new again.

To the ſigning whereof a congregation was immediately called of all the graduates of the univerſity againſt the next day, which there being read over, a new grace again was aſked, and granted for ſetting the ſeal. Then were the graduates diſmiſſed, with command to reſort forthwith to St. Mary's church, whither the commiſſioners alſo repaired. When they had taken their places, Dr. Harvy preſented to them before all the company, a new commiſſion to make inqueſt upon hereſy then newly ſent from the cardinal, which was immediately read by Ormanet's clerk. This done, Dr. Perne, who was factor for the univerſity, exhibited to the commiſſioners in the name of the univerſity the ſentence of the aforeſaid condemation. This condemnation being openly read, then Dr. Perne deſired to ſend out proceſs to cite Bucer and Phagius to appear, or any other that would take upon them to plead their cauſe, and to ſtand to the order of the court againſt the next Monday; to the intent that when they had exhibited themſelves, the court might the better determine what ought to be done to them by order of law.

The commiſſioners condeſcended to his requeſt, and the next day proceſs went out to cite the offenders. This citation Vincent of Noally, their common notary, having firſt read it over before certain witneſſes appointed for the ſame purpoſe, cauſed to be fixed up in places convenient, to wit, upon St. Mary's church door, the door of the common ſchools, and the croſs in the market-place of the ſame town. In this was ſpecified, that whoſoever would maintain Bucer and Phagius, or ſtand in defence of their doctrine, ſhould at the eighteenth day of the month ſtand forth before the lords commiſſioners in St. Mary's church, which was appointed the place of judgment, and there every man ſhould be ſufficiently heard what he could ſay. This commandment was ſet out with many words.

Shortly after the matter drew toward judgment. Therefore the day before the limited day, which was the 17th of January, the vice-chancellor called to him to Peterhouſe (whereof he was maſter) Dr. Young, Dr. Sedgwick, and with them Bullock, Taylor, Parker, Redman, Whitlock, Mitch, and certain others. Theſe men caſt their heads together how they might bear witneſs againſt Bucer and Phagius, to convince them of hereſy. For ſeeing the matter was brought in face of open court, and becauſe it might ſo come to paſs that ſome patrons of their cauſe would come out, they thought it needful to have witneſſes to depoſe of their doctrine. What came of this their conſultation is not perfectly known.

The eighteenth day the vice-chancellor going to the inquiſitors ſitting at the King's college, put them in remembrance, that that was the day in which by their proceſs ſent forth the 16th, they had commanded to appear in St. Mary's church, ſuch as would take upon them to defend Bucer and Phagius by the law. He deſired therefore that they would vouchſafe to ſit there, if perchance any man would try the adventure of the law. They ſoon condeſcended thereunto. When the vice-chancellor had brought them thither, he exhibited unto them the proceſs of the citation which he had received of them to publiſh a little before, ſaying, that he had diligently executed whatſoever the contents of the ſame required. After that they had taken their places, and no man putting forth himſelf to anſwer for the offenders, the judges call aſide Dr. Young, Sedgwick, Bullock, Taylor, Maptide, Hunter, Parker, Redman, abovementioned. Alſo Brown, Gogman, Rud, Johnſon, Mitch, Raven, and Carre, who had before written out the burial of Bucer, with a ſingular commendation of him, and ſent it to Sir John Cheek, knight. Theſe men, firſt taking their oath upon a book, were commanded to bear witneſs againſt the hereſies and doctrines of Bucer and Phagius. The twenty-ſecond day of the ſame month was limited to this jury to bring in their verdict.

In the mean while, Ormanet and Dr. Watſon abode at home in their lodging to take the diſpoſition of them, whom we ſhewed you before to have been called to Peter-houſe, and to have communicated with the vice-chancellor as concerning that matter, whoſe depoſitions, as I told you, never came to light. The biſhop of Cheſter, and Dr. Cole, this day viſited them of Katherine-hall, where, as far as could be learned, nothing was done worthy of rehearſal.

As Ormanet, the pope's datary, was ſitting at Trinity-college, John Dale, one of the Queen's college, came to him, whom he had commanded before to bring with him the pix, wherein the biſhop of Rome's god of bread is wont to be incloſed. For Ormanet told them he had a precious jewel; the ſame was a linen clout that the pope had conſecrated with his own hands, which he promiſed to beſtow upon them for a gift. But Dale miſunderſtanding Ormanet, inſtead of the pix brought a chalice and a ſinging cake, called the hoſt, which he had wrapped up, and put in his boſom. When he was come, Ormanet demanded if he had brought him the thing he ſent him for. To whom he anſwered, he had brought. Then give it me, quoth he. Dale pulled out the chalice, and the ſinging-cake. When Ormanet ſaw that, he ſtepped ſomewhat back, as it had been in a wonder, calling him blockhead, and little better than a madman, demanding what he meant by thoſe things? ſaying, he deſired him to bring none of that gear, and that he was unworthy to enjoy ſo high a benefit: yet notwithſtanding foraſmuch as he had promiſed before to give it them, he would perform his promiſe. Whereupon with great reverence and ceremony he pulled out the linen cloth, and laid it in the chalice, and the bread with it, commanding them both for the holineſs of the thing, and alſo for the author of it, to keep it among them with ſuch due reverence as belonged to ſo holy a relic.

About the ſame time the commiſſioners had commanded the maſters of the colleges, that every man ſhould put in writing what books he had, with the authors names. And to the intent that every man ſhould execute it without deceit, they took an oath of them. This command ſome executed exactly and diligently: others, foraſmuch as they deemed it wrongfully, executed it ſlack enough.

We declared before, that the 18th day was limited for the day of judgment. When the day came, and that neither Bucer nor Phagius would appear at their call in the court, nor that any put forth himſelf to defend them, them, yet the courteous commiſſioners would not proceed to judgment: which nevertheleſs for their contumacy in abſenting themſelves, they might have done, conſidering how that day was peremptory. But theſe men, being bent altogether to equity and mercy, had rather ſhew ſome favour, than to do the uttermoſt they might by the law. Whereupon Vincent publiſhed the ſecond proceſs, and ſet it up in the ſame places, as in manner before. The meaning thereof varied not much from the firſt, but that it put off the judgment day unto the 26th of the ſame month. Upon which day the vice-chancellor was ſent for to their lodging, with whom they agreed concerning the order of publiſhing the ſentence. And becauſe there ſhould want no ſolemnity in the matter, they commanded him further to warn the mayor of the town to be there at the day appointed with all his burgeſſes, which the vice-chancellor did ſpeed with all readineſs.

This day (as I ſaid) was the 26th of January, which being now come, firſt all degrees of the mother univerſity were aſſembled. And to fill up this pageant, thither alſo came the mayor and his townſmen, and all met together in St. Mary's church, to behold what ſhould be determined upon theſe men. After long attendance, at length the commiſſioners came forth, and went up to a ſcaffold that was ſomewhat higher than the reſidue, prepared for the ſame purpoſe. When they had taken their places, Dr. Perne, the vice-chancellor, the player of this interlude, faſhioning his countenance with great gravity, reached to them the proceſs that was lately publiſhed to cite them, ſaying theſe words: I bring forth again, ſaid he, to you, right reverend father, and commiſſioners of the moſt reverend my lord cardinal Poole, this citation executed according to the purport and effect of the ſame: omitting nothing for his part that might make to the commendation of this matter.

When he had thus finiſhed his tale, the biſhop of Cheſter, after he had viewed the people a little, began in the following manner.

The Oration of Dr. Scot, Biſhop of Cheſter, before the Condemnation of Bucer and Phagius.

YE ſee how ſore the univerſity preſſeth upon us, how earneſt interceſſion it maketh unto us, not only to denounce Bucer and Phagius, which theſe certain years paſt have ſpread moſt pernicious doctrine among you, to be heretics, as they be indeed; but alſo that we will command their dead carcaſes, which unto this day have obtained honourable burial among you, to be digged up; and as it is excellently ordained by the canon law, to be caſt into the fire, or whatſoever is more grievous than fire, if any can be. For the degrees of the univerſity deal not ſlightly nor ſlackly with us in this caſe, but do ſo preſs upon us, and follow the ſuit ſo earneſtly, that they ſcarce give us any reſpite of delay. And I aſſure you, albeit this caſe of itſelf be ſuch, as that even the unworthineſs of thoſe perſons, though there were no further cauſe, ought to induce us to the doing thereof, much the rather moved with theſe ſo wholeſome petitions, it is meet and convenient we ſhould grant it. For howſoever we of ourſelves are inclined to mercy in our hearts (than which we proteſt there is nothing under the ſun more dear and acceptable) yet notwithſtanding the very law riſeth up to revenge: ſo that the common ſalvation of you all, which the law provideth for, muſt be preferred before the private charity of our minds. Neither ought any ſuch negligence to overtake us for our parts, that we, being ſcarce yet eſcaped out of the ſhipwreck of our former calamity, ſhould now ſuffer this unexpiable miſchief to diſquiet any longer the conſciences of the weak.

Moreover, it is but reaſon that we ſhould do ſomewhat at ſo earneſt intreaty and ſuit of the univerſity. I need not to ſpeak much of ourſelves. For if we had been deſirous to enterprize this matter, it had been lawful after the firſt citation, to have proceeded to judgment: but becauſe we were willing that their defenders ſhould be heard, and that the matter ſhould be denounced and tried by law, we ſent out the ſecond proceſs.

If we had deſired revenge, we might have ſhewed cruelty upon them that are alive: of which (alas the more pity) there are too many that embrace this doctrine. If we thirſted for blood, it was not to be ſought in withered carcaſes and dry bones. Therefore ye may well perceive, it was no part of our wills that we now came hither: but partly induced at the intreaty of the univerſity, partly moved with the unworthineſs of the caſe itſelf, but eſpecially for the care and regard we have of your health and ſalvation, which we covet by all means to preſerve.

For you yourſelves are the cauſe of this buſineſs: you gave occaſion of this confeſſion, among whom this day ought to be a notable example, to remain as a memorial to them that ſhall come after, as in that which we may learn not only to ſhake off the filth which ye have taken of thoſe perſons, but alſo to beware hereafter that ye fall no more ſo ſhameful as ye have done. But I truſt, God will defend you, and give you minds to keep yourſelves from it.

As concerning the parties themſelves, whoſe cauſe now hangeth in law, they bear about the name of the goſpel, whereas indeed they wrought nothing elſe than thievery and deceit. And ſo much the more wicked were they in that they ſought to cover ſo ſhameful acts, with the cloak of ſo fair and holy a name. Wherefore it is not to be doubted, but that God will puniſh this deſpite, of itſelf wicked, to you pernicious, but the authors thereof ſhameful and abominable.

But if God, as he is ſlow to wrath and vengeance, will wink at it for a time, yet notwithſtanding if we, upon whom the charge of the Lord's flock leaneth, ſhould permit ſo execrable crimes to eſcape unpuniſhed, we ſhould not live in quiet one hour.

When he had thus ſpoken, he recited the ſentence out of a ſcroll, and condemned Bucer and Phagius of hereſy; the form and tenor of which ſentence, now rendered into Engliſh, here followeth:

The Sentence of Condemnation againſt Martin Bucer and Phagius.

WE Cutbert, by the grace of God and the apoſtolic ſee, biſhop of Cheſter, Nicholas Ormanet, archbiſhop of Verona, within the dioceſe under-written, auditor of the reverend lord cardinal and legate; Thomas Watſon, dean of Durham; and Henry Cole, provoſt of Eton college; viſitors to the univerſity and town of Cambridge, within the dioceſe of Ely, alſo to all perſons dwelling in the ſaid town and places adjacent, for certain motions, cauſes and reaſons thereunto moving, we are to enquire, and in what manner we think fit to proceed againſt thoſe, who have run into vile hereſies, and condemn their memory; we are impowered by letters from the moſt illuſtrious and reverend father in Chriſt, Reginald Poole, cardinal and prieſt of the moſt holy Roman church, legate de Latere from our moſt holy lord the pope, and the apoſtolic ſee, to the moſt ſerene Philip and Mary, king and queen of England, and to the whole kingdom, to depute commiſſioners of delegates, ſufficiently inſtructed in the knowledge of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and having the fear of God before their eyes, to conſtitute a court, and by this our definitive ſentence, which we give according to the opinion of the moſt learned divines and lawyers, herein contained, to condemn theſe ſons of iniquity, Martin Bucer and Paulus Phagius, by nation Germans, but both of old living and dying in this town, whom we here declare declare, pronounce, judge, and condemn as notorious heretics whilſt they lived; for truly Martin Buce, contrary to the rules and precepts of the holy fathers, as alſo to the traditions of the apoſtolic Roman church and holy councils, and of the chriſtian religion, thoſe rites and proceſſions (which are every year on the day of the ſupper of our Lord celebrated and read by the Roman prieſts, in which among others the Wickliffians and Lutherans, and all other heretics are condemned and anathematized) of the ſacraments having continued in the church hitherto, he eſpecially taught and preached about the number of them, contrary to what our holy mother the church had preached and obſerved: and he denied and openly condemned the authority of the holy apoſtolic ſee, and the ſupremacy of our great high-prieſt, and he eſpecially held this article:

"That the church may err in faith and worſhip."

This he particularly defended in the public aſſemblies, and there maintained and determined it to be true, and many others, as well by John Wickliffe, Martin Luther, and other chief heretics invented, and condemned by the church, eſpecially that,

"That all things were governed by fate and an abſolute neceſſity."

As by himſelf firſt broached, believing and following falſe and heretical principles, and moreover alſo writing books, and cauſing them to be printed, and publiſhing them being printed, and in reading theſe writings publicly, and defending them in public diſputations, as alſo by an obſtinate living and dying in this manner, not only as a notorious heretic, but as a founder of hereſy.

Alſo Paul Phagius, who among other things which ſavour of hereſy, ſcattered up and down in his writings, printed and commonly read, not only approves, but gives the higheſt encomiums to the impious memory of John Oecolampade, the aforeſaid Martin Bucer, Philip Melancthon, John Brent, and their doctrines; which manifeſtly ſhews, he not only favoured heretics, but aſſented, believed and approved their falſe principles, and endeavoured to induce others to believe and approve the ſame: thus he lived a common, notorious heretic, and died impenitent. We therefore pronounce the ſaid Martin Bucer and Paul Phagius excommunicated and anathematized, as well by the common law, as by letters proceſs, and that their memory be condemned; we alſo condemn their bodies and bones (which in that moſt wicked time of ſchiſm, and other hereſies flouriſhing in this kingdom, were raſhly buried in holy ground) to be dug up, and caſt far from the church, that they may be known from the bodies and bones of the faithful, according to the holy canons, and we command that they and their writings, if any be there found, be publicly burnt; and we interdict all perſons whatſoever of this univerſity, town or places adjacent, who ſhall read or conceal their heretical books, as well by the common law, as by our letters of proceſs.

After the ſentence thus read, the biſhop commanded their bodies to be digged out of their graves, and being degraded from holy orders, delivered them into the hands of the ſecular power. For it was not lawful for ſuch innocent perſons as they were, abhorring from all bloodſhed, and deteſting all deſire of murder, to put any man to death.

The Effect of Doctor Perne's Sermon againſt Martin Bucer.

Beſides this oration and ſentence of Dr. Scot, came in alſo Dr. Perne, vice-chancellor, with his ſermon tending to the ſame effect, to the depraving of Mr. Bucer, taking for his theme the place of the 133d Pſalm, "Behold how good and pleaſant a thing it is, &c."

Where beginning firſt with the commendation of concord and of the mutual knitting together of the minds, he alledged, that it was not poſſible to hold together, unleſs the concord were derived out of the head, which he made to be the biſhop of Rome, and that it alſo reſted in the ſame.

And after he had made a long proteſtation hereof, he paſſed forth to Bucer, upon whom he made a ſhameful railing, ſaying, that his doctrine gave occaſion of diviſion in the commonwealth, and that there was not ſo grievous a miſchief, which by his means had not been brought into the realm.

Although all men might perceive by the books he had compiled, what manner of doctrine it was; yet notwithſtanding, ſaid he, he knew it more perfectly himſelf than any did, and that he had learned it apart at the author's hand himſelf.

For at ſuch time as they had communication ſecretly among themſelves, Bucer, ſaid he, would oftentimes wiſh he might be called by ſome other name, than by the name he had; for this purpoſe, as though knowing himſelf guilty of ſo grievous a crime, he might by this means eſcape unknown unto the world, and avoid the talk that went among men of him.

Moreover, among other things, he told how Bucer held opinion (which thing he ſhould confeſs to him his ownſelf) that God was the author and well-ſpring, not only of good, but alſo of evil; and that whatſoever was of that ſort flowed from him, as from the head-ſpring and maker thereof. Which doctrine he held to be ſincere; howbeit, for offending divers mens conſciences, he durſt not put it into mens heads.

Many other things he patched together of like purport and effect, as of the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome, of the marriage of prieſts, of divorcements and ſhameful uſury alſo, as though he had deemed the ſame lawful to be uſed among chriſtian people, with divers others of the like ſort.

In all which all his allegations, conſidering how lewdly, without all ſhame, he lyed upon Bucer (as his writings evidently declare) he did not ſo much hinder his name with railing upon him, as win unto himſelf an inexpiable infamy, by forging ſo ſhameful lyes upon ſo worthy a man.

But what needeth witneſs to prove him a lyar? his own conſcience ſhall make as much againſt him as a number of men.

It was reported for a truth, and teſtified by his own familiar friends, that the ſaid Dr. Perne himſelf, either immediately after his ſermon, or elſe ſomewhat before he went to it, ſtriking himſelf on the breaſt, and in manner weeping, wiſhed at home in his own houſe, with all his heart, that God would grant his ſoul might even then preſently depart, and remain with Bucer's. For he knew well enough that his life was ſuch, that if any man's ſoul was worthy of heaven, he thought eſpecially his to be moſt worthy.

While he was thus talking to the people, in the mean time the leaves of the church doors were covered over with verſes, in which the young men, to ſhew their folly, who ſcarce knew him by ſight, blazed Bucer's name with moſt reproachful poetry.

Theſe things being diſpatched, Dr. Perne (as though he had ſped his matter marvellouſly well) was for his labour of courteſy bidden to dinner to Trinity-college by the commiſſioners. Where, after the table was taken up, they cauſed the ſentence of condemnation to be copied out with all ſpeed: which being ſigned with the biſhop of Cheſter's ſeal, the next day following was a triumph triumph ſent to London, with divers of thoſe verſes and ſlanderous libels.

Beſides this, they ſent alſo their own letters, wherein they both advertiſed the cardinal how far they had proceeded in that matter, and alſo deſired his grace, that he would cauſe to be ſent out of hand to Smith, the mayor of the town, the commandment, commonly called a writ, for the burning of heretics. For unleſs he had the queen's warrant to ſave him harmleſs, he would not have to do in the matter: and that which remained to be done in that caſe, could not be diſpatched till that warrant came.

While this purſuivant went on his journey, they ordered to be brought unto them the books that they commanded before to be ſearched out. For they determined to throw them into the fire with Bucer and Phagius.

About the ſame time Dr. Watſon taking occaſion upon the day, becauſe it was a high feaſt, in which was wont to be celebrated the memorial of the purification of the bleſſed virgin, made a ſermon to the people upon that pſalm, "We have received thy mercy, O Lord, in the midſt of thy temple, &c." In which ſermon he ſpake much reproach of Bucer and Phagius, and of their doctrine.

He ſaid, that theſe men, and all the heretics of our time that were of the ſame opinion (which for the moſt part, he ſaid, were budded out of Germany) among other things which they had perniciouſly put into mens heads, taught to caſt away all ceremonies. Whereas notwithſtanding the apoſtle himſelf commanded all things to be done in due order.

And upon that deed of the bleſſed virgin and Joſeph, which was done by them as upon that day, it was manifeſtly apparent, that they with our Saviour, being then a little babe, obſerved theſe rites and ceremonies for catholic men to teach. For he ſaid, that they came to the temple the ſame time with wax candles in their hands, after the manner of proceſſion (as they term it) in good order with much reverence and devotion, and yet we are not aſhamed to laugh and mock at theſe things with the heretics and ſchiſmatics.

As he was ſpeaking of Chriſt, Mary and Joſeph, one of them that heard him, a merry-conceited fellow, turning himſelf to him that ſtood next him, And if it be true, ſaid he, that this man preacheth, which of them I pray you (if a man might aſk him a queſtion) bare the croſs before them? for that might not be miſſing in ſuch ſolemn ceremonies. Not only this man jeſted at the preacher's folly, but divers others alſo laughed at his manifeſt unſhamefacedneſs in preaching theſe ſo vain and fooliſh ſuperſtitions.

While he was thus talking to his audience, John Chiſtopherſon, elected biſhop of Chicheſter, being ſtricken with a ſudden ſickneſs, fell down in a ſudden ſwoon among the preſs; and came not to himſelf in a good while after: in the mean time babbling many things, as though he had been out of his wits. Some thought it came upon this occaſion, becauſe he had been greatly accuſed before the commiſſioners for miſpending and miſordering the goods of the college, and therefore was grieved with the matter, knowing that they had been offended with him, by reaſon Ormanet had cancelled before his face a leaſe of his, by which he had let to farm to his brother-in-law a certain manor of that college, becauſe the covenants ſeemed unreaſonable.

By this time the purſuivant was returned again, who (as was ſaid before) was ſent to London with the commiſſioners letters, and brought with him a warrant for the burning of theſe men.

Upon the receipt whereof they appointed the ſixth day of February for the accompliſhment of the matter: for it had been in hand a great while already.

Therefore when the ſaid day was come, the commiſſioners ſent for the vice-chancellor, demanding of him in what caſe things ſtood, whether all things were in a readineſs for the accompliſhment of this buſineſs. Underſtanding by him that all things were ready, they commanded the matter to be broached out of hand.

The vice-chancellor therefore taking with him Marſhal, the common notary, went firſt to St. Michael's church, where Phagius was buried. Then he called forth Andrew Smith, Henry Sawyer, and Henry Adams, men of the ſame pariſh, and bound them with an oath, to dig up the bones of Phagius, and to bring them to the place of execution. Marſhal took their oaths, receiving the like of Roger Smith and William Haſell, the two ſerjeants, and of John Caper, warden of the ſame church, for doing the like with Bucer. Smith, the mayor of the town, who ſhould be their executioner (for it was not lawful for them to intermeddle in caſes of blood) commanded certain of his towns-men to wait upon him in harneſs, by whom the dead bodies were guarded; and being bound with ropes, and laid upon mens ſhoulders (for they were incloſed in cheſts, Bucer in the ſame that he was buried, and Phagius in a new one) they were carried into the midſt of the market-place, with a great train of people following them.

This place was prepared before, and a great poſt was ſet faſt in the ground to bind the carcaſes to, and a great heap of wood was laid ready to burn them withal.

When they came thither, the cheſts were ſet up on end with the dead bodies in them, and faſtened on both ſides with ſtakes, and bound to the poſt with a long iron chain, as if they had been alive. Fire being forthwith put to, as ſoon as it began to flame round about, a great many books that were condemned with them were caſt into the ſame.

There was that day gathered into the town a great multitude of country folks (for it was market-day) who ſeeing men borne to execution, and learning by enquiry that they were dead before, partly deteſted and abhorred the extreme cruelty of the commiſſioners toward the rotten carcaſes, and partly laughed at their folly in making ſuch preparatives. For what needeth any weapon, ſaid they? As though they were afraid that the dead bodies, which felt them not, would do them ſome harm. Or to what purpoſe ſerveth that chain wherewith they are tied, ſince they might be burnt looſe without peril: for it was not to be feared that they would run away?

Thus every body that ſtood by found fault with the cruelty of the deed, either ſharply or elſe lightly, as every man's mind gave him. There were very few that liked their doings therein.

In the mean time that they were a roaſting in the fire, Dr. Watſon went into the pulpit in St. Mary's church, and there before his audience railed upon their doctrine, as wicked and erroneous, ſaying, that it was the ground of all the miſchief that had happened of a long time in the common-wealth. For behold (ſaid he) as well the proſperity as the adverſity of theſe years that enſued, and ye ſhall find that all things have chanced unluckily to them that have followed this new-found faith; as contrarily, all things have happened fortunately to them that have eſchewed it. What robbing and poiling (quoth he) have we ſeen in this realm, as long as religion was defaced with ſects; the common treaſure (gathered for the maintenance of the public weal) and the goods of the realm ſhamefully ſpent in waſte for the maintenance of a few peoples luſts, all good order broken, all diſcipline caſt aſide, holydays appointed to the ſolemnizing of ceremonies neglected; and what is more, the places themſelves beaten down, fleſh and other kind of prohibited ſuſtenance eaten every where upon days forbidden, without remorſe of conſcience, the prieſts had in deriſion, the maſs railed upon, no honour done to the ſacraments of the church; all eſtates and degrees given to ſuch a licentious liberty, without check, that all things may ſeem to draw to their utter ruin and decay.

And yet in the mean time the name of the goſpel was pretended outwardly, as though that for it men ought of duty to give credit to their erroneous opinions; whereas indeed there is nothing more different, or more to the ſlander of God's word than the ſame. For what other thing taught they to remain in that moſt bleſſed and myſtical ſacrament of the body of our Lord, than bare unleavened bread? And what elſe do the remnant of them teach unto this day? Whereas Chriſt by expreſs words doth aſſure it to be his very body. How perilous a doctrine is that which concerneth the fatal and abſolute neceſſity of predeſtination? And yet they ſet it out in ſuch wiſe, that they have left no choice at all in things. As who ſhould ſay, it ſkilled not what a man purpoſed of any matter, ſince he had not the power to determine otherwiſe than the matter ſhould come to paſs. Which was the peculiar opinion of them, that made God the author of evil, bringing men through this perſuaſion into ſuch a careleſs ſecurity of the everlaſting eternity, that in the mean ſeaſon it made no matter either toward ſalvation, or damnation, what a man did in this life. Theſe errors (which were not even among the heathen men) were defended by them with great ſtoutneſs.

Theſe and many other ſuch things he ſlanderouſly and falſly alledged againſt Bucer, whoſe doctrine (in ſuch ſort as he himſelf taught it) either he would not underſtand, or elſe he was minded to ſlander. And yet he was not ignorant, that Bucer taught none other things than the very ſame whereunto both he and Scot, in the reign of king Edward the ſixth, had willingly aſſented, by ſubſcribing thereto with their own hands. While he talked in this wiſe before the people, many of them that had written verſes before, did now ſet up others, in which, like a ſort of water frogs, they ſpued out their venemous malice againſt Bucer and Phagius. This was the laſt act of this interlude, and yet there remained a few things to be done, among which was the reconciling two churches of our Lady, and of St. Michael, which we declared to have been interdicted before.

This was done the next day following by the aforeſaid biſhop of Cheſter, with as much ceremonial ſolemnity as the law required. But that impanate God, whom Bucer's carcaſe had chaſed from thence, was not yet turned thither again; neither was it lawful for him to come there any more, unleſs he was brought thither with great ſolemnity: as I ſuppoſe, during all the time of his abſence, he was entertained by the commiſſioners at Trinity-college, and there continued as a ſojourner. For thither came all the graduates of the univerſity, the eighth of February, of gentleneſs and courteſy, to bring him home again. Among which number, the biſhop of Cheſter (worthy for his eſtate to come neareſt to him, becauſe he was a biſhop) took and carried him, clad in a long rochet, and a large tippet of ſarcenet about his neck, wherein he wrapt his idol alſo. Ormanet had given the ſame a little before to the univerſity, for that and ſuch like purpoſes.

When this idol ſhould return home, he went not out the ſtraiteſt and neareſt way as other folks are wont to go, but be fetched a compaſs about moſt part of the town, and roamed through ſo many of the ſtreets, that it was an hour or more ere he could find the way into this church again. I believe the antient Romans obſerved a cuſtom not much unlike this in their proceſſions, when they made ſupplications at the ſhrines of all their gods. The order of which proceſſion was this: the maſters regents went before, ſinging with a loud voice, Salve feſta dies, &c. Next them followed the biſhop of Cheſter, about him went Ormanet and his fellow-commiſſioners, with the maſters of the colleges, bearing every man a long taper lighted in his hand. After whom, a little ſpace off, followed other degrees of the univerſity. Laſtly came the mayor and his townſmen. Before them all went the beadles, crying to ſuch as they met, that they ſhould bow themſelves humbly before the hoſt; if any refuſed ſo to do, they threatened to ſend them forthwith to the Tolbooth. Their God being led with this pomp, and pacified with great ſacrificed hoſt of Bucer and Phagius, at length ſettled himſelf again in his accuſtomed room.

Dr. Scot biſhop of Cheſter prayed with many words, that that day might be lucky and fortunate to himſelf, and to all that were preſent, and that from that day forward (now that God's wrath was appeaſed, and all other things ſet in good order) all men ſhould make themſelves conformable to peace and quietneſs, namely, in matters pertaining to religion.

After this they beſtowed a few days in puniſhing and amercing ſuch as they thought had deſerved it. Some they ſuſpended from giving voices either to their own preferment, or to the preferment of any other. Some they forbade to have the charge of pupils, leſt they ſhould infect the tender youth (being pliable to take what print ſoever ſhould be laid upon them) with corrupt doctrine and hereſy; others they chaſtiſed wrongfully without any deſert, and many a one they puniſhed, contrary to all right and reaſon.

Laſt of all they ſet forth certain ſtatutes, by which they would have the univerſity hereafter ordered. Wherein they enacted many things, as concerning the election of the officers of the univerſity, of keeping and adminiſtering the goods of the univerſity, and of many other things. But eſpecially they handled the matter very circumſpectly for religion. In which they were ſo ſcrupulous, that they repleniſhed all things either with open blaſphemy or with ridiculous ſuperſtitution. For they preſcribed at how many maſſes every man ſhould be day by day, and how many Pater Noſters and Aves every man ſhould ſay when he ſhould enter into the church; and in his entrance, after what ſort he ſhould bow himſelf to the altar, and how to the maſter of the houſe, what he ſhould do there, and how long he ſhould tarry, how many and what prayers he ſhould ſay, what, and how he ſhould ſing, what meditations others ſhould uſe while the prieſt is in his momento, mumbling ſecretly to himſelf, what time of the maſs a man ſhould ſtand, and when he ſhould ſit down, when he ſhould make courteſy, when excluſively, when incluſively, and many other ſuperſtitious toys they decreed, that it was a ſport then to behold their ſuperſtitions, and were tedious now to recite them.

Moreover theſe maſters of good order, for faſhion ſake, ordained that every man ſhould put on a ſurplice, not torn nor worn, but clean, forbidding them in any wiſe to wipe their noſes thereon.

Theſe things thus at a ſtay, when the commiſſioners were now ready to go their ways, the univerſity for ſo great benefits (which ſhe ſhould not ſuffer to fall out of remembrance many years after) coveting to ſhew ſome token of courteſy towards them again, dignified Ormanet and Cole with the degree of doctorſhip; for all the reſt, ſaving Chriſtopherſon, who now, by reaſon he was elected biſhop, preventing that degree, had received that order before. Thus at length were ſent away theſe peacemakers, that came to pacify ſtrifes and quarrels, who through provoking every man to accuſe one another, left ſuch gaps and breaches in mens hearts at their departure, that to this day they could never be cloſed nor joined together again.

Theſe commiſſioners, before they departed out of the univerſity, commanded, that the maſters of every houſe ſhould copy out their ſtatutes, which beſides common ordinances, contained in them certain rules of private order for every houſe particularly. Swinborn (who as I ſaid was maſter of Clare-hall) being demanded whether he would have thoſe things ingroſſed in parchment or in paper, anſwered, That it made no matter in what they were written: for the paper, or ſlighter thing that were well of leſs continuance than paper, would ſerve the turn well enough: for he ſaid, a ſlenderer thing than that would laſt a great deal longer than thoſe decrees ſhould ſtand in force. Neither was the man deceived in his conjecture: for within two years after, God beholding us with mercy, called queen Mary out of this life the 17th of November, 15 8, after whom her ſiſter Elizabeth ſucceeding in the kingdom, raiſed to life again the true religion. Whereupon, as the church of Chriſt began by little and little to flouriſh, ſo the memory of Bucer and Phagius (although their bones were burnt by cardinal Pool) was reſtored again by this godly queen Elizabeth, who gave then in commiſſion to Matthew Parker then archbiſhop of Canterbury, to Edmund Grindal then biſhop of London, to Mr. Walter Haddon and others: for the performance of which commiſſion, the ſaid reverend biſhops addreſſed their letters to the vice-chancellor, &c.

The Oration of Mr. Ackworth, Orator of the Univerſity, at the Reſtitution of Martin Bucer, and Paulus Phagius.

I AM in doubt, whether I may treat of the praiſe and commendation of ſo great a clerk (for the celebrating whereof, this aſſembly and concourſe of yours is made this day) or of the vices and calamities, out of which we be newly delivered, or of them both, conſidering the one cannot be mentioned without the other. In which times ye felt ſo much anguiſh and ſorrow, my right dear brethren, that if I ſhould repeat them, and bring them to remembrance again, I fear, I ſhould not ſo much work a juſt hatred in us towards them, for the injuries received in them, as renew our old ſorrow and heavineſs. Again, men muſt needs account me unadviſed and fooliſh in my doing, if I ſhould think myſelf able to make him who hath lived before our eyes in praiſe and eſtimation, more famous and notable by my oration, which he by his living and converſation hath oftentimes poliſhed. But the wickedneſs of the times, which endeavoured to wipe clean out of remembrance of men, the name that was ſo famous and renowned in every man's mouth, did much profit him. Inſomuch, that both in his life-time all things redounded to his continual renown, and eſpecially after his deceaſe, nothing could be deviſed more honourable than with ſo ſolemn furniture and ceremonies, to have gone about to have hurt the memory of ſuch a worthy man, and yet could not bring to paſs the thing that was ſo ſore coveted; but rather brought that thing to paſs, which was chiefly ſought to be avoided. For the deſire that men have of the dead hath purchaſed to many men everlaſting fame, and hath not taken away immortality, but rather amplified and increaſed the ſame. By means whereof it cometh to paſs, that he that will intreat of thoſe things that pertain to the praiſe of Bucer after his death, cannot chuſe but ſpeak of the crabbedneſs of the times paſt, upon which riſeth a great increaſe and augmentation of his praiſe. But his life ſo excellently ſet forth, not only by the writings of the clerks, Cheeke and Carre, and by the lively voice of the right famous Dr. Haddon, uttered in this place to the great admiration of all the hearers, when his body ſhould be laid into his grave to be buried, and after his burial, by the godly and moſt holy preachings of the right reverend father in Chriſt the archbiſhop of Canterbury that now is, and of Dr. Redman, which for the worthineſs and excellency of them, ought to ſtick longer in our minds unwritten, than many things that are penned and put in print; but alſo by the great aſſembly of all the degrees of the univerſity the ſame day, in bringing him to his grave, and the next day after by the induſtry of every man that was indued with any knowledge in the Greek or Latin tongues; of which there was no man but ſet up ſome verſes, as witneſs of his juſt and unfeigned ſorrow, upon the walls of the church: that neither at that time any reverence or duty which is due to the dead departing out of this life, was then overſlipped, or now remaineth undone, that may ſeem to pertain either to the celebrating of the memorial of ſo holy or famous a perſon, or to the conſecrating of him to everlaſting memory.

We at that time ſaw with our eyes this univerſity flouriſhing by his inſtitutions, the love and ſincere religion not only ingendered, but alſo confirmed and ſtrengthened through his continual and daily preaching. Inſomuch, that at ſuch time as he was ſuddenly taken from us, there was ſcarce any man that for ſorrow could find in his heart to bear with the preſent ſtate of this life, but that either he wiſhed with all his heart to depart out of this life with Bucer into another, and by dying to follow him into immortality; or elſe endeavoured himſelf with weeping and ſighing to call him again, being diſpatched of all troubles, into the priſon of this body, out of which he is eſcaped, leſt he ſhould leave us as it were ſtanding in battle without a captain, and he himſelf as one caſhiered, depart with his wages, or as one diſcharged out of the camp, withdraw himſelf to the everlaſting quietneſs and tranquillity of the ſoul. Therefore all men evidently declared at that time, both how ſore they took his death to heart, and alſo how hardly they could away with the loſs of ſuch a man. As long as the ardent love of his religion (wherewith we were inflamed) flouriſhed, it wrought in our hearts an incredible deſire of his preſence among us. But after the time that the godly man ceaſed to be any more in our ſight, and in our eyes, that ardent and burning love of religion, by little and little, waxed cold in our minds; and according to the times that came after (which were both miſerable, and to our utter undoing) it began not by little and little to be darkened, but it altogether vaniſhed away, and turned into nothing. For we fell again into the troubleſomeneſs of the popiſh doctrine; the old rites and cuſtoms of the Romiſh church were reſtored again, not to the adorning and beautifying of the chriſtian religion (as they ſurmiſed) but to the utter defacing, violating, and defiling of the ſame. Death was ſet before the eyes of ſuch as preſerved in the chriſtian doctrine that they had learned before. They were baniſhed the realm that would not apply themſelves to the times, and do as other men did: ſuch as remained, were forced either to diſſemble, or to hide themſelves and creep into corners, or elſe as it were by drinking of the charmed cup of Circe, to be turned and altered, not only from the nature of man into the nature of brute beaſts, but (that far worſe and much more monſtrous is) from the likeneſs of God and his angels, into the likeneſs of devils. And all England was infected with this malady. But I would to God the corruption of thoſe times, which overwhelmed all the whole realm, had not at leaſt wiſe yet pierced every part and member thereof. Of which there was not one, but that (beſides the grief that is felt, with the reſidue of the body, by reaſon of the ſickneſs and contagion ſpread into the whole) had ſome ſorrow and calamity peculiarly by itſelf. And to omit the reſt (of which to intreat, this place is not appointed, nor the time requireth ought to be ſpoken) this dwelling place of the muſes (which we call the univerſity) may be a ſufficient witneſs what we may judge of all the reſt of the body. For certainly, my brethren, the thing is not to be diſſembled, that cannot be hidden. We applying ourſelves to thoſe moſt filthy times, have moſt ſhamefully yielded, like faint-hearted cowards, who had not the ſtomachs to ſuſtain the adverſities of poverty, baniſhment and death. Which in our living and converſation kept neither the conſtancy taught us by philoſophy, nor yet the patience taught us by holy ſcripture, which have done all things at the commandment of others. And therefore that which the poet, although in another ſenſe, hath aptly ſpoken, may well be thought to have been truly propheſied upon us:

The times and ſeaſons changed be:
And changed in the ſame are we.

Divers of them that were of a pure and ſincere judgment as concerning religion, being driven from hence and troubled, the reſt that remained taſted and felt of the inhumanity of them in whoſe hands the authority of doing things here conſiſted; although to ſay the truth, I have uſed a gentler term than behoved. For it is not to be accounted inhumanity, but rather immanity and beaſtly cruelty: who when they had ſpent all kinds of torments and puniſhments upon the quick; when they had cruelly taken from ſuch as conſtantly perſevered, life; from others riches, honours, and all hope of promotion; yet they could not be ſo ſatisfied, but that incenſed and ſtirred with a greater fury, it began to outrage even againſt the dead. Therefore whereas in every ſingular place was executed a ſingular kind of cruelty, inſomuch that there was no kind of cruelty that could be deviſed, but it was put in practice in one place or other, this was proper or peculiar to Cambridge, to exerciſe the cruelty upon the dead, which in other places was extended but to the quick. Oxford burnt up the right reverend fathers, Cranmer, Ridley and Latimer, the noble witneſſes of the clear light of the goſpel. Moreover, at London periſhed theſe two lanthorns of light, Rogers and Bradford: In whom it is hard to ſay, whether there were more force of eloquence and utterance in preaching, or more holineſs of life and converſation. Many others, both here and in other places, were conſumed to aſhes for bearing record to the truth. For what city is there that hath not flamed, I ſay not with burning houſes and buildings, but with burning of holy bodies? But Cambridge, after there were no more left alive upon whom they might ſpue out their bitter poiſon, played the mad Bedlam againſt the dead. The dead men, whoſe living no man was able to find fault with, whoſe doctrine no man was able to reprove, were by falſe ſlanderous accuſers indicted, contrary to the laws of God and man, ſued in the law, condemned, their ſepulchres violated and broken up, their carcaſes pulled out and burnt with fire. A thing ſurely incredible, if we had not ſeen it with our eyes, and a thing that had not lightly been heard of. But the heinouſneſs of this wicked act was ſpread abroad as a common talk in every man's mouth, and was blown and diſperſed through all Chriſtendom.

Bucer, by the excellency of his wit and doctrine known to all men, of our countrymen in manner craved, of many others intreated and ſent for, to the intent he might inſtruct our Cambridge-men in the ſincere doctrine of the chriſtian religion, being ſpent with age, and his ſtrength utterly decayed, forſook his own country, refuſed not the tediouſneſs of that long journey, was not afraid to adventure himſelf upon the ſea, but had more regard of the dilating and amplifying of the church of Chriſt, than of all other things. So in concluſion he came, every man received and welcomed him: afterward he lived in ſuch wiſe, as it might appear he came not hither for his own ſake, but for ours. For he ſought not to drive away the ſickneſs that he had taken by troubleſome travel of his long journey: and albeit his ſtrength were weakened, yet he regarded not the recovery of his health, but put himſelf to immoderate labour and intolerable pain, only to teach and inſtruct us. And yet toward this ſo noble and worthy a perſon, while he lived were ſhewed all the tokens of humanity and gentleneſs, reverence and courteſy that could be; and when he was dead, the moſt horrible cruelty and ſpite that might be imagined. For what can be ſo commendable, as to grant unto the living, houſe and abiding place, and to the dead burial? Or what is he that will find in his heart to give entertainment, and to cheriſh that perſon in his houſe with all kind of gentleneſs that he can deviſe, upon whom he could not vouchſafe to beſtow burial when he is dead? Again, what an inconſtancy is it, with great ſolemnity, and with much advancement and commendation of his virtues to bury a man honourably, and anon after to break up his tomb, and pull him out ſpitefully, and wrongfully to ſlander him being dead, who during his life-time always deſerved praiſe? All theſe things have happened unto Bucer, who whilſt he lived had free acceſs into the moſt gorgeous buildings and ſtately palaces of the greateſt princes; and when he was dead, could not be ſuffered to enjoy ſo much as his poor grave. Who being laid in the ground nobly to his eternal fame, was afterward ſpitefully taken up and burned. Which things, albeit they did no harm to the dead, (for the dead carcaſes feel not pain, neither doth the fame of godly perſons depend upon the report of vulgar people, and the light rumours of men, but upon the rightful cenſure and juſt judgment of God), yet it reproveth the extreme cruelty and inſatiable deſire of revenge in them which offer ſuch utter wrong to the dead. Theſe perſons therefore whom they have pulled out of their graves and burned, I believe (if they had been alive) they would have caſt out of houſe and home, they would have driven out of all men's company, and in the end with moſt cruel torments have torn them in pieces, being nevertheleſs aliens, being ſtrangers, and being alſo fetched hither by us out of ſuch a country, where they not only needed not to fear any puniſhment, but contrariwiſe were always had in much reputation, as well among the noble and honourable, as alſo among the vulgar and common people. But yet how much more gentle then theſe men was biſhop Gardiner, otherwiſe an earneſt defender of the popiſh doctrine? who againſt his own countrymen, let paſs no cruelty whereby he might extinguiſh with fire and ſword the light of the goſpel: and and yet he ſpared foreigners, becauſe the right of them is ſo holy, that there was never nation ſo barbarous, that would violate the ſame. For when he had in his power the renowned clerk Peter Martyr, then teaching at Oxford, he would not keep him to puniſh him, but (as I have heard reported) when he ſhould go his way, he gave him wherewith to bear his charges. So that the thing which he thought he might of right do to his countrymen, he judged unlawful to do to ſtrangers. And whom the law of God could not with-hold from the wicked murdering of his own countrymen, him did the law of man bridle from killing of ſtrangers, which hath ever appeaſed all barbarous beaſtlineſs, and mitigated all cruelty. For it is a point of humanity for man and man to meet together, and one to come to another, though they be never ſo far ſeparated and ſet aſunder, both by ſea and land, without which acceſs there can be no intercourſe of merchandiſe, there can be no conference of wits, which firſt of all ingendered learning, nor any commodity of ſociety long to continue. To repulſe them that come to us, and to prohibit them our countries, is a point of inhumanity. Now to entertain them evil, that by our ſufferance dwell among us, and have increaſe of houſhold and houſhold-ſtuff, it is a point of wickedneſs. Wherefore this cruelty hath far ſurmounted the cruelty of all others, which, to ſatisfy the unſatiable greedineſs thereof, drew to execution not only ſtrangers, brought hither at our intreaty and ſending for, but even the withered and rotten carcaſes digged out of their graves; to the intent that the unmeaſurable thirſt which could not be quenched with ſhedding the blood of them that were alive, might at the leaſt be ſatified in burning of dead men's bones.

Theſe, my brethren, theſe, I ſay, are the juſt cauſes which have ſo provoked the wrath of God againſt us; becauſe that in doing extreme injury to the dead we have been prone and ready; but in putting the ſame away we have been ſlow and ſlack. For verily I believe (if I may have liberty to ſay freely what I think ye ſhall bear with me, me, if I chance to caſt forth any thing unadviſedly in the heat and haſty diſcourſe of my oration), that even this place, in which we have ſo oftentimes aſſembled, being defiled with that new kind of wickedneſs, ſuch as man never heard of before, is a lett and hinderance unto us, when we call for the help of God, by means whereof our prayers are not accepted, which we make to appeaſe the Godhead, and to win him to be favourable unto us again.

The blood of Abel ſhed by Cain, calleth and crieth from the earth that ſucketh it up: likewiſe, the undeſerved burning of theſe bodies, calleth upon Almighty God to puniſh us, and crieth, that not only the authors of ſo great a wickedneſs, but alſo the miniſters thereof are unpure, the places defiled, in which theſe things were perpetrated, the air infected which we take into our bodies, to the intent that by ſundry diſeaſes and ſickneſſes we may receive puniſhment for ſo execrable wickedneſs. Look well about ye (my dear brethren) and conſider with yourſelves the evils that are paſt; and ye ſhall ſee how they took their beginning at Bucer's death, following one on the neck of another even to this day. Firſt and foremoſt, when we were even in the chiefeſt of our mourning, and ſcarcely yet comforted of our ſorrow for his death, the ſweating ſickneſs lighted upon us, which paſſed ſwiftly through all England, and as it were in haſte diſpatched an innumerable company of men. Secondly, the untimely death of our moſt noble king Edward VI. whoſe life in virtue ſurmounted the opinion of all men, and ſeemed worthy of immortality) happened contrary to men's expectation in that age, in which unleſs violence be uſed, few to die. The converſion of religion, or rather the everſion and turning thereof into popery: The incurſion and domination of ſtrangers, under whoſe yoke our necks were almoſt ſubdued: The importunate cruelty of the biſhops againſt the chriſtians, which executed that wickedneſs, for making ſatisfaction whereof we are gathered together this day. Theſe are the things that enſued after his death; but after his burning enſued yet more grievous things: Namely, new kinds of plagues, and contagious diſeaſes, unknown to the very phyſicians, whereby either every man's health was impaired, or elſe they were brought to their graves, or elſe very hardly recovered. Bloody battles without victory, whereof the profit redounted to the enemy, and to us the ſlaughter with great loſs. Which things do evidently declare, that God is turned from us, and angry with us, and that he giveth no ear to our prayers, and that he is not moved with our cries and ſighs, but that he looketh that this our meeting and aſſembly ſhould be to this end, that foraſmuch as we have violated their corps, we ſhould do them right again; ſo that the memorial of theſe moſt holy men may be commended unto poſterity unhurt and undefamed. Wherefore amend yet at length (my brethren) which hitherto, by reaſon of the variableneſs and unconſtancy of the times, have been wavering and unſtedfaſt in your hearts; ſhew yourſelves cheerful and forward in making ſatisfaction for the injury you have done to the dead, whom with ſo great wickedneſs of late ye indamaged and defiled; not cenſing them with the perfumes of thoſe odours and ſpices now worn out of uſe, and put to flight, but with a true and unfeigned repentance of the heart, and with prayer, to the intent that the heavenly Godhead, provoked by our doings to be our enemy, may by our humble ſubmiſſion be intreated to be favourable and agreeable to all our other requeſts.

When Mr. Ackworth had made an end of his oration, Mr. James Pilkington, the queen's reader of the divinity lecture, going up into the pulpit made a ſermon upon the 112th Pſalm, the beginning whereof is, "Bleſſed is the man that feareth the Lord."

Where intending to prove, that the remembrance of the juſt man ſhall not periſh, and that Bucer is bleſſed, and that the ungodly ſhall fret at the ſight thereof, but yet that all their attempts ſhall be to no purpoſe, (to the intent this ſaying may be verified, I will curſe your bleſſings, and bleſs your curſings), he took his beginning of his own perſon; That albeit he were both ready and willing to take that matter in hand, partly for the worthineſs of the matter itſelf, and eſpecially for certain ſingular virtues of thoſe perſons, for whom that congregation was called, yet notwithſtanding, he ſaid, he was not fit to take that charge upon him.

For it were more reaſon, that he which before had done Bucer wrong, ſhould now make him amends for the diſpleaſure. As for his own part, he was ſo far from working any evil againſt Bucer, either by word or deed; that for their ſingular knowledge almoſt in all kind of learning, he embraced both him and Phagius with all his heart: But yet he ſomewhat more favoured Bucer, as with whom he had more familiarity and acquaintance. In conſideration whereof, although that it was ſcarce convenient that he at that time ſhould ſpeak, yet notwithſtanding he was contented for friendſhip and courteſy ſake not to fail them in their buſineſs.

Having made this preface, he entered into the pith of the matter, wherein he blamed greatly the barbarous cruelty of the court of Rome, ſo fiercely extended againſt the dead. He ſaid it was a more heinous matter than was to be borne with, to have ſhewed ſuch extreme cruelty to them that were alive; but for any man to miſbehave himſelf in ſuch wiſe toward the dead, was ſuch a a thing as had not lightly been heard of: Saving that he affirmed this cuſtom of excommunicating and curſing of dead bodies to have come firſt from Rome. For Evagrius reporteth in his writings, that Eutychius was of the ſame opinion, induced by the example of Joſias, who ſlew the prieſts of Baal, and burnt up the bones of them that were dead, even upon the altars. Whereas before the time of Eutychius this kind of puniſhment was well near unknown, neither afterward uſurped by any man (that ever he heard of) till nine hundred years after Chriſt. In the latter times (which how much the further they were from the golden age of the apoſtles, ſo much the more they were corrupted), this kind of cruelty began to creep further. For it is manifeſtly known, that Stephen the ſixth, pope of Rome digged up Formoſus, his laſt predeceſſor in that ſee, and ſpoiling him of his apparel, buried him again in a layman's apparel (as they call it) having firſt cut off and thrown into the Tyber his two fingers, with which according to their accuſtomed manner, he was wont to bleſs and conſecrate. Which his unſpeakable tyranny uſed againſt Formoſus, within ſix years after Sergius the third increaſed alſo againſt the ſame Formoſus: For taking up his dead body, and ſetting it in a pope's chair, he cauſed his head to be ſmitten off, and his other three fingers to be cut from his hand, and his body to be caſt into the river of Tyber, abrogating and diſannulling all his decrees, which thing was never done by any man before that day. The cauſe why ſo great cruelty was exerciſed (by the report of Nauclerus) was this; becauſe that Formoſus had been an adverſary to Stephen and Sergius when they ſued to be made biſhops.

This kind of cruelty, unheard of before, the popes awhile exerciſed one againſt another. But now, ere ever they had ſufficiently felt the ſmart thereof themſelves, they had turned the ſame upon their necks. Wherefore it was to be wiſhed, that ſeeing it began among them, it might have remained ſtill with the authors thereof, and not have been ſpread over thence unto us. But ſuch is the nature of all evil, that it quickly paſſeth into example, for others to do the like. For about the year of the Lord 1400, John Wickliff was in like manner digged up and burnt into aſhes, and thrown into a brook that runneth by the town where he was buried. Of which ſelf-ſame ſauce taſted alſo William Tracy of Glouceſter, a man of a worſhipful houſe, becauſe he had written in his his laſt will, that he ſhould be ſaved only by faith in Jeſus Chriſt, and that there needed not the help of any man thereto, whether he were in heaven or in earth; and therefore bequeathed no legacy to that purpoſe, as all other men were accuſtomed to do. This deed was done ſince we may remember, about the twenty-ſecond year of the reign of king Henry the eighth, in the year of our lord 1530.

Now ſeeing they extended ſuch cruelty to the dead, he ſaid it was an eaſy matter to conjecture what they would do to the living. Whereof we have had ſufficient trial by the examples of our own men, theſe few years paſt. And if we would take the pains to peruſe things done ſomewhat longer ago, we might find notable matters out of our own chronicles. Howbeit, it was ſufficient for the manifeſt demonſtration of that matter, to declare the beaſtly butchery of the French king, executed upon the Waldenſes at Cabrier, and the places near thereabout, by his captain Miner, about the year of our Lord 1545, than which there was never thing read of more cruelly done, no not even of the barbarous pagans. And yet for all that, when divers had ſhewed their uttermoſt cruelty both againſt theſe and many others, they were ſo far from their purpoſe, in extinguiſhing the light of the goſpel, which they endeavoured to ſuppreſs, that it increaſed daily more and more. Which thing Charles the fifth (than whom all Chriſtendom had not a more prudent prince, nor the church of Chriſt almoſt a ſorer enemy), eaſily perceived; and therefore when he had in his hand Luther dead, and Melanchthon and Pomeran with certain other preachers of the goſpel alive, he not only determined not any thing extremely againſt them, nor violated their graves, but alſo intreating them gently, ſent them away, not ſo much as once forbidding them to publiſh openly the doctrine that they profeſſed. For it is the nature of Chriſt's church, that the more that tyrants ſpurn againſt it, the more it increaſeth and flouriſheth. A notable proof aſſuredly of the providence and pleaſure of God in ſowing the goſpel, was that coming of the Bohemians unto us, to the intent to hear Wickliff, of whom we ſpake before, who at that time read openly at Oxford; and alſo the going of our men to the ſaid Bohemians when perſecution was raiſed among us. But much more notable was it, that we have ſeen come to paſs in theſe our days; that the Spaniards, ſent for into the realm of purpoſe to ſuppreſs the goſpel, as ſoon as they were returned home repleniſhed many parts of their country with the ſame truth of religion, to which before they were utter enemies.

By which examples it might evidently be perceived, that the princes of this world labour in vain to overthrow it, conſidering how the mercy of God hath ſown it abroad, not only in thoſe countries that we ſpake of, but alſo in France, Poland, Scotland, and almoſt all the reſt of Europe. For it is ſaid, that ſome parts of Italy (although it be under the pope's noſe) yet do they of late incline to the knowledge of the heavenly truth: Wherefore ſufficient argument and proof might be taken by the ſucceſs and increaſe thereof, to make us believe that this doctrine is ſent us from heaven, unleſs we will wilfully be blinded. And if there were any that deſired to be perſuaded more at large in the matter, he might adviſedly conſider the voyage that the emperor and the pope with both their powers together, made jointly againſt the Bohemians. In which the emperor took ſuch an unworthy repulſe of ſo ſmall a handful of his enemies, that he never almoſt in all his life took the like dishonour in any place. Hereof alſo might be an eſpecial example of the death of Henry king of France, who the ſame day that he had purpoſed to perſecute the church of Chriſt, and to have burned certain of his guard whom he had impriſoned for religion, at whoſe execution he had promiſed to have been himſelf in perſon, in the midſt of his triumph at a tourney, was wounded ſo ſore in the head with a ſpear by one of his own ſubjects, that he ſoon after died.

In which behalf, the dreadful judgments of God were no leſs approved in our own countrymen. For one that was a notable ſlaughterman of Chriſt's ſaints rotted alive, [biſhop Gardiner] and before he died, ſuch a rank ſavour ſteamed from all his body, that none of his friends were able to come to him, but they were ready to vomit. Another, being in utter deſpair well nigh of all health, howled out miſerably. The third ran out of his wits. And divers others that were enemies to the church periſhed miſerably in the end. All which things were moſt certain tokens of the favour and defence of the Divine Majeſty towards his church, and of his wrath and vengeance towards the tyrants. And foraſmuch as he had made mention of the Bohemians, he ſaid it was a moſt apt example that was reported of their captain Ziſca, who, when he ſhould die, ordered his body to be flayed, and of his ſkin to make a parchment to cover the head of a drum: for it ſhould come to paſs, that when his enemies heard the ſound of it, they ſhould not be able to ſtand againſt them. The like counſel (he ſaid) he himſelf now gave them as concerning Bucer: that like as the Bohemians did with the ſkin of Ziſca, the ſame ſhould they do with the arguments and doctrine of Bucer. For as ſoon as the papiſts ſhould hear the noiſe of him, their gewgaws would forthwith decay. For ſaving that they uſed violence to ſuch as withſtood them, their doctrine contained nothing that might ſeem to any man (having but mean underſtanding in holy ſcripture) to be grounded upon any reaſon.

As for thoſe things that were done by them, againſt ſuch as could not play the madman as well as they, ſome of them favoured of open force, and ſome of ridiculous fooliſhneſs. For what was this firſt of all? was it not frivolous, that by the ſpace of three years together, maſs ſhould be ſung in thoſe places where Bucer and Phagius reſted in the Lord, without any offence at all? And as ſoon as they took it to be an offence, ſtraitway to be an offence if any were heard there: or that it ſhould not be as good then as it was before: as if that then upon the ſudden it had been a heinous matter to celebrate it in that place, and that the fault that was paſt ſhould be counted the more grievous, becauſe it was done of longer time before. Moreover this was a matter of none effect, that Bucer and Phagius only ſhould be dug up, as who ſhould ſay, that he only had embraced the religion which they call hereſy. It was well known how one of the burgeiſſes of the town had been minded toward the popiſh religion: who when he ſhould die, deſiring neither ringing of bells, Dirges, nor any other ſuch kind of trifles to be done for him in his anniverſary, as they term it, but rather that they ſhould go with inſtruments of muſic before the mayor and council of the city, to celebrate his memorial; and alſo that yearly a ſermon ſhould be made to the people, bequeathing a piece of money to the preacher for his labour. Neither might he omit in that place to ſpeak of Ward the painter, who albeit he was a man of no reputation, yet was he not to be deſpiſed for the religion ſake which he diligently followed. Neither were divers others to be paſſed over with ſilence, who were known of a certainty to have continued in the ſame ſect, and to reſt in other churchyards in Cambridge, and rather through the whole realm, and yet defiled not their maſſes at all.

All which perſons (foraſmuch as they were all of one opinion) ought all to have been taken up, or elſe all have been to let lie with the ſame religion; unleſs a man would grant, that it lieth in their power to make what they liſt lawful at their own pleaſure.

In the condemnation of Bucer and Phagius, to ſay the truth, they uſed too much cruelty, and too much violence. For howſoever it went with the doctrine of Bucer, certainly they could find nothing whereof to accuſe Phagius, Phagius, inaſmuch as he wrote nothing that came abroad, except a few things that he had tranſlated out of the Hebrew and Chaldee tongues into Latin. After his coming into the realm, he never read, he never diſputed, he never preached, he never taught; for he died ſoon after, ſo that he could in that time give no occaſion for his adverſaries to take hold on, whereby to accuſe him whom they never heard ſpeak. In that they hated Bucer ſo deadly, for the allowable marriage of the clergy, it was their own malice conceived againſt him, and a very ſlander raiſed by themſelves. For he had for his defence in that matter (beſides other helps) the teſtimony of pope Pius the ſecond, who in a certain place ſaith, That upon weighty conſiderations prieſts wives were taken from them, but for more weighty cauſes were to be reſtored again. And alſo the ſtatute of the emperor (they call it the Interim) by which it is enacted, That ſuch of the clergy as were married, ſhould not be divorced from their wives.

Thus turning his ſtyle from this matter to the univerſity, he reproved in a few words their unfaithfulneſs towards theſe men. For if the Lord ſuffered not the bones of the king of Edom, being a wicked man, to be taken up and burnt without revengement (as ſaith Amos) let us aſſure ourſelves he will not ſuffer ſo notable a wrong done to his godly preachers unrevenged.

Afterward when he came to the condemnation (which we told you in the former action was pronounced by Dr. Perne the vice-chancellor, in the name of them all) being ſomewhat more moved at the matter, he aſtoniſhed them how much it behoved them to uſe great circumſpectneſs, what they decreed upon any man by their voices, in admitting or rejecting any man to the promotions and degrees of the univerſity. For that he which ſhould take his authority from them, ſhould be a great prejudice to all the other multitude, which (for the opinion that he had of their doctrine, judgment, allowance and knowledge), did think nothing but well of them. For it would come to paſs, that if they would beſtow their promotions upon none but fit perſons, and let the unfit go as they come, both the common-wealth ſhould receive much advantage and profit by them, and beſides that, they ſhould highly pleaſe God. But if they perſiſted to be negligent in doing thereof, they ſhould grievouſly endamage the common-wealth, and worthily work their own ſhame and reproach. Over and beſides that, they ſhould greatly offend the majeſty of God, whoſe commandment (Not to bear falſe witneſs) they ſhould in ſo doing break and violate.

In the mean while that he was ſpeaking theſe and many other things before his audience, many of the univerſity, to ſet out and defend Bucer withal, beſet the walls of the church and church-porch on both ſides with verſes; ſome in Latin, ſome in Greek, and ſome in Engliſh, in which they made a manifeſt declaration how they were minded both towards Bucer and Phagius. Finally, when his ſermon was ended, they made a common ſupplication and prayers. After thanks rendered to God for many other things, but eſpecially for reſtoring of the true and ſincere religion, every man departed his way.

Foraſmuch as mention hath been made of the death of the worthy and famous clerk, Martin Bucer, and of the burning of his bones after his death, it will not be improper here to inſert the funeral verſe of Dr. Redman upon Bucer's death, now tranſlated into Engliſh.

The Epitaph or Funeral Verſe of Dr. Redman, upon the Death of Bucer.

HENCE, O far hence let envy fly,
Nor be revenge nor mock'ry nigh:
The lying lips and faithleſs mind,
Let here no reſt or refuge find.
Theſe from the man God's image take,
And him more like the devils make.
But holy truth be preſent here,
Thou virgin everlaſting fair,
And to the inquiring many ſhow,
From whence proceeds the ſcene of woe.
Bucer, who lead the church before,
Bucer, that light of learning, is no more:
As the ſun gilds the world around,
So he in learning's orb was found.
The mourning ſchools his loſs confeſs,
But who can Cambridge's grief expreſs?
High as the ſtars her ſigns aſcend,
Lamenting thus her wonted friend.
No more ſhall we a maſter find,
Like him ſo juſt, like him ſo kind:
Whoſe exemplary life was fraught,
With all the virtues which he taught:
His reſt ſo ſmall, labour ſo great,
Nature ſunk down beneath the weight,
And yielded to death's fatal power,
Before his ſhort appointed hour.
But ſtop, my muſe, thy labour's vain,
Thy lines can't half his praiſe contain:
Then farewel, Bucer, thy remains
An humble ſepulchre retains,
'Till the Great Judge of all ſhall come,
And paſs his univerſal doom:
Then he thy body will reſtore,
More glorious than it was before.
'Till when thy ſoul amongſt the bleſt remains,
There happily thou lives, there happily thou reigns.

The deſpiteful Handling and Madneſs of the Papiſts towards Peter Martyr's Wife at Oxford, taken up from her Grave at the Command of Cardinal Poole, and afterwards buried in a Dunghill.

AND becauſe one univerſity ſhould not mock the other, like cruelty was alſo declared upon the dead body of Peter Martyr's wife at Oxford, an honeſt, grave and ſober matron while ſhe lived, and always a great helper of poor people, as many dwelling there can well teſtify.

In the year of our Lord 1552, ſhe departed this life, with great ſorrow of all thoſe needy perſons, whoſe neceſſities many times and often ſhe had liberally eaſed and relieved. Now when Brooks biſhop of Glouceſter, Nicholas Ormanet datary, Robert Morwen preſident of Corpus Chriſti college, Cole and Wright doctors of the civil law, came thither as the cardinal's viſitors, they among other things had in commiſſion to take up this good woman again out of her grave, and to conſume her carcaſe with fire, not doubting but that ſhe was of the ſame religion that her huſband had profeſſed before, when he read the king's lecture there. And to make a ſhew that they would do nothing diſorderly, they called all thoſe before them, that had any acquaintance with her or her huſband. They adminiſtered an oath unto them, that they ſhould not conceal whatſoever was demanded. In fine, their anſwer was, that they knew not what religion ſhe was of, by reaſon they underſtood not her language.

To be ſhort, after the viſitors had ſped their buſineſs they came for, they went to the cardinal again, certifying him that upon due inquiſition made, they could learn nothing upon which by the law they might burn her. Notwithſtanding the cardinal did not leave the matter ſo, but wrote down his letters a good while after to Marſhall, then dean of Frideſwide's, that he ſhould dig her up, and lay her out of chriſtian burial, becauſe ſhe was interred nigh unto St. Frideſwide's relics, ſometime had in great reverence reverence in that college. Dr. Marſhall calling his ſpades and mattocks together in the evening, when he was well whitled, cauſed her to be taken up and buried in a dunghill.

Howbeit, when it pleaſed God under good queen Elizabeth to give quietneſs to his church, long time perſecuted with priſon and death, then Dr. Parker, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Edmund Grindall, biſhop of London, Richard Goodrick, with divers others her majeſty's high commiſſioners in matters of religion (nothing ignorant how far the adverſaries of the truth had tranſgreſſed the bounds of all humanity, in violating the ſepulchre or grave of that good and virtuous woman) willed certain of that college, in which this uncourteous touch was attempted or done, to take her out of the dunghill where ſhe lay, and ſolemnly in the face of the whole town to bury her again in a more decent monument. For though the body being once dead, no great eſtimation were to be had, how or where the bones were laid; yet was ſome reverence to be uſed toward her for ſex and womanhood ſake. Beſides, to ſay the truth, it was great ſhame, that he which had travelled ſo far at king Edward's requeſt, from the place wherein he dwelt quietly, and had taken ſo earneſt pains, being an old man, in reading and ſetting forth the truth all he could, with learning to teach and inſtruct, and ſo well deſerved of that univerſity; ſhould with ſo ungentle a recompence of ingratitude be rewarded again, as to have his wife that was a godly woman, a ſtranger, good to many, eſpecially to the poor, and hurtful to none, either in word or deed, without juſt deſerving, and beſide their own law, not proceeding againſt her according to the order thereof, ſpitefully to be lain in a ſtinking dunghill.

To all good natures the fact ſeemed odious, and of ſuch as be indued with humanity, utterly to be abhorred. Wherefore Mr. Calfield, then ſub-dean of the college, diligently provided, that from Marſhall's dunghill ſhe was reſtored and tranſlated to her proper place again; yea, and withal coupled her with Frideſwide's bones, that in caſe any cardinal will be ſo mad hereafter to remove this woman's bones again, it ſhall be hard for them to diſcern the bones of her from the other. And to the intent the ſame might be notified to the minds of men the better, the next day after, which was Sunday, Mr. Rogerſon preached unto the people, in which ſermon by the way he declared the rough dealing of the adverſaries, which not contented to practiſe their cruelty againſt the living, but they muſt alſo rage againſt one that was dead, and had lain two years in her grave. God grant them once to ſee their own wickedneſs, Amen.

And thus much touching the noble acts and ſtrangeneſs of this worthy cardinal in both the univerſities; whereunto it ſhall not be impertinent, here alſo conſequently to adjoin and ſet forth to the eyes of the world, the blind and bloody articles ſet out by cardinal Poole, to be enquired upon, within his dioceſe of Canterbury, whereby it may the better appear what yokes and ſnares of fond and fruitleſs traditions were laid upon the poor flock of Chriſt, to intangle and oppreſs them with loſs of life and liberty. By which, wiſe men have to ſee what godly fruits proceeded from that catholic church and ſee of Rome. In which, albeit thou ſeeſt (good reader) ſome good articles interſperſed, let that nothing move thee: for elſe how could ſuch poiſon be adminiſtered, but it muſt have ſome honey to reliſh the reader's taſte.

The Articles ſet forth by Cardinal Poole, to be enquired in his ordinary Viſitation, within his Dioceſe of Canterbury.

An Account of ten Martyrs condemned and burnt within the Diocele of Canterbury.

MENTION was made a little before [Page 623.] of the perſecution in Kent; where we declared that 15 were impriſoned and condemned in the caſtle of Canterbury. Of which 15 we declared five to be famiſhed to death within the ſaid caſtle, and buried by the highway, about the beginning of November. The other ten in January 1557, were committed unto the fire, and there conſumed to aſhes, by Thornton, ſuffragan of Dover, and Nicholas Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury.

Their names be theſe: John Philpot of Tenterden, William Waterer, of Beddingden, Stephen Kemp, of Norgate, William Hay of Hithe, Thomas Hudſon, of Salenge, Matt. Bradbridge, of Tenderden, Thomas Stephens, of Beddingden, Nicholas Final, of Tenterden, W. Lowick of Cranbroke, W. Prowting, of Thornham.

Of theſe ten godly martyrs, ſix were burnt at Canterbury, about the 15th of January, that is, Kemp, Waterer, Prowting, Lowick, Hudſon, and Hay. Other two, Stephens and Philpot, at Wye, about the ſame month. The other two, Final and Bradbridge, were burnt together at Aſhford, the 16th of the ſame.

What the ordinary articles were that were commonly objected to them of Canterbury dioceſe is before rehearſed, ſave only that to ſome of theſe, as to them that follow after, as the time of their perſecution did grow, ſo their articles withal did increaſe to the number of two and twenty, containing ſuch like matter as ſeemed to the maintenance of the Romiſh ſee.

Their anſwers likewiſe to theſe articles need not be rehearſed, ſeeing they all agreed together, though not in the ſame form of words, yet to the ſame effect, &c.

The next month following which was February, came out another bloody commiſſion from the king and queen, to kindle up the fire of perſecution, as tho' it were not hot enough already; the contents of which commiſſion I thought here not to omit; nor for lack of matter, whereof I have too much; but that the reader may underſtand how kings and princes of this world, like as in the firſt perſecutions of the primitive church under Valerian, Decius, Maximinian, Diocleſian, Licinius, &c. ſo now alſo in theſe latter perilous days, have ſet out all their main force and power, with laws, policy and authority to the uttermoſt they could deviſe againſt Chriſt and his goſpel. And yet notwithſtanding all theſe laws, conſtitutions, injunctions, and terrible proclamations provided againſt Chriſt and his goſpel, Chriſt yet ſtill continueth, his goſpel flouriſheth, and truth prevaileth; kings and emperors in their own purpoſes overthrown, their devices diſſolved, their counſels confounded; as examples both of this and of all times and ages do make manifeſt. But now let us hear the intent of this commiſſion, in tenor as followeth.

A bloody Commiſſion given forth by King Philip and Queen Mary, to perſecute the poor Members of Chriſt.

PHilip and Mary, by the grace of God king and queen of England, &c. To the right reverend father in God, our right truſty and well-beloved counſellor, Thomas, biſhop of Ely, and to our right truſty and well-beloved William Windſore, knight, lord Windſore, Edward North, knight, lord North, and to our truſty and well-beloved counſellor, J. Bourn, knight, one of our chief ſecretaries, J. Mordaunt, knight, Francis Englefield, knight, maſter of our wards and liveries, Edward Walgrave, knight, maſter of our great wardrobe, Nicholas Hare, knight, maſter of the rolls, Thomas Pope, knight, Roger Cholmley, knight, Richard Rede, knight, Rowland Hill, knight, William Raſtal, ſerjeant at law, Henry Cole, clerk, dean of Paul's, William Roper, and Ralph Cholmley, eſquires, William Cook, Thomas Martin, John Story, and John Vaughan, doctors of the law, greeting.

Foraſmuch as divers deviliſh and ſlanderous perſons have not only invented, bruted, and ſet forth divers falſe rumours, tales, and ſeditious ſlanders againſt Us, but alſo have ſown divers hereſies and heretical opinions, and ſet forth divers ſeditious books within this Our realm of England, meaning thereby to ſtir up diviſion, ſtrife, contention, and ſedition, not only amongſt Our loving ſubjects, but alſo betwixt Us and Our ſaid ſubjects, with divers other outrageous miſdemeanors, enormities, contempts and offences, daily committed and done, to the diſquieting of Us and Our people: We, minding the due puniſhment of ſuch offenders, and the repreſſing of ſuch like offences, enormities, and miſbehaviours from henceforth, having ſpecial truſt and confidence in your fidelities, wiſdoms, and diſcretions, have authoriſed, appointed, and aſſigned you to be Our commiſſioners, and by theſe preſents do give full power and authority unto you, and three of you, to enquire as well by the oaths of twelve good and lawful men, as by witneſſes and all other means and politic ways you can deviſe, of all and ſingular heretical opinions, lollardies, heretical and ſeditious books, concealments, contempts, conſpiracies, and all falſe rumours, tales, ſeditious and ſlanderous words or ſayings, raiſed, publiſhed, bruted, invented, or ſet forth againſt Us, or either of Us, or againſt the quiet governance and rule of Our people and ſubjects, by books, lyes, tales, or otherwiſe, in any county, key, bowing, or other place or places, within this Our realm of England, or elſewhere, in any place or places beyond the ſeas, and of the bringers in, utterers, buyers, ſellers, readers, keepers, or conveyers of any ſuch letter, books, rumour, and tale, and of all and every their coadjutors, counſellors, comforters, procurers, abettors, and maintainers, giving unto you and three of you full power and authority by virtue hereof, to ſearch out and take into your hands and poſſeſſions all manner of heretical and ſeditous books, letters, and writings, whereſoever they or any of them ſhall be found, as well in printers houſes and ſhops, as elſewhere, willing you and every of you to ſearch for the ſame in all places according to your diſcretions.

And alſo to enquire, hear and determine all and ſingular enormities, diſturbances, miſbehaviours, and negligences committed in any church, chapel, or other hallowed place within this realm, and alſo for and concerning the taking away or with-holding any lands, tenements, goods, ornaments, ſtocks of money, or other things belonging to every of the ſame churches and chapels, and all accounts and reckonings concerning the ſame.

And alſo to enquire and ſearch out all ſuch perſons as obſtinately do refuſe to receive the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, to hear maſs, or to come to their pariſh churches, or other convenient places appointed for divine ſervice, and all ſuch as refuſe to go on proceſſion, to take holy bread or holy water, or otherwiſe do miſuſe themſelves in any church or other hallowed places, whereſoever any of the ſame offences have been, or hereafter ſhall be committed within this Our ſaid realm.

Nevertheleſs, Our will and pleaſure is, that when, and as often as any perſon or perſons, hereafter being called or convented before you, do obſtinately perſiſt, or ſtand in any manner of hereſy, or heretical opinion, that then ye, or three of you, do immediately take order, that the ſame perſon or perſons, ſo ſtanding or perſiſting, be delivered and committed to his ordinary, there to be uſed according to the ſpiritual and eccleſiaſtical laws.

And alſo We give unto you, or three of you, full power and authority to enquire and ſearch out all vagabonds, ond maſterleſs men, barretours, quarrellers, and ſuſpected perſons, abiding within Our city of London, and ten miles compaſs of the ſame, and all affaults and affrays done and committed within the ſame city and compaſs.

And further to ſearch out all waſtes, decays, and ruins of churches, chancels, chapels, parſonages, and vicarages in the dioceſe of the ſame, being within this realm, giving you, and every of you, full power and authority by virtue hereof to hear and determine the ſame, and all other offences and matters above ſpecified and rehearſed, according to your wiſdoms, conſciences, and diſcretions, willing and commanding you, or three of you, from time to time, to uſe and deviſe all ſuch politic ways and means for the trial and ſearching out of the premiſes, as by you, or three of you, ſhall be thought moſt expedient and neceſſary: and upon enquiry and due proof had, known, perceived, and tried out, by the confeſſion of the parties, or by ſufficient witneſſes before you, or three of you, concerning the premiſes, or any part thereof, or by any other ways or means requiſite, to give and award ſuch puniſhment to the offenders, by fine, impriſonment, or otherwiſe, and to take ſuch order for redreſs and reformation of the premiſes, as to your wiſdoms, or three of you, ſhall be thought meet and convenient.

Further willing and commanding you, and every three of you, in caſe you ſhall find any perſon or perſons obſtinate or diſobedient, either in their appearance before you, or three of you, at your calling or aſſignment, or elſe in not accompliſhing, or not obeying your decrees, orders, and commandments in any thing or things, touching the premiſes or any part thereof, to commit the ſame perſon or perſons ſo offending to ward, there to remain, remain, till by you, or three of you, he be diſcharged or delivered, &c.

The Apprehenſion of twenty-two Priſoners in Eſſex.

AFTER this bloody proclamation or commiſſion thus given out at London, which was the eighth day of February, in the third and fourth years of the reign of the king and queen, theſe new inquiſitors, eſpecially ſome of them, began to ruffle, and to take upon them not a little; ſo that all quarters were full of perſecution, and priſons almoſt full of priſoners; namely, in the dioceſe of Canterbury, whereof (by the leave of Chriſt) we will ſay more anon.

In the mean time, about the town of Colcheſter, the wind of perſecution began fiercely to riſe; inſomuch that three and twenty together, men and women, were apprehended at one clap; of which number one eſcaped; the other twenty-two were driven up like a flock of chriſtian lambs to London, with two or three leaders with them at moſt, ready to give their ſkins to be plucked off for the goſpel's ſake. Notwithſtanding the biſhops, afraid belike of the number, to put ſo many at once to death, ſought means to deliver them, and ſo they did, drawing out an eaſy ſubmiſſion for them, or rather ſuffering them to draw it out themſelves; notwithſtanding divers of them were afterward taken again and ſuffered, as (God willing) ye ſhall hear hereafter. Such as met them by the way coming up, ſaw them in the fields ſcattering in ſuch ſort, as that they might eaſily have eſcaped away. And when they entered into the towns, their keepers called them again into array, to go two and two together, having a band or line going between them, the holding the ſame in their hands, every one having another cord about his arm, as though they were tied. And ſo were theſe fourteen men and eight women carried up to London, the people by the way praying to God for them, to give them ſtrength. At their entering into London they were pinioned, and ſo came into the city, as the picture doth deſcribe. But firſt let us declare concerning their being taken, and their attachers, contained in the commiſſary's letter written to Bonner; then the indenture made between the commiſſioners and the popiſh commiſſary. The letter of the commiſſary is this:

AFTER my duty done in receiving and accompliſhing your honourable and moſt loving letters, dated Auguſt 7, be it known unto your Lordſhip, that the 28th of Auguſt the Lord of Oxenford, Lord Darcy, H. Tyrel, A. Brown, W. Bendelows, E. Tyrel, R. Weſton, R. Appleton, publiſhed their commiſſion, to ſeize the lands, tenements, and goods of the fugitives, ſo that the owners ſhould have neither uſe nor advantage thereof, but by inventory remain in ſafe keeping, until the cauſe were determined.

And alſo there was likewiſe proclaimed the queen's warrant for the reſtitution of the church goods within Colcheſter, and the hundred thereabout, to the uſe of God's ſervice. And then were called the pariſhes particularly, and the heretics partly committed to my examination. And that divers perſons ſhould certify me of the ornaments of their churches, betwixt this and the juſtices next appearance, which ſhall be on Michaelmas next. And the pariſhes which had preſented at two ſeveral times, to have all ornaments with other things in good order, were exonerated for ever, till they were warned again, and others to make their appearance from time to time. And thoſe names blotted in the indenture were indicted for treaſon, fugitives, or diſobedients, and were put forth by Mr. Brown's commandment. And before the ſealing, my Lord Darcy ſaid unto me apart and Mr. Bendelows, that I ſhould have ſufficient time to ſend unto your Lordſhip, yea, if need were; the heretics to remain in durance till I had an anſwer from you, yea, till the Lord legates graces commiſſioners come into the country.

And Mr. Brown came unto my Lord Darcy's houſe and parlour belonging unto Mr. Barnaby, before my ſaid Lord and all the juſtices, and laid his hand on my ſhoulder, with a ſmiling countenance, and deſired me to make his hearty commendations to your good Lordſhip, and aſked me if I would: and I ſaid, Yea, with a good will. Wherefore I was glad, and thought that I ſhould not have been charged with ſo ſudden a carriage.

But after dinner, the juſtices counſelled with the bailiffs, and with the goalers, and then after took me unto them, and made collation of the indentures, and ſealed them; and then Mr. Brown commanded me this afternoon, being the 30th of Auguſt, to go and receive my priſoners by and by. And then I ſaid, it is an unreaſonable commandment, for that I have attended on you here theſe three days, and this Sunday early I have ſent home my men. Wherefore I deſire you to have a convenient time appointed, wherein I may know, whether it will pleaſe my Lord my maſter to ſend his commiſſioners hither, or that I ſhall make carriage of them unto his Lordſhip. Then Mr. Brown ſaid, We are certified that the council have written to your maſter to make ſpeed, and to rid theſe priſoners out of hand: therefore go receive your priſoners in haſte. I anſwered, Sir, I ſhall receive them within theſe ten days. Then Mr. Brown ſaid, The limitation lieth in us, and not in you, therefore get you hence.

I replied, Sir, ye have indicted and delivered me by this indenture, whoſe faith or opinions I knew not, truſting that ye will grant me a time to examine them, lest I ſhould puniſh the catholics. Well, ſaid Mr. Brown, for that cauſe ye ſhall have time betwixt this and Wedneſday. And I ſay unto you, Mr. bailiffs, if he do not receive them at your hands on Wedneſday, ſet open your door, and let them go.

Then I ſaid, my Lord and maſters all, I promiſe to diſcharge the town and country of theſe heretics within theſe ten days. The Lord Darcy anſwered, Commiſſary, we do and muſt all agree in one. Wherefore do ye receive them on or before Wedneſday.

To which I replied, My Lord, the laſt I carried, I was going betwixt the caſtle and St. Katherine's chapel two hours and a half, and in great preſs and danger; wherefore this may be to deſire your Lordſhip to give in commandment unto Mr. Sayer, my bailiff, here preſent, to aid me through his liberties, not only with men and weapons, but that the town-clerk may be ready there with his book to write the names of the moſt buſy perſons, and this upon three hours warning; all which both my Lord and Mr. Brown commanded.

The 31ſt of Auguſt William Goodwin of Muchbirch, huſbandman, this bringer, and Tho. Alſey, of Copford, your Lordſhip's apparator of your conſiſtory in Colcheſter, covenanted with me, that they ſhould hire two other men at the leaſt, whereof one ſhould be a bowman, to come to me the next day about two of the clock in the afternoon, ſo that I might recite this bargain before Mr. archdeacon, and pay the money, that is forty-ſix ſhillings and eight pence. Wherefore they ſhould then go forth with me unto Colcheſter, and on Wedneſday, before three of the clock in the morning, receive there at my hand within the caſtle and mote-hall, fourteen men, and eight women, bound with cords and fetters, and drive, carry, or lead, and feed with meat and drink, as heretics ought to be found continually, unto ſuch time that the ſaid Goodwin and Alſey ſhall cauſe the ſaid two and twenty perſons to be delivered unto my Lord or London's officers, and within the ſafe keeping of my ſaid Lord, and then to bring unto me again the ſaid fetters, with a perfect token of or from my ſaid Lord, and then this covenant is void, or elſe, &c.

Mr.

Mr. Bendelows ſaid unto me in my Lord of Oxenford's chamber at the King's head, after I had ſaid maſs before the Lords, that on the morrow after the Holy-rood day, when we ſhall meet at Chelmsford for the diviſion of theſe lands, I think Mr. archdeacon, you and Mr. Smith, ſhall be fain to ride with certain of the jury to thoſe portions and manors in your part of Eſſex, and in like caſe divide yourſelves, to tread and view the ground with the queſt, or elſe I think they will not labour the matter, and ſo do you ſay unto Mr. archdeacon.

Alice, the wife of William Walley, of Colcheſter, hath ſubmitted herſelf, abjured her erroneous opinions, aſked abſolution, promiſed to do her ſolemn penance in her pariſh church at St. Peter's on Sunday next, and to continue a catholic and a faithful woman, as long as God ſhall ſend her life. And for theſe covenants her huſband ſtandeth bound in five pounds; which Alice is one of the nine women of this your indenture, and ſhe is big with child, wherefore ſhe remaineth at home, and this done in the preſence of the bailiffs, aldermen, and town-clerk. And becauſe Mr. Brown was certified there was no curate at Lexdon, he enquired who was the former? the anſwer was made, Sir Francis Jobſon. Who is the parſon? They of the queſt-men anſwered, Sir Roger Ghoſtlow. When was he with you? Not theſe fourteen years. How is your cure ſerved? Now and then. Who is the patron? My Lord of Arundel. And within ſhort time after, Sir Francis Jobſon came with great courteſy unto my Lord Darcy's place. And of all gentlemen about us, I ſaw no more come in,

Sir Robert Smith, prieſt, ſometime canon of Bridglington, now canon of Appledoore, in the wild of Kent, came to Colcheſter the 28th day of Auguſt, with his wife big with child, of late divorced, taken on ſuſpicion, examined by the Lords, and Mr. Brown told me that they have received letters from the council for the attachment of certain perſons, and eſpecially of one prieſt, whoſe name is Pullen (but his right name is Smith) doubting this prieſt to be the ſaid Pullen, although neither he nor his wife would confeſs the ſame.

Wherefore he lieth ſtill in priſon, but ſurely this is not Pullen. If it pleaſe your lordſhip to have in remembrance, that the houſholders might be compelled to bring every man his own wife to her own ſeat in the church in time of divine ſervice, it would profit much. And alſo there be yet ſtanding hoſpitals, and others of like foundation about Colcheſter, which I have not known to appear at any viſitation, as the maſters and lazars of Mary Magdalen in Colcheſter, the proctor of St. Katharine's chapel in Colcheſter, the hoſpital or breadhouſe of the foundation of the lord H. Harney in Laremarny, the hoſpital and beadman of Little Horkſley. Thus preſuming on your lordſhip's goodneſs, I am more than bold ever to trouble you with this worldly buſineſs, beſeeching Almighty God to ſend your honourable lordſhip a condign reward.

From Eaſtthrop this preſent 30th day of Auguſt.

We found a letter concerning the marriage of prieſts in the hands of the aforeſaid Sir Robert Smith. I alſo deſired Mr. Brown, the doer of all things, to require the audience to bring in their unlawful writings and books; who aſked me, if I had proclaimed the proclamation? I ſaid, Yea. Then he ſaid openly upon the bench, that they ſhould be proclaimed once every quarter. And then take the conſtables and officers, and they alone take and puniſh the offenders accordingly.

By your poor beadman,

John Kingſton, prieſt.

An Indenture made between the Lords and Juſtices within ſpecified, and Bonner's Commiſſary concerning the Delivery of the Priſoners abovenamed.

The twenty-two aforeſaid priſoners thus ſent from Colcheſter to London, were brought at length to biſhop Bonner: concerning whom Bonner himſelf writeth to cardinal Poole in the following manner.

A Letter of Biſhop Bonner to Cardinal Poole.

MAY it pleaſe your grace, with my moſt humble obedience, reverence, and duty, to underſtand, that going to London upon Thurſday laſt, and thinking to be troubled with Mr. Germaine's matter only, and ſuch other other common matters as are accuſtomed, enough to weary a right ſtrong body, I had the day following to comfort my ſtomach withal, letters from Colcheſter, that either that day, or the day following, I ſhould have ſent thence twenty-two heretics, indicted before the commiſſioners, and indeed ſo I had, and compelled to bear their charges as I did of the others, both of which coſt me above twenty nobles, a ſum of money that I thought full evil beſtowed. And theſe heretics, notwithſtanding they had honeſt catholic keepers to conduct and bring them up to me, and in all the way from Colcheſter to Stratford-Bow did go quietly and obediently, yet coming to Stratford they began to take heart of grace, and to do as pleaſed themſelves, for they began to have their guard, which generally increaſed till they came to Aldgate, where they were lodged Friday night.

And albeit I took order that the ſaid heretics ſhould be with me very early on Saturday morning, to the intent they might quietly come and be examined by me; yet it was between ten and eleven of the clock before they would come, and no way would they take but through Cheapſide, ſo that they were brought to my houſe with about a thouſand perſons. Which thing I took very ſtrange, and ſpake to Sir John Greſſam then being with me, to tell the mayor and the ſheriffs that this thing was not well ſuffered in the city. Theſe naughty heretics all the way they came through Cheapſide, both exhorted the people to their part, and had much comfort from the promiſcuous multitude; and being entered into my houſe, and talked withal, they ſhewed themſelves deſperate, and very obſtinate; yet I uſed all the honeſt means I could, both of myſelf, and others, to have won them, cauſing divers learned men to talk with them; and finding nothing in them but pride and wilfulneſs, I thought to have had them all hither to Fulham, and here to give ſentence againſt them. Nevertheleſs, perceiving by my laſt doing that your grace was offended, I thought it my duty before I any thing further proceeded herein, to advertiſe firſt your grace hereof, and know your good pleaſure, which I beſeech your grace I may do by this truſty bearer. And thus moſt humbly I take my leave of your good grace, beſeeching Almighty God always to preſerve the ſame. At Fulham, Anno 1556.

Your grace's moſt bounden beadſman and ſervant,
Edmund Bonner.

By this letter of biſhop Bonner to the cardinal, is to be underſtood, what good will was in this biſhop to have the blood of theſe men, and to have paſſed with ſentence of condemnation againſt them, had not the cardinal ſomewhat (as it ſeemed) ſtayed his fervent headineſs. Concerning which cardinal, although it cannot be denied by his acts and writings, but that he was a profeſſed enemy, and no otherwiſe to be reputed but for a papiſt: yet again it is to be ſuppoſed, that he was none of the bloody and cruel ſort of papiſts, as may appear not only by ſtaying the rage of this biſhop, but alſo by the ſolicitous writing, and long letters written to Cranmer, alſo by the complaints of certain papiſts accuſing him to the pope, to be a bearer with the heretics, and by the pope's letters ſent to him upon the ſame, calling him up to Rome, and ſetting friar Peto in his place, had not queen Mary by ſpecial intreaty, kept him out of the pope's danger. All which letters I have (if need be) to ſhew: and beſides alſo, that it is thought of him that toward his latter end a little before his coming from Rome to England, he began ſomewhat to favour the doctrine of Luther, and was no leſs ſuſpected at Rome: Yea, and furthermore, did there at Rome convert a certain learned Spaniard from papiſm to Luther's ſide; notwithſtanding the pomp and glory of the world afterward carried him away to play the papiſt thus as he did. But of this cardinal enough.

To return now to this godly company again, firſt how they were brought up in bands to London, ye have heard; alſo how Bonner was about to have read the ſentence of death upon them, and how he was ſtayed by the cardinal, ye underſtand. As touching their confeſſion, which they articled up in writing, it were too tedious to recite the whole at length. Briefly touching the article of the Lord's ſupper (for which they were chiefly troubled) thus they wrote, as here followeth.

The Supper of the Lord.

WHEREAS Chriſt at his laſt ſupper, took bread, and when he had given thanks he brake it, and gave it to his diſciples, and ſaid, "Take, eat, this is my body." And likewiſe took the cup and thanked, &c. We do underſtand it to be a figurative ſpeech, as the moſt manner of his language was in parables and dark ſentences, that they which are carnally minded ſhould ſee with their eyes and not perceive, and hear with their ears, and not underſtand; ſignifying this, that as he did break the bread among them, being but one loaf, and they all were partakers thereof, ſo we through his body, in that it was broken, and offered upon the croſs for us, are all partakers thereof, and his blood cleanſeth us from all our ſins, and hath pacified God's wrath toward us, and made the atonement between God and us, if we walk henceforth in the light, even as he is the true light.

And in that he ſaid further, "Do this in remembrance of me," it is a memorial and token of the ſuffering and death of Jeſus Chriſt: and he commanded it for this cauſe, that the congregation of Chriſt ſhould come together to ſhew his death, and to thank and laud him for all his benefits, and magnify his holy name, and ſo to break the bread, and drink the wine, in remembrance that Chriſt had given his body, and ſhed his blood for us.

Thus you may well perceive, though Chriſt called the bread his body, and the wine his blood, yet it followeth not, that the ſubſtance of his body ſhould be in the bread and wine; as divers places in ſcripture are ſpoken by Chriſt and the apoſtles in like phraſe of ſpeech, as in John 15. "I am the true vine." Alſo in John 10. "I am the door." And as it is written in the ninth to the Hebrews, and in Exod. 24. how Moſes took the blood of the calves, and ſprinkled both the book and all the people, ſaying, "This is the blood of the covenant or Teſtament." And alſo in the fifth chapter of Ezekiel, how the Lord ſaid unto him concerning the third part of his hair, ſaying, This is Jeruſalem, &c.

Thus we ſee the ſcriptures how they are ſpoken in figures, and ought to be ſpiritually examined, and not as they would have us to ſay, that the bodily preſence of Chriſt is in the bread, which is a blaſphemous underſtanding of the godly word, and is contrary to all holy ſcriptures. Alſo we do ſee that great idolatry is ſprung out of the carnal underſtanding of the words of Chriſt, "This is my body," and yet daily ſpringeth, to the great diſhonour of God; ſo that men worſhip a piece of bread for God, yea, and hold that to be their maker.

After this confeſſion of their faith and doctrine being written and exhibited, they alſo deviſed a letter withal, in manner of a ſhort ſupplication, or rather an admonition to the judges and commiſſioners, requiring that juſtice and judgment, after the rule of God's word, might be miniſtered unto them. The copy of which their letter I thought here alſo to ſhew unto the reader in form as followeth.

A Supplication of the Priſoners to the Judges.

TO the right honourable audience, before whom theſe our ſimple writings, and the confeſſion of our faith ſhall come to be heard or ſeen, we poor priſoners being being faſt in bonds upon the trial of our faith, which we offer to be tried by the ſcriptures, pray moſt heartily, that foraſmuch as God hath given you power and ſtrength over us as concerning our bodies, under whom we ſubmit ourſelves as obedient ſubjects in all things due, ye being officers and rulers of the people, may execute true judgment, keep the laws of righteouſneſs, govern the people according to right, and hear the poor and helpleſs in truth, and defend their cauſe.

God for his Son Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, give you the wiſdom and underſtanding of Solomon, David, Hezekiah, Moſes, with divers other moſt virtuous rulers, by whoſe wiſdom and moſt godly underſtanding, the people were juſtly ruled and governed in the fear of God, all wickedneſs was by them overthrown and beaten down, and all godlineſs and virtue did flouriſh and ſpring. O God which art the moſt higheſt, the creator and maker of all things, and of all men both great and ſmall, and careſt for all alike, who doſt try all men's works and imaginations, before whoſe judgment-ſeat ſhall come both high and low, rich and poor; we moſt humbly beſeech thee to put into our rulers hearts the pure love and fear of thy name, that even as they themſelves would be judged, and as they ſhall make anſwer before thee, ſo they may hear our cauſes, judge with mercy, and read over theſe our requeſts and confeſſions of our faith, with deliberation and a godly judgment.

And if any thing here ſeemeth to your honourable audience to be erroneous or diſagreeing to the ſcripture, if it ſhall pleaſe your lordſhips to hear us patiently, which do offer ourſelves to the ſcriptures, thereby to make anſwer, and to be tried, in ſo doing we poor ſubjects being in much captivity and bondage, are moſt bound to pray for your noble eſtate and long preſervation.

The requeſt of theſe men being ſo juſt, and their doctrine ſo ſound, yet all this could not prevail with the biſhop and other judges, but that ſentence ſhould have proceeded againſt them immediately, had not the goodneſs of the Lord better provided for his ſervants, than the biſhop had intended. For as they were now under the edge of the axe, ready to be condemned by ſentence, it was thought otherwiſe by the cardinal, and ſome other wiſer heads; fearing belike, leſt by the death of ſo many together, ſome diſturbance might riſe peradventure among the people; and ſo it was decreed among themſelves, that they ſhould rather make ſome ſubmiſſion or confeſſion, ſuch as they would themſelves, and ſo be ſent home again, as they were indeed; howbeit divers of them were afterward apprehended and put to death. But in the mean ſpace as touching their ſubmiſſion which they made, this it was, as in form here followeth:

The Submiſſion or Confeſſion of the aforeſaid Priſoners.

BECAUSE our Saviour Chriſt at his laſt ſupper took bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave it unto his diſciples, and ſaid, "Take, eat, this is my body which is given for you, this do in remembrance of me." Therefore according to the words of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, we do believe in the ſacrament to be Chriſt's body. And likewiſe he took the cup, gave thanks, and gave it to his diſciples, and ſaid, "This is my blood of the New Teſtament which is ſhed for many."

Therefore likewiſe we do believe that it is the blood of Chriſt, according as Chriſt's church doth adminiſter the ſame. Unto which catholic church of Chriſt we do in this like as in all other matters ſubmit ourſelves, promiſing therein to live as it becometh good chriſtian men, and here in this realm to uſe ourſelves as it becometh faithful ſubjects unto our moſt gracious king and queen, and to all other ſuperiors both ſpiritual and temporal, according to our bounden duties.

The names of thoſe who ſubſcribed to this ſubmiſſion, were theſe,

The Story of five godly Martyrs, burnt at one Fire in Smithfield, on the 12th Day of April, 1557.

TO proceed further in this hiſtory of perſecuted martyrs, next in order follow theſe five, namely,

Thomas Loſeby.	Margaret Hide,
Henry Ramſey.	and
Thomas Thirtell.	Agnes Stanley.

Who being, ſome by the lord Rich, ſome by other juſtices of peace, and conſtables (their own neighbours), at the firſt accuſed and apprehended for not coming to their pariſh churches, were in the end ſent unto Bonner biſhop of London, and by his commandment, the 27th day of January were examined before Dr. Darbiſhire, then chancellor to the ſaid biſhop, upon the former general articles mentioned.

Anſwers to the Articles.

WHOSE anſwers thereunto were, that as they confeſſed there was one true and catholic church, whereof they ſtedfaſtly believed, and thought the church of Rome to be no part or member: ſo in the ſame church they believed there were but two ſacraments, that is to ſay, baptiſm, and the ſupper of the Lord. Howbeit, ſome of them attributed the title and honour of a ſacrament to the holy eſtate of matrimony, which undoubtedly was done rather out of ſimple ignorance than of any wilful opinion, and are thereof to be adjudged as before is admoniſhed.

Moreover, they acknowledged themſelves to be baptized into the faith of that true church, as in the third article is ſpecified. And here in reading, as well of theſe articles, as alſo of the reſt, mark I beſeech you, the crafty ſubtilty of theſe catholic companions, who intermixing certain points of faith, and of the true church, with the idolatrous and ſuperſtitious maumetry of their Romiſh ſynagogue, cauſe the poor and ſimple people, for lack of knowledge, oftentimes to fall into their crafty nets.

For after they have made them grant a true church, with the ſacraments of the ſame, though not in ſuch number as they would have them, and alſo that they were chriſtened into the faith thereof, that is, In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, they craftily now in their other objections, deſcending, as it were, from the faith of the Trinity unto their idolatrous maſs and other ſuperſtitious ceremonies, would make them grant, that now in denying thereof they have ſevered themſelves from the faith of the true church, whereunto they were baptized, which is moſt falſe: for though the true light of God's goſpel and holy word, was marvellouſly darkened, and in a manner utterly extinguiſhed, yet the true faith of the Trinity, by the merciful providence of God, was ſtill preſerved, and into the faith thereof were we baptized, and not into the belief and profeſſion of their horrible idolatry and vain ceremonies.

Theſe things not thoroughly weighed by theſe poor, yet faithful and true members of Chriſt, cauſed ſome of them ignorantly to grant, that when they came to the years years of diſcretion, and underſtood the light of the goſpel, they did ſeparate themſelves from the faith of the church, meaning none other but only to ſeparate themſelves from admitting or allowing of ſuch their popiſh and erroneous traſh as they had now defiled the church of Chriſt withal, and not from their faith received in baptiſm, which in expreſs words in their anſwers to the other articles they conſtantly affirmed, declaring the maſs and ſacrament of the altar to be moſt wicked blaſphemy againſt Jeſus Chriſt, and contrary to the truth of his goſpel, and therefore utterly they refuſed to aſſent unto, and to be reconciled again thereunto.

Theſe anſwers in effect of them thus taken by the ſaid chancellor, they were for that time diſmiſſed: but the biſhop, taking the matter into his own hands, the 6th day of March, propounded unto them certain other new articles: the copy whereof followeth:

Other articles objected by Bonner, Biſhop of London, againſt Thomas Loſeby, Henry Ramſey, Thomas Thirtell, Margaret Hide, and Agnes Stanley, the ſixth Day of March, being the ſecond Time of Examination.

1. FIRST, That thou haſt thought, believed, and ſpoken, within ſome part of the city and dioceſe of London, that the faith, religion, and eccleſiaſtical ſervice, here obſerved and kept, as it is in the realm of England, is not a true and a laudable faith, religion, and ſervice, eſpecially concerning the maſs, and the ſeven ſacraments, nor is agreeable to God's word and teſtament, and that thou canſt not find in thy heart without murmuring, grudging, or ſcruple, to receive and uſe it, and to conform thyſelf unto it, as other ſubjects of this realm cuſtomably have done and do.

2. Item, That thou haſt thought, &c. that the Engliſh ſervice ſet forth in the time of king Edward the ſixth, here in this realm of England, was and is good and godly, and catholic in all points, and that it alone ought here in this realm to be received, uſed, and practiſed, and none other.

3. Item, Likewiſe thou haſt thought, &c. that thou art not bound to come to thy pariſh church, and there to be preſent, and hear matins, maſs, even-ſong, and other divine ſervice, ſung or ſaid there.

4. Item, Thou haſt thought, &c. that thou art not bound to come to proceſſion to the church upon days and and times appointed, and to go in the ſame with others of the pariſh, ſinging or ſaying then the accuſtomed prayers uſed in the church, nor to bear a taper or candle on Candlemas-day, nor take aſhes upon Aſh-wedneſday, nor bear palms upon palm-ſunday, nor to creep to the croſs upon days accuſtomed, nor to receive and kiſs the pax at maſs time, nor to receive holy water or holy bread, nor to accept and allow the ceremonies and uſages of the church, after the manner and faſhion as they are uſed in this realm.

5. Thou haſt thought, &c. that thou art not bound at any time to confeſs thy ſins to any prieſt, and to receive abſolution at his hands, as God's miniſter, nor to receive at any time the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, eſpecially as it is uſed in this church of England.

6. Item, Thou haſt thought, &c. that in matters of religion and faith, thou muſt follow and believe thine own conſcience only, and not give credit to the determination and common order of the catholic church, and the ſee of Rome, nor to any member thereof.

7. Item, Thou haſt thought, &c. that all things do chance of an abſolute and preciſe mere neceſſity, ſo that whether man do well or evil, he could not chuſe but do ſo, and that therefore no man hath any free will at all.

8. Item, Thou haſt thought, &c. that the faſhion and manner of chriſtening of infants is not agreeable to God's word; and that none can be effectually baptized, and thereby ſaved, except he have years of diſcretion to believe himſelf, and ſo willingly accept or refuſe baptiſm at his pleaſure.

6. Item, Thou haſt thought, &c. that prayers to ſaints or prayers for the dead are not available and not allowable by God's word, or profitable in any wiſe, and that the ſouls departed do ſtraitway go to heaven or hell, or elſe do ſleep till the day of doom, ſo that there is no place of purgation at all.

10. Item, Thou haſt thought, &c. that all ſuch as in the time of king Henry the eighth, or in the time of queen Mary in England, have been burned as heretics, were no heretics at all, but faithful and good chriſtian people: eſpecially Barnes, Garret, Jerome, Frith, Rogers, Hooper, Cardmaker, Latimer, Taylor, Bradford, Philpot, Cranmer, Ridley, and ſuch like; and that thou didſt and doſt allow, like, and approve all their opinions, and doſt miſlike their condemnations and burnings.

11. Item, Thou haſt thought, &c. that faſting and prayers uſed in this church of England, and the appointing of days for faſting, and the abſtaining from fleſh upon faſting-days, and eſpecially in the time of Lent, is not laudable or allowable by God's word, but is hypocriſy and fooliſhneſs; and that men ought to have liberty to eat at all times all kinds of meat.

12. Item, Thou haſt thought, &c. that the ſacrament of the altar is an idol, and to reſerve and keep it, or to honour it, is plain idolatry and ſuperſtition; and likewiſe of the maſs and elevation of the ſacrament.

13. Item, Thou haſt thought, &c. that thou or any elſe, convented before an eccleſiaſtical judge concerning matters of belief and faith, are not, nor is bound to make anſwer at all, eſpecially under an oath upon a book.

Their Anſwers to the Articles.

CONcerning the firſt, ſecond, third, fourth, fifth, ninth, tenth and twelfth, they generally granted unto, ſaying, that they denied the ſouls of the departed to ſleep till the day of judgment, as is mentioned in the ninth article.

And as concerning the ſixth objection, they thought themſelves bound to believe the true catholic church, ſo far forth as the ſame doth inſtruct them according to God's holy word, but not to follow the determinations of the erroneous and babylonic church of Rome.

As for the ſeventh, eighth and thirteenth, they utterly denied, that ever they were of any ſuch abſurd opinions as are contained therein; but they granted that man of himſelf, without the help and aſſiſtance of God's Holy Spirit, hath no power to do any good thing acceptable in God's ſight.

To the eleventh they ſaid, that true faſting and prayer, uſed according to God's word, are allowable and available in his ſight, and that by the ſame word every faithful man may eat all meats at all times, with thankſgiving to God for the ſame.

After this, the firſt day of April, they were again convented before the biſhop in his palace at London, where little appeareth to be done, except it were to know whether they would ſtand to their anſwers, and whether they would recant or no. But when they refuſed to recant, and deny the received and infallible truth, the biſhop cauſed them to be brought into the open conſiſtory, the third day of the ſame month of April in the forenoon, where firſt underſtanding by them their immutable conſtancy and ſtedfaſtneſs, he demanded particularly of every one what they had to ſay, why he ſhould not pronounce the ſentence of condemnation.

To

To whom Thomas Loſeby firſt anſwered, God give me grace and ſtrength to ſtand againſt you, and your ſentence, and alſo againſt your law, which is a devouring law, for it devoureth the flock of Chriſt. And I perceive there is no way with me but death, except I would conſent to your devouring law, and believe in that idol the maſs.

Next unto him anſwered Thomas Thirtell, ſaying, My lord, I ſay thus, if you make me an heretic, then you make Chriſt and all the twelve apoſtles heretics: for I am in the true faith, and right belief, and I will ſtand in it, for I know full well I ſhall have eternal life therefore.

The biſhop then aſked the like queſtion of Henry Ramſey; who ſaid again, My lord, will you have me to go from the truth that I am in; I ſay unto you, that my opinions be the very truth, which I will ſtand unto, and not go from them: and I ſay unto you further, that there are two churches upon the earth, and we (meaning himſelf and other true martyrs and profeſſors of Chriſt) be of the true church, and ye be not.

Unto this queſtion next anſwered Margaret Hide, ſaying, My lord, you have no cauſe to give ſentence againſt me, for I am in the true faith and opinion, and will never forſake it; and I do wiſh that I were more ſtrong in it than I am.

Laſt of all anſwered Agnes Stanley, and ſaid, I had rather every hair of my head were burned, if it were never ſo much worth, than that I will forſake my faith and opinion, which is the true faith.

The time being now ſpent, they were commanded to appear again in the afternoon in the ſame place; which commandment being obeyed, the biſhop firſt called for Loſeby, and after his accuſtomed manner ordered his articles and anſwers to be read: In reading whereof, when mention was made of the ſacrament of the altar, the biſhop with his colleagues put off their caps. Whereat Loſeby ſaid, My Lord, ſeeing you put off your cap, I will put on my cap; and therewithal did put on his cap. And after the biſhop continuing in his accuſtomed perſuaſions, Loſeby again ſaid unto him, My Lord, I truſt I have the ſpirit of truth, which you deteſt and abhor, for the wiſdom of God is fooliſhneſs unto you. Whereupon the biſhop pronounced the ſentence of condemnation againſt him.

And delivering him unto the ſheriff, called for Margaret Hide, with whom he uſed the like order of exhortations. To whom ſhe ſaid, I will not depart from my ſayings, till I be burned: and my Lord, quoth ſhe, I would ſee you inſtruct me with ſome part of God's word, and not to give me inſtructions of the holy bread and holy water, for it is no part of the ſcripture.

But he, being neither himſelf, nor any of his, able rightly to accompliſh her requeſt, to make ſhort work, uſed his final reaſon of convincement, which was the ſentence of condemnation. And therefore leaving her off, called for another, viz. Agnes Stanley, who, upon the biſhop's like perſuaſions, made this anſwer:

My Lord, where you ſay I am an heretic, I am none; neither yet will I believe you, nor any man that is wiſe will believe as you do. And as for theſe that ye ſay be burnt for hereſy, I believe are true martyrs before God: therefore I will not go from my opinion and faith as long as I live.

Her talk thus ended, ſhe received the like reward that the others had. And the biſhop then turning his tale and manner of enticement unto Thomas Thirtell, received of him likewiſe this final anſwer, My Lord, I will not hold with your idolatrous ways, as you do: for I ſay the maſs is idolatry, and will ſtick to my faith and belief, ſo long as the breath is in my body. Upon which words he was alſo condemned as an heretic.

Laſt of all Henry Ramſey was demanded if he would, as the reſt, ſtand unto his anſwers, or elſe recanting the ſame, come home again, and be a member of their church. Whereunto he anſwered, I will not go from my religion and belief as long as I live; and my Lord (quoth he) your doctrine is naught, for it is not agreeable to God's word.

After theſe words, the biſhop (to conclude) pronouncing the ſentence of condemnation againſt him and the reſt (as ye have heard) charged the ſheriffs of London with them: who being thereunto commanded, the twelfth day of the ſame month of April, brought them into Smithfield, where all together in one fire moſt joyfully and conſtantly they ended their temporal lives, receiving therefore the life eternal.

Three burned in St. George's Fields in Southwark.

IN the month of May following, William Morant, Stephen Gratwick, ———King, ſuffered in Saint George's Fields in Southwark.

Among other hiſtories of the perſecuted and condemned ſaints of God, I find the condemnation of none more ſtrange nor unlawful than of this Stephen Gratwick: who firſt was condemned by the biſhop of Wincheſter and the biſhop of Rocheſter, who were not his ordinaries.

Secondly, When he did appeal from theſe incompetent judges to his right ordinary, his appeal could not be admitted.

Thirdly, When they had no other ſhift to colour their inordinate proceedings withal, they ſuborned one of the prieſts to come in for a counterfeit and a falſe ordinary, and ſit upon him.

Fourthly, Being openly convinced and overturned in his own arguments, yet Dr. White, the ſaid biſhop of Wincheſter, neither would yield to the force of truth, nor ſuffer any of the audience aſſiſtant once to ſay, God ſtrengthen him.

Fifthly, As they brought in a falſe ordinary to ſit upon him, ſo they pretended falſe articles againſt him, which were no part of his examinations, but of their deviſing, to have his blood.

Sixthly and laſtly, Having no other ground nor juſt matters againſt him, but only for ſaying theſe words, "That which I ſaid, I have ſaid," they read the ſentence of death upon him.

And this was the dealing of theſe men, who needs will be reputed for catholic fathers of the ſpiritualty, ſucceeders of the apoſtles, diſciples of Chriſt, pillars of the holy church, and leaders of the people. Of whoſe proceedings, how agreeable they are to the example of Chriſt and his apoſtles, I leave to diſcuſs, referring the judgment hereof to them who know the inſtitution of Chriſt's religion and doctrine.

Now leſt peradventure the diſordered miſrule of theſe Chriſtmas Lords will not be credited upon the ſimple narration of the ſtory, ye ſhall hear the whole diſcourſe of this proceſs regiſtered by the hand of the martyr himſelf, who, as he could beſt tell what was done, ſo I am ſure he would not teſtify otherwiſe than the truth was, according as you ſhall hear by his own declaration here following.

The Declaration of Stephen Gratwick, concerning his own Story and Condemnation.

ON the 25th day of May, in the year 1557, I Stephen Gratwick came before Doctor White, biſhop of Wincheſter, in St. George's church in Southwark, at eight of the clock in the morning, and then he called me before him, and ſaid unto me:

Wincheſter. Stephen Gratwick, how ſtandeth the matter with thee now? Art thou contented to revoke thy hereſies, which thou haſt maintained and defended here within my dioceſe, oftentimes before me; and alſo upon

Sunday

Sunday laſt ye ſtood up in the face of the whole church, maintaining your hereſies, ſo that you have offended within the liberty of my dioceſe: and now I being your ordinary, you muſt anſwer me directly, whether you will revoke them, or not, which I have here in writing; and if ſo be that you will not revoke them, then I will excommunicate you, and therefore note well what you do, for now I read here the articles againſt you.

And ſo when he had ended, he bade me anſwer unto them.

Gratwick. My Lord, theſe articles which you have here objected againſt me, are not mine, but of your own making: for I never had any of mine examinations written at any time, and therefore theſe be the objections that you lay againſt me as a ſnare to get my blood. Wherefore I deſire your lawful favour, to allow my lawful appeal to mine ordinary; for I have nothing to do with you. And whereas you do burden me, that I have offended within your dioceſe, it is nothing ſo: for I have not enterpriſed either to preach or teach within your dioceſe, but was apprehended by mine own biſhop, and ſent priſoner into your dioceſe, by the conſent of the council, and mine own ordinary; and therefore I ſo being in your dioceſe, you have no cauſe to refuſe my lawful appeal.

And with that came the biſhop of Rocheſter, (whom the biſhop of Wincheſter gladly received) according to their determinate purpoſe before invented; and ſo followed the archdeacon of Canterbury; and then the biſhop again ſtarted up as man half raviſhed of his wits for joy, embracing him with many gentle words, and ſaid, that he was very glad of his coming, making ignorant thereof, as he thought it ſhould appear to me. Then ſaid Wincheſter;

Wincheſter. Sir, I am very glad of your coming; for here I have one before me who hath appealed unto you, being his ordinary. Then ſaid the archdeacon of Canterbury:

Archdeacon. I know this man very well. He hath been divers times before me. And then I anſwered and ſaid;

Gratwick. My Lord, I am not of his dioceſe by five miles: for his reacheth on that part no further than the clifts of Lewes; and I dwelt at Brighthelmſtone, five miles beyond, in the dioceſe of the biſhop of Chicheſter; and therefore I am not of his dioceſe.

Then the biſhop of Wincheſter, the biſhop of Rocheſter, and the archdeacon of Canterbury, caſt their heads together and laughed: and then they ſaid my ordinary would be here by and by, and ſo they ſent forth for a counterfeit inſtead of mine ordinary: and then I ſaw them laugh; and I ſpake to them, and ſaid:

Gratwick. Why do ye laugh? Are ye confederate together for my blood, and therein triumph? you have more cauſe to look weightily upon the matter; for I ſtand here before you upon my life and death. But you declare yourſelves what you are: for ye are cloathed in lamb's apparel, but I would to God ye had coats according to your aſſembly here, which is ſcarlet gowns, for I do here perceive you are bent to have my blood.

And then came ruſhing in that counterfeited biſhop, who was the hired ſervant to deliver me into the hands of the high prieſt: and the biſhop hearing him come, with haſte enquired of his man who was there: and he ſaid, My Lord of Chicheſter. Then the biſhop with haſte roſe up, and ſaid:

Wincheſter. Ye are moſt heartily welcome; and required him to ſit down: and then ſaid the biſhop of Wincheſter to me, Lo here is your ordinary; what have you now to ſay to him?

Gratwick. I have nothing to ſay to him. If he have nothing to ſay to me, I pray you let me depart. Then anſwered my counterfeit ordinary, and ſaid:

Counterfeit. Here you ſtand before my Lords and me in trial of your faith, and if you bring the truth, we ſhall by compulſion give place unto you, as it is to be proved by the word; and your doctrine to be heard and embraced for a truth.

Gratwick. Then I demanded of him whether he meant by authority, or by the judgment of the Spirit of God in his members.

And he anſwered me, By authority, as well as by the Spirit.

Then ſaid I, Now will I turn your own argument upon you: for Chriſt came before the high prieſts, ſcribes, and phariſees, bringing the truth with him, being the very truth himſelf, which truth cannot lye; yet both he and his truth was condemned, and took no place with them: And alſo the apoſtles, and all the martyrs that died ſince Chriſt: therefore I turn your own argument upon you: anſwer it if you can.

Then the ſaid counterfeit ordinary with great heat and choler, ſaid to the biſhop of Wincheſter, Object ſome articles againſt him, for he is obſtinate, and would fain get out of our hands; therefore hold him to ſome particular: ſo that no other anſwer could I have to this argument.

Then the biſhop of Wincheſter began to read objections of his own making againſt me, and he bade me anſwer to them.

And I ſaid; No, except you will ſet the law apart, becauſe I ſee you are mindful of my blood.

Wincheſter. Now you may ſee he will not anſwer to theſe, but as he hath aforeſaid.

Then ſpake the counterfeit ordinary again, and ſaid, My Lord, Aſk him what he ſaith to the ſacrament of the altar. Then the biſhop aſked me, as my counterfeit ordinary required him.

Gratwick. My Lord, I do believe that in the ſacrament of the ſupper of the Lord, truly adminiſtered in both kinds, according to the inſtitution of Chriſt, unto the worthy he eateth myſtically by faith the body and blood of Chriſt. Then I aſked him, if it were not the truth, and he ſaid, Yes. Then ſaid I, Bear witneſs of the truth.

Then the biſhop of Wincheſter, whoſe head being ſubtileſt to gather upon my words, ſaid, My Lord, ſee you not how he creepeth away with his hereſies, and covereth them privily? Note how he here ſeparateth the ſacrament of the altar from the ſupper of the Lord, meaning it not to be the true ſacrament, and alſo how he condemneth our adminiſtration in one kind, allowing that the unworthy receiver doth not eat and drink the body and blood of Chriſt; which before matters truly weighed, being covered very craftily with his ſubtil ſhifts and ſophiſtry; but he ſhall anſwer directly before he depart.

Gratwick. My lord, that is but your gathering of my words, for you before confeſſed the ſame ſayings to be the truth, and this you catch at me, and fain would have an advantage for my blood: but ſeeing you judge me not to mean the ſacrament of the altar, now come to the probation of the ſame ſacrament, and prove it to be the true ſacrament, and I am with you; or elſe if you can prove your church to be the true church, I am alſo with you.

But then he called to memory the laſt probation of the church and ſacraments, how he before was driven to forſake the ſcriptures, and to ſhew me by good reaſon how they might adminiſter the ſacrament in one kind: and his reaſon was this, Like as a man or woman dieth on a ſudden, and ſo when we have given him the body of Chriſt, in the mean time the party dieth, and ſo he eateth the body of Chriſt, and not drinketh his blood. And this was his ſimple ſhift in the proving of their ſacraments: ſo that he was now half aſhamed to begin that matter again.

But yet a little ſhift be brought in, and ſaid:

Wincheſter. What ſayſt thou by the adminiſtration of the prieſts every day by themſelves, and they miniſter in both kinds?

To that I anſwered, You have two adminiſtrations; for I am ſure at Eaſter you adminiſter but one kind, and therefore it is not according to the inſtitution of Chriſt, but after your own imaginations.

Wincheſter. Why then what ſayſt thou to theſe words, "Take, eat, this is my body." Theſe are the words of Chriſt. Wilt thou deny them?

Gratwick, My lord, they are the words of ſcripture, I affirm them, and not deny them.

Rocheſter. Why then thou doſt confeſs in the ſacrament of the altar to be a real preſence, the ſelf-ſame body that was born of the virgin Mary, and is aſcended up into heaven.

Gratwick. My lord, what do you now mean? do you not alſo mean a viſible body? for it cannot be, but of neceſſity, if it be a real preſence, and a material body, it muſt be a viſible body alſo.

Wincheſter. Nay, I ſay unto thee, it is a real preſence and a material body, and an inviſible body too.

Gratwick. My lord, then it muſt needs be a fantaſtical body, for if it ſhould be material and inviſible, as you affirm, then it muſt needs be a fantaſtical body: for it is apparent that Chriſt's human body was viſible and ſeen.

Then the biſhop brake out and ſaid, When didſt thou ſee him? I pray thee tell me.

To that I anſwered and ſaid, a ſimple argument it is; becauſe our corporal eyes cannot comprehend Chriſt, doth it prove or follow, that he is inviſible, becauſe we cannot ſee him?

And with that the biſhop began to grow weary of his argument, and removed his talk to Judas in eating the ſacrament, and ſaid, He eat him wholly, as the apoſtles did.

And then I aſked him, If he meant Chriſt's fleſh and blood, which he ſpeaketh of in the ſixth of John, and ſaith, "He that eateth my fleſh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life in me."

To that he anſwered and ſaid, Yea.

Then ſaid I, Of neceſſity Judas muſt needs be ſaved, becauſe he did eat the fleſh and drink the blood of Chriſt, as you have affirmed, and alſo all the ungodly that die without repentance, becauſe they have eaten your ſacrament, which you ſay is the fleſh and blood of Chriſt: therefore of neceſſity they ſhall receive the benefit thereof, that is, eternal life. Which is a great abſurdity to grant, and then of neceſſity it muſt follow, that all that eat not, and drink not of your ſacrament, ſhall finally periſh and be damned: for Chriſt ſaith, "Except ye eat my fleſh, and drink my blood, ye have no life in you." And you have aforeſaid that of your ſacrament, which you ſay is the ſame fleſh and blood which Chriſt ſpeaketh of: and here I prove that all children then that die under age to receive the ſacrament, by your own argument, muſt be damned, which is horrible blaſphemy to ſpeak. Now here I turn your own argument upon you, anſwer it if you can.

Wincheſter. My lord, do you not ſee what deceitful arguments he bringeth in here againſt us, mingled with ſophiſtry, and keepeth himſelf ſo that we can get no hold of him? But I ſay unto thee, thou perverſe heretic, I ſee now thou art a perverſe fellow. I had a better opinion of thee, but now I ſee we loſe our time about thee, yet I anſwer thee, St. Paul doth open the ſixth of John plainly, if thou wilt ſee: for he ſaith, "They eat Chriſt's body and drink his blood unworthily," and that was the cauſe of their damnation.

Gratwick. My lord, take heed you do not add to the text, for he that addeth to the text is accurſed of God; and I am ſure here you have brought more than Paul hath ſpoken: for he ſaith not, Becauſe they have eaten his body, and drank his blood unworthily; but Saint Paul ſaith, "Whoſoever ſhall eat of this bread, and drink of this cup unworthily, ſhall be guilty of the body and blood of Chriſt." Note, my lord, he ſaith not as you have affirmed, but clean contrary. And with that they were all in a great rage.

And the biſhop of Wincheſter ſaid I belyed the text.

And then I called for the text.

Wincheſter. I aſked thee even now if thou didſt underſtand Latin, and thy anſwer was, whether thou didſt or no, the people ſhall bear witneſs in Engliſh.

Gratwick. And ſo I called again for the Teſtament, whether it were Latin or Engliſh, for the trial of the text.

And then when the biſhop of Wincheſter ſaw that I cared not whether of the tranſlations I had, he ſtood up, thinking to beguile ſome ſimple man that had a book there, and bade him that had an Engliſh Teſtament to bring it in, that he might get ſome hold at him that ſhould bring a Teſtament: but God diſappointed him thereof, and ſo he flew away from his matter, and began to rail upon me, and ſaid, my ſubtil arguments ſhould not ſerve: for if I would not anſwer directly, I ſhould nevertheleſs be excommunicated. For (ſaid he) I ſee a mad toy in thine head; thou glorieſt much in thy talk, and thinkeſt now the people are come about thee, thou ſhalt encourage them with thy conſtant heretical opinion. For the laſt day when thou waſt before me upon Sunday in St. Mary Overy's church, thou there reprovedſt my ſermon, and hadſt a thouſand by thee at leaſt, to bid God ſtrengthen thee: but now let me ſee him here that dare open his mouth to bid God ſtrengthen thee; he ſhall die the death that thou ſhalt die.

To that I anſwered, My lord, I know your cruelty doth extend more largely than your pity. Good experience ſo I have to ſay, for you keep men in priſon a year or two, taking their books from them, permitting them not ſo much as a Teſtament to look upon for their ſoul's comfort, which all men ought to have: and ſo you treat them more like brute beaſts than chriſtian men.

Wincheſter. No, Sir, we will uſe you as we will uſe the child: for if the child will hurt himſelf with the knife, we will keep the knife from him. So becauſe you will damn your ſouls with the word, therefore you ſhall not have it.

Gratwick. My lord, a ſimple argument you bring to maintain and cover your fault. Are you not aſhamed to make the word the cauſe of our damnation? I never knew any man but only you that did not affirm our ſins to be the cauſe of our damnation, and not the word, as you ſay: and therefore if your argument be good, then this is good alſo: Becauſe that ſome men do abuſe drink, therefore the benefit of drink ſhould be taken from all men, or any other ſuch like good gift.

Wincheſter. My lords, we here loſe much time, for this fellow is perverſe, ſpeaking nothing but ſophiſtry and perverſe queſtions: ſo that we can get no advantage of him.

Then ſpake my counterfeit ordinary, as one half aſleep all this while; yet ſomewhat with haſte when he was awaked he began to tell his tale, and ſaid:

Counterfeit. Read theſe articles againſt him oncemore, and if he will not anſwer them, take him upon his firſt words; "That which I have ſaid, that I have ſaid."

Then the biſhop of Wincheſter began to read them again.

But I ſaid unto him, I would not anſwer them, becauſe they were none of mine examinations, but objections of their own making, becauſe they would have my blood. But yet I ſaid, if they would ſet the law apart, I would talk my conſcience freely to them.

Then my counterfeit ordinary began to ſpeak again, charging me with the ſaying of St. Peter, that I ſhould render account of ſuch hope as was in me.

Gratwick. So can I do, yet I ſhall not pleaſe you; for here I now render my hope, as St. Peter willeth me: I believe only in Jeſus Chriſt to have my ſalvation in him, by him, and through him; but I perceive you would have me render my faith in ſuch ſort, as you may have my blood, and therefore you bring good ſcriptures, and evil apply them.

Wincheſter. Why, this fellow is perverted, and we ſhall get no more at his hands than we have already; therefore let us pronounce ſentence againſt him, for we do but loſe our time.

Gratwick. Nay, my good lord, ſeeing you muſt needs have my blood, let me ſay a little more for myſelf.

Upon Sunday laſt, when I was before you, you preached this which was a truth, and agreeable to the doctrine of the apoſtle St. James, and ſaid, "If any man think himſelf a religious man, and in the mean time ſeduces his tongue or his heart, the ſame man's religion is a vain religion;" and ſo, my lord, you ſtanding there in the pulpit, in the mean time ſeduced your tongue to ſlander us poor priſoners being there preſent in iron bands, burdening us with the ſect of Arians, and with the ſect of Herodians, and with the ſect of Anabaptiſts, and with the ſect of Sacramentaries, and with the ſect of Pelagians.

And when we ſtood up to purge ourſelves thereof, you ſaid you would cut out our tongues, and cauſe us to be pulled out of the church by violence. But there you gave yourſelf a ſhrewd blow, for your tongue in the mean time ſlandered your neighbour. For I, my lord, will give my life againſt all theſe hereſies, which you there burdened us withal, even as I will give my life againſt that wherein I now ſtand before you. And with that he was raging angry, and caught my condemnation, and ſaid, Wincheſter. Thou wilt grant here no more but this word, "That I have ſaid, I have ſaid:" And here I gather matter enough to condemn thee, for this is a confirmation of all that thou haſt heretofore ſaid.

Then I anſwered, If you can prove that ever any of mine examinations were written, it were enough: but you have nothing againſt me but objections of your own making.

Wincheſter. Have at thee now, if thou wilt not yield, I will pronounce ſentence againſt thee: and ſo he proceeded forward, curſing and banning in Latin; ſo that I told him, If the people might hear it in Engliſh, they would think you an uncharitable biſhop.

And then I ſaid, Stay my lord, and note what you do: for you have neither temporal law nor ſpiritual here againſt me in any cauſe.

Then ſtepped forth a gentleman, and ſaid unto my lord, Take heed what ye do: for he doth here ſay, that you have no title or cauſe why you ſhould condemn him.

Then the biſhop looked about him again, and aſked me if I would recant.

I aſked him, whereof I ſhould recant.

Then ſaid the biſhop, Are you there? Nay then I know what I have to do: and ſo proceeded forth in reading my condemnation. And there was another gentleman which began to ſnap and ſnatch at me: and then ſaid I, I would God I had known this ere I had come from home, I would ſurely have put on breeches, and not had my ſkin thus torn. And all this while the biſhop read on ſtill.

At laſt his chaplains cried, Stop, ſtop, my lord: for now he will recant. And then the biſhop aſked me again.

To which I anſwered, My lord, my faith is grounded more ſtedfaſtly than to change in a moment; it is no proceſs of time can alter me, unleſs my faith were as the waves of the ſea: and ſo the biſhop made an end, and delivered me into the hands of the ſheriff, to be again carried to the Marſhalſea. And when I was condemned, I deſired God with a loud voice, that he would not lay my blood to their charge, if it were his good will, and they refuſed my prayer, and ſent me away. Then I began to talk as I went, and they cried, Cut out his tongue, or ſtop his mouth; and ſo I was brought to the Marſhalſea, and bound in irons. And therefore I pray unto God that they unto whom this preſent writing ſhall come, may take example by my death and warfare. So be it.

By me Stephen Gratwick, condemned for God's everlaſting truth.

Here for want of time, I left out many matters, becauſe the Lord hath haſtened the time, ſo that I have written but the briefneſs of the matter, in probation of of faith, and the reward of faith, which the biſhop of Rocheſter and I debated upon; which matter I would have been very glad to have ſet down in writing.

Alſo much more talk there was, that the biſhop of Wincheſter and I had concerning my worldly friends and perſonal eſtate: for he played Satan with me, he carried me up to the mountains, and there told me my learning was good, and my eloquence, and alſo my knowledge, ſave that I did abuſe it, ſaid he; and then he fell to praiſing of my perſon, that it was comely, and worthy to ſerve a prince. Thus Satan flattered with me, to make me anſwer to ſuch objections as he would lay againſt me, that I might fall into his dioceſe.

Thus this chriſtian martyr, Stephen Gratwick, being wrongfully condemned by the biſhop of Wincheſter (as ye have heard) was burnt with W. Morant, and one named King, in St. George's fields, about the latter end of May.

The Hiſtory of ſeven godly Martyrs, five Women and two Men, burnt at Maidſtone, for profeſſing the true Religion of Chriſt.

I Shewed a little before, how after the univerſal proclamation was ſet forth by the king and queen in the month of February laſt, the ſtorm of perſecution began in all places to riſe (whereof ſome part is alſo declared before) but yet in no place more than in the dioceſe of Canterbury, by reaſon of the aforeſaid inquiſitors, being now armed with authority, but eſpecially by reaſon of Richard Thornton, ſuffragan of Dover, and the archdeacon of Canterbury, who of their own nature were ſo furious and fiery againſt the harmleſs flock of Chriſt, that there was no need of any proclamation to ſtir up the coals of their burning cruelty, by reaſon whereof many a godly ſaint lieth ſlain under the altar.

And now to return to the ſaid dioceſe of Canterbury again, in the next month following, being the 18th day of June, were ſeven chriſtian and true faithful martyrs of Chriſt burned at Maidſtone, whoſe names here follow:

Joan Bradbridge, of Staplehurſt.
Walter Appleby, of Maidſtone.
Petronil, his wife.
Edmund Allin, of Frytenden.
Katherine, his wife.
John Manning's wife, of Maidſtone.
Elizabeth, a blind maiden.

As concerning the general articles commonly objected to them in the public conſiſtory, and the order of their condemnation, it differeth not much from the uſual manner expreſſed before, neither did their anſwers in effect much differ from the others that ſuffered under the ſame ordinary in the aforeſaid dioceſe of Canterbury.

Now as touching their anſwers and manner of apprehenſion, and their private conflicts with the adverſaries, I find no great matter coming to my hands, ſave only of Edmund Allin ſome intimation is given me, how his troubles came, what was his cauſe and anſwers before the juſtices, as here conſequently ye ſhall underſtand.

The

The Examination of Edmund Allin.

THIS Allin was a miller of the pariſh of Frytenden in Kent, and in a dear year, when as many poor people were like to ſtarve, he fed them, and ſold his corn cheaper by half than others did; and did not only that, but alſo fed them with the food of life, reading to them the ſcriptures, and interpreting them. This being known to the popiſh prieſts dwelling thereabouts, by the procurement of them, namely, of John Taylor, parſon of Frytenden, and Thomas Henden parſon of Staplehurſt, he was ſoon complained of to the juſtices, and brought before Sir John Baker knight; who firſt ſending for them, committed both him and his wife to ward, but not long after they were let out, I know not how, and ſo went over to Calais: where, after he had continued ſome time, he began to be troubled in conſcience, and there meeting with one John Webb, from the ſame pariſh of Frytenden (who was likewiſe fled from the tyranny of Sir John Baker and parſon Taylor) ſaid unto him, that he could not be in quiet there, whatſoever the cauſe was; for God, ſaid he, had ſomething to do for him in England: and ſhortly after he returned to his pariſh of Frytenden, where was the cruel prieſt, parſon Taylor.

This parſon being informed by his brother ſexton, that Edmund Allin the miller and his wife were returned, and were not at maſs-time in the church; as he was the ſame time in the midſt of his maſs, upon a Sunday, a little before the elevation (as they term it) even almoſt at the lifting up of his Romiſh God, he turned him to the people in a great rage, and commanded them with all ſpeed to go unto their houſe, and apprehend them, and he would come unto them with as much haſte as he might poſſible. Which promiſe he well performed; for he had no ſooner made an end of Ite, miſſa eſt, and the veſtments off his back, but by and by he was at the houſe, and there laying hands on the ſaid Allin, cauſed him again to be brought to Sir John Baker, with a grievous complaint of his exhorting and reading the ſcriptures to the people, and ſo he and his wife were ſent to Maidſtone priſon. Witneſſed by Richard Fletcher vicar of Crambroke, and John Webb of Frytenden.

No ſooner were they in priſon but Mr. Baker immediately ſent certain of his men to their houſe, namely, John Dove, Thomas Beſt, Thomas Linley, Percival Barbar, with the aforeſaid John Taylor parſon of Frytenden, and Thomas Henden parſon of Staplehurſt, to take an inventory of all the goods that were in the houſe. Where they found in the bed-ſtraw a little cheſt locked with a padlock, wherein they found a ſackcloth bag of money, containing the ſum of thirteen or fourteen pound, partly in gold and partly in ſilver: which money after they had told, and put in the bag again, like good carvers for themſelves, they carried it away with them.

Beſides alſo they found there certain books, as pſalters, bibles, and others writings. All which books, with the money, were delivered to the aforeſaid prieſt Thomas Henden, parſon of Staplehurſt, and afterwards in the fifth year of the reign of queen Elizabeth it was by right law recovered from him again, as in records remaineth to be ſeen.

Thus good Edmund Allin and his wife, being maliciouſly accuſed, wrongfully impriſoned, and cruelly robbed and ſpoiled of all their goods, were brought, as is aforeſaid, before Sir John Baker the juſtice, to be examined; who taunting and reviling him without all mercy and pity, aſked him if thoſe were the fruits of his goſpel, to have conventicles to gather people together, to make conſpiracies to ſow ſedition and rebellion; and thus he began to reaſon with him.

A Conference between Sir John Baker, Collins his Chaplain, and Edmund Allin.

Baker. WHO gave thee authority to preach and interpret? Art thou a prieſt? Art thou admitted thereunto? Let me ſee thy licence.

Mart. Collins, Sir John Baker's ſchoolmaſter ſaid, Surely he is an arrant heretic, and worthy to be burned.

Allin. And it may pleaſe your honour to give me leave to anſwer in the cauſe of my faith, I am perſuaded that God hath given me this authority, as he hath given to all other chriſtians. Why are we called chriſtians, if we do not follow Chriſt, if we do not read his law, if we do not interpret it to others that have not ſo much underſtanding? Is not Chriſt our Father? Shall not the ſon follow the father's ſteps? Is not Chriſt our Maſter? and ſhall the ſcholar be inhibited to learn and preach his precepts? Is not Chriſt our Redeemer, and ſhall not we praiſe his name, and ſerve him that hath redeemed us from ſin and damnation? Did not Chriſt, being but twelve years of age, diſpute with the doctors, and interpret the prophet Iſaiah? and yet notwithſtanding he was neither of the tribe of Levi, which were prieſts, but of the royal tribe of Judah, neither had taken any outward prieſthood; wherefore if we be chriſtians we muſt do the ſame.

Collins. And it ſhall like your honour, what a knave is this, that compareth himſelf with Chriſt?

Baker. Let him alone, he will pump out anon an infinite number of hereſies. Haſt thou any more to ſay for thyſelf?

Allin. Yea, that I have. Adam was licenced of God, and Abraham was commanded to teach his children and poſterity, and ſo David teacheth in divers pſalms: and Solomon alſo preached to the people, as the book of the preacher very well proveth, where he teacheth that there is no immortal felicity in this life, but in the next. And Noah taught them that were diſobedient in his days, and therefore is called "The eighth preacher of righteouſneſs," in the ſecond epiſtle of Peter. Alſo in the 11th chapter of Numbers, where Moſes had choſen ſeventy elders to help him to teach and rule the reſt, Eldad and Medad preached in the tents, wherefore Joſhua being offended, complained to Moſes, that Eldad and Medad did preach without licence. To whom Moſes anſwered, and wiſhed that all the people could do the like. Why ſhould I be wrong? moſt of the prieſts were not of the tribe of Levi and Aaron.

Collins. Theſe are authorities of the Old Teſtament, and therefore abrogated; but thou art a fool, and knoweſt no ſchool points. Is not the law divided into the law ceremonial, moral, and judicial?

Allin. I grant that the ceremonies ceaſed when Chriſt came, as St. Paul proveth to the Hebrews, and to the Coloſſians, where he ſaith, "Let no man judge you in any part of the Sabbath-day, new moon, or other ceremonies, which are figures of things to come: for Chriſt is the body."

Collins. And are not the judicials abrogated by Chriſt?

Allin. They are confirmed both by Chriſt in the fifth chapter of Matthew, and by Paul in the firſt epiſtle to Timothy. The law, ſaith he, is not ſet forth for the virtuous and godly, but for man-ſlayers, perjured, adulterers, and ſuch like.

Collins. Thou art an heretic. Wilt thou call the judicials of Moſes again? Wilt thou have adultery puniſhed with death? diſobedient children to their parents to be ſtoned? wilt thou have Legem Talionis? But thou art an aſs. Why ſhould I ſpeak Latin to thee thou erroneous rebel? ſhall we now ſmite out eye for eye, tooth for tooth? thou art worthy to have thy teeth and tongue plucked out.

Allin. If we had that law, we ſhould neither have diſobedient children, neither adulterers, neither falſe witneſs bearers, neither ruffians.

Baker. Maſter Collins, let us return to our firſt matter. Why didſt thou teach the people, whom thou ſaidſt thou didſt feed both bodily and ſpiritually, being no prieſt?

Allin. Becauſe that we are all kings to rule our affections, prieſts to preach out the virtues and word of God, as Peter writeth, and lively ſtones to give light to others. For as out of flint ſtones cometh forth that which is able to ſet all the world on fire; ſo out of chriſtians ſhould ſpring the beams of the goſpel, which ſhould inflame all the world. If we muſt give a reckoning of our faith to every man, and now to you demanding it, then muſt we ſtudy the ſcriptures, and practiſe them. What availeth it a man to have meat, and will eat none; and apparel, and will wear none? or to have an occupation, and to teach none; or to be a lawyer, and utter none? Shall every artificer be ſuffered, yea and commanded to practiſe his faculty and ſcience, and the chriſtian forbidden to exerciſe his? Doth not every lawyer practiſe his law? Is not every chriſtian a follower of Chriſt? Shall ignorance, which is condemned in all ſciences, be practiſed by chriſtians? Doth not St. Paul forbid any man's ſpirit to be quenched? Doth he prohibit any man that hath any of theſe gifts, which he repeateth, 1 Cor. 14. to practiſe the ſame? Only he forbiddeth women, but no man. The Jews never forbad any. Read the Acts of the apoſtles. And the reſtraint was made by Gregory the ninth pope of that name, as I heard one, a learned man, preach in king Edward's days.

Collins. This villain (and it like your honour) is mad. By my prieſthood I believe that he will ſay, that a prieſt hath no more authority than another man. Doth not a prieſt bind and looſe?

Allin. No, my ſin bindeth me, and my repentance looſeth. God forgiveth ſin only, and no prieſt. For every chriſtian, when he ſinneth, bindeth himſelf, and when he repenteth, looſeth himſelf. And if any other be looſed from his ſin by my exhortation, I am ſaid to looſe him; and if he perſevere in ſin, notwithſtanding my exhortation, I am ſaid to bind him, although it is God that bindeth and looſeth, and giveth the increaſe. Therefore ſaith Chriſt, Matt. 18. "Whereſoever two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midſt of them; and whoſe ſoever ſins they forgive they are forgiven, and whoſe ſoever ſins they retain, they are retained." Neither hath the pope any keys ſave the keys of error; for the key that openeth the lock to God's myſteries and to ſalvation, is the key of faith and repentance. And as I have heard learned men reaſon, St. Auſtin, Origen, and others, are of this opinion.

Then they reviled him, and laid him in the ſtocks all the night. Wherewith ſome that were better minded, being offended with ſuch extremity, deſired Allin to keep his conſcience to himſelf, and to follow Baruch's counſel in the ſixth chapter; "Wherefore when ye ſee the multitude of people worſhipping them, behind and before, ſay ye in your hearts, O Lord, it is thou that ought only to be worſhipped."

Wherewith he was perſuaded to go to hear maſs the next day, and ſuddenly before the ſacring went out, and conſidered in the church-yard with himſelf, that ſuch a little cake between the prieſt's fingers could not be Chriſt, nor a material body, neither to have ſoul, life, ſinews, bones, fleſh, legs, head, arms nor breaſt, and lamented that he was ſeduced by the place of Baruch, which his conſcience gave him to be no ſcripture, or elſe to have another meaning: and after this he was brought again before Sir John Baker, who aſked why he did refuſe to worſhip the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar.

Allin. It is an idol.

Collins. It is God's body.

Allin. It is not.

Collins. By the maſs it is.

Allin. It is bread.

Collins. How proveſt thou that?

Allin. When Chriſt ſate at his ſupper, and gave them bread to eat.

Collins. Bread, knave?

Allin. Yea bread, which you call Chriſt's body. Sate he ſtill at the table, or was he both in their mouths, and at the table? If he were in their mouths, and at the table, then had he two bodies, or elſe had a fantaſtical body; which is an abſurdity to ſay it.

Baker. Chriſt's body was glorified, and might be in more places than one.

Allin. Then he had more bodies than one, by your own placing of him.

Collins. Thou ignorant aſs, the ſchoolmen ſay, that a glorified body may be every where.

Allin. If his body was not glorified till it roſe again, then was it not glorified at his laſt ſupper; and therefore was not at the table, and in their mouths by your own reaſon.

Collins. A glorified body occupieth no place.

Allin. That which occupieth no place, is neither God, nor any thing elſe: But Chriſt's body, ſay you, occupieth no place; therefore it is neither God, nor any thing elſe. If it be nothing, then is your religion nothing. If it be God, then have we four in one Trinity, which is the perſon of the Father, the perſon of the Son, the perſon of the Holy Ghoſt, the human nature of Chriſt. If Chriſt be nothing, which you muſt needs confeſs, if he occupieth no place, then is our ſtudy in vain, our faith fruſtrate, and our hope without reward.

Collins. This rebel will believe nothing but ſcripture. How knoweſt thou that it is the ſcripture but by the church? and ſo ſaith St. Auſtin.

Allin. I cannot tell what St. Auſtin ſaith, but I am perſuaded that it is ſcripture by divers arguments: Firſt, that the law worketh in me my condemnation. The law telleth me, that of myſelf I am damned; and this damnation, Mr. Collins, you muſt find in yourſelf, or elſe you ſhall never come to repentance. For as this grief and ſorrow of conſcience, without faith, is deſperation; ſo is a glorious and Romiſh faith, without the lamentation of a man's ſins, preſumption.

The ſecond is the goſpel, which is the power and Spirit of God. "This Spirit (ſaith St. Paul) certifieth my ſpirit that I am the Son of God, and that theſe are the ſcriptures."

The third are the wonderful works of God, which cauſe me to believe that there is a God, though we glorify him not as God, Rom. 1. The ſun, the moon, the ſtars, and other his works (as David diſcourſeth in Pſal. 19.) declare that there is a God, and that theſe are the ſcriptures, becauſe that they teach nothing elſe but God and his power, majeſty and might; and becauſe the ſcripture teacheth nothing diſagreeing from the preſcription of nature. And fourthly, becauſe that the word of God gave authority to the church in paradiſe, ſaying, that the ſeed of the woman ſhould break down the ſerpent's head. This ſeed is the goſpel; this is all the ſcriptures, and by this we are aſſured of eternal life; and theſe words, "The ſeed of the woman ſhall break the ſerpent's head," gave authority to the church, and not the church to the word.

Baker. I heard ſay that you ſpake againſt prieſts and biſhops.

Allin. I ſpake for them; for now they have ſo much living, and eſpecially biſhops, archdeacons and deans, that they neither can nor will teach God's word. If they had a hundred pounds a-piece, then would they apply their ſtudy; now they cannot for their affairs.

Collins. Who will then ſet his children to ſchool?

Allin. Where there is now one ſent to ſchool for that end, there would be forty; becauſe that one biſhop's living divided into thirty or forty parts, would find ſo many as well learned men as the biſhops be now who have all this living, neither had Peter or Paul any ſuch revenue.

Baker. Let us diſpatch him; he will marr all.

Collins. If every man had a hundred pounds as he ſaith, it would make more learned men.

Baker. But our biſhops would be angry, if that they knew it.

Allin. It were for a common-wealth to have ſuch biſhopricks divided, for the further increaſe of learning.

Baker. What ſayeſt thou to the ſacrament?

Allin. As I ſaid before.

Baker. Away with him.

Then he was carried to priſon, and afterward burned. And thus much concerning the particular ſtory of Edmund Allin and his wife: who with the five other martyrs abovenamed, being ſeven, were altogether burned at Maidſtone, the 18th of June, 1557.

Another Story of like Cruelty, ſhewed upon Three Men and Four Women, who were burnt at Canterbury.

AMONG ſuch infinite ſeas of troubles in theſe moſt dangerous days, who can withhold from tears to ſee the mading rage of theſe pretended catholics, who being never ſatisfied with blood to maintain their carnal kingdom, preſume ſo highly to violate the preciſe law of God's commandments, in ſlaying the ſimple poor lambs of the glorious congregation of Jeſus Chriſt, and that for the true teſtimony of a good conſcience, in confeſſing the immaculate goſpel of their ſalvation? What heart will not lament the murdering miſchief of theſe men, who for want of work do ſo wrack their time on ſilly poor women, whoſe weakneſs the more ſtrength it lacketh by natural imperfection, the more it ought to be helped, or at leaſt pitied, and not oppreſſed of men that be ſtronger, and eſpecially of prieſts that ſhould be charitable.

But bleſſed be the Lord Omnipotent, who ſupernaturally hath indued from above ſuch weak creatures with ſuch manly fortitude, ſo conſtantly to withſtand the uttermoſt extremity of theſe mercileſs perſecutors: as he did before ſtrengthen the mother of the ſeven ſons in the Maccabees, and as he hath done ſince with divers other godly women in theſe our days, partly before-mentioned, and partly to be mentioned hereafter, as may appear by the martyrdom of the ſeven following, of which four were women and three men, burnt together at Canterbury, the 30th day of the ſaid month of June 1557, whoſe names are theſe:

John Fiſhcock,	Bradbridge's widow,
Nicholas White,	Wilſon's wife,
Nicholas Pardue,	Benden's wife,
Barbara Final, widow,

As it were too tedious exactly and particularly to proſecute the ſeveral ſtories of every one of theſe martyrs; ſo I cannot paſs over untouched the cruel and unchriſtian handling of Alice Benden during her impriſonment, according as I have recited by the faithful relation of them who were beſt acquainted with her, and partly alſo ſome doers in the matter, being her own natural brethren. The ſtory is thus:

Alice Benden, wife of Edward Benden, of the pariſh of Staplehurſt in the county of Kent, was firſt brought before Mr. Roberts of Crambroke in the ſaid county, the 14th of October 1556, of whom ſhe was demanded why ſhe would not go to the church? To which ſhe anſwered, that ſhe could not do ſo with a good and clear conſcience, becauſe there was much idolatry committed againſt the glory of God. For which, with many mocks and taunts ſhe was ſent to priſon, where ſhe lay fourteen days: for on the 20th day of October, her huſband required his neighbours, the wealthy men of Staplehurſt, to write to the biſhop of Dover, who had the chief government of the tyrannical ſword in Kent for thoſe days, which they did, deſiring him to ſend her home.

Wherefore the biſhop called her before him, and aſked her if ſhe would go home, and go to the church. Whereunto ſhe anſwered, If I would have ſo done, I need not to have come hither. Then wilt thou go home, and be confeſſed by thy pariſh prieſt? And ſhe ſaid, No, that would ſhe not.

Well, ſaid he, go thy ways home, and go to the church when thou wilt. Whereunto ſhe anſwered nothing. But a prieſt that ſtood by, ſaid, She ſaith ſhe will, my lord. Wherefore he let her go, and ſhe came home forthwith.

On the Saturday following her huſband deſired her to go to the church; which ſhe refuſed to do: Wherefore on the Sunday fortnight after, he going to the church, came into the company of divers inhabitants of the ſame pariſh; among whom, through his fooliſh talk and behaviour, he procured her to be ſent to Sir John Gilford, who commanded her to priſon again: yea, and the more to utter his own ſhame, they ſaid her huſband took money of the conſtable to carry her to priſon, the price of his wife's blood, meaning indeed to carry her to priſon himſelf. But ſhe having much more care of his honeſt and good report, than he had regard (as it is eaſy to ſee) of his own infamy, and no leſs aſhamed of his unnatural doings, choſe rather to commit herſelf willingly into the hands of her enemies, than that the world ſhould bear witneſs againſt her huſband of ſo wicked a fact. Wherefore ſhe went to the conſtable, deſiring him to go with her: but he anſwered that he could not; but he granted her his boy to go with her, with whom ſhe went to priſon, namely, the caſtle of Canterbury, according to the commandment given.

Where this one thing is worthy to be noted, that while ſhe was in this priſon, ſhe practiſed with a fellow-priſoner of hers, the wife of Potkin, to live both of them on twopence half-penny a day, to try thereby how well they could ſuſtain penury and hunger, before they were put to it. For they had heard, that when they ſhould be removed from thence to the biſhop's priſon, their livings ſhould be but three farthings a-piece a day, and did indeed both ſo live for fourteen days ere ſhe was from thence removed.

The 22d day of January following, her huſband went again to the biſhop, deſiring him to deliver his wife out of priſon: but he ſaid ſhe was an obſtinate heretic, and would not be reformed; and therefore ſaid that he could not deliver her.

Then ſaid he, My lord, ſhe hath a brother, whoſe name is Roger Hall, who reſorteth unto her. If your lordſhip could keep him from her, ſhe would turn; for he comforteth her, giveth her money, and perſuadeth her not to return or relent.

This caution was no ſooner given but it was as quickly taken, and as cruelly put in execution. For the biſhop commanding her upon the ſame to a priſon called Monday's Hole, there alſo he gave a ſtrict charge, that if at any time her brother came, he ſhould be taken and apprehended.

This priſon was within a court where the prebends chambers were, being a vault beneath the ground, and being before the window incloſed with a pale about four foot and a half high, and three foot diſtant from the ſame, ſo that ſhe looking from beneath, might only ſee ſuch as ſtood at the pale. After this, her brother ſought often for her, with no leſs danger of life than diligence. But for the unknown ſituation of the place, it being alſo but rarely uſed for a priſon, and the matter as cloſely kept, as it was ſecretly done, he could never come to underſtand of her being there, until through God's merciful will and unſearchable providence, he coming thither very early in the morning, her keeper being gone to the church to ring (for he was a bell-ringer) happened to hear her voice, as ſhe was pouring out her ſorrowful complaints complaints unto God, ſaying the pſalms of David: and there could he no otherwiſe relieve her, than by putting money in a loaf of bread, and ſticking the ſame on a pole, and ſo reached it to her; for neither with meat or drink he could ſuſtain her. And this was five weeks after her coming thither; all which time no creature was known to come at her more than her keeper.

Her lying in that priſon was only upon a litt'e ſtraw between a pair of ſtocks and a ſtone wall; being allowed three farthings a day, that is, an half-penny for bread, and a farthing for drink, neither could ſhe get any more for her money. Wherefore ſhe deſired to have her whole allowance in bread, and uſed water for her drink. Thus did ſhe lie nine weeks. During all which time ſhe never changed her apparel; whereby at laſt ſhe became a very piteous and lothſome creature to behold.

At her firſt coming into this place ſhe did grievouſly bewail, with great ſorrow and lamentation, and reaſoned with herſelf, why her Lord God did ſuffer her with ſo heavy juſtice to be ſequeſtered from her loving fellows into ſo extreme miſery.

In theſe dolorous mournings did ſhe continue, till on a night as ſhe was in her ſorrowful ſupplications, rehearſing this verſe of the Pſalm; "Why art thou ſo heavy, O my ſoul?" and again, "The right hand of the Moſt High can change all:" ſhe received comfort in the midſt of her miſery, and after that continued very joyful till her delivery from the ſame.

About the 25th day of March, in the year 1557, ſhe was called before the biſhop, who demanded of her, whether ſhe would now go home, and to the church or no, promiſing her great favour, if ſhe would be reformed and do as they did.

To whom ſhe anſwered, I am thoroughly perſuaded by the great extremity that you have already ſhewed me, that you are not of God, neither can your doings be godly; and I ſee that you ſeek my utter deſtruction; ſhewing how lame ſhe was by hunger and cold while ſhe lay in the diſmal priſon, whereby ſhe was not able to move herſelf without great pain.

Then the biſhop delivered her from that filthy hole, and ſent her to Weſt-gate, where being kept clean, her ſkin did peel and ſcale off as if ſhe had been poiſoned by ſome mortal venom. Here ſhe continued till the latter end of April, when ſhe was called before them, and with others condemned, and committed to a priſon called the Caſtle, where ſhe lay till the 19th day of June, and then ſhe reſigned her life in the flames.

When ſhe was at the ſtake ſhe threw her handkerchief to one John Banks, requiring him to keep it in memory of her, and from about her middle ſhe took a white lace, which ſhe gave to the keeper, deſiring him to give the ſame to her brother Roger Hall, and to tell him, that it was the laſt band that ſhe was bound with, except the chain. A ſhilling alſo of Philip and Mary ſhe took forth, which her father had bent and ſent her when ſhe was firſt ſent to priſon, deſiring that her ſaid brother ſhould with obedient ſalutations render the ſame to her father again, and ſhew him that it was the firſt piece of money that he ſent her after her troubles began, which (as ſhe proteſted) ſhe had kept, and now ſent to let him underſtand, that ſhe never wanted money while ſhe was in priſon.

Alice Benden and the other ſix before mentioned were burnt at the ſame time. Being brought to the place of martyrdom they all addreſſed themſelves joyfully to the fire, and being ready, they all ſeven (like the communion of ſaints) kneeled down, and made their humble prayers to the Lord with ſuch zeal and affection, as even the enemies of the croſs could not but like it. When they had made invocation together, they aroſe and went to the ſtake, where being ſoon encompaſſed with horrible flames of fire, they yielded their ſouls and lives glorioufly into the hands of the Lord.

This Bradbridge's wife had two children, the one named Patience, the other Charity, and when ſhe was condemned by the biſhop, ſhe deſired (if ſhe muſt needs be burnt) that he would take Patience and Charity (meaning her two children) and keep them. Nay, quoth the biſhop, by the faith of my body, I will meddle with neither of them.

The Troubles and Examinations of Matthew Plaiſe.

MAtthew Plaiſe of the pariſh of Stone, in the county of Kent, weaver, and a faithful chriſtian, being apprehended and impriſoned in the caſtle of Canterbury, was brought to examination in the year 1557, before Thornton biſhop of Dover, archdeacon Harpsfield, commiſſary Collins, and other inquiſitors, in the following manner:

Biſhop. Art thou of the dioceſe of Canterbury, and where dwelleſt thou?

Plaiſe. I am of the pariſh of Stone in Kent, and ſubject to the king and queen of England.

Biſhop. Thou wert indicted by twelve men at the ſeſſion at Aſhford for hereſy.

Plaiſe. That is ſooner ſaid than proved.

Biſhop. I have ſpoken the truth, and I can prove it.

Plaiſe. I deſire to hear it, and then I will anſwer to it.

Biſhop. No, no; ye ſhall anſwer to the article, yea or nay.

Plaiſe. You cannot prove it; for I was not at Aſhford, and therefore you have nothing to lay to my charge: but now I perceive you go about to lay a net to have my blood.

Harpsfield. Peace, peace, we do not deſire thy blood, but we are glad to hear that thou art no heretic, [with many other flattering words] yet thou art ſuſpected of hereſy; and if thou wilt be content to confeſs how thou doſt believe as concerning thoſe articles, we ſhall gladly teach thee.

Plaiſe. I do not think ſo, for I talked with one of your doctors, and after long talk, he would needs know how I believed in the ſacrament, and I recited unto him the text, and becauſe I would not make my expoſition to him upon it he would teach me nothing: yet I prayed him for my inſtruction, to write his mind, and if it were the truth I would believe him; and this I deſired of him for the love of God, but it would not be.

Harpsfield. I dare ſwear upon a book, that it is not ſo.

Plaiſe. Nay, I can prove it to be true.

Harpsfield. I will tell thee the truth [and he ſtood up with a long proceſs] I am ſure that the ſame doctor doth believe as I do.

Plaiſe. How do you know that? ſeeing St. Paul doth ſay, That no man knoweth what is in man, but the ſpirit which dwelleth in him: but if you knew what Chriſt meant by theſe words, "I require mercy and not ſacrifice," Matth. 12. you would not kill innocents.

Biſhop. I charge thee in the name of the king and queen and the lord cardinal, to anſwer yea or nay to the articles.

Plaiſe. I command you in the name of Him who ſhall come in flaming fire with his mighty angels to render vengeance to the diſobedient, and to all thoſe that believe not the goſpel of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who ſhall be puniſhed with everlaſting damnation, that you ſhall ſpeak nothing but the truth grounded upon Chriſt and his apoſtles, and then I will anſwer you, or elſe not.

Biſhop. Unleſs thou wilt anſwer to every article I will immediately condemn thee. [For the biſhop was very angry.]

Plaiſe. Well, if you do, you ſhall be guilty of my blood, and prove yourſelf a murderer.

Then the archdeacon took the articles in his hand, and read the ſecond article, which was, That I was a chriſtian man, man, and did believe in their mother the catholic church, and the determination thereof.

Plaiſe. I am a chriſtian man indeed, and therefore you have nothing againſt me.

Harpsfield. What ſayſt thou to the catholic church, which hath ſo long continued, except it were nine or ten years, that this hereſy hath ſprung up here in this realm?

Plaiſe. No man can accuſe me of any thing ſpoken againſt the catholic church of Chriſt.

Biſhop. Doſt thou not believe the creed?

Plaiſe. Yes verily, I believe my creed, and all that is written in the Teſtament of Chriſt, with the reſt of the ſcriptures.

Biſhop. Thou doſt confeſs, that there is a catholic church, I am glad of that; but tell me, is the king and queen of that church, or no?

Plaiſe. Well, now I perceive you go about to be both mine accuſer, and alſo my judge, contrary to all right. I confeſs Chriſt hath a church upon earth, which is built upon the apoſtles and prophets, Chriſt being the head thereof; and as touching the king and queen, I anſwer, I have nothing to do with any man's faith but mine own: neither came I hither to judge; for I judge not myſelf, but the Lord muſt judge me.

Biſhop. Is there no part of that church here in England?

Plaiſe. Well, I perceive you would fain have ſomething to lay to my charge. I will tell you where. Chriſt ſaith, Where two or three be gathered together in his name, there is he in the midſt among them.

Then the archdeacon ſtood up with his mocks, to put me out of countenance, and ſaid to the people that I had no wit, but that I thought all they were deceived ſo long time, and that half a dozen of us ſhould have the truth in a corner, and that all they ſhould be deceived, with ſuch like taunts and mocks; but would not ſuffer me to ſpeak one word. Then he read the article of the ſacrament, and ſaid, I did deny the real preſence to be the ſacrament, after it was once conſecrated; and that I ſaid, Chriſt's body was in heaven, and no where elſe, and that the bread was nothing but a ſign, token, or remembrance,

Plaiſe. You have to ſhew where and what my words were. [Hereof we talked a great while.]

At laſt the biſhop was ſo angry, that he charged me in the names of the king, queen, and cardinal, before the mayor and his brethren, taking them to witneſs, if I did not ſay yea, or nay, he would condemn me.

Then ſaid I, Seeing you have nothing to accuſe me of, wherefore ſhould I ſo anſwer?

Then the archdeacon ſaid, I was guilty, and that I was like a thief at the bar, who would not confeſs his fault becauſe his accuſers were not preſent; with a great many more words, and would not let me open my mouth againſt him.

Then I ſaw whereabouts they went, granting to anſwer them by the word, or elſe I think they would have condemned me for holding of my peace; and this was my beginning, I believe that Chriſt took bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave it to his diſciples, and ſaid, "Take, eat, this is my body which is given for you, this do in remembrance of me."

Harpsfield. Doſt thou believe that Chriſt meant even as he ſaid?

Plaiſe. Chriſt was no diſſembler, but he ſpake the very truth.

Harpsfield. Thou haſt very well ſaid, we will take no advantage of thy words.

Then he praiſed me with many words, going about to prove it his body real and ſubſtantial, and ſaid, Chriſt called himſelf bread: and this to prove, when Chriſt ſaid, "This is my body," the bread was his body, ſaid he, indeed, real and ſubſtantial, not ſo long and ſo big as it hung on the croſs, as the Capernaites did think; but we eat it, as man's weak nature can eat Chriſt. Therefore when he had ſaid, This is my body, the bread was his body in very deed.

Plaiſe. What did Chriſt mean by theſe words, "which is given for you?"

Harpsfield. Chriſt ſpake that by the bread alſo.

Plaiſe. Is Chriſt's body made of bread? was bread given for our redemption? or was the bread crucified for us or not?

Harpsfield. No, by St. Mary, I ſay not ſo.

Plaiſe. You have ſaid the truth indeed, and even as I believe.

Then he ſtood up with a great many words, and ſaid, that I thought it but bare bread ſtill, as other bread is; but he was ſure Chriſt called it his body, and then it was his body indeed: for he would believe Chriſt.

When he had ſpoken his pleaſure by me, thinking to have condemned me by his law, I ſaid, he had not judged right of me, for I had not ſo ſpoken, but did believe the words of Chriſt as well as he, and as much as he could prove by the word.

Harpsfield. What doſt thou ſay it is?

Plaiſe. I do believe it was that which he gave them.

Harpsfield. What was that?

Plaiſe. That which he brake.

Harpsfield. What did he break?

Plaiſe. That which he took.

Harpsfield. What did he take?

Plaiſe. The text ſaith, "He took bread."

Harpsfield. Well then, thou ſay'ſt it was but bread that his diſciples did eat, by that reaſon.

Plaiſe. Thus much I ſay, look, what he gave them, they did eat it indeed.

Harpsfield. Why then was not that his body which they did eat?

Plaiſe. It was that which he brake.

Harpsfield. Well, I perceive thy meaning well enough; for thou doſt think it is but bread ſtill, and that he was not able to make it his body.

Plaiſe. That is your expoſition upon my mind.

Harpsfield. What didſt thou receive when thou didſt receive laſt?

Plaiſe. I do believe that I did eat Chriſt's fleſh and drink his blood. For he ſaith, "My fleſh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed."

Then he ſaid, I had anſwered well, thinking to have had ſome advantage over me, and prayed me to tell him how I did eat Chriſt's fleſh, and drink his blood.

Then I ſaid, I muſt anſwer you by the word which Chriſt ſaith, "He that eateth my fleſh, dwelleth in me, and I in him."

Then he faced out the matter with ſophiſtry, and ſaid, I did eat Chriſt as that church was in his eye, with many ſuch mocks, but would not let me anſwer one word.

Commiſſary Collins then aſked me, if I did not remember St. Paul, who rebuked the Corinthians for their evil behaviour, and becauſe they made no difference of the Lord's body, and brought in to prove his matter, how he called himſelf bread in the 6th of John. So Paul ſaith, "So oft as ye eat of this bread (meaning Chriſt's body) unworthily, ye eat and drink your own damnation, becauſe ye make no difference of the Lord's body." For thus ſaith Chriſt, "The bread that I will give you is my fleſh." Now it is no bread, but it is his fleſh. And thus he alledged every ſcripture falſe, to make up the matter.

Plaiſe. I believe the words of St. Paul very well, even as he hath ſpoken them. For thus he ſaith, "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh his own damnation, becauſe he maketh no difference of the Lord's body."

Collins. What is the cauſe that he eateth his own damnation?

Plaiſe. St. Paul declareth it plainly with theſe words, "If ye had judged yourſelves, ye ſhould not have been judged of the Lord."

Harpsfield. I marvel that you will not ſay, that he called the bread his body, ſeeing Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, with many others, called it his body.

Plaiſe. You have condemned them as heretics, and you would have me ſay with them, becauſe you would kill me.

Harpsfield. In that they ſaid it was his body, they ſaid the truth.

Plaiſe. Wherefore were they killed, ſeeing they ſaid the truth?

Biſhop. I had all their anſwers, and they did not believe as they ſaid. For they ſaid, Chriſt called it his body, but it was not his natural body; but thou ſhalt anſwer me by and by, whether it be his body or not, or elſe I will anger thee.

Plaiſe. I have anſwered you by the word already, and I believe it alſo; therefore if you condemn me for that, my life is not dear unto me, I am ſure you ſhall not eſcape unpuniſhed: for God will be revenged on ſuch murderers.

The then archdeacon intreated me to be ruled by him, and take mercy while it was offered; for if I were condemned, I muſt needs be burned. Yet he would not ſay but my ſoul might be ſaved; with many more words, and deſired me that I would believe him, for he would ſpeak the truth; beginning how Chriſt fed five thouſand people with four loaves, and how he turned the water into wine, even ſo Chriſt took bread, and bleſſed it; and when he had done, he brake it, and ſaid, "This is my body," and then he commanded them to eat it: and therefore it muſt needs be his body.

Plaiſe. I deſire you to ſpeak the text right, or elſe I will not believe you.

Then archdeacon Harpsfield ſtood up, and put off his cap, and thanked me for teaching him, and ſaid, I was a ſtubborn fellow, and took ſcorn to be taught.

Plaiſe. I ought to hold you accurſed, if you teach doctrine contrary to Chriſt and his apoſtles.

Harpsfield. Do you believe that Chriſt gave that he took, or not?

Plaiſe. I do believe as much as can be proved by the ſcripture, and more I will not believe.

Then he began with Moſes's rod, how God commanded him to lay it down, and it was turned into a ſerpent. Seeing that this was by Moſes, being but a man, how much more Chriſt, being both God and man, took one thing, and gave to his diſciples another?

Plaiſe. Your compariſon is nothing like, for Moſes's rod, when it was laid down, he ſaw that it was turned into a very ſerpent indeed; but in this ſacrament no man can ſee either quality or yet quantity to be changed.

Biſhop. Your opinion and faith is like unto the Capernaites.

Plaiſe. Yours is more like their opinion than mine.

Then Harpsfield aſked me, whether Chriſt took not one thing, and gave another?

Plaiſe. What he brake he gave unto them, and bade them eat; and no other anſwer will I make, contrary to the word.

Then the archdeacon ſaid, he marvelled why I would not believe them, ſeeing this learning had continued this fifteen hundred years; neither yet did ſay, as others had before, how Chriſt did call it his body.

Plaiſe. When Cranmer, who was here biſhop, was in authority, he ſaid, that he held the truth, and commanded us to believe him, and he hath given his life for his opinion, and would you have me to believe you, becauſe you ſay that you hold the truth? And that which makes me believe chiefly is the ſcripture, which I am ſure is the truth indeed.

Biſhop. I have ſpoken the truth, and you will not believe.

Plaiſe. If you do not now ſpeak the truth, I am ſure you have ſpoke the truth; [for he had before preached doctrine contrary to this.]

Then the reſt of my articles were read; which I anſwered, and in every article he had up his breaden god. And they ſent for a candle-light, and I thought they would have condemned me; but God would not ſuffer their cruel hearts to have their pleaſure that time: bleſſed be his name for evermore, Amen.

Then the archdeacon was angry, and began to chide with me, becauſe I would not deſire a day of the biſhop, and ſaid, I was a naughty and ſtubborn fellow, and that it had been my duty to have deſired him to have been good to me, that I might have a day.

Plaiſe. I have ſpoken the truth; and therefore I will not aſk him for a day, except he would give me a day of his own mind.

Then the commiſſary ſaid, Doſt thou not think that thou mayſt be deceived, ſeeing he may be deceived that hath gone to ſtudy all the days of his life?

Plaiſe. Yea I might be deceived in that I was a man; but I was ſure God's word could not be deceived.

Then the commiſſary prayed me to be content, and confeſſed that I might learn; and ſaid, they would be glad to teach me.

Plaiſe. I will be as glad to learn as any man.

And thus they roſe up, and went away, ſaying nothing.

What became of this Matthew Plaiſe afterwards, whether he died in priſon, or was executed, or delivered, I have as yet no certain knowledge.

The Hiſtory of Ten Martyrs, who were burnt in one Fire at Lewes.

IN the town of Lewes, on the 22d of June, the ten following perſons ſuffered in one fire.

Richard Woodman. George Stevens. W. Mainard. Alexander Hoſman, his ſervant. Thomaſin a Wood, Mainard's maid. Margery Moris. James Moris, her ſon. Dennis Burgis. Aſhdon's wife. Grove's wife.

Of which number Richard Woodman was the firſt, who by his occupation was an iron-maker, dwelling in the pariſh of Warbleton, in the county of Suſſex, and dioceſe of Chicheſter, about the age of thirty years. The occaſion of his firſt apprehenſion was this:

There was one Fairebanke, who had ſometime been a married prieſt, and ſerved the curate of Warbleton, where he had often perſuaded the people not to credit any other doctrine but that which he then preached, taught and ſet forth in king Edward's days. And afterward in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, the ſaid Fairebanke preached clean contrary to that which he had before taught.

Whereupon Richard Woodman hearing him preach ſo contrary to himſelf, admoniſhed him of his inconſtancy, how before time he had taught them one thing, and now another, and deſired him to teach them the truth. For which words he was apprehended, and brought before Mr. John Aſhburnham, Mr. Tonſton, Mr. Culpepper, and Mr. Roberts, juſtices of peace in the county of Suſſex, and by them committed to the King's-bench, where he continued from June, the ſpace almoſt of a year and half; and from thence was tranſferred by Dr. Story into biſhop Bonner's coal houſe, where he remained a month before he came to examination.

At length, the ſame day when Mr. Philpot was burned, which was the 18th of December, he with four other priſoners was ſet at liberty by biſhop Bonner. Notwithſtanding ſhortly after he was ſought for again, and at laſt taken by means of his father, brother, and other friends, and was ſent up again to biſhop Bonner, where he remained in the coal-houſe eight weeks. He was there ſix times examined, and 26 times before, ſo that his examinations were in all 32, from his apprehenſion to his condemnation. And foraſmuch as the matter is ſomething ſtrange, and will peradventure ſcarce find credit upon my narration with them who deny all things that do not pleaſe them, ye ſhall hear himſelf ſpeak and teſtify both of the manner of his troubles, and alſo his own examinations, as recorded by himſelf in the following manner:

A true Certificate written by Richard Woodman, of his Apprehenſion and Impriſonment, and how he was there uſed till he was brought before the Biſhop of Chicheſter at Black-Friars in London, together with his Examinations.

GEntle reader, you will here perceive how the ſcriptures be partly fulfilled on me, being one of the leaſt of his poor lambs. Firſt, you ſhall underſtand, that ſince I was delivered out of the biſhop of London's hands in the year 1555, and the ſame day that Mr. Philpot was burned, which was the 18th of December, I lay in his coal-houſe eight weeks lacking one day: and before that I was a year and a half almoſt in the King's-bench after my firſt apprehenſion, for reproving a preacher in the pulpit in the pariſh of Warbleton, where I dwelt. Wherefore I was at two ſeſſions before I was ſent to priſon, and carried to two more ſeſſions while I was in priſon, twice before the biſhop of Chicheſter, and five times before the commiſſioners; and then ſent to Bonner's coal-houſe, and many times called before him, as it appeareth by my examinations which I wrote.

And it pleaſed God to deliver me with four more out of the butcher's hands, requiring nothing elſe of us but that we ſhould be honeſt men, and members of the true catholic church that was built upon the prophets and apoſtles, Chriſt being the head of the true church; to which we all affirmed, that we were members of the true church, and purpoſed by God's help therein to die. And hereupon we were delivered: but he ordered us many times to ſpeak good of him. And no doubt he was worthy to be praiſed, becauſe he had been ſo faithful an aid in his maſter the devil's buſineſs. For he had burnt good Mr. Philpot the ſame morning, in whoſe blood his heart was ſo drunken (as I ſuppoſed) that he could not tell what he did, as it appeared to us both before and after. For but two days before he promiſed us that we ſhould be condemned that ſame day that we were delivered, yea, and the morrow after that he had delivered us, he ſought for ſome of us again, yea, and that earneſtly. He waxed dry after his great drunkenneſs, wherefore he is like to have blood to drink in hell as he is worthy, if he repent it not with ſpeed. The Lord turn all their hearts, if it be his will.

This have I written, chiefly to certify all people how we were delivered, becauſe many carnal goſpellers and papiſts have ſaid, that it was preſcribed that we ſhould be ſo delivered, becauſe they think that God is ſubject to man, and not man to God. For if they did they would not blaſpheme him as they do, or if they thought they ſhould give an account for it. Have not many of them read how God delivered Iſrael out of Egypt, Daniel out of the lion's den, Shadrach, Meſhach, and Abednego out of the burning oven; with divers other ſuch like examples? yea God is the ſame God that he was then. He is no older, nor leſs in power, as ſome count him, in wondering at his works. Now to the matter.

After I was delivered, the papiſts ſaid, that I had conſented to them, whereof they made themſelves glad; which was the leaſt part of my thought, (I praiſe God for it) as they well perceived, and knew the contrary in a ſhort time. For I went from pariſh to pariſh, and talked with them, to the number of thirteen or fourteen, and that of the chiefeſt in all the country; and I angered them ſo, that they with the commiſſioners complained on me to the lord chamberlain that was then to the queen, Sir John Gage, ſhewing him that I baptized children, and married people, with many ſuch lyes, to bring me into their hands again. Then the commiſſioners ſent out certain citations to bring me to court. The lord chamberlain had directed out three or four warrants for me, that if I had come there I ſhould have been attached, and immediately ſent to priſon; which was not God's will, for I had warning of their lying in wait for me, and went not thither, but ſent my deputy, and he brought me word, that the bailiffs waited for me there, but they miſſed of their prey for that time, whereupon they were diſpleaſed.

Then within three days after my lord ſent three of his men to take me, whoſe names were Dean, Jeffrey, and Francis. I being at plough with my folks, right in the way as they were coming to my houſe, leaſt miſtruſting them of all others, came and ſpake to them, aſking them how they did. And they ſaid they arreſted me in the name of the king and queen, and that I muſt go with them to their maſter the lord chamberlain. Which words made my fleſh to tremble and quake, being ſuddenly ſurpriſed. But I anſwered them, that I would go with them. Yet I deſired them that they would go with me to my houſe, that I might break my faſt, and put on ſome other apparel; and they ſaid I ſhould. Then I remembered myſelf, ſaying in my heart, Why am I thus afraid? they can lay no evil to my charge. If they kill me for well doing, I may think myſelf happy. I remembered how I was willing gladly before to die in that quarrel, and ſo had continued ever ſince; and ſhould I now fear to die? God forbid; for then were all my labour in vain.

So by and by I was perſuaded, I praiſe God, conſidering it was but the frailty of my fleſh, which was loth to forego my wife and children, and goods; for I ſaw nothing but preſent death before mine eyes. And as ſoon as I was perſuaded in my mind to die, I had regard to nothing in this world, but I was as merry and as joyful, I praiſe God, as ever I was. This battle laſted not a quarter of an hour; but it was ſharper than death itſelf for the time it laſted.

So when I had my breakfaſt, I deſired them to ſhew me their warrant, thinking thereby I ſhould have ſeen wherefore I was arreſted, to the intent I might the better anſwer for myſelf, when I came before their maſter. And one of them anſwered, they had not their warrant there. Which words made me aſtoniſhed, and it was put into my mind by God, that I need not go with them, unleſs they had their warrant. Then ſaid I to them, That is a wonder that you will come to take a man without a warrant. It ſeemeth to me that you come of your own mind to get thanks of your maſter; for indeed I heard ſay, ſaid I, that there were four or five warrants out againſt me, but they were all called in again, becauſe I had certified my lord and the commiſſary, by a letter that I had ſent to the commiſſary's court, that I was not faulty in that they had laid to my charge, which was baptizing of children, and marrying folks, which I never did; for I was never a miniſter appointed to do any ſuch thing: wherefore ſet your hearts at reſt, I will not go with you, ſaid I, unleſs you will carry me by force; and if you will do ſo, be it at your peril. And ſo I roſe from the table, and ſtepped into my chamber, meaning to go from them if I could poſſible, ſeeing God had made the way ſo open for me. I meant to play Peter's part with them, but God would not it ſhould be ſo, but ſent a fear amongſt them, that as ſoon as I was gone into my chamber, ere ever I could come out again, they were gone out of my houſe.

When I ſaw that, I knew it was God's doing to me at liberty once again. Yet was I compelled to ſpeak to them, and ſaid, If you have a warrant, I deſire you for God's ſake to ſhew it me, and I will go with you with all my heart: if not, I deſire you to depart in God's peace, and the king's: for ſurely I will not go along with you without the order of the law; for I have been too ſimple in ſuch things already. For before I was ſent to priſon firſt, I met the juſtices at two ſeſſions without any warrant or commandment, but had word by one of their men, and I went juſtly to them, and they ſent me to priſon, and kept me there almoſt a year and three quarters, without all right or equity, as it is openly known, known, not hearing my cauſe gently debated. And it ſeemeth ſtrange to me, that I ſhould be thus evilly handled; and therefore I will go to none of them all henceforth, without the extremity of the law.

Then one of them anſwered me, and ſaid, We have not the warrant here, but it is at home at my houſe; the worſt is, you can but make us fetch it. Then ſaid I, Fetch it if you will, but if you come in my houſe before you have it, at your venture be it. So I ſhut my door, and went my way out at the other door. So they got help to watch my houſe, whilſt one of them fetched the conſtable, and many more, thinking to have found me in my houſe, and carried me away with a licence; but, as God would have it, I was gone before. Notwithſtanding they ſought every corner of my houſe, but to no purpoſe. I miſtruſted they would ſearch it that night again, and I kept myſelf abroad; and indeed there came ſeven of his men and the conſtable, and ſearched my houſe.

And when they ſaw that they could not meet with me, they were ready to rend their coats, that I had ſo eſcaped them, knowing that they would have a check from their maſter. When I heard that they had ſo ſought for me again, I perceiving that they were greedy of their prey, came home, and my wife told me all things.

Then I ſuppoſed that they would ſearch all the country for me, and the ſea coaſt, becauſe I ſhould not go over, and then I thought that they would not miſtruſt that I would dare be nigh home. So I told my wife, that I would take my lodging in a wood near my houſe, as indeed I did, even under a tree, and there had my bible, my pen, and mine ink, and other neceſſaries, and there I continued ſix or ſeven weeks, my wife bringing me meat daily, as I had need. Yea, I thought myſelf bleſſed of God, that I was counted worthy to lie in the woods for the name of Chriſt. Then there came word into the country, that I was ſeen and ſpoken with in Flanders; whereupon they left laying in wait for me; for they had ſought all the country for me, and the ſea coaſt from Portſmouth to Dover, even as God put it in my mind they would.

So when all was huſhed, I went abroad among our friends and brethren, and at length I went beyond the ſea, both into Flanders, and in France; but I thought every day ſeven years whilſt I was there; ſo I came home again as ſoon as it was poſſible. I was there but three weeks, before the prieſts of Baal diſcovered me, who procured out warrants againſt me, cauſing my houſe to be ſearched ſometimes twice in a week. This continued from St. James-tide to the firſt Sunday in Lent. Otherwhile I went privily, otherwhile openly, otherwhile I went from home a fortnight or three weeks, otherwhile I was at home a month or five weeks together, living there moſt commonly and openly, about my ordinary buſineſs, and yet all mine enemies could lay no hands on me, till the hour was full come: and then by the voice of the country, and by manifeſt proofs, mine own brother as concerning the fleſh, delivered me into their hands, by that he knew that I was at home.

For my father and he had as much of my effects in their hands, as I might have fifty-ſix pounds a year for clear. It was a lordſhip and an honour, and half an honour that I had delivered into their hands to pay my debts, and the reſt to remain with my wife and children. But they had reported that it would not pay my debts: which grieved me ſore; for it was two hundred pounds better than the debts came to; which cauſed me to ſpeak to ſome of my friends, that they would ſpeak to them to come to ſome reckoning with me, and to take all ſuch money again of me as they were charged with, and to deliver to me ſuch writings and writs as they had of mine again, or to whom I ſhould appoint them.

So it was agreed betwixt my father and me, that I ſhould have it again, and the day was appointed that the reckoning ſhould be made and ſent to me the ſame day that I was taken; my brother ſuppoſing that I ſhould have put him out of moſt of all his occupying that he was in; for it was all mine, in a manner, that he occupied, as all the country can, and do well know. Whereon (as it is reported) he told one Cardillar, my next neighbour, and he told ſome of Mr. Gage's men, or to Mr. Gage himſelf: and ſo he ſent to his brother, and his brother ſent twelve of his men (he being ſheriff) in the night before I was taken, and lay in the buſhes near my houſe, till about nine of the clock, even the hour that was appointed amongſt themſelves; for about the ſame time they thought to have had me within my houſe.

They had taken a man of mine, and two of my children that were abroad in the land, and kept them with them till their hour was appointed to come in; and then a little girl, one of my children, ſaw them come together, and came running in, and cried, Mother, mother, yonder cometh twenty men. I ſitting in my bed, and making of ſhoe-thongs, heard the words, and ſuſpecting ſtraitway that I was betrayed, I put on my hoſe, thinking to have gone out of the doors before they had come. My wife being amazed at the child's words, looked out at the door, and they were hard by. Then ſhe clapped to the door, and barred it faſt, even as I came out of my chamber into the hall, and ſo barred the other. They immediately beſet the houſe, and commanded the doors to be opened, or they would break them in pieces. Then I had no ſhift, but either I muſt ſhew myſelf openly, or make ſome other remedy.

So there was a place in my houſe which was never found out, which was at the leaſt, I dare ſay, ſearched twenty times, and ſometimes almoſt of twenty men at once; into which place I went. And when my wife opened the door, and they came in, and aſked for me; and ſhe ſaid I was not at home. Then they aſked her, why ſhe ſhut the door, if I was not at home. She ſaid, becauſe ſhe had been made afraid divers times with ſuch as came to ſearch us; and therefore ſhe ſhut the door: for it is reported (ſaid ſhe) that whoſoever can take my huſband, ſhall hang him, or burn him ſtraitway; and therefore I doubt they will ſerve me and my children ſo; for I think they may do ſo unto us, as well as to him, ſhe ſaid. Well, ſaid they, we know he is in the houſe, and we muſt ſearch it, for we be the ſheriff's men; let us have a candle; it is told us there are many ſecret places in your houſe. So ſhe lighted a candle, and they ſought up and down, in every corner that they could find, and had given over, and many of them were gone out of my houſe into the church-yard, and there talking with my father, and with ſome that he had brought with him.

Now when they could not find me, one of them went to him who informed them I was at home, and ſaid we cannot find him. Then he aſked them whether they had ſought over a window that was in the hall (as it was known afterward) for that ſame place I had told him of myſelf. For many times when I came home, I would ſend for him to bear me company; yet as it chanced, I had not told him the way into it. Then they began to ſearch anew. One looked up over the window, and ſpied a little loft, with three or four cheſts, and the way went in betwixt two of the cheſts, but no man could perceive it. Then he aſked my wife which was the way into it: here is a place that we have not ſought yet. When ſhe thought they would ſee it by one means or other, ſhe ſaid, the way into it was out of a chamber they were in even now. So ſhe ſent them up, and cried, Away, away. Then I knew there was no remedy, but made the beſt ſhift for myſelf that I could. The place was boarded over, and faſt nailed, and if I had come out that way that I went in, I muſt needs come out amongſt them them all in the hall. Then I had no ſhift, but ſet my ſhoulders to the boards that were nailed to the rafters to keep out the rain, and brake them in pieces, which made a great noiſe; and they that were in the other chamber, ſeeking the way into it, heard the noiſe, and looked out of a window, and ſpied me, and made an out-cry. But yet I got out and leaped down, having no ſhoes on.

So I took down a lane that was full of ſharp cinders, and they came running after with a great cry, with their ſwords drawn, crying, Strike him, ſtrike him. Which words made me look back, and there was never a one nigh me by an hundred foot; and that was but one, for all the reſt were a great way behind. And I turned about haſtily to go my way, and ſtept upon a ſharp cinder with one foot, and ſaving of it, I ſtept into a great miry hole, and fell down withal, and before I could ariſe and get away, he was come in with me. His name is Parker the Wild, as he is counted in all Suſſex. But if I had had on my ſhoes, they had been like to have gone away errandleſs, if there had been five hundred more, if I had caught the plain ground once, to which I had not a ſtone's caſt: But it was not God's will; for if it had, I ſhould have eſcaped from them all, if there had been ten thouſand of them.

Then they took me and led me home again to put on my ſhoes, and ſuch cloaths as I had need of. Then ſaid John Fauconer, Now your maſter hath deceived you. You ſaid you were an angel, and if you had been an angel, why did you not flee away from us? Then ſaid I, Who be they that ever heard me ſay that I was an angel? It is not the firſt lye by a thouſand that they have made of me. Angels were never begotten of men, nor born of women: But if they had ſaid, they had heard me ſay, That I do truſt I am a ſaint, they had not ſaid amiſs. What, do you think to be a ſaint? Yea, that I do, and am already in God's ſight, I truſt in God; for he that is not a ſaint in God's ſight already, is a devil. Therefore he that thinketh ſcorn to be a ſaint, let him be a devil. And with that word they had brought me to mine own door where I met with my father, who deſired me to remember myſelf.

To whom I anſwered, I praiſe God, I am well remembered whereabout I go. This way was appointed of God for me to be delivered into the hands of mine enemies, but woe unto him by whom I am betrayed. It had been good for that man, that he had never been born, if he repent not with ſpeed. The ſcriptures are now fulfilled on me, "For the father ſhall be againſt the ſon, and the brother ſhall deliver the brother to death," as it is this day come to paſs. Then ſaid one, He doth accuſe his father, a good child indeed! I accuſe him not, but ſay my mind; for there was no man knew me at home, but my father, my brother, and one more, who I dare ſay would not hurt me for all the good in this town.

There was one George Beching that married one of my ſiſters, and he thought that I had meant him, that he had betrayed me; and he ſaid, Brother, I would you ſhould not think that I was the cauſe of your taking. To whom I anſwered, that I meant him not; I meant one that was nearer of my blood than he was. Then one from Lauſe ſaid, that I had been a goſpeller, and ſtood from them when I was brought to a ſeſſions at Lauſe, and he ſaid, I thought you would have been an honeſt man when you were at Lauſe, and I offered Huſſey the ſheriff to be bound for you, that you ſhould go home to your wife, and come to him again. Then I remembered what he was, and ſaid, Be you the pewterer? and he ſaid, Yea. Then ſaid I, It is happened to you according to the true proverb, as ſaith St. Peter, "The dog is turned to his vomit again, and the ſow that is waſhed, to wallow in the mire," and the end of all ſuch will be worſe than the beginning. Then his mouth was ſtopped, ſo that he had nothing to ſay.

All this time I ſtood the outſide of my door; for they would not let me go in. So I put on my ſhoes and my cloaths; then they put an harneſs about my arms made of a dog's ſlip, which rejoiced my heart that I was counted worthy to be bound for the name of God. So I took my leave of my wife and children, my father and other of my friends, never expecting to ſee them any more in this world. For it was ſo thought of all the country, that I ſhould not live ſix days after my apprehenſion; for they had ſo reported. But yet I knew it was not as they would, unleſs God would grant it; I know what God can do, but what he will do I know not; but I am ſure he will work all things for the beſt to them that love and fear him. So we drank and went our way, and came to Firle about three of the clock. And thus much touching the cauſes and effect of the troubles of Richard Woodman. Now let us ſee his examinations, which follow in this order.

On the 12th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1557, I was ſent from the ſheriffs to London, and afterwards on the 14th of the ſame month I was brought before the biſhop of Chicheſter, Dr. Story, and Dr. Cook. So the ſheriff's men delivered my warrant and me to the biſhop. Then the biſhop aſked me what my name was. My name (quoth I) is Richard Woodman.

Chicheſter. I am ſorry for you, and ſo are all the worſhipful men of your country. For it hath been reported to me, that you have been a man of good eſtimation of all the country, amongſt the poor and rich, till now of late. Wherefore look well upon yourſelf, your wife and children, your father, and other of your friends, and be ruled. Think not yourſelf wiſer than all the realm. Be informed, and you ſhall have the favour of them all, as much as ever you had.

Woodman. You have charged me with many things wherein I have never offended: as if you will give me leave, I will ſhew you.

Chicheſter. Yes, I pray you ſay your mind.

Woodman. May it pleaſe you, you have charged me as though I made myſelf wiſer than all the realm; God doth know, I ſtand to learn of every man that will or can teach me the truth. And whereas you ſay, I have been well eſteemed both of the poor and rich, God doth know, I know not that I have given any juſt offence, either to rich or poor. And as for my wife and children, God doth know how I love them in him, and my life alſo. My life, my wife and my children are all in God's hands, and I have them all as I had them not, I truſt, according to St. Paul's words. But if I had ten thouſand pounds of gold, I had rather forego it all, than them, if I might be in choice, and not diſpleaſe God.

Chicheſter. The ſheriff took pains to come to me out of love, which he bare to you as to himſelf, and ſaid you were deſirous to ſpeak with me.

Woodman. I thought it meet to appeal to mine ordinary. For they go about to ſhed my blood unrighteouſly. For they have laid many unjuſt things to my charge. Wherefore I thought it meet to appeal to you, that if you can find any fault in me meet to be reformed by God's word, I ſtand to be reformed; and likewiſe if my blood ſhall be ſhed unrighteouſly, that it might be required at your hands, becauſe you have taken upon you to be the phyſician of our country.

Story. Is not this a perverſe fellow, to lay to your charge, that his blood ſhall be required at your hands? Thinkeſt thou that thou ſhalt be put to death unjuſtly, that thy blood ſhould be required? No, if he ſhould condemn an hundred ſuch heretics as thou art. I helped to rid a good many of you: and I promiſe thee, I will help to rid thee too the beſt that I can.

Then I would have answered him, but the bishop desired us both to give him place.

Chichester. Well, neighbour Woodman, I call you neighbour, because you be one of my diocese; and you are sent to me that I should give you spiritual counsel: for I am your spiritual pastor. Therefore hear what I shall say to you.

Woodman. First, I desire you to hear me a few words. You have said, you will give me spiritual counsel: Be you sure that you have the Spirit of God?

Chichester. No, I am not sure of that.

Woodman. No! be you not sure of that?

Chichester. No, by St. Mary, I dare not be so bold to say so; I doubt of that.

Woodman. Then you be like the waves of the sea, as saith St. James, that be tossed about with the wind, and be unstable in all your ways, and can look for no good thing at the Lord's hand: Yea, ye are neither hot nor cold, and therefore God will spue you out of his mouth, as saith St. John.

Then they were in a great fury, especially Dr. Story, who said,

What a perverse fellow is this? He hath the devil within him, and is mad. He is worse than the devil. Now I perceive that it is true that is reported by thee, and it is the pride of all such heretics to boast themselves.

Chichester. Yea surely, he is sent to me to learn, and taketh upon him to teach me.

Woodman. The Jews said to Christ, he had the devil, and was mad, as you have said here by me. But I know the servant is not above his master. And God forbid that I should learn of him, who confesseth that he hath not the Spirit of God.

Chichester. Why, do you think that you have the Spirit of God?

Woodman. I believe verily that I have the Spirit of God.

Chichester. You boast more than ever Paul did, or any of the apostles, which is great presumption.

Woodman. I boast not in myself, but in the gift of God, as Paul did; for he said he believed verily that he had the Spirit of God, making thereof no doubt, in 1 Cor. 7.

Chichester. It is not so, you belye the text.

Woodman. If it be not so, let me be burnt to-morrow.

Story. Thou shalt not be burned to-morrow, but thou shalt be burned within these six days, I promise thee.

Chichester. If it be so, it is wrong translated, as it is in a thousand places more.

Then one looked in a Latin Testament, and another in a Greek Testament, and they said it was in them both that Paul supposed that he had the Spirit of God, but he was not sure.

Chichester. Even so I hope and suppose that I have the Spirit of God, but am not sure.

Woodman. If that place be wrong translated, and so many places of the Bible as you say, then I may say with Christ, it cannot be avoided but offences must be given; but woe unto them by whom they come. I may say, woe unto false translators; for cursed are they that add or take away. But take you heed that you belye not the translators. I believe they had the fear of God more before their eyes, than you report of them. And yet if that place be wrong translated, I can prove by places enough, that Paul had the Spirit of God, as I myself and all God's elect have.

Chichester. How prove you that?

Woodman. "No man can believe that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost," 1 Cor. 7. I do believe that Jesus Christ is my Redeemer, and that I shall be saved from all my sins by his death and blood-shedding, as Paul and all the apostles did; and as all faithful people ought to do; which no man can do without the Spirit of God. And as there is no damnation to them that are in Christ Jesus; so is there no salvation to them that are not in Christ Jesus. "For he that hath not the Spirit of Christ, is none of his, but is a cast-away," as he saith in the same text. And again, "We have not received the spirit of bondage to fear any more, but we have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba Father. The same Spirit certifieth our spirits, that we are the sons of God." Here are proofs enough that Paul was sure that he had the Spirit of God. Also St. John saith, "He that believeth not that Christ is come in the flesh, is an Antichrist, and denieth both the Father and the Son:" which is sin against the Holy Ghost, which shall never be forgiven in this world, nor in the world to come. Besides all this, "He that believeth in God, dwelleth in God, and God in him." So that it is impossible to believe in God, unless God dwell in us. O good God! what more injury can be done unto thee, than to mistrust that we have received thy Holy Spirit by thy gift? Thus may all men see their blindness, and whose servants they be, as they do declare themselves both by their words and deeds.

Story. O my lord, what an heretic is this same? Why hear you him? Send him to prison to his fellows in the Marshalsea, and they shall be dispatched within these twelve days.

When I heard him say so I rejoiced greatly in my heart, desiring God, if it were his will, to keep him in that mind: for I looked surely to have gone to the bishop of London's coal-house, or Lollard's-Tower: yea, I thought myself happy if I might have gone to Lollard's-Tower: but it pleased God to put in their hearts to send me to the Marshalsea amongst our brethren and my old fellow-prisoners. So mercifully hath God dealt with me in easing of my burden that I looked for.

And when they perceived that I feared not imprisonment, but rather rejoiced, as they well perceived, the bishop said, Methinks he is not afraid of the prison.

Woodman. No, I praise the living God.

Story. This is an heretic indeed. He hath the right terms of all heretics: The living God! I pray you be there dead gods that you say the living God?

Woodman. Be you angry with me, because I speak the words that are written in the Bible?

Story. Bibble babble, bibble babble. What speakest thou of the Bible, there is no such word written in all the Bible.

Woodman. Then I am much to blame if it be not so written. "Behold, for the offences that you have done, you shall be carried away captive by Nebuchodonosor to Babylon, and there ye shall be seven generations: and when you be there, you shall see gods of gold, of silver, of wood, and of stone, borne before you and behind you upon men's shoulders, to cast out a fear among the heathen. When you shall see all these abominations, then say in your heart: It is the living God that ought to be worshipped." Here I prove my saying true, both that there is a living God, and that there be dead gods. Also David saith in the psalms, "My soul hath a desire and longing to enter into the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh rejoice in the living God;" with divers other places that I could recite. Wherefore I marvel that you rebuke me for speaking the truth.

Chichester. I do not deny but it is written, and is the truth, and I know it as well as you; but such is the speech of all heretics.

Story. My lord, I will tell you how you shall know an heretic by his words, because I have been more used to them than you have been; that is, they will say [the Lord] and [we praise God] and [the living God.] By these words you shall know an heretic.

Woodman. All these words are written for our learning, and we are commanded by the prophets to use them daily, as this; "The Lord's name be praised from the riſing up of the ſun unto the going down of the ſame." Alſo, "As many as fear the Lord, ſay always the Lord be praiſed."

Story. My lord, ſend him to priſon, you ſhall do no good with him. I will go to church, and leave you here. This is an old heretic. Waſt thou never before me ere now?

Woodman. Yes forſooth, that I have.

Story. Yea, I thought ſo; and I ſent thee to the biſhop of London, and he releaſed thee, and thou promiſedſt him to be an honeſt man, and that thou wouldſt be of the true catholic church, which thou haſt not fulfilled.

Woodman. I promiſed him nothing but I have fulfilled it. No man is able to prove the contrary.

Story. Well, it will be tried well enough, My lord, I will take my leave, I fear you will do this man no good.

Chicheſter. I would not have you to uſe ſuch ſpeeches as you do, as, The Lord be praiſed, and The living God, with ſuch like words. Can you not ſay as well, Our Lord, or our God, as otherwiſe?

Woodman. I marvel why you ſhould reprove me for it, ſeeing they be the words of God. I do not refuſe to ſay, our God, or our Lord, when I talk of the ſcripture where it is written. If I ſhould, it muſt follow, that I denied the words of God, and muſt needs be an heretic; but I do not. Wherefore I marvel what you mean to find fault therein. It ſeemeth to me, that you miſtruſt that I believe not as you do.

Chicheſter. Yea, that is my meaning indeed.

Woodman. I believe in the living God, if you do not ſo, then our beliefs be not alike indeed. But if it pleaſe you to examine me upon any particular matter, now or at any other time, I will make anſwer thereto by God's help.

Chicheſter. Though you believe in God, I can prove you believe not as you ought to do, as I can ſhew you by your hand-writing. You have denied the catholic church. Wherefore he that erreth from the church, it cannot be ſaid that his faith is good. Wherefore be ruled by the church, from which ye have erred.

Woodman. I will not deny my hand by God's help. For I have written nothing at any time but the truth. There may be things written againſt me, reporting it to be mine, and yet be not: but my hand cannot well be counterfeited, there be enough that know my hand.

Chicheſter. Do you know it yourſelf if you ſee it?

Woodman. Yea, that I do.

Then he aroſe and fetched a great bundle of writings, and opened them, and bade me come ſee. I looked on them, and it was my hand indeed.

Chicheſter. How ſay you, is it not your own writing?

Woodman. Yes, ſurely it is.

Chicheſter. How ſay you to this, is not this your hand alſo?

Woodman. Yes, verily is it.

Chicheſter. Well, you know what it meaneth, I dare ſay.

Woodman. Yea, I know it very well; here is a great deal, which I had thought had been in my houſe, but I thank God that it is here: for in this you ſhall try whether it be true or not. For in this is contained all the talk that was betwixt the commiſſioners and me, when I was before them five times, and alſo before the biſhop of London divers times: and I am ſure, neither you nor they ſhall find any words falſe therein written: and I think the ſheriff's men, when they ſearched my houſe for me, when I was taken, found this, and carried it with them, but I never knew it before now. But I am not ſorry for it, but am rather glad: For herein you may ſee all the wrong that I received at their hands, and how long I was in priſon, and how I was toſſed up and down, and how I was delivered at length, and by this you may try whether it be ſo or not. I dare ſay they that found it, and they that brought it to you, had thought it would have turned me to diſpleaſure; but in very deed all things work for the beſt to them that fear God.

Chicheſter. Indeed, I find no great fault in this; but here is perillous gear, here is ſedition. This was ſet up upon the church door, you know it well enough.

Woodman. Indeed I wrote it to the prieſt, and to others that took upon them to fetch my child out of my houſe without my leave, and uſe it at their pleaſure, when they knew it was baptized already, as they were well certified before. Wherefore my conſcience compelled me to ſhew them my mind in writing, wherein is contained nothing but the ſcriptures of God, rebuking them for their folly.

Chicheſter. Yea, but it is terribly meant, and uncharitably. It is ſuch gear coupled together I promiſe you, as I never ſaw the like. But I promiſe you, I will make the beſt of it. And I proteſt before God, I would your ſhould do as well as mine own ſoul and body. Be contented to be reformed. God hath done his part on you. Caſt not yourſelf away. Remember your wife and children, and the poor that lack your occupying. Mean to follow your vocation. Remember that you are not called to be a teacher nor a preacher. St. Paul ſaith, "Let every man walk wherein he is called, and therein abide." Remember you are called to another vocation, for God's ſake walk therein. It is not your office to do as you have done. You might do as much good, by the report of worſhipful men, as any man might do in all the country by your example; and if you would follow the laws of the catholic church, it would be an occaſion to bring a great many into the true church, that are out, as you are.

Woodman. I would not that you ſhould ſay, that I am out of the church of God, for I am not, but do allow the church of God according to his word. Yea, if I were abroad, if I could win any into the true church, that be out, by any means that I could uſe, I ſhould be very glad. For God knoweth I love all people as myſelf. And where you ſay I have been a preacher, it is not ſo. I never took any ſuch thing upon me, as it is well known. But as for teaching I cannot deny; for it becometh every man to teach and inſtruct his houſhold in the fear of God, and all others (as far as he can) that deſire it of him. And whereas you have blamed me for reading the ſcripture, and leaving my vocation (as you ſay); I left not my vocation in reading the ſcripture, for I truſt I followed my vocation the better for it. And the greateſt cauſe that I was compelled to read the ſcriptures, was, becauſe the preachers and teachers were ſo changeable.

Chicheſter. No! Did you not preach at a fair?

Woodman. No ſurely, but it was ſo reported. I was at a fair indeed. While I was in priſon, I had leave of the council to go home to pay my debts, and then I went to a fair to ſell cattle, and there I met with divers poor men that I had ſet to work, who lovingly aſked me how I did, and how I could away with impriſonment. And I ſhewed them how God had dealt with me, and how he would deal with all them that put their truſt in him; and this they called preaching. And ſince that it hath been reported that I have baptized children, and married folks, which I never did; for I never was a miniſter. Wherefore if I had ſo done, I had done contrary to the order of the apoſtles, as God forbid I ſhould.

Chicheſter. I am well paid if you be faultleſs in theſe things: for I have heard the contrary.

Woodman. I have ſhewed you the truth, and that no man living ſhall be able to prove the contrary.

Chicheſter. You ſaid you do not diſallow the true catholic church.

Woodman. No, that I do not.

Chicheſter.

Chicheſter. Why do you not then go to the church? You come not there, it is informed me.

Woodman. I truſt I am in the true church every day. But to tell you the truth, I come not at the church where the moſt do reſort. For if I ſhould, I ſhould offend, and be offended: for the laſt time that I was there, I offended many, and was offended myſelf. Wherefore, for conſcience ſake I would not come there. For I was ſent to priſon for my coming there, and now I am ſent to you for biding thence. So they will not be pleaſed any way with me, for they ſeek my life. Wherefore look you to it, for I am now in your hands, and you ought to be an houſe of defence againſt mine enemies. For if you ſuffer them to kill me, my blood ſhall be required at your hands. If you can find any juſt cauſe in me worthy of death by God's word, you may condemn me yourſelf, and not offend God: wherefore look to it, the matter is weighty, deliver me not into their hands, and think ſo to be diſcharged.

Chicheſter. I tell you truth, I can do little in the matter. For I have not full authority as yet of mine office: but I will ſend for you, and talk with you, if I wiſt I ſhould do you any good.

Woodman. I would be glad to talk with you, and to ſhew you my mind in any thing that you ſhall demand of me, now, or at any other time.

So then he deſired the ſheriff's men to tarry and dine with him; that this man (ſaid he) may dine with me alſo: for it may be he may have no great ſtore of meat whither he ſhall go.

So we tarried to dinner with him, and had no further talk, neither how to prove where the true church of God is, nor of the ſacraments, nor of any other thing pertaining to me-ward, not for the ſpace of two hours or more: but he entered in talk with me, how I underſtood many ſcriptures, and for biſhops and prieſts marriages, and whether Paul had a wife, or not. To whom I anſwered, It is a thing that I have little to do with, as concerning marriages: but I am very well content to talk with you in the matter, as far as my poor learning will ſerve. So when he had talked with me of divers ſcriptures, he liked my talk well. He aſked me how I ſaid by St. Paul, whether he were married or not? to whom I anſwered, I can prove by the ſcriptures that he was never married.

Chicheſter. How prove you that?

Woodman. I will prove it well enough by God's help. But yet I will prove that Paul might have had a wife, as well as the other apoſtles had.

Chicheſter. Why, had the apoſtles wives?

Woodman. Yes, all, ſaving Paul and Barnabas, as I underſtand it. For theſe are Paul's words in the ninth chapter of the firſt to the Corinthians; "Am I not an apoſtle? am I not free? have I not ſeen Jeſus Chriſt? are not ye my work in the Lord? and if I be not an apoſtle to others, yet to you I am an apoſtle; for you are the ſeal of mine apoſtleſhip in the Lord. Mine anſwer to them that aſk me is this; Have we not power to eat and to drink? either have we not power to lead about a ſiſter to wife, as well as the other apoſtles have, and as the brethren of the Lord? either have not Barnabas and I power thus to do?" So this text proveth, that Paul and Barnabas were unmarried. But Paul declareth, that the reſt had wives, and that they had power likewiſe ſo to have, but they found no need thereof. But Paul declareth in the ſeventh chapter of the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians, that he that hath no power over his fleſh, may marry: "For it is better to marry than to burn. Wherefore to avoid fornication (ſaith he) let every man have his wife." He ſaith, "Let every man have his wife, and every woman her huſband." By this place of ſcripture I underſtand, that biſhops and prieſts may have wives, becauſe they are men, rather than burn, or commit fornication. But I think verily he that can abſtain, having power of his own will, doth beſt; but if he marrieth he ſinneth not.

So then he debated the ſcriptures with me divers ways, that a biſhop or a prieſt ought not to have a wife: but I proved by divers ſcriptures both in the old law and in the new, that women were at firſt made for the help of men, which was ſpoken generally to all men. Wherefore (ſaid I) every man may have a woman, and ſin not, in honeſt matrimony, as well biſhops and deacons, as other men, which you call prieſts, if they be true miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt, and of that order that biſhops and deacons were in Paul's time. For Paul declareth to Timothy, firſt and the third, "That a biſhop ſhould be the huſband of one wife," and how they ſhould be honeſtly apparelled, and how they ſhould bring up their children, and likewiſe the deacons. This (ſaid I) proveth more plainly, that both biſhops and deacons had wives in the apoſtles time; which he could not deny. But then he alledged, that no biſhop nor prieſt might take a wife, after he had taken upon him that office, but if he had a wife before he took the office, tried meet for the purpoſe of his life, and for his learning, he might keep his wife, and bring up his children according to St. Paul's meaning to Timothy, or elſe might they have no wives.

Then ſaid I, I think Paul's meaning in that place, was, that a man that hath had two wives might not be made a biſhop nor a deacon, if he had never ſo much learning. But that place maketh not that a biſhop or a deacon may not marry, after they be made biſhops and deacons. For I am ſure that Paul was in the ſtate of a biſhop, when he ſaid, "He had power to lead about a ſiſter to wife, as well as the other apoſtles had." Here Paul declares, that it was in his power to have a wife, after he had the office of a biſhop, which was not in his power, if he had been forbidden of God.

Thus have I ſhewed you my mind in this behalf, both of Paul, and alſo for the marriages of biſhops and prieſts, as I underſtand the ſcriptures. Howbeit, it is a thing which I have little to do withal: but as you required me to ſay my mind in that matter, ſo I have done.

Chicheſter. Marry, I am glad that you have ſaid as you have done. Many do affirm boldly, that Paul had a wife, and yet cannot prove whether he had or had not, by the ſcriptures: but you have ſaid very well. I am glad that ye are contented to be ruled by God's word. And if you will be contented likewiſe in other matters, no doubt you ſhall do well; therefore gentle goodman Woodman, be ruled. God hath given you a good wit. I proteſt before God, I would you ſhould do as well as mine own ſoul and body, and ſo would (I dare ſay) all the worſhipful men in the country, as they have reported to me.

Woodman. Why, my lord, I take God to record (whom I truſt to ſerve) that I would be as glad to live in reſt and peace, as any man in the world, if I might. And I ſtand to learn, and am contented to be reformed of any thing that I hold, if it can be proved that it be not agreeable to God's word. And the truth is ſo, I have talked with a dozen prieſts at the leaſt, ſince I was delivered out of priſon, of certain matters, and they have not been able to certify me in any thing that I have aſked them: and therefore they have complained on me to the ſheriff, and juſtices, making tales and lyes on me, to turn me to diſpleaſure, as much as in them lieth. I promiſe you, there be as many unlearned prieſts in your dioceſe, as in any one dioceſe in England I think; the more it is to be lamented.

Chicheſter. I promiſe you, I do much lament it myſelf: for I hear ſay no leſs, but it is true what you ſay. I would I could remedy it, but I cannot: but I will do the beſt that I can, when I come into the country, and I will be glad to talk with you ſome other time, when I am ſomewhat better at eaſe. You ſee I am very tender now, as I have been this half year or more. Come to dinner: our dinner is ready. I cauſed you not to tarry for any great cheer that you ſhall have, nor would I you ſhould think that I go about to win you with my meat. But you be welcome with all my heart. Come ſit down.

Woodman. I thanked him, and went to dinner; and there dined with him a merchant man, one of the ſheriff's men, and I, and no more, and we had good cheer, God be praiſed therefore. We had no talk of the ſcriptures all the dinner while; but when dinner was done, the biſhop ſaid, Chicheſter. Now call Mr. Story's man. For the commiſſioners have committed you to priſon: but I will ſend for you before it be long, and I pray God I may do you good. I would be very glad of it.

Woodman. If it pleaſe you to ſend for me, I would be very glad to talk with you, for I like your talk well. And then if it pleaſe your lordſhip to examine me upon any particular matter, I will ſhew you my mind therein, by God's grace, without diſſimulation. But I pray you let me have nothing to do with Mr. Story, for I think he is a man without reaſon.

Chicheſter. Well, before you go, how ſay you to the ſeven ſacraments? Let me hear what you ſay to them, that I may be the more willing to ſend for you again?

Woodman. I know not ſeven ſacraments.

Chicheſter. Then what ſhall I talk with you? How many do you know?

Woodman. I know but two; one the ſacrament of baptiſm, and the other the ſupper of the Lord. But if you can juſtly prove by God's word, that there be more than two, I ſtand to be reformed.

Chicheſter, If I prove not ſeven by God's word, then believe me not: and ſo he bade me farewel.

Then the ſheriff's two men, and one of Dr. Story's men, carried me to Dr. Cook's houſe, which Dr. Cook commanded them to carry me to the ſheriff's priſon in Southwark, ſaying, He ſhall be called before us again ſhortly, and all his fellows, and we ſhall diſpatch them from troubling the country any more.

And ſo I was brought to the Marſhalſea, where I now am merry (God be praiſed therefore) looking for judgment of my fleſh: for they intend to diſpatch me ſhortly, if God will give them leave: but God hath their hearts in his hands, and they can do nothing to me, but as God will give them leave. Wherefore I commit my cauſe to God only, and I am ſure there ſhall not one hair of my head periſh, without my heavenly Father's will, although I bide never ſo much trouble. Job periſhed not for all his trouble, although God gave the devil leave to trouble and try him divers and many ways, as God hath ſuffered his members to trouble and try me divers and many ways, I praiſe God. They ſhall as little prevail againſt my faith (I have no miſtruſt) as the devil prevailed againſt Job, whatſoever they do with my goods, life, or body. For he that kept Job in all his trouble, neither ſlumbereth nor ſleepeth, but keepeth me, and all his elect, that whether we live or die, it ſhall be to the praiſe and glory of God. For if we live, we live at the Lord's will, and if we die, we die to the Lord's will; ſo, whether we live or die, we are the Lord's, therefore bleſſed be his name.

Wherefore, dear brethren and ſiſters, to whom this my writing ſhall come, be of good cheer, and fear not what man can do unto you. For they can but kill the body: but fear him that hath power to kill both body and ſoul. And yet once again I bid you be of good cheer. For the ſheriff, with divers other gentlemen and prieſts, whilſt I was at the ſheriff's houſe, ſaid to me, that all the heretics in the country hung on me, as the people did in times paſt on St. Auguſtine, or St. Ambroſe, or ſuch like. Wherefore, ſaid they, look well on it, you have a great thing to anſwer for. To the which I anſwered, I pray God lay nothing more to my charge, than he will do for hereſy, as I am ſure he will not. For he hath ſet my ſins as far from me, as it is from the eaſt to the weſt: ſo that I am ſure they ſhall never come near to me any more. Yea, and that they call hereſy, we ſerve God withal. And I am ſure there is no man nor woman that hangeth on me, but on God. But yet that is their imaginations and thoughts, that if they might win me to them, they ſhould win a great many likewiſe; and thinking to kill me, if they cannot win me, as I truſt in God, and am ſure they ſhall never by God's grace, if it were poſſible for them to kill me ten times. For I am ſo linked to Chriſt in a chain by faith, that it is impoſſible for men to looſe us aſunder, neither for life nor death, I praiſe my Lord God therefore. And no doubt their full intent and purpoſe is to kill me, thinking thereby to make others afraid. Which death of my body were beſt of all for me, if God were ſo pleaſed. But if I may live for the comfort of others, his name be praiſed therefore: I know what he can do; but what he will do I know not. But if death be offered me, ſo that I cannot refuſe it without diſpleaſing of God, I truſt in God I ſhall not offend my brethren in receiving of death, but ſhall be rather an occaſion of the ſtrengthening of their faith, by chooſing and receiving of it, and that with joy. For as Chriſt hath given his life for us, ſo ought we to give our lives for the defence of the goſpel, and comfort of our brethren. And whereas the biſhop ſaith he will prove ſeven ſacraments, be you out of doubt he ſhall never be able to do it, no more than he hath proved other arguments with me already.

Thus fare ye well, from the Marſhalſea, where I now am, as a ſheep appointed to be ſlain, God be praiſed therefore.

The ſecond Examination of Richard Woodman before the Biſhop of Chicheſter, two of his Chaplains, and Dr. Story, on April 27.

FIRST, I was ſent to the Marſhalſea by Dr. Story, and was carried to his houſe, near to St. Nicholas Shambles; and when I had ſpoken to him, he ſent me to the biſhop of Chicheſter, and ſaid he would come to him himſelf ſtraightway: and when we were in the biſhop's hall, we had not tarried long but the biſhop ſent for me; and when I came before him, I did my duty to him.

Then ſaid the biſhop, You are welcome; how do you now?

Woodman. Well, I praiſe God, thanking your lordſhip for the gentle talk that you had with me at my laſt departing from you.

Chicheſter. Well, goodman Woodman, I have ſent for you of love and good will, to talk with you, and would have you to tell me your mind in few words. For indeed the laſt time that I talked with you, our talk was ſo long, that I fell into a great drought thereby, and have been the worſe in my body ever ſince. Wherefore I pray you ſhew me your mind briefly in thoſe particular matters that I ſhall demand of you, according to the promiſe that you made the laſt time you were with me. How ſay you, will you?

Woodman. Yea, forſooth, I will anſwer to any thing that you ſhall demand of me (by God's help) as well as I can.

Chicheſter. How ſay you by the ſeven ſacraments? for there we left off, and there we will begin again. You ſaid then there were but two. How ſay you now to it? will you deny all except two?

Woodman. I ſay now as I ſaid then. You ſaid, there be ſeven ſacraments; and I ſaid, I knew but two: but if you could prove ſeven by God's word, when I came before you again, I muſt needs grant them. And you ſaid, if you could not prove them by God's word, I ſhould not believe them: and now I am come to ſee how well you can prove them.

At which words the biſhop and his chaplains were moved.

Chicheſter. By God, and by troth, I believe he thinketh I cannot prove them. How ſay you to the ſacrament of matrimony?

Woodman. Why, my lord, St. Paul ſaith to Timothy, A biſhop ſhould be faultleſs, and you uſe much ſwearing, which is a great fault of a biſhop of all others, that ſhould be an example to the flock.

Then the biſhop and his prieſts were in a great rage with me, becauſe I reproved him for his ſwearing.

Chicheſter. What, I perceive this man is worſe than he was the laſt day: what, he taketh upon him to teach me to ſpeak, as though I could not tell what I had to do.

Prieſt. So methinketh, my lord, he is a ſtout fellow indeed, as we have ſeen.

Woodman. Yes, I am ſtout, becauſe I do what I am commanded. I dare not for my life hold my peace; for I ſhould bear your ſin, which I will not do for any of you all, I tell you plainly.

Chicheſter. Where find you that you are commanded to reprove me?

Woodman. "If thou ſee thy brother ſin, reprove him; if he repent, thou haſt won thy brother." But you repent it not, but rather go about to maintain the ſame. Chriſt ſaith, "He that breaketh one of the leaſt of my commandments, and teacheth men ſo, ſhall be called leaſt in the kingdom of heaven;" and you go about to teach men ſo, ſo far as I ſee.

Prieſt. Why, my lord, this man is paſt cure. I ſee no hope in him.

Chicheſter. No, ſo methinketh. I will never talk with him more. Go call Mr. Story; let him do with him what he will. He hath been with his fellows in the Marſhalſea, and now he is worſe than he was before. I had ſome hope in him the other day, but now I ſee none.

Woodman. No, I praiſe God, my faith hangeth upon no men, but upon God.

Prieſt. Nay, my lord, I think he is not the worſe for them: but I fear me they be the worſe for him; I know this man of old, before mine old lord.

Woodman. Well, my lord, look well to it: will you deliver me to other men to ſhed my blood, and ſo think to waſh your hands of me, as Pilate did by Chriſt? Nay, you cannot be ſo diſcharged.

Chicheſter. I have nothing to do with you: but of my gentleneſs I have ſent for you, becauſe you ſaid, you would declare your mind in any particular matter I would demand of you.

Woodman. Why, I do not deny but I will do ſo, if you do demand it of me. But you go about to deliver me to others to kill me: and I know there is none that hath to do with me but you.

Chicheſter. I am not yet conſecrated: wherefore my lord cardinal may examine you, and condemn you, or my lord of London: for you are now in his dioceſe.

Woodman. Yea, my lord, is the matter even ſo? Then I perceive whereabout you go. Nay, I will talk no more with you then, if you be at that point. Ask me what you will, but I will ſhew you nothing of my mind. I promiſe you I will not anſwer in particular matters, and ſo you to accuſe me to others, and they to kill me.

Chicheſter. I go not about to kill you, but would be glad to hear your mind in the ſacraments, and if you underſtand them not aright, I would be glad with all my heart to ſhew you my mind how I underſtand them. For I would tell you you ſhould do as well as mine own ſelf.

Woodman. If you would talk with me to do me good, I would be contented to hear you, and ſhew you my mind; otherwiſe I would be loth.

Chicheſter. Nay, I will promiſe you, if I can do you no good, I will do you no harm: for if I meant to do you harm, I would lay your own hand-writing againſt you, but I will not: wherefore be in no doubt of me. How ſay you to the ſacrament of matrimony? is it a ſacrament or no? How think you by it?

Woodman. I think it is an holy inſtitution, ordained of God in paradiſe, and ſo to continue to the world's end.

Chicheſter. Lo, now you ſhall ſee how you be deceived in that, as you be in all the reſt. Come hither. You can read Latin, I am ſure.

Woodman. Yea, I can read Latin, but I underſtand very little.

Chicheſter. Come to me, you ſhall ſee that Paul calleth it an holy ſacrament. For theſe be the words, "For this cauſe ſhall a man leave father and mother, and ſhall be joined to his wife: and two ſhall be made one fleſh;" This is a great ſacrament.

Woodman. I remember ſuch a ſaying, but St. Paul calleth it not a ſacrament. But he ſaith, "it is a great myſtery."

Chicheſter. Where ſaith he ſo?

Woodman. I am not ſure in what text it is, but I am ſure theſe be St. Paul's words, and that he calleth it not a ſacrament in all his writings.

Chicheſter. What, the laſt day ye were full of ſcriptures; here it is written, and there it is written; what, we can rehearſe the ſcriptures as well as you; wherefore, if we be ſure it is written, it is no great matter for the place. Come hither, I will ſhew you the place, I think, that you mean.

I looked, and it was written Sacramentum. I know it is a great myſtery, in the Engliſh tranſlation.

Chicheſter. I permit it to be a myſtery. What is a myſtery?

Woodman. A myſtery is (as I take it) unſeen; for he ſaith, he ſpeaketh betwixt Chriſt and the congregation: ſo the great myſtery that he ſpeaketh of, I take to be the faith of them that be married, which is hid in Chriſt, which we ſee not, but Chriſt. But the deed which is in the congregation, which is the outward marriage we ſee, but the inward part of the marriage of the heart we ſee not. Wherefore Paul calleth it a myſtery. And therefore if it be a ſacrament, it is inviſible to us: it is not ſeen, as other ſacraments be.

Chicheſter. Nay, I tell you it is a viſible ſacrament, ſeen as the others be: for is not the marriage ſeen? is not the man and woman ſeen?

Woodman. My lord, I pray you, what is a ſacrament?

Chicheſter. It it a ſign of a holy thing.

Woodman. Methinks you have certified me very well. There need not be a ſign of a holy thing, where the holy thing is itſelf.

Then his chaplains would have interrupted me, but I deſired my Lord I might ſay out my mind in the matter. So with much ado he bade me ſay what I could.

There need not be a ſign of a thing, where the thing is itſelf. Matrimony is an holy thing itſelf, and is ended outwardly, and need no more ſigns but themſelves; wherefore it cannot be a ſacrament as others be.

Chicheſter. Lo, how much you ſpeak againſt yourſelf. And for example, I come by an hoſier, and there hangeth a pair of hoſe, which be hoſe, and be a ſign of hoſe that be to ſell within.

Prieſt. How ſay you to this? Now my lord hath hit you home indeed.

Woodman. He hath hit me perilouſly, I tell you, with ſophiſtry to blind mine eyes withal. I marvel you are not all aſhamed of it. I can anſwer that to all your ſhames, if I might be juſtly heard, I tell you plainly.

Prieſt. What, you are angry, methinks.

Woodman. I am not angry, but I am in earneſt, I tell you, to ſee your blindneſs and folly. I talked of the ſcriptures that be written, and it is God's word, to prove my matter true by, and you will prove your matter true by a pair of hoſe. And you can as well prove it by that, as by God's word.

Prieſt. Why is there nothing true but what is written in the bible?

Woodman. St. Paul ſaith to the Galatians, chapter 1. "If an angel come from heaven, and preach any other doctrine than may be proved from God's word, hold him accurſed:" and ſo do I. I tell you plainly.

Prieſt. Here is a Teſtament in mine hand, if I hurl it in the fire, and burn it, have I burned God's word, or not? I will buy a new one for ſixteen pence.

Woodman. I ſay you have burned God's word, and I believe he that will burn a Teſtament willingly, would burn God himſelf, if he were here, if he could; for he and his word are all one.

Then they made a great laughing at him.

Woodman. Laugh on. Your laughing will be turned to weeping, and all ſuch joy will be turned to mourning, if you repent it not with ſpeed.

Then the biſhop began to cloak the prieſt's folly, ſaying, Why if my counting-houſe were full of books, and if my houſe ſhall be on fire by chance, and ſo burned, were God's word burned?

Woodman. No, my lord, becauſe they were burned againſt your will: but if you ſhould burn them willingly, and think it well, and not be ſorry for it, you burn God's word as well as he. For he that is not ſorry for a ſhrewd turn, doth allow it to be good.

Chicheſter. Follow your vocation; you have a little learning. "We have an altar whereof you may not eat." What meaneth St. Paul thereby?

Woodman. There is no man ſo fooliſh to eat ſtones, I ſuppoſe.

Chicheſter. What mockers and ſcorners be you, to ſay, no man will be ſo fooliſh to eat ſtones? it is a plain mock.

Woodman. Why, my lord, you ſaid I had no learning, nor knowledge, nor underſtanding: wherefore it becometh you to make things more plain to me, and not to aſk me ſuch dark queſtions, and yet blame me too; methinks it is too much.

Chicheſter. I dare ſay you know what it meaneth well enough. The greateſt fool in my houſe will underſtand my meaning better than you do.

There ſtood ſome of his men at at diſtance, talking together by a window. He called one of them by his name.

Chicheſter. Come hither, I ſay to thee, thou ſhalt not eat of this table. What do I mean thereby?

Chicheſter's man. Forſooth, my lord, you would not have me eat of this table, laying his hand thereon.

With this anſwer he made all them in the houſe to fall on laughing, and I could not hold it in, but burſt out with laughter, and ſaid.

Woodman. He hath expounded the matter almoſt as well as I.

Chicheſter. He meaneth well enough, if you would underſtand him.

Anſwer me again to make it more plain. I ſay to thee thou ſhalt not eat of this table. What mean I thereby?

Chicheſter's man. Forſooth, you would not have me eat this table.

Theſe words made them all laugh, wherewith the biſhop was almoſt angry, becauſe the anſwer proved no better, and ſaid, Chicheſter. He meaneth that I would not have him eat any of the meat that is ſet upon this table. How ſayſt thou, doſt thou not mean ſo?

Chicheſter's man. Yes forſooth, my lord, this was my meaning indeed.

Woodman. Yea, my lord, now you have told him what you mean, he can ſay ſo too: and ſo could I have done (as little wit as I have) if you had ſaid, Paul meant that no man ſhould eat of that which was offered upon the altar, but the prieſts.

Chicheſter. Yea, I perceive you underſtand the meaning of Paul well enough, but that you liſt to cavil with me.

Woodman. Why, my lord, do you think I underſtand ſuch dark places of the ſcripture without learning? You ſaid even now, I had no knowledge nor learning, wherefore I anſwered you as you judged of me.

Chicheſter. Well, let this matter paſs, and let us turn to the principal again. How ſay you by the ſacrament of the altar?

Woodman. You mean the ſacrament of the body and blood of Jeſus Chriſt.

Chicheſter. I mean the ſacrament of the altar, and ſo I ſay.

Woodman. You mean Chriſt to be the altar, do you not?

Chicheſter. I mean the ſacrament of the altar in the church. What is it ſo ſtrange to you?

Woodman. It is ſtrange to me indeed, if you mean the altar of ſtone.

Chicheſter. It is that altar that I mean.

Woodman. I underſtand not the altar ſo.

Chicheſter. No, I think ſo indeed: and that is the cauſe that you be deceived. I pray you, how do you underſtand the altar then?

Woodman. If you will give me leave till I have done, I will ſhew you how I underſtand the altar, and where it is.

Chicheſter. Yes, you ſhall have leave to ſay your mind, as much as you will.

Woodman. It is written, Matt. 18. "That whereſoever two or three be gathered together in Chriſt's name, there is he in the midſt among them: and whatſoever they aſk the Father upon earth, it ſhall be granted them in heaven." Agreeing to the fifth of Matthew, ſaying, "When thou comeſt to offer thy gift at the altar, and there remembereſt that thy brother hath ought againſt thee, leave there thy offering, and go firſt and be reconciled to thy brother, and then offer thy gift." The prieſts would have interrupted, but the biſhop bade them let me alone, for (ſaid he) you ſhall hear a pretty concluſion anon.

I pray you let me make an end, quoth I, and then find fault with me, if you can. Now to the matter. In theſe two places of ſcripture I prove that Chriſt is the true altar, whereon every chriſtian man and woman ought to come and offer their gifts. Firſt, whereſoever the people are gathered together in Chriſt's name, there is he in the midſt; and where he is, there is the altar, ſo that we may be bold to come and offer our gift, if we be in love and charity: if we be not, we muſt leave there our offering, and go firſt and be reconciled to our brother, and agree with him quickly, and ſo forth, and then come and offer our gift. Some will ſay, How ſhall I agree with mine adverſary, when he is not nigh by an hundred miles? May I not pray till I have ſpoken with him? To all ſuch I anſwer; If thou doſt preſume to pray among the faithful, wiſhing any evil to any man, woman, or child, thou aſkeſt vengeance upon thyſelf. For no ſuch asketh any thing elſe of the Lord in his prayer. Wherefore agree with thine adverſary, that is, make thy life agreeable to God's word. Say in thy heart without diſſimulation, that thou askeſt God and all the world forgiveneſs from the bottom of thy heart, intending never to offend them any more. Then all ſuch may be bold to come and offer their gift, their prayer on the altar, where the people of God are gathered together. Thus have I ſhewed you my mind, both of the altar and of the offering, as I underſtand it.

Chicheſter. Do you underſtand the offering and the altar ſo? I never heard any man underſtand it ſo, no not Luther, the great heretic, that was condemned by a general council, and his picture burned.

Woodman. If he were an heretic, I think he underſtood it not ſo indeed; but I am ſure all chriſtians ought to underſtand it ſo.

Chicheſter. O what vain-glory is in you, as though you underſtood all things, and other men nothing? Hear me, me; I will ſhew you the true underſtanding both of the altar, and the offering on the altar. "We have an altar (ſaid Paul, Heb. 13.) that ye may not eat of." Meaning thereby, that no man might eat of that which was offered on the altar, but the prieſt. For in Paul's time all the living that the prieſt had, the people came and offered it on the altar, money or other things: and when the people came to offer it, and then remembered that they had any thing againſt their brother, then they left their offering upon the altar, and went and were reconciled to their brother; and they came again and offered their gift, and the prieſt had it. This is the true underſtanding of the place that you have rehearſed; wherefore you be deceived.

Woodman. My lord, that was the uſe in the old law. Chriſt was the end of that. But indeed I perceive by Paul's words, the ſacrifice was offered in Paul's time: yet that maketh not that was well done, but he rebuked it. Wherefore it ſeemeth to me that you be deceived.

Chicheſter. Who ſhall be judges betwixt us in this matter?

Woodman. The 12th of John declareth who ſhall be judge in the laſt day.

Chicheſter. You mean the word ſhall judge the word, how can that be!

Woodman. St. Peter ſaith, "The ſcripture hath no private interpretation;" but one ſcripture muſt be underſtood by another.

Chicheſter. You will underſtand it one way, I will underſtand it another way; and who ſhall be judge betwixt us then?

Woodman. The true church of God is able to diſcuſs all doubts: to whom I refer it.

Chicheſter. I am glad you ſay ſo, if you will ſay ſo indeed.

Woodman. My lord, I never meant otherwiſe.

Chicheſter. The church of God doth allow the ſacrament of the altar.

Woodman. What do you now offer upon the altar?

Chicheſter. We offer up in the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, the body of Chriſt to pacify the wrath of God the Father; and therewith they all put off their caps to the abominable idol.

Woodman. St. Paul ſaith to the Hebrews, in the 10th chapter, "We are ſanctified by offering of the body of Jeſus Chriſt upon the croſs once for all: and every prieſt is daily miniſtering, and oftentimes offereth one manner of offering, which can never take away ſins; and that is the offering that you uſe to offer. As far as I can ſee, you be prieſts after the order of Aaron, that offered up ſacrifice for their own ſins, and the ſins of the people.

Chicheſter. Nay, Aaron's ſacrifice was with blood, which ſignifieth the death of Chriſt, the which was ended upon the croſs by his blood-ſhedding; but we are prieſts after the order of Melchiſedech, which offereth bread to the king in remembrance, and ſignifieth the giving of Chriſt's body in bread and wine at the laſt ſupper, which he gave to his diſciples, and commanded it to be uſed to the end of the world. This is the ſacrifice that we offer, according to his word.

Woodman. I think you have made the matter very plain to me, that as Chriſt was the end of all ſacrifices, ſo was he the beginning of the ſacraments, willing them to be uſed in remembrance of him, to the world's end.

Chicheſter. What, in remembrance of him, and not himſelf, as his word ſaith, "Take, eat, this is my body;" it is not the ſign only, but the thing itſelf. How ſay you? is it not his body, after the words are ſpoken by the prieſt? how ſay you? go briefly to work, for I cannot long tarry with you.

Woodman. My lord, if you will anſwer me to one ſacrament, I will anſwer you to another.

Chicheſter. Yes, I am very well content with that.

Woodman. If you ſay the words of baptiſm over the water, and there be no child there, is there true baptiſm?

Chicheſter. No, there muſt be the water, the word, and the child, and then it is baptiſm.

Woodman. Very well. Then if a child be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, it is not truly baptized.

Chicheſter. No: the child muſt be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, or elſe it is not truly baptized.

Woodman. Then there may be nothing added, nor taken away from the ſacraments; may there?

Chicheſter. No, ſaid the biſhop.

Woodman. Now my lord, I will anſwer to you, if it pleaſe you.

Chicheſter. Well, how ſay you, "Take, eat, this is my body;" is it not Chriſt's body, as ſoon as the words be ſaid?

Woodman. My lord, I will anſwer you by your own words, that you anſwered me, which is true; the water, the word, and the child, all theſe together make baptiſm; the bread, wine, and the word make the ſacrament; and the eater, eating in true faith, maketh it his body. Here I prove it is not Chriſt's body, but to the faithful receiver. For he ſaid, "Take, eat, this is my body."

He called it not his body before eating, but after eating. And St. Auguſtine ſaith, Believe and thou haſt eaten. And St. John ſaith, "He that believeth in God, dwelleth in God, and God in him:" Wherefore it is impoſſible to dwell in God, and to eat his body, without a true faith.

Prieſt. Then the faith of the receiver maketh it his body; and not his word, by your ſaying. I pray you what did Judas eat?

Woodman. Judas did eat the ſacrament of Chriſt, and the devil withal.

Prieſt. He eat the body of Chriſt unworthily, as St. Paul ſaith.

Woodman. Nay, St. Paul ſaith no ſuch thing. He ſpeaketh not of eating of his body unworthily, but of the ſacrament unworthily. For he ſaith, "Whoſoever eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily, eateth and drinketh his own damnation, becauſe he maketh no difference of the Lord's body;" and not becauſe he eateth the Lord's body. If Judas had eat Chriſt's body, it muſt needs follow, that Judas is ſaved. For Chriſt ſaith in the 6th of John, "Whoſoever eateth my fleſh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raiſe him up again at the laſt day."

Prieſt. My lord, this man is an interpreter after his own mind.

Chicheſter. I ſee it is but folly to talk with you; it is but loſt labour. How ſay you? do you not believe that after the words be ſaid, there remaineth neither bread nor wine, but the very body of Chriſt really? make me a plain anſwer, for I will talk no more with you.

Woodman. I will make you a direct anſwer, how I believe of the true ſacrament. I do believe, that if I come to receive the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt truly miniſtered, believing that Chriſt was born for me, and that he ſuffered death for me, and that I ſhall be ſaved from my ſins by his blood-ſhedding, and ſo receive the ſacrament in that remembrance, then I believe I do receive wholly Chriſt, God and man, myſtically by faith: this is my belief.

Chicheſter. Why, then it is no body without faith; God's word is of no force, as you count it?

Woodman. My lord, I have told you my mind without diſſimulation, and more you get not of me, without you will talk with me by the ſcriptures: and if you will do ſo, I will begin anew with you, and prove it more plainly three or four manner of ways, that you ſhall not ſay nay to that I have ſaid, yourſelf.

Then

Then they made a great laughing, and ſaid, this is an heretic indeed, it is time he were burned. Which words moved my ſpirit, and I ſaid to them, Judge not, leſt you be judged. For as you judge me, you ſhall be judged yourſelves. For that you call hereſy, I ſerve God truly with, as you all ſhall well know, when you ſhall be in hell, and have blood to drink, and ſhall be compelled to ſay for pain, This was the man that we jeſted on, and whoſe talk we thought fooliſhneſs, and his end to be without honour: but now we may ſee how he is counted among the ſaints of God, and we are puniſhed. Theſe words ſhall you ſay, being in hell, if you repent not with ſpeed, if you conſent to the ſhedding of my blood: wherefore look to it, I give you counſel.

Prieſt. What, you are angry, methinks. Now I will ſay more to you than I thought to have done. You were at Baxill a twelvemonth ago, and ſent for the parſon, and talked with him in the church-yard, and would not go into the church; for you ſaid it was the idol's temple. Yea, I was with mine old lord, when he came to the King's-bench to you, and you ſaid many ſtout words to him.

Woodman. That I ſaid, I ſaid, and where you ſaid I was angry, I take God to my record, I am not, but am zealous in the truth, and ſpeak out of the Spirit of God with chearfulneſs.

Prieſt. The Spirit of God? hough, hough, hough: think you that you have the Spirit of God?

Woodman. I believe ſurely that I have the Spirit of God, I praiſe God for it; and you be deceivers, mockers, and ſcorners before God, and be the children of hell, all the ſort of you, as far as I can ſee. And therewith came in Dr. Story, pointing at me with his finger, ſpeaking to the biſhop in Latin, ſaying at length.

Story. I can ſay nothing to him, but he is an heretic. I have heard you talk this hour and a half, and can hear no reaſon in him.

Woodman. Judge not, leſt you be judged: for as you judge, you ſhall be judged yourſelf.

Story. What, be you a preaching? you ſhall preach at a ſtake ſhortly with your fellows. My lord, trouble yourſelf no more with him.

With theſe words, one brought word that the abbot of Weſtminſter was come to dine with the biſhop, and many other gentlemen and women. Then there was ruſhing away with ſpeed to meet him.

Then ſaid Dr. Story to my keeper, Carry him to the Marſhalſea again; keep him cloſe, and let nobody come to ſpeak with him.

And ſo they departed. Then one of the prieſts began to flatter me, and ſaid, For God's ſake remember yourſelf. God hath given you a good wit: you have read the ſcriptures well, and have borne them well in memory. It were great pity you ſhould do amiſs.

Woodman. What a flatterer be you, to ſay my wit is good, and that I have read the ſcriptures well? and but even now you ſaid I was an heretic and deſpiſed me. If I be an heretic, I can have no good wit, as you have confeſſed. But I think your own conſcience doth accuſe you. God give you grace to repent, if it be his will.

Prieſt. I call it a good wit, becauſe you are expert in all queſtions.

Woodman. You may call it a wicked wit, if it agree not with God's word. Then one cried, Away, away, here come ſtrangers. So we departed, and I came again to the Marſhalſea with my keeper.

The third Examination of Mr. Woodman (copied with his own Hand) before Dr. Langdale, Chaplain to my Lord Montague, and Mr. James Gage, at my Lord Montague's Houſe, near St. Mary Overies in Southwark, May 12, 1557.

THE 12th of May the marſhal came to the Marſhalſea, and ſent for me to ſpeak with him. When I came before him and had done my duty, he aſked my name, and what countryman I was: I ſhewed him both. Then he aſked me when I was abroad in the city. To whom I anſwered, if it ſhall pleaſe your maſterſhip I was abroad in the city on Monday was ſevennight.

Marſhal. What made you abroad?

Woodman. The biſhop of Chicheſter ſent for me to talk with me at his houſe near St. Nicholas' Shambles.

Marſhal. Were you abroad no otherwiſe than ſo?

Woodman. No forſooth: I was never abroad ſince I was ſent hither, but then. For I have nothing to do abroad, unleſs they ſend for me.

Marſhal. This is a marvellous matter. I promiſe you I was not ſo rebuked theſe ſeven years, as I was for you within theſe three days. It is reported that you were abroad in the city at certain taverns, and ſpake ſeditious words both in the taverns and ſtreets as you went.

Woodman. Sir, the truth is, I was in never a houſe or tavern while I was abroad, but in the biſhop's houſe, as my keeper can, and will (I am ſure) teſtify: nor did I ever talk with any man in the ſtreets as I came, but with my keeper, except one man indeed, of the pariſh of Framfield in Suſſex, where Mr. James Gage dwelleth. His name is Robert Smith, being one of my greateſt enemies; who ſtood in a wain as we came by, and was unlading of cheeſe but a little way from the Marſhalſea. Indeed I bade him God ſpeed, and aſked him how he did: and he ſaid, well, and thanked me. And he aſked me how I did: and I ſaid, well, I praiſe God; and that was all the talk that we had. And theſe words were ſpoken as I came by him: I promiſe you, Sir, I ſtood not ſtill while I ſpake them, as my keeper can tell: and I think theſe words were not ſeditious words, but might be ſpoken well enough, I think, or elſe it were very ſtrait.

Marſhal. Then is it to be thought, that that man reported otherwiſe than it was. I am glad it is as you ſay. Well, make you ready: for you muſt go forth ſtraitway, where you ſhall be examined of that and of other things, where you ſhall anſwer for yourſelf. Go, make haſte, for I will tarry till you be ready.

So I departed, and went to my fellow-priſoners, and took my leave of them, deſiring them to pray for me, for I expected to ſee them no more. I did ſuppoſe I ſhould have gone before the council, becauſe the marſhal ſaid, he would tarry for me himſelf: and eſpecially becauſe he ſaid, it was reported that I had ſpoken ſeditious words, it made me imagine they had contrived falſe things againſt me to bring me to my end. I remembered what Chriſt ſaid, "The ſervant is not above his Lord." Seeing the Jews brought falſe witneſs againſt Chriſt, I thought they would do much more, or at leaſt do ſo to me, if God would ſuffer them, which made me think the worſt. But I was ſure that all the world could not juſtly accuſe me of any ſuch thing, the conſideration of which made me merry and joyful, being confident withal, that they could do no more againſt me than God would permit. I took my leave of my fellow-priſoners, and went to the marſhal in the porter's lodge, and he delivered me to one of his own men, and one of my lord Montague's men, and bade me go with them: and they carried me to my lord Montague's place in Southwark, not far from St. Mary Overy's, and brought me into a a chamber in my lord Montague's houſe; and there was one Dr. Langdale, chaplain to my lord. My keepers ſaid to the doctor, This is the man that we went for.

Langdale. Is your name Woodman?

Woodman. Yea, forſooth, that is my name.

Then he began with a great circumſtance, and ſaid, I am ſorry for you, that you will not be ruled, but ſtand ſo much in your own conceit, diſpleaſing your father and others, judging that all the realm doth evil, ſaving a few that do as you do: What think you of them that died long ago, your grandfather, with their fathers before them them? You judge them to be damned, and all others that uſe the ſame that they did throughout all Chriſtendom, unleſs it be in Germany, and here in England a few years, and in Denmark; and yet they are returned again. Thus we are ſure this is the truth, and I would you ſhould do well. Your father is an honeſt man, and one of my pariſh, and hath wept to me divers times becauſe you would not be ruled: and he loveth you well, and ſo doth all the country, both rich and poor, if it were not for thoſe evil opinions that you hold; [with many ſuch like tales of Robin Hood.]

Woodman. I pray you give me leave to ſpeak a few words to you.

Langdale. Yes, ſay your mind.

Woodman. You have told a great long tale, as it were againſt me (as you think) ſaying, I hold this and that; I judge my father and my grandfather, and almoſt all the world, without it be a few that be of our ſect. But I judge no man. But the 12th of John declareth, who it is that judgeth, and ſhall judge in the laſt day. The father ſhall not bear the ſon's offences, nor the ſon the father's offences: but that ſoul that ſinneth ſhall die, as ſaith the prophet. And again, We may not follow a multitude to do evil, as ſaith the prophet: for the moſt go the wrong way. And Chriſt ſaith in the 12th of Luke, that his flock is a little flock. Here be places enough to diſcharge me, although I do not as the moſt do. But can any man ſay that I do not as I ought to do: where be my accuſers?

Langdale. What, you be full of ſcriptures methinks, and call your accuſers as though you were afraid to utter your mind to me. But I would have you not be afraid to talk with me, for I mean no more hurt to you than I do to myſelf, I take God to be my record.

Woodman. I cannot tell; it is hard truſting to fair words. When a man cannot truſt his father nor brother, nor others that have been his familiar friends, but they deceive him, a man may lawfully follow the example of Chriſt towards them that he never ſaw before, ſaying, "Be as wiſe as ſerpents, and as innocent as doves. Beware of men, for they go about to betray you." And it maketh me much to ſuſpect you, becauſe you blame me for anſwering with the ſcriptures. It maketh me to doubt that you would take advantage of me, if I ſhould ſpeak mine own words. Wherefore I will take as good heed as I can, becauſe I have been deceived already by them I truſted moſt. Wherefore blame me not though I anſwer circumſpectly. It ſhall not be ſaid, by God's help, that I will run wilfully into mine enemies hands, and yet I praiſe God my life is not dear to myſelf, but it is dear with God: wherefore I will do the uttermoſt that I can to keep it.

Langdale. You be afraid where no fear is, for I was deſired by maſter ſheriff and his brother, and other friends, to talk with you, and they told me that you were deſirous to talk with me, and now ye make the matter as though you had nothing to do with me, and as though you were ſent to priſon for nothing: for you call for your accuſers, as though there were no man to accuſe you. But if there were no man to accuſe you, your own hand-writing did accuſe you enough, that you ſet upon the church door (if you remember it) and other letters that you let fall abroad, ſome at one place and ſome at another. Wherefore you need not call for your accuſers. Your own hand will accuſe you, I warrant you; it is kept ſafe enough. I would not for two hundred pounds there were ſo much againſt me.

Woodman. I will not deny mine own hand; for it cannot eaſily be counterfeited. I do not deny but I wrote a letter to the prieſt, and others of the pariſh, declaring their folly and preſumption, to come into my houſe without my love or leave, and brought out my child, and uſed it at their pleaſure: which moved me to write my mind unto them: and becauſe I could not tell how to convey it to them, I let it on the church door: which letter my lord of Chicheſter hath; for he ſhewed it me when I was before him: wherein it contained nothing but the very ſcriptures, to their reproach. Let it be laid before me when you or he will, I will anſwer to it by the help of God, to all their ſhames that I wrote it to. And as for any other letters, I wrote none, as you ſaid I did, neither had I wrote that, if they had done like honeſt neighbours. Wherefore if they be offended with me for that, I will anſwer them with Chriſt's words, in the 18th of Matthew, "Woe unto themſelves, becauſe they gave me the occaſion.

And whereas you ſaid, I was deſirous to ſpeak with you, and that maſter ſheriff and his brother, and other of my friends willed you to talk with me, and that I fare now as though I had nothing to do with you, and as though I were ſent to priſon for nothing: the truth is, I know no more wherefore I am ſent to priſon, than the leaſt child in this town knoweth. And as for me, I deſired not maſter ſheriff to ſpeak with you; but indeed he deſired me that I would ſpeak with you, and utter my faith to you. For he ſuppoſed that I did not believe well, and he reported you to be learned. But I refuſed to talk with you at the firſt. For I remembered not that you were the parſon at Buxted: wherefore I ſaid to him, I would not utter my faith to any but to the biſhop. I ſaid, he is mine ordinary: wherefore I appeal unto him. I am commanded by St. Peter in the firſt epiſtle, the third chapter, to render account of my hope that I have in God, to him that hath authority; wherefore I will talk with none in that matter, but with him. Wherefore ſend me to him if you will, or elſe there ſhall no man know my faith I tell you plainly.

Theſe words then made the ſheriff angry, and he went his way; and when he was gone from me, I remembered that it was you that he would have me to talk with, and then I remembered that I had made the promiſe to my father and goodman Day of Veſield, not paſt a fortnight before I was taken, that whenſoever you came into the country, I would ſpeak with you by God's help, becauſe they praiſed you ſo much, that you were learned, and they would fain hear us talk.

So all theſe things called to remembrance, I deſired my keeper, which was the ſheriff's man, to ſhew his maſter, that I would fain ſpeak with him: for I had remembered things that were not in my mind before, when I ſpake to him. So he went to his maſter, and ſhewed him the matter, and he came to me; and then I told him my mind, and what promiſe I had made; and he ſaid, he would ſend for you on the morrow, as he did, and the meſſenger brought word you could not come; you preached before the Queen, he ſaid. Whereupon the ſheriff came up himſelf, and ſpake to the biſhop that he ſhould come down, but he was ſick. So when he came home again, he ſent me to the biſhop, and I have talked with him twice already, and I am ſure he can find no fault in me, if he ſay juſtly; and yet I know not wherefore I was ſent to priſon; for I was not guilty of that which was laid to my charge, that I had baptized children, the which I never did, as God knoweth; wherefore I had wrong to be thus handled.

Langdale. Indeed it hath been reported, that you have chriſtened children; and that you chriſtened your own child; but ſince I heard ſay, you would not have the child chriſtened, which is a damnable way, if you deny baptiſm: and they ſaid, your child was not chriſtened in a fortnight or three weeks after it was born, and the chiefeſt of the pariſh, were fained to fetch it out of your houſe againſt your will. Wherefore you wrote railing words againſt the prieſt and them for their good will: the which declareth that you allow not baptizing of children. And if the child had died it had been damned, becauſe it was not chriſtened, and you ſhould have been damned, becauſe you were the hindrance thereof.

Woodman. What abominable lyes have you told? be you not aſhamed to ſpeak ſuch words as you have done? Firſt you ſay, I chriſtened mine own child, and by and by you ſaid, I denied baptizing of children, and that my child was a fortnight or three weeks old before it was baptized. What abominable lyes be theſe! I neither baptized my child myſelf, neither held againſt the baptizing of it, but did moſt gladly allow it; for it was baptized as ſoon as it was born, and I was glad thereof; therefore you be to blame to report of me.

Langdale I pray you, who baptized it? ſome unthrift of your providing.

Woodman. Nay, ſurely, the midwife baptized it.

Langdale. But it was your mind that it ſhould be ſo.

Woodman. Nay ſure, I was not nigh home by almoſt twenty miles, nor heard that my wife was brought to-bed four days after the child was chriſtened. But it was not like to live: and therefore the midwife baptized it.

Langdale. Would you had it to church to have been chriſtened, if it had not been chriſtened?

Woodman. That is no matter what I would have done. I am ſure you cannot deny but it is ſufficiently done, if the midwife do it, and I hold not againſt the doing of it, neither did I it myſelf, as you ſaid I did.

Langdale. Wherefore were you diſpleaſed with them that carried it to church?

Woodman. Firſt tell me whether the child were not truly baptized by the midwife?

Langdale. Yes, it was truly baptized, if ſhe baptized it in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt.

Woodman. Yes, that I am ſure ſhe did, and you grant that was ſufficient: and the cauſe that I blamed them for, was becauſe they did more to it than need was, by your own ſaying. Yea, they fetched it out of my houſe without my leave: which was not well done.

Langdale. They had it to church to confirm what was done.

Woodman. Yea, but that was more than needs. But God forgive them, if it be his will. But let that matter paſs. But I would you ſhould not ſay, that I hold againſt baptizing of children; for I do not, I take God to record; but do allow it to be moſt neceſſary, if it be truly uſed. But methought you ſpake words even now that were uncomely to be ſpoken; if a child die, and be not baptized, it is damned. How think you? be all damned that receive not the outward ſign of baptiſm?

Langdale. Yea, that they be.

Woodman. How prove you that?

Langdale. "Go, ſaith Chriſt, and baptize in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt: and he that believeth, and is baptized, ſhall be ſaved: and he that believeth not ſhall be damned." Theſe be the words of Chriſt, which are my warrant.

Woodman. Then by your ſaying, baptiſm bringeth faith, and all that be baptized in water ſhall be ſaved: ſhall they? how ſay you?

Langdale. Yea, that they ſhall; if they die before they come to diſcretion, they ſhall be ſaved every one of them: and all that be not baptized ſhall be damned every one of them.

Then my ſpirit was moved with him to reprove him ſharply, becauſe I had manifeſt ſcriptures freſh in my mind againſt his ſaying. Then ſaid I:

O Lord God! how dare you ſpeak ſuch blaſphemy againſt God and his word, as you do? how dare you for your life take upon you to preach, and teach the people, and underſtand not what you ſay? For I proteſt before God you underſtand not the ſcriptures, but as natural reaſon can comprehend. For if you did, you would be aſhamed to ſpeak as you do.

Langdale Wherein have I ſpoken amiſs; take heed, you have a toy in your head will make you deſpair: I dare ſay you cannot tell what you ſay. Wherefore reprove you me as you do?

Woodman. Becauſe you blaſpheme God; and as for deſpairing, take heed to yourſelf. For I cannot ſee but you be out of your wits already, and as for me, I praiſe God, I can tell what I ſay, and what you have ſaid: which ſhall turn to your ſhame, if you will talk by the ſcriptures with me.

So when he perceived that I ſpake earneſtly, and challenged him to talk by the word, his colour began to change, and his fleſh began to tremble and quake. And I ſaid:

Prove your ſayings true, if you can; for I will prove them falſe by God's help. You ſaid, All children, or others, that be not baptized with water, ſhall be damned. I dare not ſay ſo for all the good in the world. And you brought in the ſaying of Chriſt for your warrant. In Mark 16. it is written, "Whoſo believeth, and is baptized, ſhall be ſaved;" which words be very true: and whoſo believeth not ſhall be damned," which words be very true alſo. He ſays, "He that believeth not, ſhall be damned." Yea, St. John ſaith, "He that believeth not, is condemned already, becauſe he believeth not." But neither of theſe two ſcriptures, nor any other ſcripture in all the New Teſtament ſaith, That he that is not baptized ſhall be damned, or is damned already. "But if he believe not he ſhall be damned, and is damned already, as is aforeſaid. Then he would have interrupted me, and would have laid to my charge, that I was an Anabaptiſt. But I would give him no place to ſpeak, but ſaid:

Let me make an end, and then ſay what you can. You ſhall have as much to do, by God's help, with this matter, as ever you had to anſwer thing in your life. You know (I am ſure) it is no manners to pluck a tale out of a man's mouth, nor is it the order of reaſoning, as you know that better than I can tell you. Then Dr. Langdale bade me ſay on.

Woodman. My ſaying was, that they that believe not ſhall be damned, and be damned already. But I dare not ſay for all the goods under heaven; that all they that receive no material baptiſm by water ſhall be damned, as you have ſaid: yet I would you ſhould not gather of theſe words, that I deny baptiſm, as you were about to lay to my charge, before ever I had half told out my tale. But I would not have you, nor any man ſo raſh in judgment, to condemn the thing that they are not able to prove by the word, and to make it ſeem to the ſimple, that the outward waſhing of water were the cauſe of faith.

Langdale. Why, is it not ſo? will you deny it? How ſay you? will you deny it? I ſay, the child hath no faith before it is baptized; and therefore the baptizing bringeth faith. How ſay you to it? make me a plain anſwer to this queſtion.

Woodman. Now I perceive you go about nothing elſe, but to take advantage of my words: But by God's help, I will anſwer you ſo, that you ſhall well ſee your ſayings untrue. And yet I will not ſpeak mine own words, but the words of the Holy Ghoſt, out of the mouth of the prophets and apoſtles; and then aſk them whether they will deny it.

You ſaid, that faith cometh by baptiſm, had by the uſe of material water. I muſt be ſo bold to aſk you where Jacob was baptized before he had faith. St. Paul ſaith in the ninth chapter to the Romans, "Before ever the children were born, before ever they had done either good or bad, that the purpoſe of God, which is by election, might ſtand, not by the reaſon of works, but by the grace of the Caller, the elder ſhall ſerve the younger. Jacob have I loved, and Eſau have I hated." How think you, had this child faith before he were born, or no? anſwer to this if you can.

Langdale. What, you ſpeak of the old law. Jacob was not chriſtened, but circumciſed. I ſpeak of baptiſm, and you are gone from baptizing to the time of circumciſion; anſwer me to the baptizing. And methink by your talk, you deny original ſin, and free will, by the words that you brought in of St. Paul.

For

For if children can be ſaved without baptiſm, then it muſt needs follow, that children have no original ſin, which is put away in baptizing. But I think you know not what original ſin is, nor free will neither.

Woodman. Yes, I praiſe God (I think) I can tell them all better than you can. Firſt I pray you what free will hath man to do good of himſelf? tell me this firſt, and then I will anſwer to all other queſtions that you have objected againſt me.

Langdale. I ſay, that all men have as much free will now, as Adam had before his fall.

Woodman. I pray you how prove you that?

Langdale. Thus I prove it, that as ſin entered into the world, and by the means of one that ſinned all men became ſinners, which was by Adam; ſo by the obedience of one man, righteouſneſs came upon all men that had ſinned, and ſet them as free as they were before their fall, which was by Jeſus Chriſt, Rom. 5.

Woodman. O Lord, what an overthrow have you given yourſelf here in original ſin, and yet cannot ſee it? For in proving that we have free will, you have denied quite original ſin. For here you have declared that we be ſet as free by the death of Chriſt, as Adam was before his fall, and I am ſure that Adam had no original ſin before his fall. If we be as free now as he was then, I marvel wherefore Paul complained thrice to God, to take away the ſting of it, God making him anſwer, and ſaying, "My grace is ſufficient for thee."

Theſe words with divers others, prove original ſin in us; but not that it ſhall hurt God's elect people, but that his grace is ſufficient for all his. But you ſay in one place, it is not without baptiſm; and in another place, you put it away quite by the death of Chriſt; and in very deed you have ſpoken truer in the matter than you are aware of. For all that believe in Chriſt are baptized in the blood of Chriſt that he ſhed on the croſs, and in the water that he ſweat for pain, and putting away of our ſins at his death. And yet I ſay with David in the 51ſt Pſalm, "In ſin was I born, and in ſin hath my mother conceived me:" but in no ſuch ſin that ſhall be imputed, becauſe I am born of God by faith, as St. John ſaith, chap. 3. Therefore I am bleſſed, as ſaith the prophet, Pſal. 23. "Becauſe the Lord imputeth not my ſin," and not becauſe I have no ſin; but becauſe God hath not imputed my ſins. Not of our own deſerving, but of his free mercy he hath ſaved us. Where is now your free will become that you ſpake of? If we have free will, then our ſalvation cometh of our ownſelves, and not of God; which is great blaſphemy againſt God and his word.

For St. James ſaith, chap. 1. "Every good and perfect gift cometh from above, from the Father of light, with whom is no variableneſs, neither is he changed into darkneſs. Of his own will he begat us. For the wind bloweth where it liſteth, and we hear the ſound thereof," (as ſaith St. John, chap. 3.) but we cannot tell from whence it cometh, neither whither it goeth: even ſo is it with every one that is born of God." For St. Paul ſaith, Phil. 2. "It is God that worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleaſure." Seeing then that every good and perfect gift cometh from above, and lighteneth upon whom it pleaſeth God, and that he worketh in us both to will and to do, methinks all the reſt of our own will is little worth, or naught at all, unleſs it be wickedneſs. So methinks here be places enow to prove that a man hath no free will to do good of himſelf; with an hundred places more that I could recite, if time did ſerve. And as for original ſin, I think I have declared my mind therein, how it remaineth in man; which you cannot deny, unleſs you deny the word of God. Now, if you will ſuffer me, I will prove my ſaying of Jacob and Eſau, that I brought in to prove that faith was before baptiſm, and you refuſed it, becauſe (you ſaid) Jacob was not baptized. If you will give me leave, you ſhall hear what I can ſay therein: for methinks you think my talk long. This I ſaid, becauſe I ſaw he was ſore offended at my ſayings.

Langdale. Say what you can; for it availeth me to ſay nothing to you. For I was deſired to ſend for you, to teach you, and there will no words of mine take place in you; but you go about to reprove me. Say what you will, for me.

Woodman. I take not upon me to teach you, but to anſwer ſuch things as you lay to my charge: and I ſpeak not mine own mind, but the mind of the Holy Ghoſt, written by the prophets and apoſtles. Will you give me leave to anſwer briefly in this matter, that you may report to others what I hold? And he ſaid he was contented. But I think it was for nothing but to have caught advantage at my words.

Firſt, if you remember, you ſaid, that if my child had died without baptiſm, if I had been the cauſe that it had not been baptized, the child ſhould have been damned, and I too. How ſay you?

Langdale. Yea that you ſhould.

Woodman. That is moſt untrue. For the prophet ſaith, "The father ſhall not bear the child's offences, nor the child the father's; but the ſoul that ſinneth ſhall die." What could the child have done withal, if it had died without baptiſm? the child could not do withal. How ſay you to this? And I am ſure, that which I brought in, in the old law, to prove that faith is before baptiſm, is not diſagreeable to the word. For circumciſion was a figure of baptiſm. And that I may bring to prove baptiſm by, as well as St. Peter did: for he brought in Noah's flood, which was a long time before Jacob and Eſau, to prove baptiſm, ſaying, "While the ark was preparing, wherein few (that is to ſay) eight ſouls were ſaved by water, like as baptiſm alſo now ſaveth us, not in putting away of the filth of the fleſh, but there is a good conſcience conſenting to God.

Here Peter proveth, that water had not ſaved Noah and the other ſeven, no more than it ſaved all the reſt, if it had not been for their faith, which faith now ſaveth us; not in putting away the filthy ſoil of the fleſh, by the waſhing of the water, but by a good conſcience conſenting unto God.

But you ſaid, If they be baptized with the water, if they die before they come to years of diſcretion, they be all ſaved; which St. Peter is clean againſt, unleſs you grant that children have faith before they be baptized.

Now I aſk you what conſent of conſcience the children have, being infants. For you ſay, they believe not before they be baptized: Ergo, they conſent not to be baptized, becauſe they believe not. And by this it followeth, that none ſhall be ſaved, although they be baptized. I would fain ſee how you can anſwer this.

Langdale. You are the moſt perverſe man that ever I knew. You know not what you ſay. The children are baptized in their godfathers and godmothers faith, and that is the good conſcience that St. Peter ſpeaketh of: and the chriſtening is the keeping of the law that St. Paul ſpeaketh of, ſaying, Neither is circumciſion any thing worth, nor uncircumciſion any thing worth, but keeping of the law is all together. Like as the circumciſion was the keeping of the old law, ſo is baptiſm the keeping of the new law.

Woodman. Ah, I thought if you would talk with me, you ſhould be fain to bring in the old law to maintain your ſayings by, for all that you refuſed it when I brought it in. But yet it ſerveth not for your purpoſe, ſo much as you think for: for here you have confeſſed, that neither circumciſion availeth, nor uncircumciſion; which you yourſelf have coupled with baptiſm, proving that neither of them prevaileth, but keeping of the law is all together: which law is kept (you ſay) by the outward ſigns; which is nothing ſo: for Abraham believed God, and that was counted to him for righteouſneſs, and this was before he was circumciſed. So the children believe before they be either circumciſed or baptized, tized, according to my firſt ſaying of Jacob and Eſau, "Jacob I loved, but Eſau I hated." Theſe words declare, that Jacob had faith in his mother's womb: and John Baptiſt was ſanctified in his mother's womb; and therefore it was counted to them for righteouſneſs: and I am ſure, if they had died before they had either received circumciſion or baptiſm as concerning the outward deed. they ſhould have been ſaved. For God's gifts and callings are ſuch, that he cannot repent of them. But by your ſaying he doth both repent and change. For you ſay, keeping of the outward law is all together; but a bad cauſe is as good as none at all. And where you ſaid, the children be baptized in their godfathers and godmothers faith, they being all unbelievers, in what faith is that child baptized then: In none at all, by your own ſaying: which words made him ſtamp and ſtare.

Langdale. What! then you would count that there were very few believers, if there were not one of three that believeth. You enter into judgment againſt the people. Belike you think there be none that believe well, unleſs they be of your mind. Then indeed Chriſt's flock was a very little flock.

Woodman. Indeed theſe be Chriſt's words in the 12th of Luke, which we may ſee to be very true. Yea, you ſaid, if there were not one amongſt three, that were very few. But there is not one amongſt three hundred, for any thing that I can ſee. For if there were, there would not be ſo many that would ſeek their neighbours goods and lives as there be.

Langdale. Is the flock of Chriſt ſuch a little flock as you ſpeak of? You may call it a great flock. How many may there be of them, can you tell me?

Woodman. A pretty queſtion, I promiſe you, it is that you aſk me: as though I did make myſelf equal with God.

No, no, you ſhall catch no ſuch advantage of my words, nor do I know how many there be. But I will tell you as nigh as I can. For therefore you look. I am ſure that I ſhould enter into judgment.

Langdale. Yea, I pray you tell me as much as you can, ſeeing you be ſo cunning.

Woodman. You ſhall ſee my judgment in it by and by. Firſt the prophet ſaith, "Follow not a multitude to do evil, for they muſt go the wrong way." For the moſt go the wrong way. There is one point to know them.

Then Chriſt ſaith in the 7th of Matthew, "Broad is the way, and wide is the gate that leadeth into deſtruction, and many there be that go in thereat: and ſtrait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." And in the 12th of Luke, it is written (which words were ſpoken of Chriſt) "Come you little flock, it is my Father's will to give you a kingdom." The third point is this, in the third of Mark, and ſecond of Matthew, "You (ſaith Chriſt) ſhall know the tree by the fruits. A good tree bringeth forth good fruits, and a bad tree bringeth forth bad fruits:" ſo by the fruits I know them: For every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, muſt be hewn down, and caſt into the fire (into hell I think Chriſt meant) and your fruits declare that you be one of them. Thus have I proved four ways, that the people who ſhall be ſaved is but a ſmall company in compariſon of the reſt. But if that be not enough for the proof thereof, I have twenty ways more to prove it by, and you were never the nearer of your purpoſe.

Langdale. What a naughty man are you? you would make the moſt patient man in the world angry with you. I think your talk is nothing but pride and vain-glory, with frumps and mocks, and deſpiſing and judging of men. It is time ſuch a fellow was taken indeed. Such a one is enough to trouble a whole country. I think he is bleſt of God that took you: for you are not fit to be in a common-wealth.

With divers other ſuch like words that I cannot recite; they came out ſo thick, with ſtamping and chafing, as though he had been out of his wits. I held my peace until he had made an end of his talk, and then I ſpake.

Wherein have I ſaid amiſs? or have I not anſwered you unto every queſtion that you have demanded of me? what fault can you find in one word that I have ſaid? I dare ſay you can find none. I marvel why you take on thus againſt me, having no cauſe ſo to do.

Langdale. No, no, you have not anſwered me to original ſin, you deny original ſin.

With theſe words Mr. James Gage came in at the door; and I think he ſtood at the door a good while before he came in; and that Doctor Langdale ſaw him: for his face was toward the door, and my face was from it.

Gage. Ah Woodman, methink Mr. Doctor and you cannot agree.

Woodman. Yes, Sir, methink we agree very well.

Langdale. Without doubt, Sir, he is the naughtieſt man that ever I talked with in all my life: for he will have his own way in all things.

Gage. Woodman, leave that pride. Do not truſt too much to your own wit. Hearken to this man, this is a learned man, I tell you. He is known to be learned, for elſe he ſhould not be allowed to preach before the queen's majeſty: and I dare ſay, he will tell thee nothing, nor will thee to do any thing, but that he will do himſelf: and I dare ſay, he will not go to the devil, to bring thee thither. How ſay you, Mr. Doctor? Thou mighteſt think us mad, if we would hurt ourſelves to hurt thee. No, I promiſe thee, my brother, neither I, nor any gentleman in the country, I think of my conſcience, but would thou ſhouldeſt do as well as their own bodies and ſouls, as a great many of them have ſaid to thy face whilſt thou waſt at my brother's, and which thou canſt not deny.

Woodman. Sir, I can ſay no otherwiſe but I was gently treated at your brother's, both with meat and drink, and gentle words, both by you and him, and divers other gentlemen: and I am ſure neither you nor they can ſay, that you found me unreaſonable at any time. For I ſaid, I was contented to learn of them that were able to teach me, and ſo I am, as God knoweth: and here Mr. Doctor (I think) can ſay no otherwiſe; for I dare ſay he can find no fault in the talk we have had.

Langdale. No marry, I can find nothing elſe in you. I promiſe you, Mr. Gage, if you had been here, you would have ſaid ſo yourſelf. He took me up indeed, and ſaid, he marvelled how I durſt preach. For he ſaid, I underſtood not the ſcripture, but as far as natural reaſon comprehended: as though he underſtood all, and I nothing. With divers other ſuch like words he made a great complaint to him of me, and ſaid to Mr. James Gage, he would make you believe that I could find no fault in him. Yes, I underſtand, he denies original ſin.

Gage. Yea, doth he ſo? by St. Mary that is a great matter: Woodman, leave your pride. That pride will come to nought. Can you live without ſin?

Woodman. Sir, now I perceive he will ſoon lye on me behind my back, when he will not ſtick to lye before my face.

He ſaith, I denied original ſin; and it was he himſelf, as I will let you be judge in the matter. For, as he went about to prove, that man hath free will, he ſaid, we were ſet as free by the death of Chriſt, as Adam was before his fall: which words prove plainly, that we have no original ſin: And I took him withal, and ſaid, Had Adam original ſin before his fall? and then he could not tell what to ſay, but cavilled with words, and ſaid he meant not ſo; and therefore I marvel he is not aſhamed to make ſuch lyes to my face. Theſe words made them both aſtoniſhed.

Gage. Mr. Doctor, he ſaid even now you could find no fault in all his talk. I will bid you aſk him a queſtion, and I will warrant you will find fault enough.

enough. I pray you ask him how he believeth in the ſacrament of the altar. I think he will make but a bad account thereof.

Woodman. Yes, I will make account good enough of that, by God's help.

Langdale. Well, how ſay you to the ſacrament of the altar?

Woodman. I ſay, I know no ſuch ſacrament, unleſs Chriſt be the altar that you mean.

Gage. Lo! I told you, you ſhould ſoon find fault in him, if you came to that point with him. You ſhould have begun with that firſt, and never have talked with him about other things. What! know you not the ſacrament of the altar?

Woodman. No ſure, I know no ſuch, unleſs Chriſt be the altar that you mean; for Chriſt is the altar of all goodneſs. And if you mean Chriſt to be the altar of the ſacrament you ſpeak of, you ſhall ſoon hear my mind and belief therein.

Langdale. Well, we mean Chriſt to be the altar. Say your mind, and go briefly to work; for I think it almoſt dinner time.

Woodman. Yes, you ſhall ſoon hear my mind therein, by God's help. I do believe, that whenſoever I come to receive the ſacrament of the body and blood of Jeſus Chriſt, being duly adminiſtered according to Chriſt's inſtitution, I believing that Chriſt was born of the virgin Mary, and that he was crucified on the croſs, and ſhed his blood for the remiſſion of my ſins, and ſo take and eat the ſacrament of bread and wine in that remembrance, that then I do receive whole Chriſt, God and man, myſtically by faith. This is my belief of the ſacrament, which no man is able to diſprove.

Gage. By St Mary, I can find no fault in this. How ſay you, Mr. Doctor?

Langdale. Sir, you ſee not ſo much as I do. For he goeth craftily to work, I tell you as I have heard. For though he hath granted, that the faithful receiver receiveth the body of Chriſt, God and man, yet he hath not granted that it is the body of Chriſt before it be received, as you ſhall ſee by and by, I warrant you, by his own words. How ſay you? Is it the body of Chriſt as ſoon as the words be ſpoken by the prieſt, or not? for theſe words will try him more than all the reſt.

Woodman Doth the word ſay that it is his body before it is received? if it do, I will ſay ſo too.

Gage. Why, then we ſhall agree well enough, if you will be tried by the word.

Woodman. Yes indeed, that I will; God forbid elſe.

Gage. Why, the word ſaith it is his body before it is eaten.

Woodman. Theſe words would I fain hear; but I am ſure they be not in the Bible.

Langdale No! that you ſhall ſee preſently (ſays he to Mr. Gage) and then turned to the 22d of Luke, and there he read, "When ſupper was done, Chriſt took bread, gave thanks, and brake it, and gave to his diſciples, and ſaid; Take, eat, this is my body:" Then they ſpake both at once, Here he ſaith it is his body.

Woodman. Mr. Gage, I do not deny that he called it his body, but not before eating, as I ſaid before; wherefore I pray you mark the words. Chriſt ſaith, "Take, eat:" I pray you mark theſe words that he ſaid, "Take and eat," and then he ſaid, "it was his body." So you ſee eating goeth before. For he ſaith, "Eat, this is my body." So according to the very word, I do believe it is his body. Which words made them both aſtoniſhed.

Langdale. Why, then by your ſaying, Judas eat not the body of Chriſt. How ſay you, did he not?

Woodman. Nay, I aſk you. Did he?

Langdale. I ask you.

Woodman. And I ask you.

Langdale. And I ask you.

Woodman. Marry I ask you: and I bid you anſwer if you dare for your life; for whatſoever you anſwer, unleſs you ſay as I have ſaid, you will damn your own ſoul. For Mr. Gage, I proteſt before God, I would you ſhould do as well as mine own ſoul and body; and it lamenteth my heart to ſee how you be deceived by them; they be deceivers all the ſort of them. He cannot anſwer to this, but either he muſt prove Judas to be ſaved, or elſe he muſt prove that it is no body before it be received in faith, as you ſhall well perceive, by God's help. if he dare anſwer the queſtion.

Gage. Yes, I dare ſay he dareth; what, you need not threaten him ſo.

Woodman. Then let him anſwer if he can.

Then he ſaid, he knew what I would ſay to him; therefore he was much in doubt to anſwer the queſtion.

Langdale. Mr. Gage, I will tell you in your ear what words he will anſwer me, before I ſpeak to him.

Then he told Mr. Gage a tale in his ear, and ſaid: I have told Mr. Gage what you will ſay.

Gage. Yea, and I will ſpeak the truth for both parties.

Woodman, Well, how ſay you? Did Judas eat the body of Chriſt, or not?

Langdale. Yea, I ſay Judas did eat the body of Chriſt.

Woodman. Then it muſt needs follow that Judas hath everlaſting life: for Chriſt ſaith in the 6th of John, "whoſo eateth my fleſh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raiſe him up at the laſt day." If Judas did eat Chriſt's body, I am ſure you cannot deny but that he did both eat his fleſh, and drink his blood, and then is Judas ſaved by Chriſt's own words. Therefore now you are compelled to ſay that it was not Chriſt's body, or elſe that Judas is ſaved.

Gage. Surely theſe be the very words that Maſter doctor told me in mine ear that you would ſay to him.

Woodman. Well, let us ſee how well he can avoid this argument.

Langdale. Judas is damned, and yet he eat the body of Chriſt; but he eat it unworthily: and therefore he is damned.

Woodman. Where find you that Judas did eat the body of Chriſt unworthily?

Langdale. They be Saint Paul's words, 1 Cor. 11.

Woodman. Maſter Gage, I deſire you for God's ſake mark my words well what I ſay. If Saint Paul ſpake any ſuch words there, or in any other place; if there be any ſuch words written in all the whole Bible, that ever any man eat the body of Chriſt unworthily, then ſay that I am the falſeſt man that ever you heard ſpeak with a tongue. But indeed, theſe be the words of Saint Paul, "Whoſo eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily, eateth and drinketh his own damnation, becauſe he maketh no difference of the Lord's body;" that is, becauſe he preſumeth to eat the ſacrament of the Lord's body without faith, making no difference betwixt the ſacrament and other meat and drink. And that is Saint Paul's meaning, and not that any man doth or can eat the body of Chriſt unworthily. For whoſoever eateth the body of Chriſt, hath everlaſting life, as is aforeſaid in the ſixth of John. With theſe words one came for them to dinner in all haſte.

Gage. I am ſorry, I would fain hear more of this talk, but we ſhall have another day well enough.

Langdale. Nay, maſter Gage, I will never talk with him more; for he is the moſt unreaſonable man that ever I talked with in all my life.

Then Mr. Gage put off his cap, and deſired him that he would not refuſe to talk with me, and that it might not be grievous to him. For, ſaid he, we will ſeek all the means poſſible to make him an honeſt man, and to keep him from burning, if we could: for if it had not been for me and my brother, he had been burnt before this.

Langdale. Sir, for your ſake, and for my maſter your brother's ſake, and for his father's ſake, and other of his friends ſakes, that have ſpoken to me many times with weeping tears, I will do the beſt to him that I can; but for no love nor favour that I bear to him, I tell you truth.

Gage. Woodman, you hear what maſter Doctor ſaith: when will you come again?

Woodman. Even when you will ſend for me. For I am a priſoner, and cannot come when I would. Or if I ſhould deſire to come, it will coſt me money, and I have none to give; but if you ſend for me, it will coſt me none.

Gage. Well, I will ſend for you on Friday or Saturday at fartheſt; for to-morrow I muſt ride out of town; and I would fain hear you talk.

Woodman. Sir, I would be very glad you ſhould hear our talk always, and I truſt in God you ſhall hear me ſay nothing, but the word of God ſhall be my warrant.

So Mr. Gage took his leave, and went away to his lodging, which was right in my way to the priſon; and when we came without my lord Montague's gates, there we met with one Hood of Burſted, a ſmith.

Then ſaid Mr. Gage: Woodman, I had forgot one thing that Hood had brought me in remembrance of as ſoon as I ſaw him; for he heard when the tale was told me. Hood, did not you hear when Smith of Farmfield told me that he ſaw Woodman abroad in the city at liberty?

Hood. Yea forſooth, that I did.

Gage. Yea ſurely, and I was very glad, for I had well hoped you had been conformable. But I heard otherwiſe afterwards again, that you had leave of the keeper to go abroad, and ſpeak openly in the ſtreets, as you went up and down.

Woodman. Indeed ſo the marſhal told me to-day. But indeed I was never abroad ſince I came to priſon, but when I was ſent for; and indeed the ſame time I was abroad with my keeper, coming from the biſhop, and as I was coming, even not far from the Marſhalſea, I ſaw goodman Smith ſtand in a wain unloading of cheeſe, and I aſked him how he did, even as I went by, and never ſtaid for the matter, and thereupon it did ariſe. So I departed from them with my keeper to the Marſhalſea again, where now I am merry, I praiſe God, as a ſheep appointed to be ſlain.

The fourth Examination of Richard Woodman, before the Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Biſhop of Rocheſter, and a certain Doctor, with divers other Prieſts and Gentlemen, May 25, 1557.

I Was brought from the Marſhalſea to the ſaid biſhops and prieſts, ſitting in St. George's church in Southwark, by one of the marſhal's men, and one of the ſheriff's men. When I came before them, and had done my duty to them as nigh as I could, then ſaid the biſhop of Wincheſter:

What is your name?

Woodman. My name is Richard Woodman, forſooth.

Wincheſter. Ah Woodman! you were taken and apprehended for hereſy about three years ago, and were ſent to priſon in the King's-bench, and there remained a long time. Mine old lord of Chicheſter, being a learned famous man, well known in this realm of England, and almoſt throughout all chriſtendom, I think came to priſon to you, and there, and at other places, called you before him divers times, travailing with you, and perſuading you many times (becauſe he was your ordinary) to pluck you from your hereſies that you held, but he could by no means advertiſe you.

Whereupon you were delivered to the commiſſioners, and they could do no good with you neither. Then they ſent you unto my lord of London. My lord of London calling you before him divers times, means was made to him by your friends, that you might be releaſed. My lord having a good hope in you, that you would become an honeſt man, becauſe he had heard ſo of you in times paſt, yea and of yourſelf promiſing him, that you would go home, and recant the hereſies which you held, delivered you; ſending alſo a letter of your recantation to the commiſſary, that he ſhould ſee it done. But as ſoon as you were out of his hands, you were as bad as ever, and would never fulfil your promiſe, but have hid yourſelf in the woods, buſhes, dens, and caves, and thus have you continued ever ſince, till it was now of late. Then the ſheriff of that county (being a worſhipful man) hearing thereof, ſent certain of his men, and took you in a wood, and ſo carried you to his houſe. I cannot tell his name. What is your ſheriff's name?

Woodman. Forſooth, his name is Sir Edward Gage.

Biſhop. Well, you were apprehended for hereſy, and being at maſter Gage's three weeks or more, ye were gently treated there: he and other gentlemen perſuading you divers times, little prevailed.

Then you appealed to the biſhop of Chicheſter that now is. The ſheriff, like a worſhipful man, ſent you to him, and he hath travelled with you, and others alſo, and can do no good with you, whereupon we have ſent for you.

Woodman. Then I ſpake to him: for I thought he would be long before he would make an end. I thought he was a year in telling of thoſe lyes againſt me there already. Yea, I kept ſilence from good words, but it was great pain and grief to me (as David ſaid.) At length the fire was ſo kindled in my heart, that I could not chuſe but ſpeak with my tongue; for I feared leſt any of the company ſhould have departed before I had anſwered to his lyes, and ſo the goſpel ſlandered by my long ſilence. So I ſaid, my lord, I pray you let me now anſwer for myſelf, for it is time.

Biſhop. I permit you to anſwer to theſe things that I have ſaid.

Woodman. I thank God for that, and I think myſelf happy (as Paul ſaid when he was brought before king Aprippa) that I may this day anſwer for myſelf. My lord, I promiſe you there is never a word of your ſayings true that you have alledged againſt me.

Biſhop. I cannot tell, but thus it is reported of you. As for me, I never ſaw you before this day; but I am ſure it is not all lyes that I have ſaid, as you report.

Woodman. Yes, my lord, there is never a true word of that you have ſaid. And further, where you ſaid you never ſaw me before this day, you have both heard me and ſeen me before this day, I dare ſay.

Biſhop. I think I heard you indeed on Sunday, where you played the malapert fellow; but I cannot tell that I ſaw you. But I pray you, were you not taken in the woods by the ſheriff's men?

Woodman. No, I was taken near my houſe, I being in my houſe when they came, wherefore that is not true.

Biſhop. Were you not three weeks at the ſheriffs?

Woodman. Yes that I was, juſt a month, and was gently treated by him: I can ſay no otherwiſe; for I had meat and drink enough, and fair words.

Biſhop. It is not all lyes then, as it chanced. For I ſpake but of three weeks, and you confeſs a month yourſelf.

Woodman. Yet your tale is never the truer for that: for you ſaid, I was there three weeks for hereſy, which is not ſo; for I was not apprehended for hereſy at the firſt, neither did mine old lord of Chicheſter travail with me to pull me from hereſy, as you ſaid; for I held none then, neither do I now, as God knoweth, neither was I ſent to the commiſſioners, nor to the biſhop of London for hereſy, neither was I delivered to him for any ſuch thing, nor promiſed him to recant, as you ſaid I did. Wherefore I marvel you be not aſhamed to tell ſo many lyes, being a biſhop, that ſhould be an enſample to others.

Biſhop. Lo, what an arrant heretic he is; he will deny God; for he that denieth his own hand, denieth God.

Woodman. My lord, judge not, leſt ye be judged yourſelf: for as you have judged me, you ſhall be judged, if you repent not: and if I have ſet my hand to any recantation, let it be ſeen to my ſhame before this audience; for I will never deny mine own hand, by God's help.

Biſhop. It is not here now, but I think it may be had well enough; but if it cannot be found, by whom will you be tried?

Woodman. By my lord of London; for he dealt like a good man with me in that matter for which I was ſent to priſon. For it was upon the breach of a ſtatute, as maſter ſheriff here can tell. For he was ſheriff then, as he is now, and can tell how I was toſſed up and down from ſeſſions to ſeſſions; and becauſe I would not conſent that I had offended therein, they ſent me to priſon again.

Then my lord of Chicheſter being mine ordinary, and I being his tenant, came to me, to perſuade me to conſent to them, and to find myſelf in fault, when I was in none: to which I would not agree; but I deſired that he would ſee me releaſed of my wrong; but he ſaid he could not; but willed me or my friends to ſpeak to the commiſſioners for me, becauſe it was a temporal matter: and when I came before them, they ſent me to my lord of London, and my lord of London was certified by the hands of almoſt thirty men, both eſquires, gentlemen, and yeomen, the chief of all the country where I dwelt, that I had not offended in the matter that I was ſent to priſon for: whereupon he delivered me, not requiring me to recant hereſies, for I held none (as God knoweth) neither do I now: nor do I know for what I was ſent to priſon, no more than any man here knoweth; for I was taken away from my work.

Biſhop. No? why then did you not appeal to my lord of Chicheſter, if it were not for hereſy?

Woodman. Becauſe there was laid to my charge that I had baptized children, and married folks, which I never did, for I was no where miniſter. Wherefore I appealed to mine ordinary, to clear myſelf thereof, which I have done. Wherefore if any man hath any thing againſt me, let them ſpeak; for I came not hither to accuſe myſelf, neither will I.

Biſhop. Maſter ſheriff, can you tell upon what breach of ſtatute he was ſent to priſon firſt?

Sheriff. Yea forſooth, my lord, that I can.

Woodman. My lord, if you will give me leave, I will ſhew you the whole matter.

Biſhop. Nay, maſter ſheriff, I pray you tell the matter, ſeeing you know it.

The ſheriff. My lord, it was for ſpeaking to a curate in the pulpit, as I remember.

Biſhop. Ah, like enough, that he would not ſtick to reprove a curate. For did you not ſee how he faſhioned himſelf to ſpeak to me in the pulpit on Sunday? he played the impudent fellow with me; and therefore it was no great marvel though he played that part with another.

Woodman. Why, you will not blame me for that, I am ſure. For we ſpeak no other cauſe, but to purge ourſelves of thoſe hereſies that you laid to our charge. For theſe were your words; Good people, theſe men that be brought before us, being here, deny Chriſt to be God, and the Holy Ghoſt to be God (pointing to us with your left hand) which might ſeem to the whole audience, that you meant us all. Wherefore to clear ourſelves thereof, we ſpake, and ſaid we held no ſuch thing. And you ſaid you would cut out our tongues. But I am ſure you have no ſuch law.

Biſhop. Yes, that we have, if you blaſpheme, and as it chanced, I found ſuch amongſt you.

Woodman. Indeed after we ſpake, you declared who they were, but not before; for you ſpake generally. Wherefore we blaſphemed not, but purged ourſelves.

Biſhop. But I pray you, how can you purge yourſelf for ſpeaking to the curate, that it is not hereſy?

Woodman. Forſooth theſe be the words of the ſtatute; Whoſoever doth interrupt any preacher or preachers lawfully authorized by the queen's majeſty, or by any other lawful ordinary, that all ſuch ſhall ſuffer three months impriſonment, and furthermore be brought to the quarter ſeſſions, there (being ſorry for the ſame) to be releaſed upon his good behaviour one whole year. But I had not ſo offended, as it was well proved; for he that I ſpake to was not lawfully authorized, nor had put away his wife. Wherefore it was not lawful for him to preach by your own law; and therefore I brake not the ſtatute, though I ſpake to him.

Biſhop. I am glad I perceive this man ſpeaketh againſt prieſts marriages; he is not contented with prieſts that have wives. He is an honeſter man than I took him for, maſter ſheriff, have him away. I am glad he loveth not prieſts marriages.

Woodman. Then I would have anſwered to his ſaying, but he would in no wiſe hear me, but bade the ſheriff have me away. So the ſheriff took me by the hand, and plucked me away, and would not let me ſpeak; but going out of the chancel door, I ſaid; I would ſhew him the whole matter, if he would have given me leave, but ſeeing he will not, if he will let me go ſo, they ſhall ſee whether I will not go home to my wife and children, and keep them, as my bounden duty is, by the help of God. So I was ſent to the Marſhalſea again, where I now am merry, I praiſe God therefore, as a ſheep appointed to be ſlain.

Moreover, I was credibly informed by one of our brethren that heard our talk, that the biſhop ſaid when I was gone, that they would take me whilſt I was ſomewhat good. Which words ſeemed to many of the people that were there, that I ſpeak againſt prieſts marriages, but I did not, but did only anſwer to ſuch queſtions as he aſked me, as you ſhall perceive well by the words, if you mark them; which words were theſe:

How can you purge yourſelf from hereſy, for talking to the curate in the pulpit, and not offend the ſtatute, ſaid the biſhop? meaning thereby, I think, to have taken advantage of my words; but it was not God's will that he ſhould at that time. For I anſwered him by the words of the ſtatute, which words be as hereafter followeth, (that is) Whoſoever doth interrupt any preacher or preachers, lawfully authorized by the queen's majeſty, or by any other lawful ordinary, that all ſuch ſhall ſuffer three months impriſonment. But I prove that this man was not lawfully authorized to preach (by their own law) becauſe he had not put away his wife. For their law is, that no prieſt may ſay maſs, nor preach with the maſs, but he muſt firſt be ſeparated from his wife. That is, becauſe honeſt marriages be good and commendable, and theirs naught and abominable; therefore they cannot dwell together.

Now I give you all to underſtand, that I did not reprove this prieſt becauſe he had a wife, but becauſe he taught falſe doctrine, which grieved my ſoul, becauſe he had been a fervent preacher againſt the maſs, and all the idolatry thereof ſeven years before, and then came and held with it again; for which cauſe I reproved him in the pulpit: and the words that I ſpake to him are written in divers of my examinations at my firſt impriſonment. But in very deed I knew not of the ſtatute, when I reproved him. But becauſe I was ſent to priſon upon the breach of it, I bought a ſtatute book, and when I had peruſed it, I perceived I had not offended by their own law; and therefore ſtill when I was called to anſwer, I anſwered them with their own law. But yet they kept me in priſon a year and almoſt three quarters before I was releaſed. I was at mine anſwer for that eighteen times. If any do think I do not allow biſhops and prieſts marriages, let them look in my firſt examination tion before the biſhop of Chicheſter that now is during this my impriſonment, and there they ſhall find what I have ſaid in this matter. The truth is, I looked to be condemned with my brother that ſame day: but we may all ſee that they can do nothing but as God will permit them to do But when the time is full come, I truſt in God I ſhall run that joyful race that my brethren have done. Thus I commit you all into the hands of God, who is the preſerver, defender, and keeper of all his elect for evermore, Amen.

The fifth Examination of Richard Woodman before the Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Archdeacon of Canterbury, Dr. Langdale, a fat Prieſt, and others whoſe Names I know not, at St. Mary Overy's Church, in Southwark, June 15, 1557.

Wincheſter. WOODMAN, you were before us the laſt day, and would not be known in any wiſe that you were ſent to priſon for hereſy, and called for your accuſers, and ſtood ſtoutly in defending of yourſelf, and in your departing I had thought you had ſpoke againſt prieſts marriages, thinking by your words we ſhould have found you an honeſt man, and conformable, when we had called you before us again. You told ſuch a fair tale for yourſelf, as though you had been free from all that was laid to your charge: for you ſaid it was all lyes that I told againſt you; but ſince I have proved the contrary, as here is your own hand to ſhew. By which I have proved, that you reproved not the prieſt for lacking of authority, and becauſe he had not put away his wife, but becauſe you liked not his preaching. For indeed I took it, that you reproved him, becauſe he was not lawfully authorized, but I have proved the contrary ſince.

Woodman. I told you not that I did either reprove him for lack of authority, or becauſe I liked not his preaching, but I told you wherefore I was firſt ſent to priſon. For you ſaid it was for hereſy, and made a long tale againſt me. And indeed I told you that there was never a word of your ſayings true, but were all lyes, as they were indeed. For I never was ſent to priſon for hereſy, neither held I any then, nor do now, I take heaven and earth to witneſs; but I told you I was ſent to priſon upon the breach of a ſtatute, which was for ſpeaking to a prieſt in the pulpit, and for that cauſe the juſtices of that country thought that I had offended the ſtatute, and called me before them, and would have had me bound to my good behaviour, and becauſe I refuſed it they ſent me to priſon. And theſe be the words of the ſtatute, as I told you the laſt day. "If any man do interrupt any preacher or preachers, lawfully authorized by the queen's majeſty, or by any other lawful ordinary, that then every party that ſo offendeth, ſhall ſuffer three months impriſonment, and furthermore be brought to the quarter-ſeſſions, and there being ſorry for the ſame, and alſo bound for his good abearing one whole year, to be releaſed, or elſe to remain to priſon again."

And when I was in priſon I brought a ſtatute-book, which when I had peruſed over, I found by the words thereof that I had not offended, becauſe he was not lawfully authorized, as the biſhop of London was certified by the hands of almoſt thirty of the chief men in the country. For he had not put away his wife, and therefore the ſtatute took no place on me, as I told you the other day. Wherefore my lord of London, ſeeing me have ſo much wrong, did like a good man to me in that matter, and releaſed me. Now when I had told you this matter, you bade the ſheriff take me away; you ſaid you were glad I held againſt prieſts marriages, becauſe I anſwered to the queſtion you aſked me.

Fat prieſt. My lord, do you not hear what he ſaith by my lord of London? He ſaith he is a good man in that he releaſed him, but he meaneth that he is good in nothing elſe.

Woodman. What! can you tell what I mean? let every man ſay as he findeth; he did juſtly to me in that matter. I ſay, if he be not good in any thing elſe, as you ſay, he ſhall anſwer for it, and not I; for I have nothing to do with other matters.

Biſhop. Well, how ſay you? how liked you his preaching? I pray you tell us.

Woodman. That is no matter how I liked it. Howſoever I liked it, I offended not the ſtatute. Wherefore you have nothing to ſay to me for that I am ſure.

Biſhop. Well, how like you this then? Here is your own hand-writing. I am ſure you will not deny it. Will you look on it?

Woodman. It is mine own handy-work indeed, which by God's help I will never deny, nor ever yet did.

Biſhop. And here is good gear I tell you. I pray you hearken well to it: theſe be the words before the commiſſioners. How ſay you? do not you believe as ſoon as the words be ſpoken by the prieſt, that there remaineth neither bread nor wine, but only the very body of Chriſt, both fleſh and blood, as he was born of the virgin Mary. Theſe were the words of the commiſſioners.

And then thou ſaidſt, thou durſt not ſay otherwiſe than the ſcripture ſaith. I cannot find (ſay you) that it is the body of Chriſt before it is received by faith, bringing in the 22d of Luke, ſaying, Chriſt ſaid, "Take, eat, this is my body." So I cannot prove it is his body before it be eaten. Then ſaid the commiſſioners, did not Judas eat Chriſt's body? And if you can prove that Judas is ſaved (ſaid you) I muſt grant that he eat his body. For Chriſt ſaith in the ſixth of John, "Whoſo eateth my fleſh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raiſe him up at the laſt day;" which words prove, ſaid you, that if Judas eat the body of Chriſt, he muſt needs be ſaved. How ſay you now? Did Judas eat the body of Chriſt or not?

Woodman. Then I perceived he went about nothing but to catch words of me in his dioceſe, to condemn me with. Though I ſhould confound him never ſo much, I perceived that he was fully bent thereto. To whom I anſwered and ſaid:

I will anſwer you to no ſuch thing, for I am none of your dioceſe; wherefore I will not anſwer to you.

Biſhop. Thou art within my dioceſe, and thou haſt offended within my dioceſe; and therefore I will have to do with thee.

Woodman. Have to do with me if you will; but I will have nothing to do with you, I tell you plainly. For though I be now in your dioceſe, I have not offended in your dioceſe; if I have, ſhew me wherein.

Biſhop. Marry here is thine own hand-writing, which thou affirmedſt in my dioceſe.

Woodman. I do not deny but it is mine own hand-writing; but that does not prove that I have offended in your dioceſe; for that doth but declare what talk there was betwixt the commiſſioners and me, which you have nothing to do withal.

Biſhop. No? hold him a book, and thou ſhalt ſwear whether thou holdſt it now or not, and whether thou didſt not write in my dioceſe, as I think thou didſt; lay thy hand on the book.

Woodman. I will not be ſworn for you; for I am not your dioceſe; and therefore you have nothing to do with me: and as for the writing of the ſame, I never wrote a word of it in your dioceſe.

Langdale. No, did you not? my lord, let me ſee; I will find where you wrote it.

Then he took it and looked on it, and anon he found that I was ſent for out of the King's-bench to come before the commiſſioners.

Langdale. My lord, here you may ſee it was in the King's-bench, which is in your dioceſe.

Woodman. Although I was fetched out of the King's-bench, that proveth not that I wrote it there; nor did I, I promiſe you truly.

The fat prieſt. Where wrote you it then?

Woodman. Nay, I owe you not ſo much ſervice as to tell you; find it out as well as you can: for I perceive you go about to ſhed my blood.

Biſhop. It is no matter where it was written, it is here, and he denieth not but he wrote it. You ſhall hear more of it. Here the commiſſioners aſked you, whether Judas did eat any more than bare bread, and you anſwered, that he eat more than bare bread.

Whereupon they ſent you away back to the King's-bench again, and aſked you nothing more, for which cauſe (as you have written here) you had a hell burning in your conſcience. For you had thought they would have ſent a diſcharge to the King's-bench, and ſo let me go (ſaid you) and regiſter my name in their books, that I had granted that Judas did eat the body of Chriſt, and ſo the goſpel ſhould have been ſlandered by me. For which cauſe I was in ſuch caſe, I could ſcarcely eat, drink, or ſleep for that ſpace, as all my fellow priſoners can teſtify. If all you, I ſay, that go to the church of Satan, and there hear the deteſtable doctrine that they ſpit and ſpue out in their churches and pulpits, to the great diſhonour of God, if all you, I ſay, that come there, had ſuch a hell burning in your conſcience for the time, as I had till I came before them again, and had uttered my conſcience more plainly, I dare ſay you would come there no more. All this is your writing; is it not? how ſay you?

Woodman. I do not deny but it was mine own deed.

Biſhop. And I pray you, where is there ſuch ſpitting and ſpewing out falſe doctrine as you ſpeak of?

Woodman. In the ſynagogue of Satan, where God is diſhonoured with falſe doctrine.

Biſhop. And I pray you, where is one of them?

Woodman. Nay, that judge yourſelf; I came not hither to be a judge.

Biſhop. Well, here you have affirmed, that Judas (your maſter) eat more than bread, but yet he eat not the body of Chriſt, as you have declared by your words. For, you had a hell burning in your conſcience, becauſe you were in doubt, that the commiſſioners underſtood by your words, that Judas had eaten the body of Chriſt, becauſe you ſaid, he eat more than bare bread. Therefore thou hadſt a great ſort of devils in thee: for in hell be many devils: and therefore the devil and Judas is thy maſter, by thine own words.

Woodman. Nay, I defy Judas and the devil, and his ſervants; for they be your maſters, and you ſerve them, for any thing that I can ſee, I tell you truth.

Biſhop. Nay, they be thy maſters. For the devil is maſter where hell is, and thou ſaidſt thou hadſt a burning hell in thee. I pray thee tell me, how thou canſt avoid it, but that the devil was in thee by thine own ſaying?

Woodman. The hell that I had, was the loving correction of God towards me, to call me to repentance, that I ſhould not offend God and his people in leaving things ſo dark, as I left that. For which cauſe my conſcience bare me record, I had not done well, as at all times I have felt the ſting of it, when I have broken the commandments of God by any means, as all God's people do, I dare ſay, and it is the loving kindneſs of God towards them, to drive them to repentance. But it is to be thought, that your conſcience is never troubled, how wickedly ſoever you do. For if it were, it ſhould not be ſo ſtrange to you as you make it, which declareth plainly whoſe ſervant you be.

Biſhop. What a naughty fellow is this? This is ſuch a perverſe villain as I never talked with in all my life. Hold him a book, I will make him ſwear to anſwer directly to ſuch things as I will demand of him; and if he will not anſwer, I will condemn him.

Woodman. Call you me a fellow? I am ſuch a fellow, I tell you, that will drive you all to hell, if you conſent to the ſhedding of my blood, and you ſhall have blood to drink, as ſaith St. John in his Revelation, chap. 9. and being in hell, you ſhall be compelled to ſay for pain of conſcience, This is the man that we have had in deriſion, and thought his life madneſs, and his end to be without honour; but now we may ſee how he is counted among the ſaints of God, and we are puniſhed. This ſhall you ſay in hell, if you repent it not, if you do condemn me. This you ſhall find in the fifth chapter of the book of Wiſdom; and therefore take heed what you do, I give you counſel.

Biſhop. Wiſdom! what ſpeakeſt thou of wiſdom? thou never hadſt it; for thou art as very a fool as ever I heard ſpeak.

Woodman. Do you not know, that the fooliſh things of this world muſt confound the wiſe things? Wherefore it grieveth me not to be called a fool at your hands.

Biſhop. Nay, thou art none of thoſe fools; thou art an obſtinate fool, and an heretic. Lay hand on the book, and anſwer to ſuch things as will lay againſt thee.

Woodman. I will lay hand on the book for none of you all. You be not my biſhop; and therefore I will have nothing to do with you.

Biſhop. I will have to do with you. This man is without law, he careth not for the king nor queen, I dare ſay; for he will not obey their laws. Let me ſee the king's commiſſion. I will ſee whether he will obey that, or not.

Woodman. I would you loved the king and queen's majeſty no worſe than I do, if it pleaſed God: you would not do as you do then.

Biſhop. Hold him a book, he is a rank heretic. Thou ſhalt anſwer to ſuch things as I will demand of thee.

Woodman. I take heaven and earth to record I am no heretic, neither can I tell wherefore I am brought to priſon, no more than any man here can tell; and therewith I looked round about on the people, and ſaid to the biſhop, If you have any juſt cauſe againſt me worthy of death, lay it againſt me, and let me have it; for I refuſe not to die (I praiſe God) for the truth's ſake, if I had ten lives. If you have no cauſe, let me go home, I pray you, to my wife and children to ſee them kept, and other poor people that I would ſet to work by the help of God. I have ſet to work an hundred perſons before this, all the year together, and was unjuſtly taken from them; but God forgive them that did it, if it be his will.

Biſhop. Do you not ſee how he looketh about for help? but I would ſee any man ſhew thee a chearful countenance, and eſpecially you that be of my dioceſe. If any of you bid God ſtrengthen him, or take him by the hand, or embrace him, or ſhew him a chearful countenance, you ſhall be excommunicated, and ſhall not be received in again, till you have done open penance; and therefore beware of it.

Woodman. I look for no help of men, for God is on my ſide, I praiſe him for it; and therefore I needed not to care who be againſt me, neither do I care.

Then they cried, Away with him, and bring us another. So I was carried again to the Marſhalſea, where I am now merry (I praiſe God therefore) as a ſheep appointed to be ſlain. But for want of time, I have left out much of our talk; but this is the chiefeſt of it.

The ſixth and laſt Examination of Richard Woodman, written with his own Hand.

"BE it known unto all men by this preſent writing, that I Richard Woodman, ſometime of the pariſh of Warbleton, in the county of Suſſex, was condemned for God's everlaſting truth, July 16, 1557, by the biſhop of Wincheſter, in the church of St. Mary Overy's, in Southwark, there ſitting with him the ſame time the biſhop of Chicheſter, the archdeacon of Canterbury, Dr. Langdale, Mr. Roper, with a fat-headed prieſt, I can not tell his name. All theſe conſented to the ſhedding of my blood, upon this occaſion, as hereafter followeth.

I affirmed, that Judas received the ſacrament with a ſop and the devil withal; and becauſe I would not be ſworn upon a book, to anſwer directly to ſuch articles as he would declare to me; and becauſe I would not believe that there remained neither bread nor wine after the words of conſecration, and that the body of Chriſt could not be received of any but of the faithful: For theſe articles I was condemned, as hereafter ſhall follow more at large, by the help of God."

Firſt, the biſhop ſaid when I came before him.

Biſhop. You were before us on Monday laſt, and there you affirmed certain hereſies. How ſay you now? Do you hold them ſtill, or will you revoke them?

Woodman. I held no hereſies then, neither do I now, as the Lord knoweth.

Biſhop. No? did you not affirm, that Judas received bread? which is an hereſy, unleſs you tell what more than bread.

Woodman. Is it hereſy to ſay, Judas received no more than bread? I ſaid he received more than bare bread, for he received the ſame ſacrament that was prepared to ſhew forth the Lord's death, and becauſe he preſumed to eat without faith, he eat the devil withal, as the words of Chriſt declare; after he eat the ſop, the devil entered into him, as you cannot deny.

Biſhop. Hold him a book. I would have you anſwer directly, whether Judas did eat the body of Chriſt or no.

Woodman. I will anſwer no more, for I am not of your dioceſe; wherefore I will have nothing to do with you.

Biſhop. No? you be in my dioceſe, and you be of my dioceſe, becauſe you have offended in my dioceſe.

Woodman. I am not of your dioceſe, although I am in your dioceſe; and I was brought into your dioceſe againſt my will: and I have not offended in your dioceſe; if I have, tell me wherein.

Biſhop. Here is your own hand-writing, which is hereſy. Theſe be the words, "I cannot find (ſay you) that it is the body of Chriſt to any, before it is received in faith." How ſay you? is not this your own hand-writing?

Woodman. Yea, I do not deny but it is my own hand-writing; but when, or where was it written, or where were the words ſpoken?

Biſhop. Before the commiſſioners, and here is one of them; Maſter Roper, the words were ſpoken before you; were they not?

Roper. Yes indeed they were. Woodman, I am ſure you will not deny them; for you have written the words even as you ſpake them.

Woodman. No, Sir, indeed I will not deny but that I ſpake them, and am glad that you have ſeen it. For you may ſee by that whether I lye, or not.

Roper. Indeed the words be written word for word as you ſpake them.

Biſhop. Well, here you affirm, that it is your own deed. How ſay you now? will you be ſorry for it, and become an honeſt man?

Woodman. My lord, I truſt no man can ſay, but that I am an honeſt man; and as for that, I marvel that you will lay it to my charge, knowing that my lord of London diſcharged me of all matters that were laid againſt me, when I was releaſed of him.

Biſhop. You were releaſed, and it might happen, it was not laid to your charge then; therefore we lay it to your charge now, becauſe you be ſuſpected to be an heretic: and we may call you before us, and examine you upon your faith upon ſuſpicion.

Woodman. Indeed St. Peter willeth me to render an account of my hope that I have in God, and I am contented ſo to do, if it pleaſe my biſhop to hear me.

Chicheſter. Yes, I pray you let us hear it.

Woodman. I do believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and of all things viſible and inviſible. And in one Lord Jeſus Chriſt my Saviour, very God and very man. I believe in God the Holy Ghoſt, the Comforter of all God's elect people, and that he is equal with the Father and the Son. I believe the true catholic church, and all the ſacraments that belong thereto. Thus have I rendered an account of my hope, that I have of my ſalvation.

Biſhop. And how believe you in the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar? And with that they all put off their caps.

Woodman. I pray you be contented, for I will not anſwer to any more queſtions; for I perceive you go about to ſhed my blood.

Biſhop. No? hold him a book. If he refuſe to ſwear, he is an anabaptiſt, and ſhall be excommunicated.

Woodman. I will not ſwear for you, excommunicate me if you will. For you be not meet to take an oath; for you laid hereſies to my charge in yonder pulpit, which you are not able to prove; wherefore you be not meet to take an oath of any man. And as for me, I am not of your dioceſe, nor will have any thing to do with you.

Biſhop. I will have to do with thee, and I ſay thou art a ſtrong heretic.

Woodman. Yea, all truth is hereſy with you; but I am content to ſhew you my mind, how I believe on the ſacrament of the body and blood of Jeſus Chriſt, without flattering. For that you look for, I am ſure. But I will meddle no further, but what I hold myſelf of it. I will not meddle with any other man's belief on it.

Harpsfield. Why, I am ſure all men's faith ought to be alike.

Woodman. Yea, I grant you ſo, that all true chriſtians faith out to be alike. But I will anſwer for myſelf.

Harpsfield. Well, let us hear what you ſay to it.

Woodman. I do believe, that when I come to receive the ſacrament of the body and blood of Jeſus Chriſt, if it be truly miniſtered according to Chriſt's inſtitution, I coming in faith, as I truſt in God I will, whenſoever I come to receive it, I, believing that Chriſt was born for me, and that he ſuffered death for the remiſſion of my ſins, and that I ſhall be ſaved by his death and blood-ſhedding, and to receive the ſacrament of bread and wine in that remembrance, that then I do receive the whole Chriſt, God and man, myſtically by faith. This is my belief on the ſacrament.

Then they ſpake all at once, ſaying, Myſtically by faith!

Fat prieſt. What a fool art thou, Myſtically by faith! thou canſt not tell what myſtical is.

Woodman. If I be a fool, ſo take me: But God hath choſen ſuch fools of this world to confound ſuch wiſe things as you are.

Fat prieſt. I pray thee, what is myſtically?

Woodman. I take myſtically to be the faith that is in us, that the world ſeeth not, but God only.

Biſhop. He cannot tell what he ſaith. Anſwer to the ſacrament of the altar, whether it be not the body of Chriſt before it be received, and whether it be not the body of Chriſt to whomſoever receiveth it? Tell me, or elſe I will excommunicate thee.

Woodman. I have ſaid as much as I will ſay; excommunicate me if you will. I am none of your dioceſe. The biſhop of Chicheſter is mine ordinary. Let him do it if you will needs have my blood, that it may be required at his hands.

Chicheſter. I am not conſecrated yet, I told you when you were with me.

Woodman. No indeed, your kine bring forth nothing but cow-calves, as it now happeneth; meaning thereby he had not his bulls from Rome.

Then they were all in a great rage with me, and called me all to nought, and ſaid I was out of my wits, becauſe I ſpake fervently to every man's queſtion: all which I cannot remember, but I ſaid:

So Feſtus ſaid to Paul, when he ſpake the words of ſoberneſs and truth out of the Spirit of God, as I do. But as you have judged me, you be yourſelves. You will go to hell all the ſort of you, if you condemn me, if you repent it not with ſpeed.

Then my keeper, and the ſheriff's deputy Fuller, rebuked me, becauſe I ſpake ſo ſharply to them. And I ſaid, I pray you let me alone; I muſt anſwer for my life.

Then there was much ado that I ſhould keep ſilence, and ſo I held my peace. Then ſpake the biſhop of Winchester and the archdeacon of Canterbury, ſaying; We go not about to condemn thee, but go about to ſave thy ſoul, if thou wilt be ruled, and do as we would have thee.

Woodman. To ſave my ſoul? nay, you cannot ſave my ſoul. My ſoul is ſaved already, I praiſe God. There can no man ſave my ſoul, but Jeſus Chriſt; and he it is that hath ſaved my ſoul before the foundation of the world was laid.

Fat prieſt. What an hereſy is that, my lord! here is an hereſy. He ſaith his ſoul was ſaved before the foundations of the world were laid. Thou canſt not tell what thou ſayeſt. Was thy ſoul ſaved before it was?

Woodman. Yes, I praiſe God, I can tell what I ſay, and I ſay the truth. Look in the firſt of the Epheſians, and there you ſhall find it, where Paul ſaith, chap. 1. "Bleſſed be God the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who has bleſſed us with all manner of ſpiritual bleſſings in heavenly things, by Chriſt, according as he hath choſen us in himſelf, before the foundation of the world was laid, that we ſhould be holy and without blame before him through love, and thereto were we predeſtinated." Theſe be the words of Paul, and I believe they be moſt true. And therefore it is my faith, in and by Jeſus Chriſt, that ſaveth, and not you or any man elſe.

Fat prieſt. What! Faith without works! St. James ſaith, Faith without works is dead, and we have free will to do good works.

Woodman. I would not have you think, that I diſallow good works. For a good faith cannot be without good works. Yet not of ourſelves, but it is the gift of God, as ſaith St. Paul to the Philippians, chap. 2. "It is God that worketh in us both to will and to do, even of his good pleaſure."

Biſhop. Make an end; anſwer to me. Here is your ordinary, the archdeacon of Canterbury; he is made your ordinary by my lord cardinal, and he hath authority to examine you of your faith upon a book, to anſwer to ſuch articles as he will lay to you: and I pray you refuſe it not; for the danger is great if you do. Wherefore we deſire you to ſhew yourſelf a ſubject in this matter.

Then they ſpake all, and ſaid; Lo, my lord deſireth you gently to anſwer to him, and ſo we do all. For if you refuſe to take an oath, he may excommunicate you. For my lord cardinal may put whom he will in the biſhop's office, until he is conſecrated.

Woodman. I know not ſo much. If you will give me time to learn the truth of it (if I can prove it to be as you ſay) I will tell you my mind in any thing that he ſhall demand of me, without any flattering.

Prieſt. My lord and all we tell thee it is true; and therefore anſwer to him.

Woodman. I will believe none of you all, for you be turncoats and changelings, and be wavering minded, as St. James ſaith; you be neither hot nor cold, as St. John ſaith, therefore God will ſpue you out of his mouth. Wherefore I can believe none of you all, I tell you truth.

Biſhop. What! be we turncoats and changelings? what meaneſt thou by that?

Woodman. I mean, that in king Edward's time you taught the doctrine that was ſet forth then, every one of you, and now you teach the contrary; and therefore I call you turncoats and changelings, as I may well enough. Which words made the moſt part of them to quake.

Biſhop. Nay, not all as it chanced.

Woodman. No? I pray where were you then?

Biſhop. I was in the Tower, as the lieutenant will bear me record.

Woodman. If you were in the Tower, it was not therefore, I dare ſay, it was for ſome other matter.

Then they all took heart of grace, and ſaid; My lord, he comes to examine you, we think: if he will not anſwer to the articles, you had beſt excommunicate him.

Biſhop. He is the naughtieſt varlet heretic that ever I knew. I will read the ſentence againſt him.

Then they ſpake all at once, and I anſwered them as faſt as I could. But I cannot remember all, the words came out ſo quick, I ſpared them not, I praiſe God therefore; for I ſpake freely.

Then they that ſtood by rebuked me, and ſaid; You cannot tell to whom you ſpeak, I think.

Woodman. No? think you ſo? they be but men. I am ſure I have ſpoken to as good as they be, and better than they will ever be, for any thing that I can ſee, if they repent not with ſpeed.

Biſhop. Give ear; for I will read ſentence againſt you.

Woodmam. Will you ſo? wherefore will you? you have no juſt cauſe to excommunicate me; and therefore if you do condemn me, you will be condemned in hell, if you repent not: and I praiſe God, I am not afraid to die for God's ſake, if I had a hundred lives.

Biſhop. For God's ſake? nay, for the devil's ſake. Thou ſayeſt that thou art not afraid to die; no more was Judas that hanged himſelf, as thou wilt kill thyſelf wilfully, becauſe thou wilt not be ruled.

Woodman. Nay, I defy the devil, Judas, and all their members. And Judas's fleſh was not afraid, but his ſpirit and conſcience was afraid, and there deſpaired and hung himſelf. But I praiſe God, I feel no lothſomeneſs in my fleſh to die, but a joyful conſcience, and a willing mind thereto. Wherefore my fleſh is ſubdued to it, I praiſe God; and therefore I am not afraid of death.

Chicheſter. Woodman, for God's ſake be ruled. You know what you ſaid to me at my houſe. I could ſay more, if I would.

Woodman. Say what you can; the moſt fault that you found in me was, becauſe I praiſed the living God, and becauſe I ſaid, I praiſe God, and the Lord; which you ought to be aſhamed of, if you have any grace; for I told you where the words were written.

Biſhop. Well, how ſay you? will you confeſs that Judas received the body of Chriſt unworthily? tell me plainly.

Woodman. My lord, if you, or any of you all can prove before all this audience, in all the Bible, that any man ever eat the body of Chriſt unworthily, then I will be with you in all things that you will demand of me; of which matter I deſire all this people to be witneſs.

Prieſt. Will you ſo? then we ſhall agree well enough. St. Paul ſaith ſo.

Woodman. I pray you where ſaith he ſo? rehearſe the words.

Prieſt. In the eleventh chapter of the firſt to the Corinthians he ſaith, "Whoſo eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily, eateth and drinketh his own damnation, becauſe he makes no difference of the Lord's body."

Woodman.

Woodman. Do theſe words prove that Judas eat the body of Chriſt unworthily? I pray you let me ſee them. They were contented. Then ſaid I, Theſe be the words even that you ſaid: Good people hearken well to them, "Whoſo eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily:" he ſaith not, "Whoſo eateth of this body unworthily, or drinketh of this blood unworthily: but he ſaith, "Whoſo eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily (which is the ſacrament) eateth and drinketh his own damnation," becauſe he maketh no difference between the ſacrament which repreſenteth the Lord's body, and other bread and drink. Here (good people) you may all ſee they are not able to prove their ſayings true. Therefore I cannot believe them in any thing that they do.

Biſhop. Thou art a rank heretic indeed. Art thou an expounder? Now I will read ſentence againſt thee.

Woodman. Judge not leſt you be judged. For as you have judged me, you be yourſelf. Then he read the ſentence. Why, ſaid I, will you read the ſentence againſt me, and cannot tell wherefore?

Biſhop. Thou art an heretic, and therefore thou ſhalt be excommunicated.

Woodman. I am no heretic, I take heaven and earth to witneſs, I defy all heretics, and if you condemn me, you will be damned, if you repent not. But God give you grace to repent all, if it be his will; and ſo he read forth the ſentence in Latin, but what he ſaid, God knoweth, and not I. God be judge between them and me. When he had done, I would have talked my mind to them, but they cried, Away, away with him. So I was carried to the Marſhalſea again, where I am, and ſhall be as long as it ſhall pleaſe God; and I praiſe God moſt heartily, that ever he hath elected, and predeſtinated me to come to ſo high dignity, as to bear rebuke for his name's ſake; his name be praiſed therefore, for ever and ever, Amen.

And thus you have the examinations of this bleſſed Woodman, or rather Goodman; wherefore it may appear as well the great grace and wiſdom of God in that man, as alſo the groſs ignorance and barbarous cruelty of his adverſaries, eſpecially of Dr. White biſhop of Wincheſter. Now followeth likewiſe the effect of his letter.

A godly Letter of Richard Woodman, written to Mrs. Roberts of Hawkhurſt.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from his Son our alone Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, by the operation of the Holy Ghoſt, be multiplied plenteouſly upon you, dear ſiſter Roberts, that you may the more joyfully bear the croſs of Chriſt that ye are under, unto the end, to your only comfort and conſolation, and to all our brethren and ſiſters that are round about you, both now and ever, Amen.

In my moſt humble wiſe I commend me unto you, and to all our brethren and ſiſters in thoſe parts, that love our Lord unfeignedly, certifying you, that I and all my brethren with me are merry and joyful, we praiſe God, looking daily to be diſſolved from theſe our mortal bodies, according to the good pleaſure of our heavenly Father, praiſing God alſo for your conſtancy, and gentle benevolence, that you have ſhewed unto God's elect people, in this troubleſome time of perſecution, which may be a ſure pledge and token of God's good will and favour towards you, and to all others that hear thereof. For bleſſed are the merciful, for they ſhall obtain mercy. Wherefore the fruits declare alway what the tree is. For a good man or women, out of the good treaſure of their heart, bring forth good things.

Wherefore (dear ſiſter) it is not as many affirm in theſe days (the more to be lamented) that ſay God aſketh but a man's heart; which is the greateſt injury that can be deviſed againſt God and his word. For St. James ſaith; Shew me thy faith by thy deeds, and I will ſhew thee my faith by my deeds; ſaying, The devils believe and tremble for fear, and yet ſhall be but devils ſtill, becauſe their minds were never to do good. Let us not therefore be like them, but let our faith be made manifeſt to the whole world by our deeds, and in the midſt of a crooked and perverſe nation, as St. Paul ſaith, let our light ſhine as in a dark place.

O dear hearts, now is the goſpel of God overwhelmed with many black and troubleſome clouds of perſecution, for which cauſe very few go about to have their eyes made clear by the true light of the goſpel, for fear of loſing their treaſures of this world, which are but vain, and ſhall periſh.

Let us not therefore be like unto them who light their candle, and put it under a buſhel; but let us ſet our candle upon a candleſtick, that it may give light unto all men that are in the houſe: that is to ſay, let all the people of the houſhold of God ſee our good works, in ſuffering all things patiently that ſhall be laid upon us for the goſpel's ſake, if it be death itſelf. For Chriſt died for us, leaving us an example, that we ſhould follow his ſteps; and as he hath given his life for us, ſo ought we to give our lives for the defence of the goſpel, to the comfort of our brethren.

How is it then that ſome will ſay, that their faith is good, and yet they do all the deeds of antichriſt the devil, and be not aſhamed to alledge certain ſcriptures to maintain their wickedneſs? St. Paul ſaith; To believe with the heart juſtifieth, and to confeſs with the mouth maketh a man ſafe. Oh good God, here may all men ſee, that no man or woman can have a true faith, unleſs they have deeds alſo; and he that doubteth, is like the waves of the ſea toſſed about by the wind, and can look for no good thing at the Lord's hand. May not a man judge all ſuch to be like thoſe which St. John ſpeaketh of, that be neither hot nor cold; and therefore God will (ſaith he) ſpue them out of his mouth? if we judge evil of ſuch, have not they given us occaſion? had it not been better for them to have had a millſtone tied about their necks, and to have been caſt into the ſea, than they ſhould give ſuch offences to God's elect people in condemning them as they do, in going to the ſynagogues of Satan; and there to receive the mark of the beaſt, in that they ſee and hear God blaſphemed there, and hold their peace? Doth not that declare to the whole world, that they allow their doings to be good? and theſe do not only defile themſelves, but alſo be an occaſion to confirm the papiſts in their popery, and ſo be an occaſion of our weak brother's falling, which will be all required at their hands, which will be too heavy a burden for them to bear, if they repent it not with ſpeed. For they that know their maſter's will, and do it not, ſhall be beaten with many ſtripes. Oh, do we not perceive, that now is the acceptable time that Chriſt ſpeaketh of? yea even now is the axe put to the roots of the trees, ſo that every tree that bringeth not forth good fruits now, muſt be hewn down, and caſt into the fire.

Now is the Lord come with his fan in his hand, to try the wheat from the chaff. The wheat will he gather into his barn, and the chaff he will burn as aforeſaid. Now is the time come that we muſt go meet the bridegroom with oil in our lamps. We are alſo bidden to the feaſt, let us make no excuſes. Yea our maſter hath delivered his talents unto us, God give us grace to occupy them well, that at his coming he may receive his own with advantage. Yea, now is the Lord come to ſee if there be any fruit upon his trees; ſo that if the Lord come and find none, he will ſerve us as he did the wild fig-tree, that is, never fruit ſhall grow on him more; alſo, if we go to meet the bridegroom without oil in our lamps, and ſhould go to buy, the doubt is, we ſhould be ſerved as were the fooliſh virgins; that was, God ſaid to them, Depart, I know you not. Or if we ſhould make excuſes to come to the feaſt, others ſhould be bidden in our rooms; if we occupy not our talents well, they ſhall be taken from us, and given to others, and all ſuch unprofitable ſervants ſhall be caſt into priſon in hell, where ſhall be weeping and gnaſhing of teeth.

Oh good God! what a ſort of fearful ſayings are here contained? what chriſtian heart will not hearken diligently hereto? Oh, may not all people perceive now that this is the time that our maſter Chriſt ſpeaketh of, that the father ſhould be againſt the ſon, and the ſon againſt the father, and one brother againſt another; that the brother ſhall deliver the brother to death: yea, and that the wicked ſhall ſay all manner of wicked ſayings againſt us for his name's ſake? which I have well found by experience, I praiſe God therefore, that hath given me ſtrength to bear it. For I think there can be no evil deviſed but it hath been imagined againſt me, and that of my familiar friends, as David ſaith: but I praiſe my Lord God, they are not able to prove any of their ſayings true, but that they go about to find fault in them that God hath choſen, becauſe they themſelves will not take up their croſs and follow Chriſt; and therefore they ſpeak evil of the thing that they know not, who ſhall give account for it before him that is ready to judge both the quick and the dead.

But my truſt is, that all the people of God will be ruled by the counſel of Saint John, ſaying; My ſheep will hear my voice, ſtrangers they will not hear: meaning thereby, that ye ſhould not believe ſtrangers, counting them ſtrangers that go about to ſubvert the goſpel. Wherefore mark well what they be, and try them well before you give credit to them, according to Saint John's counſel in his epiſtle, ſaying; Believe not every ſpirit, but try the ſpirits whether they be of God, or not; meaning thereby, that they that be not of God, will ſpeak good of none but of them that be as they be. Wherefore (dear ſiſter) be of good cheer, and give no credit to ſuch people, whatſoever you hear them ſay. For I have no miſtruſt, by God's help, but that all the world ſhall ſee and know that my blood ſhall not be dear in mine own ſight, whenſoever it ſhall pleaſe God to give mine adverſaries leave to ſhed it. I do earneſtly believe, that God, which hath begun this good work in me, will perform it to the end, as he hath given me grace, and will always, to bear this eaſy yoke and light burden; which I have always found, I praiſe my Lord God.

For when I have been in priſon, wearing ſometimes bolts, ſometimes ſhackles, ſometimes lying on the bare ground, ſometimes ſitting in the ſtocks, ſometimes bound with cords, that all my body has been ſwoln, much like to be overcome for the pain that hath been in my fleſh, ſometimes fain to lie without in the woods and fields, wandering to and fro, few, I ſay, that durſt keep my company for fear of the rulers, ſometimes brought before the juſtices, ſheriffs, lords, doctors, and biſhops, ſometimes called dog, ſometimes devil, heretic, whoremonger, traitor, thief, deceiver, with divers other ſuch like; yea, and even they that did eat of my bread, that ſhould have been moſt my friends by nature, have betrayed me: yet for all this I praiſe my Lord God that hath ſeparated me from my mother's womb, and all this that hath happened unto me hath been eaſy, light, and moſt delectable and joyful of any treaſure that ever I poſſeſſed; for I praiſe God they are not able to prove one jot or tittle of their ſayings true. But that way that they call hereſy, I ſerve my Lord God, and at all times before whomſoever I have been brought, God hath given me mouth and wiſdom, where-againſt all my adverſaries have not been able to reſiſt, I praiſe God therefore.

Wherefore (dear ſiſter) be of good comfort with all your brethren and ſiſters, and take no thought what you ſhall ſay, for it ſhall be given you the ſame hour, according to the promiſes, as I have always found, and as you and all other of God's elect ſhall well find, when the time is full come. And whereas I and many others have hoped, that this perſecution would have been at an end before this time, now I perceive God will have a further trial to root out all diſſemblers, that no man ſhould rejoice in himſelf, but he that rejoiceth, ſhall rejoice of God.

Wherefore if prophecy ſhould fail, and tongues ſhould ceaſe, yet love muſt endure. For fear hath painfulneſs, but a perfect love caſteth out all fear: which love I have no miſtruſt but God hath poured it upon you ſo abundantly, that nothing in the world ſhall be able to ſeparate you from God. Neither high nor low, rich nor poor, life nor death, ſhall be able to put you from Chriſt; but by him I truſt you ſhall enter into New Jeruſalem, there to live for ever, beholding the glory of God with the ſame eyes that you now have, and all other faithful people that continue to the end. Give all honour and glory to God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghoſt, three perſons and one God, to be honoured now and ever, Amen.

After theſe examinations thus had and commenced between Richard Woodman and the biſhops, he was (as is aforeſaid) judged by ſentence of condemnation, and ſo deprived of his life; with whom alſo were burned nine others, to wit, five men, and four women, which were taken not paſt two or three days before their judgment. The names of which being alſo before expreſſed, here again follow in this order; Richard Woodman, George Stevens, William Maynard, Alexander Hoſman his ſervant, Thomaſine a Wood, his maid, Margery Moris, James Moris, her ſon, Denis Burgis, Aſhdowne's wife, Grove's wife.

Theſe perſons above-named were put to death at Lewes the 22d of June.

Of which number the eight laſt were apprehended (as is ſaid) either the ſame day, or the ſecond or third day before, and ſo with the ſaid Woodman and Stevens, were committed together to the fire; in which ſpace no writ could come down from London to the juſtices, for their burning. Wherefore what is to be ſaid to ſuch juſtices, or what reckoning they will make to God and to the laws of this realm, I refer that to them that have to do in the matter. The like whereof is to be found alſo of other juſtices, who without any lawful writ of diſcharge, or order of law, have unlawfully and diſorderly burnt the ſervants of Chriſt (whoſe blood the law both may and alſo ought to revenge;) eſpecially at Saliſbury, Canterbury, and Garnſey. But concerning theſe matters, though man's law do wink, or rather ſleep at them, yet they ſhall be ſure God's law will find ſuch murderers out at length. I pray God the doers may repent in time.

One Ambroſe died in Maidſtone priſon, about the ſame time.

The Condemnation of Mr. Richard Luſh.

IN the regiſters of Gilbert, biſhop of Bath and Wells, I find a certificate made to king Philip and queen Mary, of one Richard Luſh, there condemned and given to the ſecular power to be burned for the cauſe of hereſy, whoſe affirmations in the ſaid certificate be expreſſed in tenor and effect, as follows:

1. For denying the verity of the body and blood of Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar.

2. Item, For denying auricular confeſſion to be made to the prieſt.

3. Item, For affirming only to be three ſacraments; to wit, of baptiſm, of the ſupper, and of matrimony.

4. Item, For refuſing to call the Lord's ſupper by the name of the ſacrament of the altar.

5. Item, For denying purgatory, and that prayer and alms profit not the dead body.

6. Item, That images are not to be ſuffered in the church, and that all that kneel to images at the church, be idolaters.

7. Item, That they which were burnt of late for religion, died God's ſervants and good martyrs.

8. Item, For condemning the ſingle life of prieſts, and other votaries.

9. Item, For denying the univerſal and catholic church, meaning belike the church of Rome.

For theſe aſſertions, as there are expreſſed, he was condemned, and committed to the ſheriffs, and alſo a certificate directed by the biſhop aforeſaid, to the king and queen.

A Note of John Hullier, Miniſter and Martyr, burned at Cambridge.

CONcerning the ſtory of John Hullier martyr, partly mentioned before, [Page 573.] for the more full declaration of the death and martyrdom of that good man, becauſe the ſtory is before but rawly and imperfectly touched; for the more perfecting thereof, I thought thereunto to add that which ſince hath come to my hand, as followeth.

Firſt, John Hullier was brought up at Eton-college, and after, according to the foundation of that houſe, he was elected ſcholar in King's College, where alſo not tarrying full three years of probation, before he was fellow of the college, he after ſome time was one of the ten conducts in the King's College, which was anno 1539. Then at length, in proceſs of time, he came to be curate of Babram, three miles from Cambridge, and went afterwards to Lynn; where he, having divers conflicts with the papiſts, was from thence carried to Ely, to Dr. Thurlby, then biſhop there; who, after divers examinations, ſent him to Cambridge caſtle, where he remained but a while.

From thence he was conveyed to the town priſon, commonly called the Tolbooth, lying there almoſt a quarter of a year, while at length he was cited to appear at Great St. Mary's on Palm-Sunday eve, before divers doctors, both divines and lawyers, amongſt whom was chiefeſt Dr. Shaxton, Dr. Young, Dr. Sedgewike, Dr. Scot, and others. Where after examination, becauſe he would not recant, he was firſt condemned, the ſentence being read by Dr. Fuller.

Then conſequently he was degraded after their popiſh manner, with ſcraping crown and hands. When they had degraded him, he ſaid cheerfully, This is the joyfulleſt day that ever I ſaw, and I thank you all, that ye have delivered and lightened me of all this paltry.

In the mean time whilſt it was doing, one ſtanding by, asked Hullier what book he had in his hand. Who anſwered, a Teſtament. Whereat this man in a rage took it and threw it violently from him. Then was he given over to the ſecular powers, Braſey being mayor, who carried him to priſon again, took from him all his books, writings, and papers.

On Maunday Thurſday coming to the ſtake, he exhorted the people to pray for him, and after holding his peace, and praying to himſelf, one ſpake to him, ſaying, The Lord ſtrengthen thee. Whereat a ſerjeant, named Brieſly, ſtayed, and bade him hold his tongue, or elſe he ſhould repent it.

Nevertheleſs Hullier anſwered and ſaid, Friend, I truſt that as God hath hitherto begun, ſo he will alſo ſtrengthen me, and finiſh his work upon me. I am bidden to a Maundy, whither I truſt to go, and there to be ſhortly. God hath laid the foundation, as I by his aid will end it.

Then going to a ſtool (prepared for him to ſit on) to have his hoſe plucked off, he deſired the people to pray for him again, and alſo to bear witneſs, that he died in the right faith, and that he would ſeal it with his blood, certifying them, that he died in a juſt cauſe, and for the teſtimony of the verity and truth, and that there was no other rock but Jeſus Chriſt to build upon, under whoſe banner he fought, and whoſe ſoldier he was; and yet ſpeaking, he turned himſelf toward the Eaſt, and exhorted the people there likewiſe.

George Boyes, Henry Barley, and one Gray, all three arch-prieſts of Trinity-College, Cambridge, ſtood on a bank hard by. This Boyes was one of the proctors of the univerſity that year. To whom Mr. Gray ſpake, ſaying, Hear ye not, maſter proctor, what blaſphemy this fellow uttereth? ſurely it is ill done to ſuffer him.

At whoſe words this Boyes ſpake with a loud voice. Mr. Mayor, what mean ye? if ye ſuffer him thus to take liberty, I tell ye, the council ſhall hear of it, and we take you not to be the queen's friend. He is a pernicious perſon, and may do more harm than you are aware of. Whereat ſimple Hullier, as meek as a lamb, taking the matter very patiently, made no anſwer, but made himſelf ready, uttering his prayer. Which done, he went meekly himſelf to the ſtake, and with chains being bound, was beſet with reed and wood, ſtanding in a pitch barrel, and the fire being ſet to, not marking the wind, it blew the flame to his back. Then he feeling it, began earneſtly to call upon God. Nevertheleſs his friends perceiving the fire to be ill kindled, cauſed the ſerjeants to turn it, and fire it to that place where the wind might blow it to his face.

That done, there was a parcel of books which were caſt into the fire, and by chance a communion book fell between his hands, who receiving it joyfully, opened it, and read ſo long till the force of the flame and ſmoak cauſed him that he could ſee no more; and then he fell again to prayer, holding his hands up to heaven, and the book between his arms, next to his heart, thanking God for ſending him it: and at that time the day being very fair and hot, yet the wind was ſomewhat up, and it cauſed the fire to be the fiercer, and when all the people thought he had been dead, he ſuddenly uttered theſe words; Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit, dying very meekly.

The place where he was burned, is called Jeſus Green, not far from Jeſus College. Seagar gave him certain gunpowder, but little to the purpoſe; for he was dead before it took fire. All the people prayed for him, and many a tear was ſhed for him. Which the papiſts ſeeing, cried, he was not to be prayed for, and being but a damned man, it could profit him nothing: nevertheleſs they continued praying; whereat the papiſts fell into ſuch a rage, that they menaced them with terrible threatnings to ward. His fleſh being conſumed, his bones ſtood upright, even as if they had been alive. Of the people, ſome took what they could get of him, as pieces of bones. One had his heart, which was diſtributed ſo far as it would go; one took the ſcalp, and looked for the tongue, but it was conſumed except the very root.

Simon Miller and Elizabeth Cooper burnt at Norwich.

IN the month of July next followed the martyrdom of Simon Miller and Elizabeth Cooper. This Simon dwelling in the town of Lynn, a pious and zealous man in the knowledge of the Lord, and his truth, deteſting and abhorring the contrary enforced religion then ſet forth, came from Lynn to Norwich, where he ſtanding in the preſs, and hearing of the people, began to ask them, as they came out of the church from their popiſh ſervice, where he might go to have the communion. At which divers marvelled to hear and ſee his boldneſs.

One

One that was an evil-diſpoſed papiſt, hearing the ſame, ſaid, that if he would needs go to a communion, he would go bring him thither where he ſhould be ſped to his purpoſe. Whereupon he was brought to the chancellor of Norwich (whoſe name was Dunning) who, after a few words, and ſmall talk paſſed with this examinate, committed him to ward.

In the mean while as he was in examination, he had in his ſhoe his confeſſion, written in a certain paper, whereof a piece appearing above his ſhoe, was ſpied and taken out. The chancellor asking if he would ſtand to the confeſſion of the ſame faith therein contained, he conſtantly affirmed the ſame. Whereupon, as is ſaid, he was committed. Thus the ſaid Simon being in the biſhop's houſe, under the cuſtody of the keeper there called maſter Felow, how it happened is not certain, whether by gentleneſs of the keeper (who was ſomewhat gentle that way) or by leave given of the biſhop, or elſe whether he had condeſcended on purpoſe to their articles, he was diſmiſſed, and went home to his houſe at Lynn, where he continued a certain ſpace, while he had diſpoſed and ſet all things in order.

That done, he returned again to the biſhop's houſe to his priſon and keeper, till the time at length, he conſtantly abiding in his profeſſed purpoſe, and defence of God's truth, was, by the ſaid biſhop and his chancellor, condemned, and committed to the fire about the 13th day of July.

With this Simon Miller alſo was burnt one Elizabeth Cooper (as is aforeſaid) a pewterer's wife, dwelling in St. Andrew's pariſh in Norwich, where ſhe had before recanted; and being unquiet for the ſame, and greatly troubled inwardly, at the laſt ſhe came into the ſaid St. Andrew's church, the people being at their popiſh ſervice, and there ſtanding in the ſame, ſaid ſhe revoked her recantation, before made in that place, and was heartily ſorry that ever ſhe did it, willing the people not to be deceived, neither to take her doings before for an example, &c. Theſe or ſuch words ſhe ſpake in the church.

Then cried one Bacon of the ſaid pariſh, laying his arms abroad, ſaying, Mr. Sheriff, will you ſuffer this? and repeating the ſame, urged him to go from the church to her houſe, at whoſe knocking ſhe came down, and was taken and ſent to priſon.

The ſheriff (named Mr. Thomas Sutton) and ſhe had before been ſervants together in one houſe; and for the friendſhip he bare unto her, and more for the goſpel's ſake, he was very loth to do it, but that he was enforced by thoſe other perſons before mentioned, much againſt his own conſcience, which he now earneſtly repenteth.

This good woman being condemned with Simon Miller to be burnt at the ſtake, when the fire came to her, ſhe a little ſhrunk thereat, with a voice crying, Ah! When the ſaid Simon Miller heard the ſame, he put his hand behind him towards her, and deſired her to be ſtrong and of good cheer: for good ſiſter (ſaid he) we ſhall have a joyful and ſweet ſupper. At which ſhe being as it ſeemed, thereby ſtrengthened, ſtood as ſtill and quiet, as one moſt glad to finiſh that good work, which ſhe before had ſo happily begun. And thus ſhe and her companion joyfully ended their lives, committing their ſouls into the hands of Almighty God.

The Martyrdom of five Men and five Women at Colcheſter, ſix in the Forenoon, and four in the Afternoon.

AS it is no new thing in thoſe whom we call prelates and prieſts of the church, to be raiſers up of perſecution againſt Chriſt and his poor flock: ſo it is much to be marvelled, or rather lamented, that noble perſons, and men of honour and worſhip, ſhould be made ſuch miniſters, to ſerve the deſires of theſe tyrants, as is now common, as well in the ſorrowful reign of the late queen Mary, as namely in this preſent ſtory is to be remarked.

And firſt thou remembereſt, gentle reader, how mention was made a little before of twenty-two, which were ſent up priſoners together from Colcheſter to London, by the earl of Oxford, the lord Darcy, Mr. Tyrrel, of St. Oſithes, and other commiſſioners and juſtices, &c. which twenty-two, as aforeſaid, through a gentle ſubmiſſion put to them, were afterwards releaſed, and ſet at liberty.

In the number of theſe aforeſaid twenty-two, was one William Munt, of Muchbentley, in Eſſex, huſbandman, with Alice, his wife, and Roſe Allin, maid, daughter to the ſaid Alice Munt; who coming home again to their houſe at Muchbentley aforeſaid, refrained themſelves from the unſavoury ſervice of the popiſh church, and frequented the company of good men and women, who gave themſelves diligently to reading and calling upon the name of God through Chriſt: whereby they ſo fretted the wicked prieſt of the town, called Sir Thomas Tye, and others like unto him, that laying their heads togethers they made a ſupplication to the lord Darcy, in the name of the whole pariſh: the ſubſtance whereof is as followeth:

A Supplication to the Lord Darcy, and by him delivered to Sir John Kingſton, Prieſt and Commiſſary.

PLeaſeth your honourable lordſhip to be advertiſed, that we confeſs whilſt your good lordſhip lay here in the country, the people were ſtayed in good order, to our great comfort: but ſince your lordſhip's departure, they have made digreſſion from good order in ſome places, and namely in the pariſh of Muchbentley, by reaſon of three ſeditious perſons, William Munt, and his wife, and Roſe, her daughter, who by their colourable ſubmiſſion (as it doth appear) were diſmiſſed, and ſent down from the biſhop of London; and ſince their coming home they have not only in their own perſons ſhewed manifeſt ſigns and tokens of diſobedience, in not coming to the church, nor yet obſerving other good orders, but alſo moſt maliciouſly and ſeditiouſly have ſeduced many from coming to the church, and from obeying all other good orders; mocking alſo thoſe that frequent the church, and calling them church-owls, and blaſphemouſly calling the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar a blind god, with divers ſuch like blaſphemies. In conſideration whereof, may it pleaſe your honour, (for the love of God, and for the tender zeal your good lordſhip beareth to juſtice, and the common peace and quietneſs of the king and queen's majeſties loving ſubjects) to award out your warrant for the ſaid William Munt, his wife, and Roſe, her daughter, that they being attached and brought before your good lordſhip, we truſt the reſt fear to offend (their ringleaders of ſedition being apprehended) to the quietneſs of their obedient ſubjects.

Your daily orators, the pariſhioners of Muchbentley, Thomas Tye, prieſt, John Carter, Thomas Chandler, John Barker, Richard Mere, J. Painter, Will. Harris, John Richard, with others.

This being done, the ſaid Sir Thomas Tye bethought with himſelf where the ſaid perſecuted did reſort: for in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, for a twelvemonth and more he came not to the church, but frequented the company of godly men and women, who abſtained from the ſame, and, as they thought, he laboured to keep a good conſcience, but the ſequel ſhewed him to be a falſe brother.

Now (as I ſaid) he partly knowing the places of refuge for honeſt men, did further enquire of other men about the ſame: and being thereof ſufficiently (as he thought) inſtructed to this purpoſe, immediately about the time the ſupplication above ſpecified was exhibited to the ſaid lord Darcy, wrote a letter ſecretly to biſhop Bonner, wherein he maketh his account how he had beſtowed his time, and complained of divers honeſt men, among which was the ſaid William Munt and his company: the tenor of which letter followeth:

A Letter from Sir Thomas Tye, Prieſt, to Biſhop Bonner.

RIGHT honourable lord, after my bounden duty done in moſt humble wiſe, theſe ſhall be to ſignify unto your lordſhip the ſtate of our parts concerning religion. And firſt ſince the coming down of the twenty-two rank heretics diſmiſſed from you, the deteſtable ſort of ſchiſmatics were never ſo bold ſince the king and queen's majeſties reign, as they are now at this preſent. In Muchbentley where your lordſhip is patron of the church, ſince William Munt, and Alice, his wife, with Roſe Allin, her daughter, came home, they do not only abſent themſelves from the church and ſervice of God, but do daily allure many others away from the ſame, which before did outwardly ſhew ſigns and tokens of obedience.

They aſſemble together upon the ſabbath-day in the time of divine ſervice, ſometimes in one houſe, ſometimes in another, and there keep their private conventicles and ſchools of hereſy. The jurates ſay, the lord's commiſſion is out, and they are diſcharged of their oath. The queſtmen in your archdeacon's viſitation alledged, that foraſmuch as they were once preſented and now ſent home, they have no more to do with them nor any other. Your officers ſay, namely Mr. Boſwell, that the council ſent them not home without a great conſideration. I pray God ſome of your officers prove not favourers of heretics. The rebels are ſtout in the town of Colcheſter.

The miniſters of the church are hem'd as in the open ſtreets, and called knaves. The bleſſed ſacrament of the altar is blaſphemed and railed upon in every houſe and tavern. Prayer and faſting is not regarded. Seditious talks and news are rife both in town and country, in as ample and large manner, as though no honourable lords and commiſſioners had been ſent for reformation thereof. The occaſion riſeth partly by reaſon of John Love of Colcheſter-heath (a perverſe place) which John Love was twice indicted of hereſy, and thereupon fled with his wife and houſhold, and his goods ſeized within the town of Colcheſter, to the king and queen's majeſties uſe. Nevertheleſs the ſaid John is come home again, and nothing ſaid or done to him. Whereupon the heretics are wonderfully encouraged, to the great diſcomfort of good and catholic people, which daily pray to God for the profit, unity, and reſtoration of his church again: which thing ſhall come the ſooner to paſs, through the travel and pains of ſuch honourable lords and reverend fathers as your lordſhip is, unto whom I wiſh long life and continuance, with increaſe of much honour. From Colcheſter, December 18.

Your humble bedeſman, Tho. Tye, prieſt.

When this wicked prieſt had thus wrought his malice againſt the people of God, within a while after the ſtorms began to ariſe againſt thoſe poor perſecuted Wm. Munt, and his company, whereby they were enforced to hide themſelves from the heat thereof. And continuing ſo a little ſpace, at laſt, the ſeventh day of March 1557, being the firſt Sunday in Lent, and by two of the clock in the morning, one Mr. Edmund Tyrrel (who came of the houſe of thoſe Tyrrels which murdered king Edward V. and his brother) took with him the bailiff of the hundred called Wm. Samuel, dwelling in Colcheſter, and the two conſtables of Muchbentley aforeſaid, named John Barker, and Wm. Harris, with many others; and beſetting the houſe of the ſaid Wm. Munt round about, called to them at length to open the door: which being done, Mr. Tyrrel with ſome of his company went into the chamber where the ſaid father Munt and his wife lay, willing them to riſe: for, ſaid he, you muſt go with us to Colcheſter-caſtle. Mother Munt hearing that, being very ſick, deſired that her daughter might fetch her ſome drink; for ſhe was (ſhe ſaid) very ill at eaſe.

Then he gave her leave and bade her go. So her daughter, the forenamed Roſe Allin, maid, took a ſtone pot in one hand, and a candle in the other, and went to draw drink for her mother: and as ſhe came back again thorough the houſe, Tyrrel met her, and willed her to give her father and mother good counſel, and advertiſe them to be better catholic people.

Roſe. Sir, they have a better inſtructor than me. For the Holy Ghoſt doth teach them, I hope, which I truſt will not ſuffer them to err.

Tyrrel. Why, ſaid Mr. Tyrrel, art thou ſtill in that mind, thou naughty houſewife? marry it is time to look upon ſuch heretics indeed.

Roſe. Sir, with which you call hereſy do I worſhip my Lord God, I tell you truth.

Tyrrel. Then I perceive you will burn goſſip, with the reſt, for company's ſake.

Roſe. No, ſir, not for company's ſake, but for Chriſt's ſake, if ſo I be compelled; and I hope in his mercy, if he call me to it, he will enable me to bear it.

So he turning to his company, ſaid, Sirs, this goſſip will burn: what do you think of her? Why truly, Sir, ſaith one, prove her, and you ſhall ſee what ſhe will do by and by.

Then that cruel Tyrrel, taking the candle from her, held her wriſt, and the burning candle under her hand, burning croſsways over the back thereof, ſo long, till the very ſinews cracked aſunder. Witneſs hereof, William Chandler, then dwelling at Muchbentley, who was there preſent and ſaw it. Alſo Mrs. Bright of Rumford, with Ann Starkey her maid, to whom Roſe Allin alſo declared the ſame, and the ſaid Mrs. Bright alſo miniſtered ſalve for the curing thereof, as ſhe lay in her houſe at Rumford, going up towards London with other priſoners.

In which time of his tyranny, he ſaid often to her, Why whore, wilt thou not cry? Thou young whore, wilt thou not cry? To which ſhe always anſwered, that ſhe thanked God ſhe had no cauſe, but rather to rejoice. But, ſhe ſaid, he had more cauſe to weep than ſhe, if he conſidered the matter well. In the end, when the ſinews (as I ſaid) brake, that all the houſe heard them, he then thruſt her violently from him, ſaying, A ſtrong whore, thou ſhameleſs beaſt, thou beaſtly whore, &c. with ſuch like vile words. But ſhe quietly ſuffering his rage for the time, at laſt ſaid, Sir, have ye done what ye will do? He ſaid, yea, and if thou think not well of it, then mend it.

Roſe. Mend it! nay, the Lord mend you, and give you repentance, if it be his will. And now, if you think it good, begin at the feet, and burn the head alſo: for he that ſet you on work, ſhall pay you your wages one day, I warrant you: and ſo went and carried her mother drink, as ſhe was commanded. Likewiſe, after ſearching of the houſe for more company, at laſt they found one John Thurſton, and Margaret, his wife, whom they alſo carried with the reſt to Colcheſter caſtle immediately.

And this ſaid Roſe Allin, being priſoner, told a friend of hers this cruel act of the ſaid Tyrrel; and ſhewing him the manner thereof, ſhe ſaid, while my own hand was a burning, I having a pot in my other hand, might have ſtruck him on the face with it, if I had had a mind, for no man held my hand to hinder me therefrom. But I thank God, ſaid ſhe, with all my heart, that I did it not.

Alſo being aſked of another, how ſhe could abide the painful burning of her hand, ſhe ſaid, at firſt it was ſome grief to her; but afterwards, the longer ſhe burned, the leſs ſhe felt, or well near none at all.

And becauſe Mr. Tyrrel ſhall not go alone in this kind of cruelty, you ſhall hear another like example of a blind harper's harper's hand, burnt by biſhop Bonner, as is teſtified by the relation of Valentine Dingley, ſometime gentleman to the ſaid biſhop, who declared before credible witneſs, as followeth: How the ſaid biſhop Bonner, having this blind harper before him, ſpake thus unto him, That ſuch blind abjects, which follow a ſort of heretical preachers, when they come to the feeling of the fire, will be the firſt that will fly from it.

To whom the blind man anſwered, that if every joint of him were to be burnt, yet he truſted in the Lord he ſhould not fly. Then Bonner ſignifying privily to certain of his men about him what they ſhould do, they brought to him a burning coal; which coal being put into the poor man's hand, they cloſed it faſt again, which burned his hand moſt piteouſly. Amongſt the doers thereof was the ſaid Mr. Valentine Dingley, witneſs and reporter hereof, as is declared.

We read in Titus Livius, of the ſtory of king Porſenna, who after the burning of the right hand of Marcus Scevola, who came purpoſely to kill him, being only contented therewith, ſent him home to Rome again. But thus to burn the hands of poor men and women, who never meant any harm to them, and not contented with that, but alſo to conſume their whole bodies without any juſt cauſe, we find no example of ſuch barbarous tyranny, neither in Titus Livius, nor in any other ſtory among the heathen.

But to return to our Colcheſter martyrs again. With the ſaid William Munt and his family, was joined alſo in the ſame priſon at Colcheſter, another faithful brother, named John Johnſon, alias Aliker, of Thorp in the county of Eſſex, labourer, thirty-four years of age, having no wife alive, but three young children, who was alſo indicted with them of hereſy, and ſo all theſe four lay together in Colcheſter-caſtle.

The other ſix priſoners lay in Mote-hall in the ſaid town of Colcheſter, whoſe names were,

1. William Bongeor, of the pariſh of St. Nicholas in Colcheſter, glazier, of the age of ſixty years.

2. Thomas Benold of Colcheſter, tallow-chandler.

3. W. Purcas of Bocking in Eſſex, fuller, of the age of twenty years.

4. Agnes Silverſide, alias Smith, dwelling in Colcheſter, widow, of the age of forty years.

5. Helen Ewring, the wife of John Ewring miller, dwelling in Colcheſter, of the age of forty-five years or thereabouts, who was one of the twenty-two priſoners mentioned before, ſent up in bands from Colcheſter to London, and after being delivered with the reſt, repaired home to Colcheſter again to her huſband, where notwithſtanding ſhe enjoyed her liberty not very long: for ſhortly after her return, one Robert Maynard then bailiff of Colcheſter, met with her, who eſpying her, came to her, and kiſſed her, and bade her welcome home from London. Unto whom ſhe conſiderately anſwered again, and ſaid, That it was but a Judas kiſs: for in the end, quoth ſhe, I know you will betray me, as indeed it came to paſs: for immediately after that diſcourſe ſhe was apprehended by him, and was lodged with the reſt in the town priſon (as is aforeſaid) called the Mote-hall.

6. The ſixth of this company was Elizabeth Folks, a young maid, and ſervant in Colcheſter, of the age of twenty years. Theſe ſix were impriſoned in the town priſon of Colcheſter, called Mote-hall, as the other four beforementioned were in the caſtle.

Divers examinations theſe good men had at ſundry times before divers juſtices, prieſts, and officers, as Mr. Roper, John Kingſton, commiſſary, John Boſwel, prieſt, and Bonner's ſcribe, and ſeveral others, in the preſence of the two bailiffs of Colcheſter, Robert Brown and Robert Maynard, with divers other juſtices both of the town and country, and a great many other gentlemen: at which time and place, and before the ſaid perſons, they had ſentence of condemnation read againſt them, chiefly for not affirming the real preſence of the ſacrament in their altar. The effect of their words therein, was as follows:

Firſt, the Priſoners in Mote-hall.

WILLIAM Bongeor, of the pariſh of St. Nicholas in Colcheſter, glazier, ſaid, that the ſacrament of the altar was bread, is bread, and ſo remaineth bread; and that the conſecration made it not more holy, but rather the worſe. To this he did ſtand, as alſo againſt all the reſt of their popiſh doctrine: and ſo had ſentence read againſt him.

Thomas Benold, of Colcheſter, tallow-chandler, affirmed to the like effect as William Bongeor did: and ſo had ſentence alſo read againſt him.

W. Purcas of Bocking ſaid, that when he received the ſacrament, he received bread in an holy uſe, that preacheth the remembrance of Chriſt dying for him. To this he ſtood, and againſt other their popiſh matters: and ſo alſo had ſentence read againſt him.

Agnes Silverſide, alias Smith, ſaid, that ſhe loved no conſecration; for the bread and wine, ſhe ſaid, was made rather worſe thereby than better. This good old woman anſwered them with ſuch ſound judgment and boldneſs, to every thing they aſked her, that it rejoiced the hearts of many, and eſpecially to ſee the patience of ſuch a reverend old age, againſt the taunts and checks of her enemies. To this ſhe alſo ſtood, and had ſentence read againſt her in like manner.

Helen Ewring anſwered to the like effect, as the others did, utterly denying all the laws ſet forth by the pope, with her whole heart. This good woman was ſomewhat thick of hearing, but yet in the Lord's matters was quick of underſtanding, whoſe name therefore be praiſed. Againſt her alſo was ſentence read.

Elizabeth Folks, the young maiden, being examined whether ſhe believed the preſence of Chriſt's body to be in the ſacrament ſubſtantially and really, or no; anſwered, that ſhe believed it to be a ſubſtantial lye, and a real lye. At which words, the prieſts and others were very angry, and aſked her again, whether after the conſecration there remained not the body of Chriſt in the ſacrament. To which ſhe anſwered, that before conſecration and after, it is but bread; and the man that bleſſeth without God's word, is curſed and abominable by the word, &c. Then they examined her about confeſſion to the prieſt, of going to church to hear maſs, of the authority of the biſhop of Rome, &c. To all which ſhe anſwered, that, by the grace of God, ſhe would neither uſe nor frequent any of them all, but utterly deteſt and abhor them from the bottom of her heart, and all ſuch trumpery.

Then they read the ſentence of condemnation againſt her; at which, Dr. Chedſey wept, that the tears trickled down his cheeks. So the ſentence being read, ſhe kneeled down on her knees, lifting up her hands and eyes unto heaven, with fervent prayer and audible voice praiſing God, that ever ſhe was born to ſee that moſt bleſſed and happy day, that the Lord would count her worthy to ſuffer for the teſtimony of Chriſt: and Lord, ſaid ſhe, if it be thy will, forgive them that have done this againſt me, for they know not what they do. Then riſing up, ſhe exhorted all thoſe on the bench to repentance, eſpecially thoſe who brought her to priſon, as Robert Maynard the bailiff, and ſuch like; which Maynard commonly, when he ſate in judgment upon life and death, would ſit ſleeping on the bench oftentimes, ſo careful was his mind on his office.

Further, ſhe deſired halting goſpellers to beware of blood, for that would cry for vengeance, &c. And in the end ſhe told them all, laying her hand upon the bar, that if they did not repent their wicked doings therein, that undoubtedly the very bar would be a witneſs againſt them at the day of judgment, that they had that day ſhed innocent blood.

This Elizabeth Folks, the day before ſhe was condemned, was examined only by this article, Whether ſhe believed there was a catholic church of Chriſt, or not. To which ſhe anſwered, Yea. Then was ſhe immediately (by Boſwell's means the ſcribe) delivered unto her uncle Holt of the ſame town of Colcheſter to keep, who carried her home to his houſe: and ſhe being there might have departed thence many times, if ſhe had pleaſed; for there were means offered to convey her away. But ſhe hearing that ſome doubted that ſhe had yielded to the pope (although it was moſt untrue) would in no wiſe content herſelf, but wept, and was in ſuch anguiſh of mind and terror of conſcience, that (no remedy) ſhe would to the papiſts again for any perſuaſions that could be. And coming before them at Coſins's houſe at the White-Hart, in Colcheſter, ſhe was at utter defiance with them and their doctrine: and ſo had, as you have heard, in the end a papiſtical reward, as the reſt of her brethren had.

The Priſoners in Colcheſter Caſtle.

WILLIAM Munt of Muchbentley in Eſſex, of the age of 61 years ſaid, that the ſacrament of the altar was an abominable idol, and that if he ſhould obſerve any part of their popiſh proceedings, he ſhould diſpleaſe God, and bring his curſe upon him, and therefore for fear of his vengeance he durſt not do it. This good father was examined of many things, but God be thanked he ſtood to the truth, and in the end thereof had ſentence of condemnation read againſt him. John Johnſon of Thorp in Eſſex, widower, thirty-four years of age, was examined as the reſt, and made anſwer in ſuch ſort, as the papiſts counted him none of theirs, and therefore condemned him with their bloody ſentence, as they had done the reſt before. This John Johnſon affirmed, that in the receiving of the ſacrament according to Chriſt's inſtitution, he receiveth the body of Chriſt ſpiritually, &c.

Alice Munt, the wife of the ſaid William Munt, forty-one years of age, being alſo examined as the reſt, ſaid and confirmed the ſame in effect as her huſband did, and was therefore alſo condemned.

Roſe Allin, maid, daughter of the ſaid Alice Munt, of the age of twenty years, being examined of auricular confeſſion, going to the church to hear maſs, of the popiſh ſeven ſacraments, &c. anſwered ſtoutly, that they ſtank in the face of God, and ſhe durſt not have to do with them for her life, neither was ſhe (ſhe ſaid) any member of theirs; for they were the members of antichriſt, and ſo ſhould have, if they repented not, the reward of antichriſt. Being aſked further what ſhe could ſay of the ſee of the biſhop of Rome, whether ſhe would obey his authority, or no: ſhe anſwered boldly that ſhe was none of his. As for his ſee (ſaid ſhe) it is for crows, kites, owls and ravens to ſwim in, ſuch as you be: for by the grace of God I will not ſwim in that ſee while I live, neither will I have any thing to do therewith. Then they read the ſentence of condemnation againſt her, and ſent her to priſon again unto the reſt, where ſhe ſung with great joy, to the wonder of many.

Thus theſe poor condemned lambs, being delivered into the hands of the ſecular power, were all ſent to the priſon from whence they came, where they remained with much joy and great comfort (in continual reading and invocating the name of God) ever looking and expecting the happy day of their diſſolution. In which time the cruel papiſts left not their miſchievous attempts againſt them, although they would ſeem now to have no more to do with them. For bloody Bonner, whoſe throat never cried ho, ſhortly after got a writ for the burning of the aforeſaid perſons; and to ſhew the more diligence in his cauſe, he ſent a truſty man of his, named Edward Coſin, down with it, and with him alſo his letter, for the furtherance of the matter, the next month after the condemnation.

The writ being thus received by the ſaid bailiffs, and they having then no leaſure thereabouts, appointed the day of the execution thereof, to be the ſecond day of Auguſt next following. And becauſe the faithful ſouls were in two ſeveral priſons, as the caſtle was for the country, and Mote-hall for the town: therefore it was agreed among them, that they in Mote-hall ſhould be burnt in the forenoon, and thoſe at the caſtle, by the ſheriff of the ſhire, in the afternoon.

The ſecond day of Auguſt 1557, betwixt ſix and ſeven of the clock in the morning, was brought from Mote-hall unto a plat of ground, hard by the town-wall of Colcheſter on the outſide, William Bongeor, William Purcas, Thomas Benold, Agnes Silverſide alias Smith, Helen Ewring and Elizabeth Folks before-mentioned, who being there, and all things prepared for their martyrdom, they kneeled down, and made their humble prayers to God, but not in ſuch a manner as they would, for the cruel tyrants would not ſuffer them: eſpecially one Mr. Clere among the reſt (who ſometime had been a goſpeller) ſhewed himſelf very extreme unto them; the Lord give him repentance (if it be his good will) and grace to be a better man. When they made their prayers, they roſe, and made themſelves ready for the fire: and Elizabeth Folks, when ſhe had plucked off her petticoat, would have given it to her mother (who came and kiſſed her at the ſtake, and exhorted her to be ſtrong in the Lord) but the wicked there attending, would not ſuffer her to give it. Therefore taking the ſaid petticoat in her hand, ſhe threw it away from her, ſaying, farewel all the world, farewel faith, farewel hope; and ſo taking the ſtake in her hand, ſaid, welcome love, &c. Now ſhe being at the ſtake, and one of the officers nailing the chain about her, in the ſtriking of the ſtaple, he miſſed the place, and gave her a great ſtroke with the hammer on the ſhoulder bone: at which, ſhe turning her head, lifted up her eyes to the Lord, and ſmilingly praying, gave herſelf to exhorting the people again.

When they were all nailed to the ſtakes, and the fire about them, they clapped their hands for joy in the fire, that the ſtanders by, (which were by eſtimation thouſands) almoſt all cried, The Lord ſtrengthen them, the Lord comfort them, the Lord pour his mercies upon them, with ſuch like words, as was wonderful to hear.

Thus yielded they up their ſouls and bodies into the Lord's hand, for the teſtimony of his truth. The Lord grant we may imitate the ſame in the like quarrel, for his mercies ſake, Amen.

In like manner, the ſaid day in the afternoon, was brought forth into the caſtle-yard, to a place appointed for the ſame, William Munt, John Johnſon, Alice Munt and Roſe Allin aforeſaid: who after they had made their prayers, were joyfully tied to the ſtakes, calling upon the name of God, and earneſtly exhorting the people to flee from idolatry, ſuffered martyrdom with ſuch triumph and joy, that the people did no leſs ſhout thereat to ſee it, than at the others that were burnt the ſame day in the morning.

Thus theſe ten perſons happily ended their lives for the teſtimony of the goſpel. God grant we may well ſpend our years and days likewiſe to his glory, Amen.

You have heard before of the taking of John Thurſton at Muchbentley, in the houſe of William Munt of the ſame town; which ſaid John Thurſton, about the month of May 1557, died in Colcheſter-caſtle, a conſtant confeſſer of Jeſus Chriſt.

The Hiſtory of George Eagles, otherwiſe called Trudge-over.

AMONG other martyrs of ſingular virtue and conſtancy, one George Eagles deſerveth much to be commended, for that he having little or no learning, moſt manfully ſerved and fought under the banner of Chriſt's church. For oftentimes the will and pleaſure of God is, to beautify and adorn his kingdom with the weak and ſimple inſtruments of this world; ſuch as Amos was in the Old Teſtament, who with many others of obſcure and unknown names, were called from the heards and folds to the honour of prophets; as likewiſe we read of the apoſtles, who were called from the fiſherman's craft, and put into churches. Wherefore this George Eagles is not to be deſpiſed for his baſe occupation, whom Chriſt hath called thence to ſet forth and declare abroad his goſpel. We ought rather to glorify God the more, who by his grace, in ſo blind a time, inſpired him with the gift of preaching, and conſtancy of ſuffering: who after he had uſed the occupation of a taylor, for ſome time, being eloquent and of good utterance, gave and applied himſelf to the ſervice of Chriſt's church.

Which man, as before in thoſe moſt bright and clear days of king Edward VI. he had not unfruitfully ſhewed and preached the power and force of the Lord, ſo afterward in the tempeſtuous time and fall of the church (at which time confeſſors of Chriſt and his goſpel were troubled, divers of them murdered, ſome baniſhed, and others through fear conſtrained from appearing publicly) he expreſſed and uttered his mind with courage. For he, wandering abroad into divers and far countries, where he could find any of his brethren, did there moſt earneſtly encourage and comfort them, now tarrying in this town, and ſometime abiding in that certain months together, as occaſion ſerved, lodging ſometimes in the country, and ſometimes for fear living in the fields and woods, who, for his immoderate and unreaſonable going abroad, was called Trudge-over. Oftentimes did he lie abroad in the night, without covert, ſpending the moſt part in devout and earneſt prayer.

His diet was ſo ſpare and ſlender above meaſure, that he uſed, almoſt for the ſpace of three years, to drink nothing but water, whereunto he was compelled through neceſſity in the time of perſecution: but when he perceived that by God's providence his body proved well enough with this diet, he thought beſt to inure himſelf to it againſt all neceſſities.

Now when he had profited Chriſt's church in this ſort, by going about and preaching the goſpel a year or two, eſpecially in Colcheſter and the places thereabout, that privy enemy which envieth always the ſalvation and bleſſed eſtate of the good, lurked and laid wait by all means poſſible for him, ſo that there were divers ſpies ſent out, who had in commandment, whereſoever they found him, to bring him either alive or dead. But when this their attempt could not prevail, but all was in vain (the ſaid Eagles with his brethren keeping in cloſe, and hiding themſelves in ſecret places, as in barns, thickets, holes, &c.) his adverſaries went about another way to compaſs this their enterprize of taking him.

For in the queen's name a grievous edict was proclaimed throughout four ſhires, Eſſex, Suffolk, Kent, and Norfolk, promiſing the perſon that took him twenty pounds for his pains; doubtleſs a worthy hire to entice any Jew to treachery. For being inflamed with greedy deſire of the money, they deviſed and invented all ways poſſible to be enriched with the hurt and deſtruction of this poor man.

At length it came to paſs, that he being ſeen at Colcheſter upon Mary Magdalen's-day, at which time they kept a fair in the town, would have been taken by his adverſaries, if he had not ſpeedily conveyed himſelf away, a great multitude purſuing after, and ſeeking diligently after him. Who firſt hid himſelf in a grove, and afterwards in a corn-field hard by, and ſo lay ſecretly couched from the violence of his enemies, inſomuch as they were all, except one, paſt hope of taking him, and therefore ready to depart their way.

This one, having more ſubtilty and wicked craft in his head than the reſt, would not depart thence with his fellows, but climbed up into a high tree, there to view and eſpy if he might ſee Eagles any where ſtir or move. The poor man thinking all ſure enough, by reaſon that he heard no noiſe abroad, roſe up on his knees, and lifting up his hand, prayed unto God. And whether it were for that his head was above the corn, or becauſe his voice was heard, the lurker perceiving his deſired prey that he haunted after, forthwith came down, and ſuddenly laying hands on him, brought him as priſoner to Colcheſter. Notwithſtanding the greedy and Judas knave, which had ſo much promiſed him, was fain to be contented with a very ſmall reward, and glad to take that too, leſt he ſhould have nothing at all.

George Eagles being thus taken, was committed to priſon at Colcheſter, and from thence within four days after conveyed to Chelmsford, where he abode all that night in devout prayer, and would not ſleep, neither would eat or drink but bread and water. The next day he was carried to London to the biſhop or the council, and there remained a certain time, and then was brought down to Chelmsford to the ſeſſions, and there was indicted and accuſed of treaſon, becauſe he had aſſembled companies together, contrary to the laws and ſtatutes of the realm in that caſe provided. For it was ordained a little before, to avoid ſedition, that if men ſhould flock ſecretly together, above the number of ſix, they ſhould be attached of treaſon. And albeit it was well known, that George Eagles did never any thing ſeditiouſly againſt the queen, yet to cloak an honeſt matter withal, and to cauſe him to be the more hated of the people, they turned religion into a civil offence and crime, and though he defended his cauſe ſtoutly and boldly, making a full declaration of his religion, or faith, before the judges; yet could he not bring it to paſs by any means, but that he muſt needs be indicted, as he ſaid, of treaſon; whoſe indictment did run much after this faſhion.

"George Eagles, thou art indicted by the name of George Eagles, otherwiſe Trudge-over the world, for that thou didſt ſuch a day make thy prayer that God ſhould turn queen Mary's heart, or elſe take her away."

He denied that he prayed that God ſhould take her away, but he confeſſed, he prayed that God would turn her heart in his prayer. Well, notwithſtanding he was condemned for a traitor, although the meaning thereof was for religion.

This being done, he was carried to the ſign of the Crown in Chelmsford, and being there, one Richard Potto the elder, an inn-holder, dwelling at the ſign of the Cock in the ſame town, did much trouble him, in perſuading him to confeſs he had offended the queen in his prayer, which he was condemned for, and to aſk her forgiveneſs.

To whom he ſaid, he had not offended her grace in that behalf. So in proceſs of time he was laid upon a ſled, with an hurdle on it, and drawn to the place of execution, being faſt bound, having in his hand a pſalm-book, of which he read very devoutly all the way with a loud voice, till he came there: and being on the ladder the aforeſaid Potto did much trouble him with the matter aforeſaid, but the ſheriff commanded Potto to hold his peace, and trouble him no more.

So he made his confeſſion, and ſtood very conſtant ſtill; then he was turned off the ladder. With him were caſt certain thieves alſo, and the next day, when they were brought out to be executed with him, there happened a thing that did much ſet forth and declare the innocency and piety of this man. For being led between two thieves to the place where he ſhould ſuffer, when as he exhorted both them and all others to ſtand ſtedfaſtly to the truth, one of them turned the counſel he gave into a jeſting matter, and made but a flout at it.

Why ſhould we doubt to obtain heaven, ſaid he, foraſmuch as this holy man ſhall go before us, as captain and leader unto us in the way. We ſhall flee thither ſtrait as ſoon as he hath once made us the entry.

In this, George Eagles and the other did greatly reprove him, who on the other ſide gave good heed to George's exhortation, earneſtly bewailing his own wickedneſs, and calling to Chriſt for mercy. But the more that the firſt was bid to be ſtill, and to leave off his ſcoffing, the more perverſe he continued in his fooliſhneſs, and his wicked behaviour. At length he came to the gallows, where they ſhould be hanged, but George was carried to another place hard by to ſuffer. Between the two he went foremoſt who was moſt ſerious, who being upon the ladder, after he had exhorted the people to beware and to take heed to themſelves, how they did tranſgreſs the commandments of God, and then had committed his ſoul into God's hands, he ended his life after a godly and quiet manner.

The mocker's turn cometh next, who would have likewiſe ſaid ſomewhat, but his tongue faultered in his head, that he was not able to ſpeak a word. He would fain have uttered his mind, but he could not bring it out. Then the under-ſheriff bade him ſay the Lord's prayer, which he could not ſay neither but ſtutteringly, as a man would ſay, one word to-day and another to-morrow. Then one did begin to ſay it, and ſo bade him ſay after.

Such as were there and ſaw it, were much aſtoniſhed, eſpecially thoſe that beheld the juſt puniſhment of God againſt him that had mocked ſo earneſt a matter. George Eagles in the mean time, after he had hanged a ſmall ſpace, having a check with the haltar, immediately one of the bailiffs cut the haltar aſunder, and he fell to the ground, being ſtill alive, although much amazed with the check he had of the ladder. Then one William Swallow of Chelmsford, a bailiff, drew him to the ſled that he was drawn thither on, and laid his neck thereon, and with a cleaver, ſuch as is occupied in many men's kitchens, and blunt, did hackle off his head, and ſometimes hit his neck, and ſometimes his chin, and did foully mangle him, and ſo opened him. Notwithſtanding this bleſſed martyr of Chriſt abode ſtedfaſt and conſtant in the very midſt of his torments, till ſuch time as this tormentor William Swallow did pluck the heart out of his body. The body being divided into four parts, and his bowels burnt, was brought to the foreſaid Swallow's door, and there laid upon the fiſh-ſtalls before his door, till they had made ready a horſe to carry his quarters, one to Colcheſter, and the reſt to Harwich, Chelmsford, and St. Rouſes.

His head was ſet up at Chelmsford on the market-croſs on a long pole, and there ſtood, till the wind blew it down, and lying certain days in the ſtreet tumbled about, one cauſed it to be buried in the church yard in the night. Alſo a wonderful work of God was it that ſhewed on this wicked bailiff Swallow, who within ſhort ſpace after this was ſo puniſhed, that all the hair went well near off his head, his eyes were as it were cloſed up, and could ſcarcely ſee, the nails of his fingers and toes went clean off. He was in ſuch caſe of his body as though he had been a leper, and now in his laſt age almoſt a very beggar, and his wife, which he a little after married, God hath puniſhed with the falling-ſickneſs, or a diſeaſe like unto that: which may be a warning or glaſs for all men and women to look in, that be enemies to God's ſervants.

No leſs token of his marvellous judgment did God ſhew upon the aforeſaid Richard Potto, who did ſo much trouble this George Eagles in the inn, and at the place of execution, as is above ſpecified. He lived till the beginning of queen Elizabeth's reign, all which time he little joyed, and being on a time in a great chafe with two or three of his neighbours in his own houſe, feeling himſelf not well, he ſaid to one of his ſervants, go with me into the chamber, and when he came there, he fell down on a low bed, as heavy as it had been lead, and lay there foaming at the mouth, and could never ſpeak after, neither yet underſtood what was ſaid to him, but lay as ſenſeleſs as it had been a very dumb beaſt, and within three or four days died. God grant that this token ſent of God, with many more like, may be a warning to us ever hereafter, while we live unto the world's end.

Beſides this, God hath wonderfully ſhewed his work. For at a time when they had laid great wait for George Eagles, that it was thought impoſſible but that he ſhould be taken, being ſo beſet; his friends did put him into apprentice apparel, viz. watchet-hoſe, as their manner is, and an old cloak, and ſet him on a pack of wool, as though he had ridden to carry wool to the ſpinners, ſo he rode amongſt the midſt of his adverſaries, and eſcaped them all for that time. Another troubler of the ſaid George Eagles, was alſo juſtice Brown, who enjoyed not his cruelty many years after.

Alſo when he was at the ſeſſions at Chelmsford, there was a rumour raiſed, that he had accuſed divers honeſt men that did keep him in their houſes, and was converſant with him, and all to diſcredit him; which rumour was very falſe and untrue. Witneſs one Raynold, with divers others dwelling in Chelmsford.

The Examination of Richard Craſhfield of Weymundham, condemned to Death for the Teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt.

ABOUT this time ſuffered at Norwich, a godly man, named Richard Craſhfield, whoſe examinations before the chancellor, named Dunning, as he penned them with his own hand, ſo have we faithfully recorded the ſame.

How ſay you, Sirrah, ſaid the chancellor, to the ceremonies of the church?

Then ſaid I, what ceremonies?

He ſaid unto me, Do you not believe that all the ceremonies of the church were good and godly?

My anſwer was, I do believe ſo many as are grounded in the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt.

Tuſh, ſaid he, do you believe in the ſacrament of the altar?

I ſaid, I knew not what it was.

Then, ſaid he, Do you not believe that Chriſt took bread, gave thanks, brake it, and ſaid, "Take, eat, this is my body?"

Yes, verily, ſaid I, and even as Chriſt did ſpeak, ſo did he perform the work.

Tuſh, ſaid he, Do you not believe this, that after the words ſpoken by the prieſt, there is the ſubſtance of Chriſt's body, fleſh and blood? How ſay you, do you not believe this? ſpeak, man?

I do believe that Chriſt's body was broken for me upon the croſs, and his blood ſhed for my redemption, whereof the bread and wine is a perpetual memory, the pledge of his mercy, the ring and ſeal of his promiſe, and a perpetual memory for the faithful unto the end of the world. So then I was commanded into priſon until the next day.

Another Examination of Richard Craſhfield.

THE next day following I was brought forth. Then the chancellor ſaid unto me, Richard, how ſay you? Are you otherwiſe minded than you were yeſterday? He rehearſing all the words we had before, ſaid, Are not theſe your words? Whereunto I anſwered, Yes.

Then

Then ſaid he, How ſay you, can you not find in your heart, when you come to the church, to kneel down before the rood, and make your prayer?

I anſwered and ſaid, No; rehearſing the commandment of God forbidding the ſame.

He ſaid, Have you not read or heard, that God commanded an image to be made?

I anſwered, what image?

He ſaid, the brazen ſerpent.

I ſaid, yes, I have heard it read, how that God did command it to be made, and likewiſe to be broken down.

Then Dr. Bridges ſaid, wherefore did God command the Seraphins and Cherubins to be made?

I ſaid, I could not tell; I would fain learn.

Then ſaid the chancellor, but how ſay you to this? can you find in your heart to fall down before the picture of Chriſt, which is the rood?

I ſaid, no; I fear the curſe of God: for it is written, that God curſed his hands that made them, yea and the hands that made the tools wherewith they were carved.

Then Dr. Bridges raged and ſaid, liſt now what a piece of ſcripture he hath here gotten to ſerve his purpoſe, for he will not allow but where he liſteth.

Then ſaid the chancellor, how ſay you to confeſſion to the prieſt? when were you confeſſed?

I ſaid, I confeſs myſelf daily unto the eternal God, whom I moſt grievouſly offend.

Then the chancellor ſaid, Do you not then take confeſſion to the prieſt to be good?

I anſwered, no, but rather wicked.

Then the chancellor ſaid, how ſay you by yonder gear, yonder ſinging and yonder playing on the organs? is it not good and godly?

I ſaid, I could perceive no godlineſs in it.

Then he ſaid, why, is it not written in the pſalms, that we ſhould praiſe God with hymns and ſpiritual ſongs?

I ſaid, yes, ſpiritual ſongs muſt be had; but yonder is of the fleſh, and of the ſpirit of error. For to you it is pleaſant and glorious, but to the Lord it is bitter and odious.

Then ſaid the chancellor, why, is it not written, my houſe is an houſe of prayer?

I ſaid, yes. It is written alſo, that you have made my houſe of prayer a den of thieves.

With that the chancellor looked and ſaid, have we?

I anſwered and ſaid, Chriſt ſaid ſo. Then was I commanded to ward.

The Thurſday next following, was Dr. Bridges ſent to me to examine me of my faith. And he ſaid, countryman, my lord biſhop (for love he would have you ſaved) hath ſent me unto you, becauſe to-morrow is your day appointed: therefore my lord hath thought it meet, that you ſhould declare unto me your faith. For to-morrow my lord will not have much ado with you.

I anſwered and ſaid, hath my lord ſent you? It is not to you, whom I am diſpoſed to ſhew my mind.

Then he ſaid to me, I pray you ſhew me your mind concerning the ſacrament of the altar.

I anſwered, are you ignorant what I have ſaid?

He ſaid, no, for it was well written, except you believe, ſaith he, as the church hath taught, you are damned, both body and ſoul.

I anſwered and ſaid, judge not, leſt you be judged: condemn not, leſt you be condemned.

And he ſaid, lo we ſhall have a traitor as well as an heretic: for he will diſallow the king's judgment.

I ſaid, no, I do not diſallow the king's judgment, but yours I do diſallow. For I pray you tell me, how came you by this judgment?

He anſwered and ſaid, by the church: for the church hath power to ſave and condemn: for if you be condemned by the church, be ye ſure, that you be damned both body and ſoul.

Then I anſwered, if you have this power, I am ſore deceived. For I believe that Chriſt ſhall be our judge. But now I perceive that you will do much for him, that you will not put him to the pain.

Then he ſaid, ſtand nearer country-man: why ſtand ye ſo far off?

I ſaid, I am near enough, and a little too near.

Then he ſaid, did not Chriſt ſay, is not my fleſh meat, and my blood drink indeed?

I ſaid, to whom ſpake Chriſt thoſe words?

He ſaid, to his diſciples.

I (intending to rehearſe the text) ſaid, whereat did Chriſt's diſciples murmur inwardly?

He ſaid, no, they did not murmur, but they were the infidels, ſaith he, for the diſciples were ſatisfied with theſe words.

I ſaid, did not Chriſt ſay thus, as he taught at Capernaum, whereas his diſciples murmured, ſaying, this is an hard ſaying, who can abide the hearing of it? Jeſus perceiving their thoughts, ſaid, doth this offend you?

Then he raged and ſaid, oh, thou wreſteſt the text for thine own purpoſe: for the diſciples did never murmur, but unbelievers as thou art.

I ſaid, yes, but I perceive you know not the text.

Then he ſaid with much rage, I will lay my head thereon it is not ſo.

Then I ſaid, I have done with you.

To which he ſaid, what ſhall I tell my lord of you?

If you have nothing to tell him, your errand ſhall be ſooner done, ſaid I. And ſo departed.

Then on Friday I was brought forth to receive judgment, when the chancellor ſaid unto me, Are you a new man, or are you not?

I anſwered, I truſt I am a new man born of God.

God give grace you be ſo, ſaid he. So he rehearſed all my examination and ſaid, how ſay you, are not theſe your words?

I ſaid, Yes, I do not deny them.

Then he ſaid to Dr. Pere, ſtanding by, I pray you talk with him. Then he alledging to me many flattering words, ſaid, "Take, eat, this is my body." How ſay you to this? Do you not believe that it is Chriſt's body? Speak.

I ſaid, Have you not my mind, why do ye trouble me?

He ſaid, What did Chriſt give you, was it bread, or was it not?

I ſaid, Chriſt took bread, and gave thanks, and gave it, and they took bread, and did eat. And St. Paul maketh it more manifeſt, where he ſaith, "So oft as ye ſhall eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye ſhall ſhew forth the Lord's death until he come." St. Paul ſaith not here as you ſay: for he ſaith, "So oft as ye ſhall eat of this bread." He doth not ſay, body.

So they intending that I ſhould go no further in the text, ſaid, Tuſh, you go about the buſh. Anſwer me to the firſt queſtion. Let us make an end of that.

What ſay you to the bread that Chriſt gave? Let me have your mind in that.

I anſwered, I have ſaid my mind in it.

Then ſaid the chancellor, No, we will have your mind more plainly: for we intend not to have many more words with you.

I ſaid, My faith is fully grounded and eſtabliſhed, that Chriſt Jeſus the Eaſter lamb hath offered his bleſſed body a ſacrifice to God the Father, the price of my redemption. For by that only ſacrifice are all the faithful ſanctified, and he is our only advocate and mediator, and he hath made perfect our redemption. This hath he done alone, without any of your daily oblations.

Then Dr. Bridges ſtarted up and ſaid, Truth, your words are true indeed: you take well the literal ſenſe: but this you muſt underſtand, that like as you ſaid that Chriſt offered his body upon the croſs, which was a bloody ſacrifice and a viſible ſacrifice; ſo likewiſe we daily offer the ſelf-ſame body that was offered upon the croſs, but not bloody and viſible, but inviſible, unto God the Father.

Do you offer Chriſt's body, I ſaid? Why then Chriſt's ſacrifice was not perfect. But Chriſt is true, when all men ſhall be lyars.

Then he ſaid, Thou ſhalt not fear him that hath power to kill the body: but thou ſhalt fear him that hath power to kill both body and ſoul.

I anſwered and ſaid, It is not ſo. But the text is thus; "Thou ſhalt not fear them that hath power to kill the body, and then have done what they can. But thou ſhalt fear him that hath power to kill both body and ſoul, and caſt them both into hell-fire, and not them.

He anſwered and ſaid, yes: for it is the church.

I anſwered, why, Chriſt ſaith, "I give my life for the redemption of the world. No man taketh my life from me, ſaith he, but I give it of my own power, and ſo have I power to take it again." Therefore Chriſt the Son of God did offer his body once for all. And if you will preſume to offer his body daily, then your power is above Chriſt's power. With that he was angry, and ſaid, What, ſhall we have doctrine? ye are not hitherto appointed.

Then the chancellor ſtood up and ſaid, Will ye turn from this wicked error, and be an example of goodneſs, as you have been an example of evil (for by your wicked reading you have perſuaded ſimple women to be in this error) and you ſhall have mercy.

And I ſaid, it is of God that I do crave mercy, whom I have offended, and not you.

Then the chancellor ſaid, When were you at your pariſh church? you have ſtood excommunicated theſe two years and more: wherefore you are condemned. And ſo I was condemned.

Thus haſt thou, gentle reader, the examinations of this pious young man, ſet forth and written with his own hand, who, ſoon after his condemnation, was brought to the ſtake by the ſheriffs and officers, where with much patience and conſtancy he entered his martyrdom. At whoſe burning, one Thomas Carman was apprehended, whoſe ſtory hereafter followeth in its order and place.

About the ſame time one named Fryer, with a woman accompanying him, who was the ſiſter of George Eagles, ſuffered the like martyrdom by the unrighteous papiſts, whoſe tyranny the Lord of his mercy abate and cut ſhort, turning that generation, if it be his will, to a better mind.

The Apprehenſion and death of Mrs. Joyce Lewes, the Wife of Thomas Lewes, of Manceter.

Miſtreſs Joyce Lewes, a gentlewoman born, was firſt married to one Appleby, and afterwards to Thomas Lewes, of Manceter. In the beginning of queen Mary's time ſhe went to church, and heard maſs as others did; but when ſhe heard of the burning of that moſt godly and learned martyr, Laurence Saunders, who ſuffered in Coventry, ſhe began to take more heed to the matter, and enquired earneſtly of ſuch as ſhe knew feared God, the cauſe of his death: and when ſhe perceived it was becauſe he refuſed to receive the maſs, ſhe began to be troubled in conſcience, and waxed very unquiet. And becauſe her houſe was even hard by Mr. John Glover's houſe, of whom mention was made before, a man of bleſſed memory, and a ſingular example of his unfeigned godlineſs, and manifold troubles which he ſuffered for the goſpel, ſhe did oftentimes reſort to him, and deſired him to tell her the faults that were in the maſs, and other things that at that time were urged as neceſſary to ſalvation.

Now he perceiving both her unquiet mind, and alſo the deſire ſhe had to know the truth, did moſt diligently inſtruct her in the way of the Lord, proving unto her out of God's holy word, that the maſs, with all other papiſtical inventions, were odious in God's ſight; and beſides this, reproved her, for that ſhe delighted in the vanities of this world ſo much. By which godly counſel, ſhe began to grow weary of the world, and thoroughly ſorrowful for her ſins, being inflamed with the love of God, and deſirous to ſerve him according to his word, purpoſing alſo to flee from thoſe things which diſpleaſed him. And becauſe ſhe had learned the maſs to be evil and abominable, ſhe began to hate it. And when at a time ſhe was compelled by the furiouſneſs of her huſband to come to the church, at the ſame time when the holy water was caſt, ſhe turned her back towards it, and ſhewed herſelf to be diſpleaſed with their blaſphemous holy water, injurious to the blood of Chriſt. Whereupon ſhe was accuſed before the biſhop, for deſpiſing of their ſacramentals.

Immediately, a citation was ſent for her to her huſband's houſe, to appear before the biſhop. The ſumner that brought the citation delivered it to her huſband, who looking upon it, and perceiving it, was moved with anger, willing the ſumner to take the citation with him again, or elſe he would make him eat it. The ſumner refuſed to take it again, for he thought no man durſt have been ſo bold to trouble him. But in the end Lewes compelled the ſaid ſumner to eat the citation indeed, by ſetting a dagger to his heart; and when he had eaten it, he cauſed him to drink it, and ſo ſent him away. But immediately after, the ſaid Lewes with his wife were commanded to appear before the biſhop, where the ſaid Lewes by and by ſubmitted himſelf, and deſiring the biſhop to be good to him, excuſing himſelf after the beſt faſhion he could. Whereupon the biſhop was content to receive his ſubmiſſion, with condition that his wife ſhould ſubmit herſelf alſo. But ſhe ſtoutly told the biſhop, that by refuſing of the holy water, ſhe had neither offended God, nor any part of his laws. At which words the biſhop being grievouſly offended, yet becauſe ſhe was a gentlewoman, he would not take her at the worſt (as he ſaid) he gave her one month's reſpite, binding her huſband in an hundred pound to bring her again unto him at the month's end, and ſo they were both let go.

When they came to their own houſe, the ſaid Mrs. Joyce Lewes gave herſelf to moſt diligent prayer, and invocating of the name of God, reſorting continually to the abovenamed man of God, Maſter John Glover, who did moſt diligently inſtruct her with God's word, willing her in any caſe not to meddle with that matter in reſpect of vain-glory, or to get herſelf a name, ſhewing her the great dangers ſhe was like to caſt herſelf in, if ſhe ſhould meddle in God's matter otherwiſe than Chriſt doth teach.

When the month was now almoſt expired, and the time at hand that ſhould be brought before the ſaid biſhop, her huſband being advertiſed by the ſaid Mr. John Glover and others, not to carry her to the biſhop, but to ſeek ſome ways to ſave her, or if the worſt ſhould come, to be content to forfeit ſo much money, rather than to caſt his own wife into the fire: he anſwered, he would not loſe or forfeit any thing for her ſake; and ſo, like a murderer of his own wife, he carried her to the bloody biſhop, where ſhe was examined, and found more ſtout, than ſhe was before death was threatened. And to begin withal, ſhe was ſent to ſuch a ſtinking priſon, that a certain maid, which was appointed to keep her company, did ſwoon in the ſame priſon.

Being thus kept in priſon, and oftentimes examined, at length ſhe was brought in judgement, and pronounced an heretic worthy to be burned. When the biſhop reaſoned with her, why ſhe would not come to the maſs, and receive the ſacraments and ſacramentals of the Holy Ghoſt: ſhe anſwered, becauſe I find not theſe things in God's word, which you ſo urge and magnify, as things moſt needful for mens ſalvation. If theſe things were in the word of God commanded, I would with all my heart, receive, eſteem, and believe them. The biſhop anſwered, if thou wilt believe no more than is in the ſcripture, concerning matters of religion, thou art in a damnable caſe. At which words ſhe was wonderfully amazed, zed, and being moved by the Spirit of God, told the biſhop, that his words were ungodly and wicked.

After her condemnation, ſhe continued a whole twelvemonth in priſon, becauſe ſhe was committed to the ſheriff, that was of late choſen, who could not be compelled to put her to death in his time, as he affirmed; for which things, after her death, he was ſore troubled, and in danger of his life. All that time ſhe was in priſon, her behaviour was ſuch both in words and deeds, that all they that had any ſpark of godlineſs and honeſty, did greatly lament her caſe, that ſhe ſhould be put to death.

Now when the time drew near which God had appointed for her deliverance, the writ, De comburendo (as they term it) being brought down from London, ſhe deſired ſome of her friends to come to her, with whom when they came, ſhe conſulted how ſhe might behave herſelf, that her death might be more glorious to the name of God, comfortable to his people, and alſo moſt diſcomfortable to the enemies of God. As for death (ſaid ſhe) I do not greatly paſs; when I behold the amiable countenance of Chriſt my dear Saviour, the ugly face of death doth not greatly trouble me. In which time alſo ſhe reaſoned moſt comfortably out of God's word, of God's election and reprobation.

In the evening before her ſuffering, two of the prieſts of the cloſe of Litchfield came to the under ſheriff's houſe where ſhe lay, and ſent word to her by the ſheriff, that they were come to her confeſſion; for they would be ſorry ſhe ſhould die without. She ſent them word again, ſhe had made her confeſſion to Chriſt her Saviour, at whoſe hands ſhe was ſure to have forgiveneſs of her ſins. As concerning the cauſe for which ſhe ſhould die, ſhe had no cauſe to confeſs that, but rather to give moſt humble praiſe to God, that he did make her worthy to ſuffer death for his word: And as concerning that abſolution that they were able to give unto her, being authorized by the pope, ſhe did defy the ſame, even from the bottom of her heart.

Which when the prieſts heard, they ſaid to the ſheriff, Well, to-morrow her ſtoutneſs will be proved and tried: for although perhaps ſhe hath now ſome friends that whiſper her in her ears, to-morrow we will ſee who dare be ſo hardy as to come near her: and ſo they went their ways with anger, that their confeſſion and abſolution was nought ſet by.

All that night ſhe was wonderfully cheerful and merry, with a certain gravity, inſomuch that the majeſty of the Spirit of God did manifeſtly appear in her, who did expel the fear of death out of her heart, ſpending the time in prayer, reading and talking with them that were purpoſely come unto her, to comfort her with the word of God.

About three of the clock in the morning, Satan (who never ſleepeth, eſpecially when death is at hand) began to ſtir himſelf buſily, ſhooting at her that fiery dart, which he is wont to do againſt all that are at defiance with him, by queſtioning her, How ſhe could tell that ſhe was choſen to eternal life, and that Chriſt died for her: I grant that he died, but that he died for thee, how canſt thou tell? Whilſt ſhe was troubled with this ſuggeſtion, they that were about her counſelled her to follow the example of Paul, Gal. 2. where he ſaith, "which hath loved me, and given himſelf for me." Alſo, that her vocation and calling to the knowledge of God's word was a manifeſt token of God's love towards her, eſpecially that ſame holy Spirit of God working in her heart, that love and deſire towards God to pleaſe him, and to be juſtified by him through Chriſt, &c. By theſe and like perſuaſions, and eſpecially by the comfortable promiſes of Chriſt, brought out of the ſcripture, Satan was put to flight, and ſhe comforted in Chriſt.

About eight of the clock Mr. ſheriff came into her chamber, ſaying theſe words, Mrs. Lewes, I am come to bring you tidings of the queen's pleaſure, which is, that you ſhall live but one hour longer in this world: therefore it behoveth you to prepare yourſelf for it. At which words, being ſo groſly uttered, and ſo ſuddenly, by ſuch an officer as he was, made her ſomewhat caſt down. Wherefore one of her friends and acquaintance ſtanding by, ſaid theſe words: Mr. Lewes, you have great cauſe to praiſe God, who has vouchſafed ſo ſoon to take you out of this world, and make you worthy to be a witneſs of his truth, and to bear record unto Chriſt, that he is the only Saviour.

After which words, ſhe ſaid, Mr. ſheriff, your meſſage is welcome to me, and I thank my God that he had made me worthy to offer my life for his ſervice. At which words the ſheriff departed: but in the ſpace of an hour he came again, with ſwords and clubs; and when he came up in her chamber, one of her friends deſired him to give him leave to go with her to the ſtake, and to comfort her, which the ſheriff granted at that time; but afterwards, when ſhe was dead, he was ſore troubled for the ſame.

Now when ſhe was brought through the town by a number of bill-men, a great number of people being preſent, ſhe was led by two of her friends (namely, Mr. Michael Reniger, and Mr. Auguſtine Bernher) and ſo brought to the place of execution: and becauſe the place was far off, and the throng of the people great, and ſhe not acquainted with the freſh air (being ſo long in priſon) one of her friends ſent a meſſenger to the ſheriff's houſe for ſome drink: and after ſhe had prayed three ſeveral times, in which prayers ſhe deſired God moſt inſtantly to aboliſh the idolatrous maſs, and to deliver this realm from popery (at the end of which prayers moſt part of the people cried Amen; yea, even the ſheriff that ſtood hard by her, ready to caſt her into the fire for not allowing the maſs, at this her prayer ſaid with the reſt of the people, Amen;) when ſhe had thus prayed, ſhe took the cup into her hands, ſaying, I drink to all them that unfeignedly love the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, and wish for the aboliſhment of popery. When ſhe had drank, they that were her friends drank alſo. After that a great number, eſpecially the women of that town, drank with her; who afterwards were put to open penance in the church by the cruel papiſts, for drinking with her.

When ſhe was chained to the ſtake, ſhe ſhewed ſuch a cheerfulneſs, that it paſſed man's reaſon, being ſo well coloured in her face, and being ſo patient, that moſt part of them that had honeſt hearts were moved, and even with tears bewailed the tyranny of the papiſts. When the fire was ſet to her, ſhe made no other reſiſtance than by lifting up her hands towards heaven, being dead very ſoon: for the under-ſheriff, at the requeſt of her friends, had provided ſuch ſtuff, that ſhe was ſuddenly diſpatched out of this miſerable world.

This, amongſt other things, is not to be forgotten, that the papiſts had appointed ſome to rail upon her, and to revile her, both as ſhe went to the place of execution, as alſo when ſhe was at the ſtake. Amongſt others, there was an old prieſt, who had a pair of writing-tables, wherein he ſet down the names of thoſe women that drank of the cup, (as before-mentioned) and alſo deſcribed her friends by their apparel, for he could not preſently learn their names, and afterwards enquired for them: and ſo immediately after proceſs was ſent out for them, both to Coventry, and other places: but God, whoſe providence ſleeps not, did defend them from the hands of theſe cruel tyrants. Unto which God, with the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, be honour and glory for ever. Amen.

The Martyrdom of Ralph Allerton, James Auſtoo, Margery Auſtoo, and Richard Roth, at Iſlington.

ABOUT the ſeventeenth day of September, were burned at Iſlington, near London, theſe four profeſſors of Chriſt, Ralph Allerton, James Auſtoo, Margery gery Auſtoo, his wife, and Richard Roth. Among which, it firſt appeareth, that this Ralph Allerton was, more than a year before his condemnation, apprehended and brought before the lord Darcy of Chicheſter, and was there accuſed, as well for that he would not conſent to come unto the idolatry and ſuperſtition which then was uſed, as alſo that he had by preaching enticed others to do the like.

Being examined thereupon, he confeſſed that he coming into the pariſh of Bentle, and ſeeing the people ſitting there, either gazing about, or elſe talking together, he exhorted them that they would fall into prayer, and meditation of God's moſt holy word, and not ſit ſo idly: to which they willingly conſented. Then after prayer ended, he read to them a chapter out of the New Teſtament, and ſo departed.

In which exerciſe he continued until Candlemas, and then being informed that he might not do ſo by the law, (for that he was no prieſt or miniſter) he left off, and kept himſelf cloſe in the houſe till after Eaſter. At which time, certain ſworn men for the enquiry of ſuch matters came unto his houſe, and attached him for reading in the pariſh of Welley.

But when they underſtood that he had read but once, and that it was of obedience (whereunto he earneſtly moved the people) they let him for that time depart. Notwithſtanding for fear of their cruelty, he was not long after conſtrained to forſake his own houſe, and keep himſelf in woods, barns, and other ſolitary places, until the time of his apprehenſion.

After his examination, the lord Darcy ſent him up to the council; but they (not minding to trouble themſelves with him) ſent him unto Bonner, who by threatenings and other ſubtle means ſo abuſed the ſimple and fearful heart of this man, that within a ſhort time he won his moſt wicked will, and made him revoke and recant his former profeſſion, and thereupon ſet him at liberty of body: yet brought ſuch a bondage and terror of ſoul and conſcience, and ſo caſt him down, that except God (whoſe mercies are immeaſurable) had ſupported and lifted him up again, he had periſhed for ever.

But God, who never ſuffereth his children utterly to fall, caſting his pitiful eyes on his loſt ſheep, with his merciful and fatherly chaſtiſements, did, with Peter, raiſe him up again, giving unto him not only hearty and unfeigned repentance, but alſo a moſt conſtant boldneſs to profeſs again, even unto his death, his moſt holy name, and glorious goſpel. Wherefore at the procurement of Thomas Tye, prieſt, ſome time an earneſt profeſſor of Chriſt, but now a fierce perſecutor of the ſame (as appeareth more at large before in the hiſtory of William Munt, and his wife) he was again apprehended, and ſent to biſhop Bonner; before whom he was, the eighth day of April, and ſundry other times elſe examined. The report of which examination, written by his own hand with blood, for lack of ink, here followeth.

The Examination of Ralph Allerton, at his ſecond Apprehenſion, before the Biſhop of London, at Fulham, April 8, 1557.

Bonner. AH ſirrah, how chanceth it that you are come hither again on this faſhion? I dare ſay thou art accuſed wrongfully.

Ralph. Yea, my lord, ſo I am. For if I were guilty of ſuch things as I am accuſed of, then I would be very ſorry.

Bonner. By St. Mary that is not well done. But let me hear, art thou an honeſt man? for if I can prove no hereſy by thee, then ſhall thine accuſers do thee no harm at all. Go to, let me hear thee; for I did not believe the tale to be true.

Ralph. My lord, who did accuſe me? I pray you let me know, and what is mine accuſation, that I may anſwer thereunto.

Bonner. Ah, wilt thou ſo? Before God, if thou haſt not diſſembled, then thou needeſt not be afraid, nor aſhamed to anſwer for thyſelf. But tell me in faith, haſt thou not diſſembled?

Ralph. If I cannot have mine accuſers to accuſe me before you, my conſcience doth conſtrain me to accuſe myſelf before you: For I confeſs that I have grievouſly offended God in my diſſimulation at my laſt being before your lordſhip, for which I am very ſorry, as God knoweth.

Bonner. Wherein, I pray thee, didſt thou diſſemble, when thou waſt before me?

Ralph. Forſooth, my lord, if your lordſhip remember, I did ſet my hand to a certain writing, the contents whereof (as I remember) were, That I believe in all things as the catholic church teacheth, &c. In which I did not diſcloſe my mind, but ſhamefully diſſembled, becauſe I made no difference between the true church and the untrue church.

Bonner. Nay, but I pray thee let me hear more of this gear. For I fear me thou wilt ſmell of an heretic anon. Which is the true church, as thou ſayeſt? Doſt thou not call the heretic's church the true church, or the catholic church of Chriſt? Now which of theſe two is the true church, ſayſt thou? Go to, for in faith I will know of thee before I leave thee.

Ralph. As concerning the church of heretics, I utterly abhor the ſame, as deteſtable and abominable before God, with all their enormities and hereſies: and the church catholic is it that I only embrace, whoſe doctrine is ſincere, pure, and true.

Bonner. By Saint Auguſtine, but that is well ſaid of thee. For by God Almighty, if thou hadſt allowed the church of heretics, I would have burned thee with fire for thy labour.

Then ſaid one Morton, a prieſt, my lord, you know not yet what church it is that he calleth catholic. I warrant you he meaneth naughtily enough.

Bonner. Think you ſo? Now by our bleſſed lady, if it be ſo, he might have deceived me. How ſay you, ſirrah, which is the catholic church?

Ralph. Even that which hath received the wholeſome ſound, ſpoken of by Iſaiah, David, Malachi, and Paul, with many other more. Which ſound, as it is written, hath gone throughout all the earth in every place, and unto the ends of the world.

Bonner. Yea thou ſayſt true before God. For this is the ſound that hath gone throughout all Chriſtendom, and he that believeth not the ſound of the holy church, as Saint Cyprian ſaith, doth err. For he ſaith, that whoſoever is out of the church, is like unto them that were out of Noah's ſhip, when the flood came upon all the whole world; ſo the ark of Noah is likened unto the church: and therefore thou haſt well ſaid in thy confeſſion. For the church is not alone in Germany, nor was here in England in the time of the late ſchiſms, as the heretics do affirm. For if the church ſhould be there alone, then were Chriſt a lyar: for he promiſed that the Holy Ghoſt ſhould come to us, lead us to all truth, and remain with us unto the end of the world. So now if we will take Chriſt for a true ſayer, then muſt we needs affirm, that the way which is taught in France, Spain, Italy, Denmark, Scotland, and all Chriſtendom over, muſt needs be the true catholic church.

Ralph. My lord, if you remember, I ſpake of all the world, as it is written, and not of all Chriſtendom only, as methinks your lordſhip takes it, which kind of ſpeaking you do not find in all the Bible. For I am ſure, that the goſpel hath been preached and perſecuted in all lands: Firſt, in Jewry by the ſcribes and phariſees, and ſince that time by Nero, Diocleſian, and ſuch like, and now here in theſe our days by your lordſhip knoweth whom. For

For true it is that the church which you call catholic, is none other catholic than was figured in Cain, obſerved of by Jeroboam, Ahab, Jezabel, Nabuchodonoſor, Antiochus, Herod, with innumerable more of the like: and as both Daniel and Eſdras make mention of theſe laſt days, by a plain prophecy, and now fulfilled, as appeareth, and affirmed by our Saviour Chriſt and his apoſtles, ſaying; There ſhall come grievous wolves to devour the flock.

Bonner. Now, by the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, Mr. Morton, he is the rankeſt heretic that ever came before me. How ſay you? have you heard the like?

Morton. I thought what he was my lord at the firſt.

Bonner. Now by All-hallows thou ſhalt be burnt with fire for thy lying, thou whoreſon varlet and prick-louſe thou. Doſt thou find a prophecy in Daniel of us? Nay, you knave, it is of you that he ſpeaketh of, and of your falſe pretended holineſs. Go to, let me hear what is the ſayings of Eſdras, and take heed ye make not a lye, I adviſe you.

Ralph. The ſaying of Eſdras is this; "The heat of a great multitude is kindled over you, and they ſhall take away certain of you, and feed the idols with you, and he that conſenteth unto them, ſhall be had in deriſion, laughed to ſcorn, and trodden under foot: yea they ſhall be like mad men, for they ſpare no man; they ſhall ſpoil and waſte ſuch as fear the Lord, &c."

Bonner. And have you taken this thing to make your market good? Ah ſirrah, wilt thou ſo! by my faith a pretty inſtruction, and a neceſſary thing to be taught among the people. By my troth I think there be more of this opinion. I pray thee tell me: is there any that underſtandeth this ſcripture on this faſhion! Before God, I think there be none in all England, but thou.

Ralph. Yes, my lord, there are in England three religions.

Bonner. Sayſt thou ſo? which be thoſe three?

Ralph. The firſt is that which you hold; the ſecond is clean contrary to the ſame; and the third is a neuter, being indifferent: that is to ſay, obſerving all things that are commanded outwardly, as though he were of your part, his heart being ſet wholly againſt the ſame.

Bonner. And of theſe three which art thou? for now thou muſt needs be one of them.

Ralph. Yes, my lord, I am one of them; and that which I am of, is even that which is contrary to that which you teach to be believed under pain of death.

Bonner. Ah Sir, you were here with me at Fulham, and had good cheer, yea and money in your purſe when you went away, and by my faith I had a favour unto thee. But now I ſee thou wilt be a naughty knave. Why wilt thou take upon thee to read the ſcripture, and canſt underſtand never a word? for thou haſt brought a text of ſcripture, which maketh clean againſt thee. For Eſdras ſpeaketh of the multitude of you heretics, declaring your hate againſt the catholic church, making the ſimple or idle people believe, that all is idolatry that we do, and ſo entice them away, until you have overcome them.

Ralph. Nay, not ſo, my lord. For he maketh it more plain, and ſaith on this wiſe; "They ſhall take away their goods, and put them out of their houſes, and then ſhall it be known who are my choſen (ſaith the Lord) for they ſhall be tried, as the ſilver or gold in the fire." And we ſee it ſo come to paſs, even as he hath ſaid. For who is not now driven from houſe and home, yea, and his goods taken up for other men that never ſweat for them, if he do not obſerve as you command and ſet forth? Or elſe, if he be taken, then muſt he either deny the truth, as I did in diſſembling, or elſe he ſhall be ſure to be tried, as Eſdras ſaith, even as the gold is tried in the fire. Whereby all the world may know, that you are the bloody church, figured in Cain the tyrant, neither yet are ye able to abide it.

Morton. I promiſe you, my lord, I like him better now than ever I did, when he was here before you the other time. For then he did but diſſemble, as I perceived well enough; but now methinks he ſpeaketh plainly.

Bonner. Marry Sir, as you ſay indeed, he is plain. For he is a plain heretic, and ſhall be burned. Have the knave away. Let him be carried to Little-eaſe at London, until I come.

And ſo I was carried to London, unto Little-eaſe, and there remained that night, and on the next morrow I appeared before him again, the dean of Paul's and the chancellor of London being preſent. Then were brought forth certain writings that I had ſet my hand unto.

Bonner. Come on your ways, ſirrah. Is not this your hand, and this, and this?

Ralph. Yea, they are my hand all of them; I confeſs the ſame, neither yet will I deny any thing that I have ſet my hand unto. But if I have ſet my hand to any thing that is not lawful, therefore am I ſorry. Nevertheleſs, my hand I will not deny to be my doing.

Bonner. Well ſaid, now ye muſt tell me; were you never at the church ſince you went from me; at maſs, matins, &c?

Ralph. No, my lord, not at maſs, matins, nor any other ſtrange worſhipping of God.

Bonner. Yea, ſayſt thou ſo? Waſt thou never at thine own pariſh church, nor at any other? And doſt thou alſo ſay, that it is a ſtrange worſhipping? Why, I pray thee, wilt thou not believe the ſcripture to be true?

Ralph. Yea, my lord, I believe the ſcripture to be true, and in defence of the ſame I intend to give my life, rather than I will deny any part thereof, God willing.

Dean. My lord, this fellow will be an honeſt man, I hear by him. He will not ſtand in his opinion; for he ſheweth himſelf gentle and patient in his talk.

Bonner. Oh, he is a glorious knave. His painted terms ſhall no more deceive me. An whoreſon prick-louſe, doth not Chriſt ſay, This is my body? And how dareſt thou deny theſe words; for to ſay, I have a writing to ſhew, and thine own hand at the ſame? Let me ſee, Wilt thou deny this? Is not this thine own hand?

Ralph. Yes, my lord, it is mine own hand, neither am I aſhamed thereof, becauſe my confeſſion thereof is agreeable to God's word. And whereas you do lay unto my charge, that I ſhould deny the words of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt! Oh good Lord, from whence cometh this raſh, haſty, and untrue judgment? Forſooth, not from the Spirit of truth; for he leadeth men into all truth, and is not the father of lyars. Whereupon ſhould your lordſhip gather or ſay of me ſo diffamouſly? wherefore I beſeech you, if I deny the ſcriptures canonical, or any part thereof, then let me die.

Tye the prieſt. My lord, he is a very ſeditious fellow, and perſuadeth other men to do as he himſelf doth, contrary to the order appointed by the queen's highneſs, and the clergy of this realm. For a great many of the pariſh will be gathered one day to one place, and another day to another place, to hear him; ſo that very few come to church to hear divine ſervice: and this was not only before that he was taken, and brought into the council, but alſo ſince his return home again, he hath done much harm. For where both men and women were honeſtly diſpoſed before, by Saint Anne now are they as ill as he almoſt. And furthermore, he was not aſhamed to withſtand me before all the pariſh, ſaying. that we were of the malignant church of Antichriſt, and not of the true church of Chriſt, alledging a great many ſcriptures to ſerve his purpoſe, ſaying; Good people, take heed, and beware of thoſe blood-thirſty dogs, &c, And then I commanded the conſtable to apprehend him, and ſo he did. Nevertheleſs, after this apprehenſion. the conſtable let him go about his buſineſs all the next day, ſo that, without putting in of ſureties, he let him go go into Suffolk, and other places, for no goodneſs, I warrant you, my lord. It were alms to teach ſuch officers their duty, how they ſhould let ſuch rebels go at their own liberty, after they be apprehended and taken, but to keep them faſt in the ſtocks until they bring them before a juſtice.

Ralph. As I ſaid before, ſo ſay I now again; thou art not of the church of Chriſt, and that I will prove, if I may be ſuffered. And where you ſaid, that you commanded the conſtable to apprehend me, you did ſo indeed, contrary to the laws of this realm, having neither treaſon, felony, nor murder to lay to my charge: No, neither had you precept, proceſs, nor warrant to ſerve on me; and therefore I ſay without a law was I apprehended. And whereas you ſeek to trouble the conſtable, becauſe he kept me not in the ſtocks three days and three nights, it doth ſhew in part what you are. And my going into Suffolk was not for any evil, but only to buy half a buſhel of corn for bread for my poor wife and children, knowing that I had no long time to tarry with them. But if I had run away, then you ſurely would have laid ſomewhat to his charge.

Bonner. Go to, thou art a merchant indeed. Ah ſirrah, before God thou ſhalt be burnt with fire. Thou knoweſt Richard Roth, doeſt thou not? Is he of the ſame mind that thou art of, or no? canſt thou tell?

Ralph. He is of age to anſwer, let him ſpeak for himſelf; for I hear ſay that he is in your houſe.

Bonner. Lo what a knave here is. Go Cluny, fetch me Roth hither. By my troth he is a falſe knave; but yet thou art worſe than he. Ah ſirrah, did you not ſet your hand to a writing, the tenor whereof was, that if you ſhould at any time ſay or do heretically, then it ſhould be lawful for me to take thee with a relapſe, and to proceed in ſentence againſt thee?

Ralph. Yea, that is ſo. But here is to be aſked, whether it is ſufficient, that my hand or name in writing be able to give authority to you or any other to kill me? For if I by writing can do ſo much, then muſt my authority be greater than yours. Nevertheleſs, I have neither ſaid nor done heretically, but like a true chriſtian man have I behaved myſelf. And ſo I was committed unto priſon again, and the 24th day of the ſame month I was brought before the biſhop, the lord North, doctor Story, and others, and after a long talk in latin amongſt themſelves (unto which I gave no anſwer, becauſe they ſpake not to me, although they ſpake of me) at laſt the biſhop ſaid:

Bonner. How ſay you, ſirrah? tell me briefly at one word, wilt thou be contented to go to Fulham with me, and there to kneel thee down at maſs, ſhewing thyſelf outwardly as though thou didſt it with a good will? Go to, ſpeak.

Ralph. I will not ſay ſo.

Bonner. Away with him, away with him.

The ſecond day of May I was brought before the biſhop, and three noblemen of the council, whoſe names I do not remember.

Bonner. Lo, my lords, this ſame is the fellow that was ſent unto me from the council, and did ſubmit himſelf, ſo that I had half a hope of him: but by St. Anne I was always in doubt of him. Nevertheleſs, he was with me, and fared well, and when I delivered him, I gave him money in his purſe. How ſayſt thou? was it not as I tell my lords here?

Ralph. Indeed my lord I had meat and drink enough, but I never came in bed all the while. And at my departing you gave me twelve-pence, howbeit I asked none, and would have none.

A lord. Be good to him, my lord. He will be an honeſt man.

Bonner. Before God, how ſhould I truſt him? He hath once deceived me already. But ye ſhall hear what he will ſay to the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar. How ſay you ſirrah? after the words of conſecration be ſpoken by the prieſt, there remaineth no bread, but the very body of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, God and man, and none other ſubſtance, under the form of bread.

Ralph. Where find you that my lord written?

Bonner. Lo, Sir. Why? Doth not Chriſt ſay, "This is my body?" How ſayſt thou? Wilt thou deny theſe words of our Saviour Chriſt? Or elſe was he a diſſembler, ſpeaking one thing, and meaning another? Go to, now I have taken you.

Ralph. Yea, my lord, you have taken me indeed, and will keep me until you kill me. Howbeit, my lord, I marvel why you leave out the beginning of the inſtitution of the ſupper of our Lord? For Chriſt ſaid, "Take ye, and eat ye, this is my body." And if it will pleaſe you to join the former words to the latter, then ſhall I make you an anſwer. For ſure I am, that Chriſt was no diſſembler, neither did he ſay one thing, and mean another.

Bonner. Why? Then muſt thou needs ſay, that it is his body; for he ſaith it himſelf, and thou confeſſeſt that he will not lye.

Ralph. No, my lord; he is true, and all men are lyars. Notwithſtanding, I utterly refuſe to take the words of our Saviour ſo fantaſtically as you teach us to take them: for then ſhould we conſpire with certain heretics, called the Neſtorians; for they deny that Chriſt had a true natural body, and ſo methinks you do, my lord. If you will affirm his body to be there, as you ſay he is, then muſt you needs alſo affirm, that it is a fantaſtical body; and therefore look to it for God's ſake, and let theſe words go before; "Take ye, and eat ye," without which words the reſt are not ſufficient; but when the worthy receivers do take and eat, even then are fulfilled the words of our Saviour unto him, or every of them that receiveth.

Bonner. Ah, I feel well thou canſt not underſtand theſe words; I will ſhew thee a parable. If I ſhould ſet a piece of beef before thee, and ſay, eat; it is beef: And then take part of it away, and ſend it to my cook, and he ſhall change the faſhion thereof, and make it look like bread: What, wouldſt thou ſay that it were no beef, becauſe it had not the faſhion of beef?

Ralph. Let me underſtand a little further, my lord; ſhall the cook add nothing thereunto, nor take any thing therefrom?

Bonner. What is that to the matter, whether he do, or no, ſo long as the ſhape is changed into another likeneſs?

Ralph. Ah, will you ſo, my lord? your ſophiſtry will not ſerve; the truth will have the victory nevertheleſs, as Eſay ſaith; he that reſtraineth himſelf from evil, muſt be ſpoiled. And Amos hath ſuch like words alſo: For the wiſe muſt be fain to hold their peace; ſo wicked a time it is, ſaith he: Nevertheleſs, he that can ſpeak the truth, and will not, ſhall give a ſtrait account for the ſame.

A doctor. By my lord's leave, here methinks thou ſpeakeſt like a fool. Wilt thou be a judge of the ſcripture? Nay, thou muſt ſtand to learn, and not to teach; for the whole congregation hath determined the matter long ago,

A prieſt. No, by your leave, we have a church, and not a congregation. You miſtake that word, Mr. Doctor.

Ralph. Then ſaid I to my fellow priſoners ſtanding by; my brethren, do ye not hear how theſe men help one another? Let us do ſo alſo. But we never came all in together. Then was I carried away for that time. The 19th day of May I was brought before the biſhop of Rocheſter, and Chicheſter, with others.

Rocheſter. Were you a companion of George Eagles, otherwiſe called Trudge-over? My lord of London telleth me that you were his fellow companion.

Ralph. I know him very well, my lord.

Rocheſter.

Rocheſter. By my faith, I had him once, and then he was as drunk as an ape, for he ſtank ſo of drink, that I could not abide him; and ſo ſent him away.

Ralph. My lord, I dare ſay you took your mark amiſs. It was either yourſelf, or ſome of your own company, for he did neither drink wine, ale, nor beer, in a quarter of a year before that time; and therefore it was not he forſooth.

The reſt of mine examinations you ſhall have when I am condemned, if I can have any time after my coming into Newgate, which I truſt ſhall touch the matter a great deal more plainly; for the pithy matters are yet unwritten. Thus fare you well good friends all. Yea, I ſay, farewel for ever in this preſent world. Greet ye one another, and be joyful in the Lord. Salute the good widows among you, with all the reſt of the congregation in Barfold, and Dedham, and Colcheſter.

This promiſe of his, being either not performed, for that he might not thereto be permitted, or elſe if he did write, the ſame not coming to my hands, I am fain in the reſt of his examinations to follow the only report of the regiſter; who witneſſeth, that the 15th day of May, anno 1557, in the biſhop's palace at London, he was examined upon certain interrogatories, the contents whereof be theſe.

FIRST, that he was of the pariſh of Muchbentley, and ſo of the dioceſe of London.

Secondly, that the 10th day of January then laſt paſt, Mr. John Morant preaching at Paul's, the ſaid Ralph Allerton did there openly ſubmit himſelf unto the church of Rome, with the rites and ceremonies thereof.

Thirdly, that he did conſent and ſubſcribe as well unto the ſame ſubmiſſion, as alſo to one other bill, in which he granted, that if he ſhould at any time turn again unto his former opinions, it ſhould be then lawful for the biſhop immediately to denounce and adjudge him as an heretic.

Fourthly, that he had ſubſcribed to a bill, wherein he affirmed, that in the ſacrament, after the words of conſecration be ſpoken by the prieſt, there remaineth ſtill material bread and material wine; and that he believeth that the bread is the bread of thankſgiving, and the memorial of Chriſt's death; and that when he receiveth it, he receiveth the body of Chriſt ſpiritually in his ſoul, but material bread in ſubſtance.

Fifthly, that he had openly affirmed, and alſo adviſedly ſpoken that which is contained in the ſaid former fourth article laſt before ſpecified.

Sixthly, that he had ſpoken againſt the biſhop of Rome, with the church and ſee of the ſame, and alſo againſt the ſeven ſacraments and other ceremonies and ordinances of the ſame church, uſed then within this realm.

Seventhly, that he had allowed and commended the opinion and faith of Mr. Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, and others of late burned within this realm, and believed that their opinions were good and godly.

Eighthly, that he had divers times affirmed, that the religion uſed within this realm, at the time of his apprehenſion, was neither good, nor agreeable to God's word, and that he could not conform himſelf thereunto.

Ninthly, that he had affirmed, that the book of common prayer ſet forth in the reign of K. Edward VI. was in all parts good and godly; and that the ſaid Ralph and his company priſoners, did daily uſe amongſt themſelves in priſon ſome part of the book.

Tenthly, that he had affirmed, that if he were out of priſon, he would not come to maſs, matins, nor evenſong, nor bear taper, candle, or palm, nor go in proceſſion, nor would receive holy water, holy bread, aſhes, or pax, or any other ceremony of the church then uſed within this realm.

Eleventhly, that he had affirmed, that if he were at liberty he would not confeſs his ſins to any prieſt, nor receive abſolution of him; nor yet would receive the ſacrament of the altar, as it was then uſed.

Twelfthly, that he had affirmed, that praying to ſaints and prayers for the dead, were neither good nor profitable, and that a man is not bound to faſt and pray, but at his own will and pleaſure; neither that it is lawful to reſerve the ſacrament, or to worſhip it.

Thirteenthly, that the ſaid Allerton hath according to theſe his affirmations, abſtained and refuſed to come unto his pariſh church ever ſince the 10th of January laſt, or to uſe, receive, or allow any ceremonies, ſacraments, or other rites then uſed in the church.

To all theſe articles he anſwered affirmatively, denying preciſely none of them; ſaving to this clauſe contained in the 12th article, that a man is not bound to faſt and pray but at his own will and pleaſure, he ſaid, that he had affirmed no ſuch thing, but he confeſſed that he had not faſted nor prayed ſo oft as he was bound to do. And unto this anſwer he alſo ſubſcribed in this ſort.

Except it be proved otherwiſe by the holy ſcripture, I do affirm theſe articles to be true. By me, Ralph Allerton.

The next examination was the fourth day of July; the acts whereof, becauſe they do appear more amply in his other examination, on the 10th of Sept. I here omit, giving you farther to underſtand, that on the 7th of July, he was brought before Dr. Darbyſhire in the biſhop's palace, who examined him again on the former articles, and after perſuaded him to recant, threatening him that otherwiſe he ſhould be burned. To whom he boldly anſwered, I would I might be condemned even to-morrow; for I perceive my lord (meaning Bonner) doth nothing but ſeek men's blood. Upon which ſaying, Dr. Darbyſhire committed him again to priſon, and the 10th of Sept. the biſhop cauſed him (with the other three abovenamed) to be brought unto Fulham, and there in his private chapel within his houſe, he judicially propounded unto him certain other new articles; of which, the tenor of the 1ſt, 5th, 6th, and 7th, are already mentioned in the 2d, 3d, and 4th former objections: as for the reſt, the contents whereof here follow.

"Thou Ralph Allerton canſt not deny, but that the information given againſt thee, and remaining now in the acts of this court of thine ordinary, Edmund biſhop of London, was and is a true information."

This information was given by Thomas Tye, curate of Bentley (of whom you have already heard) and certain others of the ſame pariſh and affinity: as namely, John Painter, William Harris, John Barker, John Carter, Thomas Candeler, Jeffry Beſtwood, John Richard, Richard Meer.

The effect whereof was, that one Laurence Edwards, of Bentley aforeſaid, had a child that was unchriſtened, and being demanded by the ſaid Tye, why his child was not baptized? he made anſwer, it ſhould be when he could find one of his religion (meaning a true profeſſor of Chriſt's goſpel). Whereat the curate ſaid, Ah, ye have had ſome inſtructor that hath ſchooled you of late. Yea, quoth Edwards, that I have, and if your doctrine be better than his, then I will believe you; and thereupon fondly offered to fetch him.

Whereupon the conſtable going with him, they brought before the ſaid curate the ſaid Ralph Allerton; of whom in this information they made this report, that he was a ſeditious perſon, who ſince his coming down from the biſhop had ſet upon the conſtable's door certain ſeditious letters, moving and perſuading thereby the people to follow his malicious diſobedience; and that theſe his perſuaſions had taken effect in many: and farther, that the ſaid Ralph Allerton (the curate aſking him whether he had inſtructed this Lawrence Edwards, that it was againſt God's commandment to enter into the church), caſting his hands abroad, ſhould ſay, Oh, good people, now is fulfilled the ſaying of the godly prieſt and prophet Eſdras, who ſaith, 4 Eſd. 16. "The fire of a multitude is kindled againſt a few; they have taken away their their houſes, and ſpoiled their goods, &c." Which of you all have not ſeen this day? who is he here amongſt you, that ſeeth not all theſe things done upon us this day? The church which they call us to, is the church of Antichriſt, a perſecuting church, and the church malignant. With theſe and many more words (ſaid they, moſt maliciouſly and falſly alledged out of the ſcriptures) he thus perſuaded a great multitude (as much as in him lay) unto diſobedience. For which cauſe the conſtables did apprehend him.

3. Item, Thou Ralph Allerton canſt not deny, but the letter ſent unto me by my lord Darcy, beginning with theſe words, Pleaſeth it your lordſhip, &c. was thine own letter, and was ſubſcribed by thine own hand.

The contents of the letter mentioned in this article, and written by Allerton unto the lord Darcy, was a confeſſion of his demeanour before his firſt apprehenſion, the effect and purport whereof, becauſe it appeareth in the beginning of his hiſtory, I do here omit.

4. Item, Thou Ralph Allerton canſt not deny, but that the other letter, ſent alſo to me from my ſaid lord Darcy, beginning thus, Pleaſeth it your lordſhip, &c. and ending with thoſe words, Whenſoever it be, is thine own letter, and ſubſcribed with thine own hand.

This was alſo another letter written by him unto the lord Darcy, the contents whereof were, that where the ſaid lord had commanded him to declare where he had been ever ſince Whitſuntide laſt before his firſt apprehenſion, this was to certify his lordſhip, that he was not able ſo to do, otherwiſe than as he had already ſhewed him by his former letters. And moreover, whereas he charged him to have read unto the people abroad in the woods, he certified him that he did never read any thing abroad, ſaving once when he was in company with George Eagles, and others, Richard Roth took a writing out of his boſom, and deſired the ſaid Ralph to read it, which requeſt he then accompliſhed; and demanding of him whoſe doing the ſame was, the ſaid Roth told that it was maſter Cranmer, late archbiſhop of Canterbury; and farther he would not ſhew him. Nevertheleſs, he was ready and willing to ſuffer ſuch puniſhment as his lordſhip ſhould think meet, deſiring yet that the ſame might be with favour and mercy, although he feared neither puniſhment nor death: praying the Lord, that it might be in his fear, whenſoever it ſhould be.

8. Item, Thou Ralph Allerton canſt not deny, but that the letters written with blood, beginning with theſe words, Grace, mercy and peace, and ending thus, Farewel in God, remaining now regiſtered in the acts of this court, were written voluntarily with thine own hand.

He wrote this letter in the priſon with blood for lack of other ink, and did mean to ſend the ſame unto Agnes Smith, alias Silverſide, at that time impriſoned, and afterward burnt at Colcheſter for the teſtimony of the goſpel of Chriſt, as before is mentioned. The copy of which letter here enſueth.

A Letter written by Ralph Allerton, unto Agnes Smith, Widow.

GRACE, mercy and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, with the aſſiſtance of God's Holy Spirit, and the abundant health both of ſoul and body, I wiſh unto you, as to my own ſoul, as God knoweth, who is the ſearcher of all ſecrets.

Foraſmuch as it hath pleaſed Almighty God of his infinite mercy to call me to the ſtate of grace, to ſuffer martyrdom for Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, although heretofore I have moſt negligently dallied therewith; and therefore far unworthy I am of ſuch an high benefit, to be crowned with the moſt joyful crown of martyrdom: nevertheleſs, it hath pleaſed God not ſo to leave me, but hath raiſed me up again according to his promiſe, which ſaith, "Although he fall, yet ſhall he not be hurt: for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand," Pſ. 37. Whereby we perceive God's election to be ſure, for undoubtedly he will preſerve all thoſe that are appointed to die. And as he hath begun this work in me, even ſo do I believe that he will finiſh the ſame, to his glory, and to my wealth, through Jeſus Chriſt, ſo be it.

Dearly beloved ſiſter, I am conſtrained ſo to call you, becauſe of your conſtant faith and love unfeigned; conſider, that if we be the true ſervants of Chriſt, then may not we in any wiſe make agreement with his enemy Antichriſt. For there is no concord and agreement between them, ſaith the ſcriptures, and a man cannot ſerve two maſters, ſaith Chriſt. And alſo it is prefigured unto us in the old law, whereas the people of God were moſt ſtraitly commanded that they ſhould not mingle themſelves with the ungodly heathen, and were alſo forbidden to eat, drink, or to marry with them. For as often as they did either marry unto their ſons, or take their daughters unto them, or to their ſons, even ſo often came the great and heavy wrath of God upon his own people, to overthrow both them and all their cities, with the holy ſanctuary of God; and brought in ſtrange princes to reign over them, and wicked rulers to govern them, ſo that they were ſure of hunger, ſword, peſtilence, and wild beaſts to devour them. Which plagues never ceaſed, until the good people of God were clean ſeparated from the wicked idolatrous people.

Oh dearly beloved, this was written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the ſcriptures might have hope. And is it not in like caſe happened now in this realm of England? For now are the people of God had in deriſion, and trodden under foot, and the cities, towns, and houſes where they dwelt, are inhabited with them that have no right thereunto, and the true owners are ſpoiled of their labours: yea, and the holy ſanctuary of God's moſt bleſſed word is laid deſolate and waſte, ſo that the very foxes run over it, &c. yet is it the food of our ſouls, the lantern of our feet, and the light unto our paths; and where it is not preached, the people periſh. But the prophet ſaith, "He that refraineth himſelf from evil, muſt be ſpoiled," Eſay 59. Why ſhould men then be abaſhed to be ſpoiled, ſeeing that it is told us before, that it muſt ſo happen unto them that refrain from evil? And thus I bid you farewel in God.

R. A.

9. Item, Thou Ralph Allerton canſt not deny, but that the letters written with blood, beginning with theſe words in the over part thereof, The angel of God, &c. and ended thus, Be with you, Amen. and having alſo this poſtſcript, Do ye ſuppoſe that our brethren. &c. remaining now regiſtered in the acts of this court, are thine own hand-writing.

For the better underſtanding of this article, I have alſo inſerted the copy of the letter mentioned in the ſame; which letter he wrote, by his own confeſſion, unto Richard Roth, then in danger of the ſubtle ſnares of that bloody wolf Bonner.

Another Letter written by Ralph Allerton unto Richard Roth, his Fellow-martyr.

THE angel of God pitch his tent about us, and defend us in all our ways, Amen, Amen.

O dear brother, I pray for you; for I hear ſay, that you have been divers times before my lord in examination. Wherefore take heed for God's ſake what the wiſe man teacheth you, and ſhrink not away when you are enticed to confeſs an untruth, for hope of life, but be ready always to give an anſwer of the hope that is in you. For whoſoever confeſſeth Chriſt before men, him will Chriſt alſo confeſs before his Father. But he that is aſhamed to confeſs him before men, ſhall have his reward with them that do deny him. And therefore, dear brother, brother, go forward: ye have a ready way, ſo fair as ever had any of the prophets or apoſtles, or the reſt of our brethren, the holy martyrs of God. Therefore covet to go hence with the multitude while the way is full. Alſo, dear brother, underſtand that I have ſeen your letter, and although I cannot read it perfectly, yet I partly perceive your meaning therein, and very gladly I would copy it out, with certain comfortable additions thereunto annexed. The which as yet will not be brought to paſs for lack of paper, until my lord be gone from hence, and then your requeſt ſhall be accompliſhed, God willing, without delay. Thus fare you well in God. Our dear brother and fellow in tribulation, Robert Allin, ſaluteth you, and the fellowſhip of the Holy Ghoſt be with you, Amen.

Ralph Allerton.

P. S. Do ye ſuppoſe that our brethren and ſiſters are not yet diſpatched out of this world? I think that either they are dead, or ſhall be within theſe two days.

As for the other objection yet remaining, and not ſpecified, if it were not more ſomewhat to ſhew the folly of theſe bloody tyrants (which of ſo ſmall trifles take occaſions to quarrel with the ſaints of God), than for any weighty thing therein contained; I would neither trouble you with the reading thereof, not yet myſelf with writing. But that ye may judge of them as their actions do give occaſion, I will now proceed in the matter.

Item, Thou Ralph Allerton canſt not deny, but confeſſeſt that the writing of letters in a little piece of paper on both ſides of it, with this ſentence following on the one ſide; "Look at the foot of the ſtocks for a knife," and the following ſentence on the other ſide, "Look between the poſt and the wall for two books and two epiſtles, leave them here when ye go:" remaining now in the regiſter and acts of this court, is voluntarily written by thee, Ralph Allerton, with thine own hand.

Item, Thou Ralph Allerton canſt not deny, but that thou art privy to a certain writing, remaining now in the regiſter and acts of this court, the beginning whereof is with theſe words, "I would have men wiſe, &c." and ending thus, "From houſe to houſe."

Item, Thou Ralph Allerton canſt not deny, but that thou art privy, and by conſent and maintenance, to a certain great wood-knife, a long ſword, a hook, a ſtone, and of a trencher written upon with chalk, having this ſentence, "All is gone and loſt, becauſe of your folly." Alſo of two boards, written upon with chalk, the one having this ſentence, "Under the ſtone look:" and the other having this ſentence, "Whereas you bid me take heed, I thank you, I truſt in God that I ſhall be at peace with him ſhortly;" remaining now regiſtered in the acts of this court.

For anſwer unto all theſe articles, he granted that the firſt nine were true, as the regiſter recordeth. Howbeit, I find noted in the backſide of the information, ſpecified in the ſecond article, although croſſed out again, that he denied ſuch things as were there on information againſt him. Therefore it is not likely that he did ſimply grant the contents of the ſecond article, but that he only affirmed, that ſuch an information was given againſt him, and not that the ſame was true.

Thus much I thought to acquaint the reader of, leſt in miſtaking his anſwers, it might ſeem that he granted himſelf to be a ſeditious and a rebellious perſon; of which fact he was both clear and innocent. And being farther demanded upon the contents of the eighth article, where he had the blood he wrote that letter withal? He ſaid that Richard Roth, ſometime fellow-priſoner with him, did make his noſe bleed, and thereby he got the blood wherewith he did then write. The biſhop again aſked him, to whom he would have ſent the ſame. He anſwered, unto one Agnes Smith, alias Silverſide, of Colcheſter. Why, ſays the biſhop, Agnes Smith was an heretic, and burnt for hereſy. Nay, ſaid Allerton, ſhe is in better caſe, than either I myſelf, or any of us all. And being again demanded, upon the ninth objection, to whom he would have ſent the letter mentioned in the ſame: he anſwered, that he intended to have ſent it unto Richard Roth, at that time ſeparated from him. Whereupon the biſhop farther inquired, what he meant by theſe words, "Brethren and ſiſters," ſpecified in the ſaid letter? He anſwered, that he meant thereby, ſuch as were lately condemned at Colcheſter, and were like, at the writing thereof, ſhortly to be burned. As for the contents of the tenth and eleventh articles, he utterly denied them. But to the twelfth, he confeſſed, that he wrote upon the ſaid trencher and other boards, the words mentioned in the ſaid article, and that he did leave the ſame in the priſon-houſe, to the intent that Richard Roth ſhould read them. Bonner alſo bringing out the wooden ſword, mentioned in the ſaid articles, aſked him who made it, and for what purpoſe? Whereunto he anſwered, that he was the maker thereof, howbeit for no evil purpoſe. But being idle in the priſon, and finding there an old board, he thought the time better ſpent in making thereof, than to ſit and do nothing at all.

The forenoon being now ſpent, the reſt of this tragedy was deferred till the afternoon. Wherein was miniſtered unto him yet certain other objections, the tenor whereof was,

Firſt, That he had miſliked the maſs, calling upon ſaints, and carrying the croſs in proceſſion, with other ceremonies, calling them idolatry, and alſo had diſſuaded them therefrom.

2. Item, That he was much deſirous to have the people believe as he did; and therefore being in priſon with his fellows, did ſing pſalms and other ſongs againſt the ſacrament of the altar, and other ordinances of the church, ſo loud that the people abroad might hear them and delight in them.

3. Item, That he at divers times conſpired againſt his keeper, and had provided things to kill him, and ſo break the priſon, and eſcape away.

4. That he had railed againſt the biſhop, being his ordinary, calling him a bloody butcher, tyrant, and ravening wolf, and alſo againſt his officers, eſpecially Cluny his ſumner, calling him butcher's cur, with other ſuch names.

5. Item, That he had murmured, grudged, diſdained and miſliked, that the biſhop had proceeded againſt ſome of his dioceſe, and had condemned them as heretics, or that he ſhould proceed now againſt him and others yet remaining in errors, notwithſtanding that he and his chaplains had charitably admoniſhed and exhorted them from the ſame.

6. Item, That he ought faithfully to believe, that there is one catholic church, without which there is no ſalvation: which church of Jeſus Chriſt is the very high prieſt and ſacrifice, whoſe body and blood is really and truly contained in the ſacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine; the bread and wine being by the divine power tranſubſtantiated into his body and blood.

7. Item, That he had kept himſelf, and alſo diſtributed to others certain heretical and corrupt books, condemned and reproved by the laws of this realm.

8. Item, That he had contrary to the orders and ſtatutes of this realm kept company with that ſeditious heretic and traitor, George Eagles, commonly called Trudge-over, and had heard him read in woods and other places, yet not accuſing, but allowing and praiſing him.

Unto which articles, becauſe they were for the moſt part fooliſh and full of lyes, he would in a manner make no anſwer, ſaving he granted, that he miſliked their maſs and other ceremonies, becauſe they were wicked and naught. And moreover, he told the biſhop, that he and his accomplices did nothing but ſeek how to kill innocents.

The biſhop then aſked, whether he would believe in all points touching the ſacrament of the altar, as is contained in the general council holden and kept under Innocent the third, and therewithal he did read the decree of the ſaid council concerning the ſacrament.

Whereunto Allerton again made anſwer and ſaid; I believe nothing contained in the ſame council, neither have I any thing to do therewith; and it were alſo very neceſſary, that no man elſe ſhould have to do therewith.

Then, quoth Bonner, thou art of the opinion that the heretics lately burnt at Colcheſter were of.

Yea, ſaid he, I am of their opinion, and believe that they be ſaints in heaven.

This done, the biſhop perceiving that he would not recant, demanded what he had to ſay, why he ſhould not pronounce the ſentence of condemnation againſt him. To whom he anſwered, Ye ought not to condemn me as an heretic, for I am a good chriſtian. But now go to, do as you have already determined: for I ſee right well, that right and truth is ſuppreſſed, and cannot appear upon the earth.

Theſe words ended, the biſhop pronounced the ſentence of condemnation, and ſo delivered him unto the temporal officers: who kept him in their cuſtody till the 17th of September, at which time, both he and the other three before mentioned, were all burned, as ye have already heard. Of which other three, becauſe as yet little is ſaid, I will therefore now proceed to declare ſuch cauſe of their cruel deaths, as in the regiſter is recorded.

James Auſtoo, and Margery his Wife.

I Cannot find why theſe two perſons were firſt apprehended, howbeit, as the days then ſerved, it was no hard or ſtrange matter to fall into the hands of ſuch, as with cruelty perſecuted the true profeſſors of God's goſpel, eſpecially having ſo many promoters, and unkind neighbours to help them forwards. By which kind of people, it is not unlike theſe two godly yoke-fellows were accuſed and taken: and being once delivered into the mercileſs hands of biſhop Bonner, their examinations, ye may be ſure, were not long deferred. For the 16th of July, 1557, they were brought before him at London: where firſt he demanded of the ſaid James Auſtoo (among other queſtions) where he had been confeſſed in Lent, and whether he had received the ſacrament of the altar at Eaſter, or not?

To whom he anſwered, that indeed he had been confeſſed of the curate of All-hallows Barking, nigh to the Tower of London, but that he had not received the ſacrament of the altar; for he deſired it from the bottom of his heart.

Why, quoth the biſhop, doſt thou not believe, that in the ſacrament of the altar there is the true body and blood of Chriſt?

No, ſaid Auſtoo, not in the ſacrament of the altar, but in the ſupper of the Lord, to the faithful receiver is the very body and blood of Chriſt by faith.

Bonner not well pleaſed with this talk, aſked then the wife, how ſhe liked the religion then uſed in this church of England?

She anſwered, that ſhe believed, that the ſame was not according to God's word, but falſe and corrupted, and that they which did go thereunto, did it more for fear of the law, than otherwiſe.

Then he again aſked her, if ſhe would go to the church and hear maſs, and pray for the proſperous eſtate of the king, being then abroad in his affairs.

Whereunto ſhe ſaid, that ſhe defied the maſs with all her heart, and that ſhe would not come into any church wherein were idols.

After this the biſhop objected unto them certain articles, unto the number of eighteen. The tenor whereof (becauſe they touch only ſuch common and trifling matters as are already mentioned in divers places before) I do for brevity's ſake omit and paſs over; giving you yet thus much to underſtand, that in the matters of faith they were as ſound, and anſwered as truly as ever any did, eſpecially the woman, to whom the Lord had given the greater knowledge, and more fervency of ſpirit. Notwithſtanding according to the meaſure of grace that God gave them, they both ſtood moſt firmly unto the truth. And therefore to conclude, the 10th day of Sept. they were, with Ralph Allerton, brought again before the biſhop within his chapel at Fulham, where he ſpeaking unto them, ſaid firſt on this wiſe; Auſtoo, doſt thou know where thou art now, and in what place, and before whom, and what thou haſt to do?

Yea, quoth Auſtoo, I know where I am: for I am in an idol's temple.

After which words, their articles being again read, and their conſtancy in faith perceived, Bonner pronounced againſt either of them ſeverally the ſentence of condemnation, and delivering them unto the ſheriff there preſent did rid his hands, as he thought, of them; but the Lord in the end will judge that: to whom I refer his cauſe.

Richard Roth.

IN the godly fellowſhip of the forenamed three martyrs, was alſo this Richard Roth, as is already ſpecified; who being apprehended, and brought up to the biſhop of London, was by him examined the 4th day of July, at which time the biſhop earneſtly perſuaded him to believe that there were ſeven ſacraments in Chriſt's church, and that in the ſacrament of the altar, after the words of conſecration duly ſpoken, there remaineth the very ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood, and none other. Whereunto, at the preſent, he made only this anſwer; that if the ſcripture did ſo teach him, and that he might be by the ſame ſo perſuaded, he would ſo believe, otherwiſe not. But at another examination, which was the 9th of Sept. he declared plainly, that in the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, as it was then uſed, there was not the very body and blood of Chriſt, but that it was a dead God, and that the maſs was deteſtable, and contrary to God's holy word and will, from which faith and opinion he would not go or decline. The next day, being the tenth of the ſame month, the biſhop at his houſe at Fulham, by way of an article, laid and objected againſt him; That he was a comforter and ſupporter of heretics: and therefore had written a letter to that effect unto ſeveral that were burned at Colcheſter, the copy whereof followeth:

Richard Roth's Letter to his Friends at Colcheſter.

O Dear brethren and ſiſters, how much have you to rejoice in God, that he hath given you ſuch faith to overcome this blood-thirſty tyrant thus far? and no doubt he that hath begun that good work in you, will fulfil it unto the end. O dear hearts in Chriſt, what a crown of glory ſhall ye receive with Chriſt in the kingdom of God? O that it had been the good will of God that I had been ready to have gone with you. For I lie in my lord's little eaſe in the day, and in the night I lie in the coal-houſe, from Ralph Allerton, or any other: and we look every day when we ſhall be condemned. For he ſaid, that I ſhould be burned within ten days before Eaſter; but I lie ſtill at the pool's brink, and every man goeth in before me: but we abide patiently the Lord's leiſure, with many bonds, in fetters and ſtocks; by which we have received great joy in God. And now fare you well dear brethren and ſiſters, in this world, but I truſt to ſee you in the heavens face to face.

Oh

Publiſhed as the Act directs, by H. Trapp Pater-noſter Row.

Oh brother Munt, with your wife and my ſiſter Roſe, how bleſſed are you in the Lord, that God hath found you worthy to ſuffer for his ſake? with all the reſt of my dear brethren and ſiſters known and unknown. O be joyful even unto death. Fear it not, ſaith Chriſt, for I have overcome death. O dear hearts, ſeeing that Jeſus will be our help, oh tarry you the Lord's leiſure. Be ſtrong, let your hearts be of good comfort, and wait you ſtill for the Lord. He is at hand. Yea, the angel of the Lord pitcheth his tent round about them that fear him, and delivereth them which way he ſeeth beſt. For our lives are in the Lord's hands; and they can do nothing unto us before God ſuffer them. Therefore give all thanks to God.

O dear hearts; you ſhall be cloathed with long white garments upon the mount Sion, with the multitude of ſaints, and with Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour, which will never forſake us. O bleſſed virgins, ye have played the wiſe virgins part, in that you have taken oyl in your lamps, that ye may go in with the bridegroom, when he cometh, into the everlaſting joy with him. But as for the fooliſh, they ſhall be ſhut out, becauſe they made not themſelves ready to ſuffer with Chriſt, neither go about to take up his croſs. Oh dear hearts, how precious ſhall your death be in the ſight of the Lord? for dear is the death of his ſaints. O fare you well, and pray. The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you all, Amen, Amen. Pray, pray, pray.

By me Richard Roth, written with my own blood.

This letter he confeſſed indeed (upon the ſaid examination) that he had written with his blood, and that he meant to have ſent the ſame unto ſuch as were condemned at Colcheſter for the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, and were afterwards burned there, as ye have already heard.

The biſhop then farther aſked him, what he thought his fellow-priſoner Ralph Allerton to be.

He anſwered, that he thought him to be one of the elect children of God; and that if at any time hereafter he happened to be put to death for his faith and religion, he thought he ſhould die a true martyr. And moreover, finding himſelf grieved with the biſhop's privy and ſecret condemning of God's people, he ſaid unto him in this ſort; My lord, becauſe the people ſhould not ſee and behold your doings, ye cauſe me and others to be brought to our examinations by night, being afraid (belike) to do it by day.

The biſhop, not greatly caring for his talk, proceeded to examine him of other matters, amongſt which this high and weighty thing was one, videlicet, how he did like the order and rites of the church then uſed here in England?

To whom he ſaid, that he ever had, and yet then did abhor the ſame with all his heart.

Then divers of the biſhop's complices intreated and perſuaded him to recant, and aſk mercy of the biſhop.

No (quoth Roth) I will not ask mercy of him that cannot give it. Whereupon he was (as the reſt before mentioned) condemned and delivered unto the ſheriff, and the 17th day of September, they all moſt joyfully ended their lives in one fire at Iſlington, for the teſtimony of Chriſt, as is before declared.

Agnes Bongeor, and Margaret Thurſton, two pious Women, burnt at Colcheſter, for the ſincere Profeſſion of Chriſt's Goſpel.

A Little before (gentle reader) mention was made of ten that ſuffered martyrdom at Colcheſter; at which time there were alſo two other women, one called Margaret Thurſton, and the other Agnes Bongeor, that ſhould have ſuffered with them, and were likewiſe condemned at the ſame time and place, for the like cauſe with the other ten before-mentioned, and anſwered alſo in their examinations to the ſame effect as the others did. But the one, namely Margaret Thurſton, the morning ſhe ſhould ſuffer with thoſe that went from the caſtle, was for that time deferred. What the cauſe was, the teſtimony of Joan Cook ſhall declare unto us. Which Joan Cook, now the wife of John Spark, being then in the caſtle of Colcheſter for religion, did demand of this widow Thurſton, whoſe huſband died in the priſon, being impriſoned for religion, wherefore the ſaid Margaret, being a condemned woman, ſhould be reſerved when the others ſuffered in the caſtle Baily? She anſwered, that it was not for any fear of death; but being prepared, as the reſt were that ſuffered the ſame day, ſhe was taken with a great ſhivering and trembling of the fleſh; whereupon, forſaking the company, ſhe went aſide to pray; and whilſt ſhe was a praying, ſhe thought that ſhe was lifted up by a mighty wind that came round about her. Even at that inſtant came in the gaoler and company with him, and whilſt ſhe turned herſelf to fetch her pſalter, they took the other priſoners and left her alone. Shortly after ſhe was removed out of the caſtle, and put into the town priſon, where ſhe continued until Friday ſevennight after her company were burnt. That day, not two hours before her death, ſhe was brought to the caſtle again, where ſhe declared thus much to the aforeſaid Joan Cook.

The other, named Agnes Bongeor, who ſhould have ſuffered in like manner with the ſix that went out of Motehall, was alſo kept back at that time, but not in like ſort, becauſe her name was wrong written within the writ.

The ſame morning, the ſecond of Auguſt, that the ſaid ſix in Motehall were called out to go to their martyrdom, Agnes Bongeor was alſo called with them, by the name of Agnes Bower. Wherefore the bailiffs, underſtanding her to be wrong named within the writ, commanded the ſaid Agnes Bongeor to priſon again, as you have heard in the letter before-mentioned, and ſo that day ſent her from Motehall to the caſtle, where ſhe remained till her death.

But when ſhe ſaw herſelf ſeparated from her fellow-priſoners in ſuch manner, oh! what piteous complaint that good woman made; how bitterly ſhe wept; what ſtrange thoughts came into her mind, how naked and deſolate ſhe eſteemed herſelf, and to what plunge of deſpair and care her poor ſoul was brought, was both ſad and moving to behold: and all came becauſe ſhe went not with them to give up her life for the cauſe of Chriſt; for of all things in the world, life was the leaſt thing that ſhe expected. For the morning, on which ſhe was kept back from burning, ſhe had put on a ſmock that ſhe had prepared only for that purpoſe. And alſo having a child, a little young infant ſucking on her, whom ſhe kept with her tenderly all the time ſhe was in priſon, that day likewiſe did ſhe ſend away to another nurſe, and prepared herſelf preſently to give herſelf for the teſtimony of the glorious goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt. So little did ſhe look for life, and ſo greatly did God's gifts work in her above nature, that death ſeemed much better welcome than life. But this took not effect at that time as ſhe thought it would, and therefore (as I ſaid) ſhe was greatly troubled.

Being in this great perplexity of mind, a friend of hers came to her, and required to know whether Abraham's obedience was accepted before God, for that he did ſacrifice his ſon Iſaac, or in that he would have offended him? unto which ſhe anſwered thus:

I know, ſaid ſhe, that Abraham's will before God was allowed for the deed, in that he would have done it, if the angel of the Lord had not ſtayed him: but I (ſaid ſhe) am unhappy, the Lord thinketh me not worthy of this dignity, and therefore Abraham's caſe and mine is not alike.

Why, ſaid her friend, would ye not willingly have gone with your company, if God ſhould ſo have ſuffered it?

Yes,

Yes, ſaid ſhe, with all my heart, and becauſe I did not, it is now my chief and greateſt grief.

Then ſaid her friend; my dear ſiſter, I pray thee conſider Abraham and thyſelf well, and thou ſhalt ſee thou doeſt nothing differ from him in will at all.

Alas, ſaid ſhe, there is a far greater matter in Abraham than in me; for Abraham was tried with the offering of his own child, but ſo am not I; and therefore our caſes are not alike,

Good ſiſter, ſaid her friend, weigh the matter but indifferently. Abraham, I grant, would have offered his ſon: and have not you done the like in your little ſucking babe? but conſider further than this, my good ſiſter (ſaid he) where Abraham was commanded but to offer his ſon, you are heavy and grieved becauſe you offer not yourſelf, which goeth ſomewhat more near you than Abraham's obedience did; and therefore before God, aſſuredly, is no leſs accepted and allowed in his holy preſence; which further the preparing of your ſhroud alſo doth argue full well, &c. After which talk between them, ſhe began a little to ſtay herſelf, and gave her whole exerciſe to reading and prayer, wherein ſhe found a great deal of comfort.

In the time that theſe aforeſaid two good women were priſoners, one in the caſtle, and the other in Motehall, God by a ſecret means called the ſaid Margaret Thurſton unto his truth again; who having her eyes opened by the working of his Spirit, did greatly ſorrow and lament her backſliding before, and promiſed faithfully to the Lord in hope of his mercies, never more while ſhe lived to do the like again, but that ſhe would conſtantly ſtand to the confeſſion of the ſame; againſt all the adverſaries of the croſs of Chriſt. After which promiſe made, came in a ſhort time a writ from London for the burning of them, which was accordingly executed the 17th day of September, in the year aforeſaid.

Now when theſe aforeſaid women were brought to the place at Colcheſter where they ſhould ſuffer, they fell down upon their knees, and made their humble prayers to God, which being done, they roſe, and went to the ſtake joyfully, and were immediately chained thereto, and after the fire had compaſſed them about, they with great joy and glorious triumph gave up their ſouls, ſpirits, and lives, into the hands of the Lord, under whoſe government and protection, for Chriſt's ſake we beſeech him to grant us his holy defence and help for evermore, Amen.

John Kurde, Martyr.

IN the ſtory before, ſome things were mentioned of a certain ſhoe-maker ſuffering at Northampton, being un-named, when becauſe we underſtand by a letter ſent from the ſaid parties, that he ſuffered in this year 1557, and in the month of September, therefore we thought there to place him. His name was John Kurde, a ſhoemaker, late of the pariſh of Syrſam, in Northamptonſhire, who was impriſoned in Northampton caſtle, for denying the popiſh tranſubſtantiation, for which cauſe William Binſley, batchelor of law, and chancellor unto the biſhop of Peterborough, and now archdeacon of Northampton, did pronounce ſentence of death againſt the ſaid Kurde, in the church of All-ſaints, in Northampton, in Auguſt, 1557, and in September following, at the commandment of Sir Thomas Treſham, ſheriff then of the ſhire, he was led by his officers without the north-gate of Northampton, and in the ſtonepits was burned. A popiſh prieſt ſtanding by, whoſe name was John Rote, vicar of St. Giles's in Northampton, did declare unto him, that if he would recant, he was authoriſed to give him his pardon. His anſwer was, that he had his pardon by Jeſus Chriſt, &c.

A true Certificate of the apprehending of John Noyes, of Laxefield, in the county of Suffolk, Shoe-maker, April 19th, 1557.

IN the month of September this preſent year, or (as ſome report) in the year paſt, ſuffered the bleſſed martyr, John Noyes, whoſe ſtory here followeth.

Firſt, Mr. Thomas Lovel, being then chief conſtable of Hoxton hundred, in the county aforeſaid, and one John Jacob, and William Stannard, then being underconſtables of the aforeſaid town of Laxefield, and Wolfren Dowſing, and Nicholas Stannard, of the ſame town, being then accounted faithful and catholic chriſtians, though undoubtedly they proved moſt cruel hinderers of the true profeſſors of Chriſt and his goſpel, with others, were commanded to be that preſent day before the juſtices, whoſe names were Mr. Thurſton, Sir John Tyrrel, and Mr. Kene, and Sir Jo. Silliard being high-ſheriff.

Theſe ſitting at Hoxton, in the county of Suffolk aforeſaid, and there the ſaid townſmen aforeſaid having commandment of the ſaid juſtices to inquire in their town if there were any that would neglect to come to their ſervice and maſs, further to examine the cauſe why they would not come, and thereupon to bring the true certificate to the ſaid juſtices within fourteen days then next enſuing; they then coming homeward, being full of hatred againſt the truth, and deſirous to get promotion, without any ſuch commandment of the juſtices (as far as we can learn) took counſel one with another how to attach the ſaid John Noyes without any more delay.

This deviliſh enterprize agreed upon, chiefly through the counſel of Mr. Thomas Lovel, Wolfren Dowſing, and Nicholas Stannard aforeſaid, with expedition his houſe was beſet on both ſides. This done, they found the ſaid John Noyes on the backſide of the ſaid houſe going out, and Nicholas Stannard called to the ſaid John, and ſaid, Whither goeſt thou? and he ſaid, To my neighbour's. And the ſaid Nicholas Stannard ſaid, Your maſter hath deceived you; you muſt go with us now. But the ſaid John Noyes anſwered, No, but take you heed your maſter deceive not you. And ſo they took him, and carried him to the juſtices the next day. After his appearance, and ſundry cauſes alledging, the juſtices and the ſheriff together caſt him into Eye dungeon, and there he lay a certain time, And then was carried from thence to Norwich, and ſo came before the biſhop, where were miniſtered unto him theſe poſitions following:

Firſt, Whether he believed that the ceremonies uſed in the church were good and godly, to ſtir up mens minds to devotion.

2. Item, Whether he believed the pope to be ſupreme head of the church here in earth.

3. Item, Whether he believed the body of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt to be in the ſacrament of the altar under the forms of bread and wine, after the words of conſecration.

Whereunto he anſwered, that he thought the natural body of Chriſt to be only in heaven, and not in the ſacrament, &c.

For which, ſentence at laſt was read by the biſhop againſt him in the preſence of theſe there ſitting the ſame time, Dr. Dunning, chancellor, Sir W. Woodhouſe, Sir Thomas Woodhouſe, Mr. George Heyden, Mr. Spenſer, W. Farrar, alderman of Norwich, Mr. Thurſton, Wineſden, with divers others.

More of his examination than this came not to our hands.

In the mean time, his brother-in-law, Nicholas Fiſk, of Dennington, going to comfort him at ſuch a time as he remained priſoner in the Guildhall of Norwich, after chriſtian exhortation, asked him if he did not fear death when the biſhop gave judgement againſt him, conſidering the terror of the ſame; and the ſaid Noyes anſwered, he thanked thanked God he feared death no more at that time, than he or any other did, being at liberty. Then the ſaid Nicholas required him to ſhew the cauſe of his condemnation. Upon which requeſt, the ſaid John Noyes writ with his own hand as followeth:

I ſaid, that I could not believe, that in the ſacrament of the altar there is the natural body of Chriſt, the ſame body that was born of the virgin Mary. But I ſaid, that the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt is received of chriſtian people in remembrance of Chriſt's death, as a ſpiritual food, if it be miniſtered according to Chriſt's inſtitution.

But they ſaid, I could not tell what ſpiritual meant. The biſhop ſaid, that the ſacrament was God, and muſt be worſhipped as God. So ſaid the chancellor alſo.

Then anſwered I, My lord, I cannot ſo believe.

Then ſaid the biſhop, why? then ſay thou doſt believe. Notwithſtanding theſe colluſions could not prevail.

Now being condemned, he was ſent again from Norwich to Eye priſon, and upon the 21ſt day of September about midnight, he was brought from Eye to Laxefield to be burned, and on the next morning was brought to the ſtake, where was ready againſt his coming, the aforeſaid juſtice Mr. Thurſton, one Mr. Waller then being under-ſheriff, and Mr. Thomas Lovel being high-conſtable, as is before expreſſed, who commanded men to make ready all things meet for that ſinful purpoſe. Now the fire in moſt places of the ſtreet was put out, ſaving a ſmoak was eſpied by the ſaid Thomas Lovel proceeding out from the top of a chimney, to which houſe the ſheriff and Granmow his man went, and brake open the door, and thereby got fire, and brought the ſame to the place of execution. When John Noyes came to the place where he ſhould be burned, he kneeled down, and ſaid the 50th Pſalm, wth other prayers, and then they making haſte, bound him to the ſtake, and being bound, the ſaid John Noyes ſaid, "Fear not them that can kill the body, but fear him that can kill both body and ſoul, and caſt it into everlaſting fire."

When he ſaw his ſiſter weeping and making moan for him, he bade her that ſhe ſhould not weep for him, but weep for her ſins.

Then one Nicholas Cadman brought a faggot, and ſet againſt him; and the ſaid John Noyes took up the faghot, and kiſſed it, and ſaid; bleſſed be the time that ever I was born to come to this.

Then he delivered his pſalter to the under-ſheriff, deſiring him to be good to his wife and children, and to deliver to her that ſame book; and the ſheriff promiſed him that he would, notwithſtanding he never as yet performed his promiſe. Then the ſaid John Noyes ſaid to the people, They ſay they can make God of a piece of bread, believe them not.

Then ſaid he; Good people, bear witneſs that I do believe to be ſaved by the merits and paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt, and not by mine own deeds; and ſo the fire was kindled, and burned about him, then he ſaid, Lord have mercy upon me. Chriſt have mercy upon me. Son of David have mercy upon me.

And ſo he yielded up his life, and when his body was burned, they made a pit to bury the coals and aſhes, and amongſt the ſame they found one of his feet that was unburned, whole up to the ancle with the hoſe on, and that they buried with the reſt.

Now while he was a burning, there ſtood one John Jarvis by, a ſervant in the ſame town, a plain fellow, which ſaid; Good Lord, how the ſinews of his arms ſhrink up. And there ſtood behind him Granmow and Benet, the ſheriff's men, and they told their maſter, that John Jarvis ſaid, What villain wretches are theſe? and their maſter ordered them to apprehend him, and they took him and pinioned him, and carried him before the juſtice that ſame day, and the juſtice did examine him of the words aforeſaid, but he denied them, and anſwered that he ſaid nothing but this, Good Lord, how the ſinews of his arms ſhrink up. But for all this the juſtice did bind his father and his maſter in 5l. a-piece, that he ſhould be forthcoming at all times. And on the Wedneſday next he was brought again before the juſtices, Mr. Thurſton and Mr. Kene, they ſitting at Freſingfield in Hoxton hundred, and there they did appoint and command, that the ſaid John Jarvis ſhould be ſet in the ſtocks the next market day, and whipt about the market naked. But his maſter, one William Jarvis, did after crave friendſhip of the conſtables, and they did not ſet him in the ſtocks till Sunday morning, and in the afternoon they did whip him about the market with a dog-whip, having three cords, and ſo they let him go.

The Copy of a certain Letter that he ſent to comfort his Wife at ſuch Time that he lay in Priſon.

WIFE, you deſired me that I would ſend you ſome tokens that you might remember me. As I did read in the New Teſtament, I thought it good to write unto you certain places of the ſcripture for a remembrance. Saint Peter ſaith, 1 Pet. 4. "Dearly beloved, be not troubled with this heat that is now come among you to try you, as though ſome ſtrange thing had happened unto you, but rejoice, inſomuch as ye are partakers of Chriſt's ſufferings, that when his glory appeareth ye may be merry and glad. If ye be railed on for the name of Chriſt, happy are ye, for the Spirit of glory, and the Spirit of God reſteth upon you.

"It is better, if the will of God be ſo, that ye ſuffer for well doing than for evil doing. 1 Pet. 4."

So 1 Pet. 4. "See that none of you ſuffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or an evil-doer, or as a buſy body in other mens matters; but if any man ſuffer as a chriſtian man, let him not be aſhamed, but let him glorify God in this behalf; for the time is come that judgment muſt begin at the houſe of God. If it firſt begin at us, what ſhall the end of them be that believe not the goſpel of God? wherefore let them that ſuffer according to the will of God, commit their ſouls to him in well doing."

St. Paul ſaith, 2 Tim. 3. "All that will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus, muſt ſuffer perſecution."

St. John ſaith, 1 John, 2. "See that ye love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, as the luſt of the fleſh, the luſt of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world, which vaniſheth away, and the luſt thereof, but he that fulfilleth the will of God abideth for ever."

St. Paul ſaith, Col. 3. "If ye be riſen again with Chriſt, ſeek thoſe things which are above, where Chriſt ſitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affection on things that are above, and not on things which are on earth."

Our Saviour Chriſt ſaith, Matt. 18. "Whoſoever ſhall offend one of theſe little ones that believe in me, it were better for him that a mill-ſtone were hanged about his neck, and that he were caſt into the ſea."

The Prophet David ſaith, Pſal. 34. "Great are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of all."

"Fear the Lord, ye his ſaints: for they that fear him lack nothing."

"When the righteous cry, the Lord heareth them, and delivereth them out of all their troubles: but miſfortune ſhall ſlay the ungodly, and they that hate the righteous ſhall periſh."

"Hear, O my people. I aſſure thee, O Iſrael, if thou will hearken unto me, there ſhall no ſtrange God be in thee, neither ſhalt thou worſhip any other God. Oh that my people would obey me: for if Iſrael would walk in my ways, I ſhould ſoon put down their enemies, and turn my hand againſt their adverſaries."

Our

Our Saviour Chriſt ſaith; "The diſciple is not above his Maſter, nor yet the ſervant above his Lord. It is enough for the diſciple to be as his maſter is, and that the ſervant be as his lord is. If they have called the maſter of the houſe belzebub, how much more ſhall they call them of his houſhold ſo? fear them not therefore."

St. Paul ſaith, 2 Cor. 4. "Set yourſelves therefore at large, and bear not a ſtranger's yoke with the unbelievers: for what fellowſhip hath righteouſneſs with unrighteouſneſs? what company hath light with darkneſs? either what part hath the believer with the infidel, &c? Wherefore come out from among them, and ſeparate yourſelves now (ſaith the Lord, and touch none unclean thing; ſo will I receive you, and I will be a Father unto you, and ye ſhall be my ſons and daughters, ſaith the Lord Almighty."

"For neither eye hath ſeen, nor the ear hath heard, neither can it enter into the heart of man what good things the Lord hath prepared for them that love him, 1 Cor. 2."

"Ye are bought neither with ſilver nor gold, but with the precious blood of Chriſt, 1 Pet. 1."

"There is none other name given to men wherein we muſt be ſaved, Acts 4."

"So fare ye well wife and children; and leave "worldly care, and ſee that ye be diligent "to pray.

"Take no thought (ſaith Chriſt, Matt. 6.) ſaying, what ſhall we eat, or what ſhall we drink, or wherewith ſhall we be cloathed? (for after all theſe things ſeek the Gentiles) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all theſe things, but ſeek ye firſt the kingdom of heaven, and the righteouſneſs thereof, and all theſe things ſhall be miniſtered unto you."

The Martyrdom of Cicely Ormes, at Norwich.

ABOUT the 23d day of the ſaid month of September, next after the others above-mentioned, ſuffered at Norwich, Cicely Ormes, wife of Edmund Ormes, worſted weaver, dwelling in St. Laurence pariſh in Norwich: ſhe being of the age of thirty-two or more, was taken at the death of Simon Miller and Elizabeth Cooper above-mentioned, in a place called Lollards pit without Biſhopſgate, at the ſaid Norwich, for that ſhe ſaid ſhe would pledge them of the ſame cup that they drank of. For ſo ſaying, one Mr. Corbet, of Sprowſon, by Norwich, took her, and ſent her to the chancellor. When ſhe came before him, he aſked her what ſhe ſaid unto the ſacrament of Chriſt's body. And ſhe ſaid, ſhe did believe it was the ſacrament of the body of Chriſt. Yea, ſaid the chancellor, but what is that that the prieſt holdeth over his head? ſhe anſwered him, and ſaid, it is bread: and if you make it any better, it is worſe. At which words the chancellor ſent her to the biſhop's priſon, to the keeper called Fellow, with many threatnings and hot words, as a man being in great rage.

The twenty-third of July ſhe was called before the chancellor again, who ſat in judgment with Mr. Bridges and others. The chancellor offered her, if ſhe would go to the church and keep her tongue, ſhe ſhould be at liberty, and believe as ſhe would. But ſhe told him, ſhe would not conſent to his wicked deſire therein, do with her what he would; for if ſhe ſhould, ſhe ſaid, God would ſurely plague her. Then the chancellor told her, he had ſhewed more favour to her, than ever he did to any, and that he was loth to condemn her, conſidering ſhe was an ignorant, unlearned, and fooliſh woman. But ſhe, not weighing his words, told him, if he did, he ſhould not be ſo deſirous of her ſinful fleſh, as ſhe would (by God's grace) be content to give it in ſo good a quarrel. Then he roſe and read the bloody ſentence of condemnation againſt her, and ſo delivered her to the ſecular power of the ſheriffs of the city, Mr. Thomas Sutherton, and Mr. Leonard Sutherton, brethren, who immediately carried her to Guildhall, in Norwich, where ſhe remained until her death.

This Cicely Ormes was a very ſimple woman, but yet zealous in the Lord's cauſe, being born in Eaſt Deram, and was the daughter of one Thomas Haund, taylor. She was taken the fifth day of July, and did for a twelve-month before ſhe was taken recant, but never after was ſhe quiet in conſcience, until ſhe was utterly driven from all their popery. Between the time that ſhe recanted, and that ſhe was taken, ſhe got a letter made to give to the chancellor, to let him know that ſhe repented her recantation from the bottom of her heart, and would never do the like again while ſhe lived. But before ſhe exhibited her bill, ſhe was taken and ſent to priſon as is before ſaid. She was burnt the twenty-third of September, between ſeven and eight in the morning, the ſaid two ſheriffs being there, and to the number of two hundred people. When ſhe came to the ſtake, ſhe kneeled down, and made her prayers to God: that being done, ſhe roſe up and ſaid, Good people, I believe in God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghoſt, three perſons, and one God.

This do I not, nor will I recant; but I recant utterly from the bottom of my heart the doings of the pope of Rome, and all his popiſh prieſts I utterly refuſe, and never will have to do with them again by God's grace. And good people, I would you ſhould not think of me, that I believe to be ſaved in that I offer myſelf here unto the death for the Lord's cauſe, but I believe to be ſaved by the death and paſſion of Chriſt; and this my death is and ſhall be a witneſs of my faith unto you all here preſent. Good people, as many of you as believe as I believe, pray for me.

Then ſhe came to the ſtake, and laid her hand on it, and ſaid, "Welcome the croſs of Chriſt." Which being done, ſhe looking on her hand, and ſeeing it blacked with the ſtake, ſhe wiped it upon her ſmock, for ſhe was burnt at the ſame ſtake that Simon Miller and Eliz. Cooper was. Then after ſhe had touched it with her hand, ſhe came and kiſſed it, and ſaid, "Welcome the ſweet croſs of Chriſt," and ſo gave herſelf to be bound thereto. After the tormentors had kindled the fire to her, ſhe ſaid, "My ſoul doth magnify the Lord, and my ſpirit rejoiceth in God my Saviour;" and in ſaying ſo ſhe ſet her hands together right againſt her breaſt, caſting her eyes and head upward, and ſo ſtood, heaving up her hands by little and little, till the very ſinews of her arms did break aſunder, and then they fell; but ſhe yielded her life unto God as quietly as if ſhe had been in a ſlumber, or as one feeling no pain; ſo wonderfully did the Lord work with her; his name therefore be praiſed for evermore, Amen.

After the death and martyrdom of Mrs. Joyce Lewes, a little above ſpecified, divers good men and women in the ſame town of Litchfield were had up before the biſhop and his chancellor, for kiſſing the ſaid Joyce Lewes, and drinking with her about the time of her death; the names of which perſons were theſe; Joan Love, Elizabeth Smith, Margaret Biddel, Helen Bouring, Margaret Cootesfort, Nicholas Bird, John Hariſtone and his wife, Agnes Glyn, Agnes Glover, Agnes Penifather, &c. Theſe with others were produced to their examination before the biſhop and his chancellor for the cauſe above-named, and therefore adjudged for heretics, becauſe they did pray and drink with the ſaid Mrs. Lewes, but eſpecially Agnes Penifather ſuſtained the moſt trouble, for that ſhe accompanied the ſaid Joyce Lewes going to her death. Which Agnes being examined further of the ſaid biſhop, what words ſhe had ſpoken to two prieſts of the church of Litchfield, called John Ady, and James Fox, concerning the ſaid Joyce Lewes after her burning, ſaid as followeth, That ſhe being aſked by the ſaid two prieſts being at her father's houſe in the city of Litchfield, at ſuch time as ſhe came from the burning of the ſaid Joyce Lewes, why ſhe the ſaid Agnes did weep for ſuch an heretic, meaning Joyce Lewes, whoſe ſoul they ſaid was in hell; the ſaid Agnes Penifather to their demand made this anſwer, That ſhe thought the bleſſed martyr to be in better caſe than the ſaid two prieſts were.

With

With which words being charged, and desired to submit herself as the others had done above rehearsed to such penance as they should enjoin unto her, she refused so to do, and therefore was commanded to close prison, the sheriffs being charged with her under pain of a hundred pounds, that none should have any access unto her. At length, at the persuasion of her friends she was compelled to do as the others had done before. And thus much concerning things done at Litchfield.

And now from Litchfield to come to Chichester, although we have but little to report thereof, for want of certain relation and records of that country, yet it seemeth no little trouble and persecution to have there raged also, as in other countries. For what place was there almost in all the realm, where the pope's ministers did not bestir them, murdering some or other, as in the acts of this ecclesiastical history may sufficiently appear? Wherefore as this plague of the pope's tyranny was general to all other people and countries of England, so likewise in the diocese of Chichester, divers and many there were condemned and martyred for the true testimony of righteousness within the compass of queen Mary's reign. In the number of whom were these: John Foreman of Eastgrenested. John Warner of Berne. Christian Grover of the archdeaconry of Lewes. Thomas Athoth, priest. Thomas Avington of Erdingly. Dennis Burgis of Buxsted. Thomas Ravensdale of Rie. John Mimes of Hellinglegh. Nicholas Holden of Withiam. John Hart of Withiam, Margery Morice of Hethfield. Anne Try of Eastgrenested. John Oseward of Woodmancote. Thomas Harland of Woodmancote. James Morice of Hethfield. Thomas Dougate of Eastgrenested. John Asnedon of Katherfield.

The greatest actor against these faithful martyrs, were these: Christopherson the bishop of Chichester, Richard Briefly doctor of law, and chancellor of Chichester, Robert Taylor batchelor of law, his deputy, Thomas Paccard civilian, Anth. Clarke, Albane Langdale batchelor of divinity, &c.

The Examination of Thomas Spurdance one of Queen Mary's Servants, before the Chancellor of Norwich.

THE bishop's chancellor asked me if I had been with the priest, and confessed my sins unto him.

And I said, No, I had confessed my sins to God, and God saith, In what hour soever a sinner repenteth and is sorry for his sins, and asketh forgiveness, willing no more so to do, he will no more reckon his sin unto him, and that is sufficient for me.

Then said the chancellor, Thou denyest the sacrament of penance.

I said, I deny not penance, but I deny that I should shew my sins unto the priest.

Then said the chancellor, That is a denying of the sacrament of penance.

Write this article.

Have you received the blessed sacrament of the altar (said he) at this time of Easter?

And I said, No.

And why have not, saith he?

I said, I dare not meddle with you in it, as you use it.

Why, do we not use it truly, said he?

I said, No: for the holy supper of the Lord serveth for the christian congregation, and you are none of Christ's members: and therefore I dare not meddle with you, lest I be like unto you.

Why are we none of Christ's members, said the chancellor?

I said, Because you teach laws contrary to God's laws.

What laws are those, said he?

I said, These three articles that you swear the people unto here, be false and untrue, and you do evil to swear the people unto them.

Then said he, Good people take no heed unto his words; for he is an heretic, and teacheth you disobedience: and so he would no more speak of that matter.

Then said he, How believest thou in the blessed sacrament of the altar: dost thou not believe that after it is consecrated, it is the very same body that was born of the virgin Mary?

I said, No, not the same body in substance; for the same body hath a substance in flesh, blood, and bones, and was a bloody sacrifice, and this is a dry sacrifice.

And I said, Is the mass a sacrifice?

Unto which a doctor answered that sate by him, It is a sacrifice both for the quick and the dead.

Then said I, No, it is no sacrifice; for St. Paul saith, that Christ made one sacrifice once for all: and I do believe in none other sacrifice, but only in that one sacrifice that our Lord Jesus Christ made once for all.

Then said the doctor, That sacrifice that Christ made, was a wet sacrifice, and the mass is a dry sacrifice.

Then said I, That same dry sacrifice is a sacrifice of your own making, and it is your sacrifice, it is none of mine.

Then said the chancellor, He is an heretic, he denieth the sacrament of the altar?

Then said I, Will ye know how I believe in the holy supper of our Lord?

And he said, Yea.

Then said I, I believe that if I come rightly and worthily as God hath commanded me, to the holy supper of the Lord, I receive him by faith, by believing in him. But the bread being received is not God, nor the bread that is yonder in the pix is not God. God dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither will be worshipped with the works of men's hands. And therefore you do very evil to cause the people to kneel down and worship the bread; for God did never bid you hold it above your heads, neither had the apostles such use.

Then said the chancellor, He denieth the presence in the sacrament. Write this article also. He is a very heretic.

Then said I, The servant is not greater than his master. For your predecessors killed my master Christ, the prophets and apostles, and holy virtuous men, and now you also kill the servant of Christ, so that all the righteous blood that hath been shed, even from righteous Abel, until this day, shall be required at your hands.

Well, said the chancellor, Have him away.

Another Examination of Spurdance, before the Bishop in his House.

Bishop. SIRRAH, dost thou not believe in the catholic faith of the holy church?

Spurdance. I believe Christ's catholic church.

Bishop. Yea in Christ's church, of which the pope is the head? dost thou not believe that the pope is supreme head of the catholic church?

Spurdance. No. I believe not he should be above the apostles, if he take them to be his predecessors. For when there came a thought among the apostles, who should be the greatest when their master was gone, Christ answered them unto their thoughts, "The kings of the earth bear dominion above other, but ye shall not so do, for he that will be greatest among you shall become servant unto you all. How is it then (said I) that he will climb so high above his fellows? And also we were sworn in my master king Henry's time, that we should to the utmost of our power, never consent to him again. And therefore as he hath nothing to do here in England, so neither in his own country more, than a bishop hath in his diocese.

Bishop. Yea, what of that? we were then in error and sin, and now we are in the right way again, and therefore thou must come home again with us, and acknowledge thy thy fault, and become a chriſtian man, and be ſworn unto the pope as our ſupreme head. Wilt thou thus be ſworn unto the pope? how ſayeſt thou?

Spurdance. No, I warrant you, by the grace of God not as long as I live. For you cannot prove by the ſcripture that the pope is head of the church, and may do therein what he pleaſeth.

Biſhop. No? yes I trow: for as the bellweather which weareth the bell, is head of the flock of ſheep, even ſo is the pope the head of the church of Chriſt. And as the bees in the hive have a maſter bee, when they are gone out, to bring them home again to the hive: even ſo the pope when we be gone aſtray and wandered from the fold, from the hive, &c. then is ordained our head by ſucceſſion of Peter, to bring us home again to the true church. As thou now, my good fellow, haſt wandered long out of the way like a ſcattered ſheep, &c. hear therefore that bellweather, the maſter bell, &c. and come home with us to thy mother the church again.

Spurdance. My lord, all this is but natural reaſon, and no ſcripture: but ſince ye cannot prove the pope to be authorized by ſcripture, ye anſwer not me as I thought ye would.

Biſhop. Ha, I ſee well ye be ſtout, and will not be anſwered: therefore ye ſhall be compelled by law whether ye will or no.

Spurdance. My lord, ſo did your forefathers intreat Chriſt and his apoſtles. They had a law, and by their law they put him to death; and ſo likewiſe, you have a law which is tyranny, and by that would ye enforce me to believe as you do: but the Lord I truſt will aſſiſt me againſt all your beggarly ceremonies, and make your fooliſhneſs known to all the world one day.

Biſhop. When were you at church and went in proceſſion, and did the ceremonies of the church?

Spurdance. Never ſince I was born.

Biſhop. No? how old are you?

Spurdance. I think about forty.

Biſhop. Why, how did you uſe yourſelf at church 20 years ago?

Spurdance. As you do now.

Biſhop. And even now, you ſaid you did not uſe the ceremonies ſince you were born.

Spurdance. No more I did, ſince I was born anew; as Chriſt ſaid unto Nicodemus, "Except ye be born anew, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Then ſaid a doctor that ſat by, He is a very anabaptiſt: for that is their opinion plain.

No, Sir, you ſay falſly, ſaid I: for I am no anabaptiſt: for they deny children to be baptized, and ſo do not I.

Biſhop. Well, why doſt thou not go to the church, and do the ceremonies?

Spurdance. Becauſe they be contrary to God's word and laws, as you yourſelf have taught: but now you ſay it is good again: and I think if there were a return tomorrow, you would ſay that falſe again which you hold now. Therefore, I may well ſay, there is no truth in you.

Biſhop. Then thou art a ſtubborn fellow, and an heretic, and a traitor.

Spurdance. No, I am no traitor, for I have done, I think, better ſervice to the crown imperial of England, than you.

Biſhop. If you had done ſo good ſervice, you would be obedient to the laws of the realm.

Spurdance. So I am. There is no man alive, I thank God, that can accuſe me juſtly that ever I was diſobedient to any civil laws. But you muſt conſider, my lord, that I have a ſoul and a body, and my ſoul is none of the queen's, but my body and my goods are the queen's. And I muſt give God my ſoul, and all that belongeth unto it, that is, I muſt do the laws and commandments of God; and whoſoever commandeth me contrary to God's laws, I may not do them for loſing of my ſoul, but muſt rather obey God than man.

Biſhop. Why doſt thou not theſe laws then? are they not agreeable to God's law?

Spurdance. No, you cannot prove them to be God's laws.

Biſhop. Yes, that I can.

Spurdance. Then if you can prove by the word of God that you ſhould have any graven images made to ſet in your churches for laymen's books or to worſhip God by them, or that you ſhould have any ceremonies in your church as you have, prove them by the word of God, and I will do them.

Biſhop. Then it is a good and decent order to furniſh the church: as when you ſhall go to dinner, you have a cloth upon the table to furniſh the table before the meat ſhall come upon it; ſo are all theſe ceremonies a comely, decent order to be in the church among chriſtian people.

Spurdance. Theſe are inventions and imaginations out of your own brain, without any word of God to prove them. For God ſaith, Look what you think good in your own eyes, if I command the contrary, it is abominable in my ſight. And theſe ceremonies are againſt God's laws. For St. Paul ſaith, They be weak and beggarly, and rebuketh the Galatians for doing them.

Biſhop. Well, if you will not do them, ſeeing they be the laws of the realm, you are an heretic and diſobedient: and therefore come home again and confeſs your faults with us, that you have been in error, &c. Will you do ſo?

Spurdance. No, I have been in no error; for the ſpiritual laws were never more truly ſet forth than in my maſter king Edward's time, and I will truſt unto God I ſhall never leave them while I live.

Then came a gentleman to ſee me and ſaid, Are ye wiſer than all men? and have ye more knowledge than all men? will ye caſt away your ſoul willingly? my lord and other men alſo, would fain you would ſave yourſelf: therefore chuſe ſome man where you will, either ſpiritual or temporal, and take a day, my lord will give it you.

Spurdance. If I ſave my life, I ſhall loſe it; and if I loſe my life for Chriſt's ſake, I ſhall find it in life everlaſting. And if I take a day, when that day cometh, I muſt ſay then even as I do now, except I will lye, and therefore that needeth not.

Well, then have him away, ſaid the biſhop.

This abovenamed Thomas Spurdance, was one of queen Mary's ſervants, and was taken by two of his fellows, the ſaid queen's ſervants, named John Haman, otherwiſe called Barker, and George Looſon, both dwelling in Codman, in the county of Suffolk, who carried him to one Mr. Goſnal, dwelling in the ſaid Codman, and by him he was ſent to Bury, where he remained in priſon, and afterwards burned in the month of November.

The Martyrdom of John Hallingdale, William Sparrow, and Richard Gibſon.

SOON after the martyrdom of the two good women at Colcheſter, the three above-mentioned perſons were put to death in Smithfield at London, the 18th of November: Who being brought before Bonner biſhop of London, the 5th day of November, 1557, the following articles were exhibited unto them.

Articles miniſtered unto John Hallingdale.

FIRT, That the ſaid John Hallingdale is of the dioceſe of London, and ſo ſubject to the juriſdiction of the biſhop of London.

2. That the ſaid John, before the time of the reign of king Edward VI. late of England, was of the ſame faith and and religion that was then obſerved, believed, taught, and ſet forth in the realm of England.

3. That during the reign of the ſaid king Edward VI. the ſaid John Hallingdale, upon occaſion of the preaching of certain miniſters in that time, did not abide in his former faith and religion, but did depart from it, and ſo did and doth continue till this preſent day, and ſo determineth to do, as he ſaith, till his life's end.

4. That the ſaid John Hallingdale hath thought, believed, and ſpoken divers times, that the faith, religion, and eccleſiaſtical ſervice received, obſerved, and uſed now in this realm of England, is not good and laudable, but againſt God's commandment and word, eſpecially concerning the maſs and the ſeven ſacraments; and that he the ſaid John will not in any wiſe conform himſelf to the ſame, but ſpeak and think againſt it during his natural life.

5. That the ſaid John abſenteth himſelf continually from his own pariſh church of St. Leonard's, neither hearing matins, maſs, nor even-ſong, not yet confeſſing his ſins to the prieſt, or receiving the ſacrament of the altar at his hands, or uſing other ceremonies as they are now uſed in this church and realm of England: and as he remembereth, he never came but once in the pariſh church of St. Leonard, and careth not if he never come there any more, the ſervice being as it is there, and ſo many abuſes being there, eſpecially the maſs, the ſacraments, and the ceremonies and ſervice ſet forth in Latin.

6. That the ſaid John, when his wife, called Alice, was brought to-bed of a man-child, cauſed the ſaid child to be chriſtened in Engliſh after the ſame manner and form in all points, as it was uſed in the time of the reign of king Edward VI. aforeſaid, and cauſed it to be called Joſue, and would not have the ſaid child chriſtened in Latin, after the form and manner as it is now uſed in the church and realm of England, nor will have it, by his will, to be confirmed by the biſhop.

Unto all which articles the ſaid John Hallingdale made anſwer, confeſſing them all, and every part of them to be true, and ſaying, that he would not revoke his ſaid anſwers, but ſtand unto them according as it was in every article above written.

Furthermore, the ſaid John Hallingdale, being demanded by the ſaid Bonner, whether he firmly believed, that in the ſacrament, commonly called the ſacrament of the altar, there is really and truly the very body and blood of our Saviour Chriſt, or no? made anſwer, that he neither in the time of the ſaid king Edward VI. nor at that preſent did believe, that in the ſaid ſacrament there is really the very body and blood of Chriſt. For he ſaid, that if he had ſo believed, he would, as others had done, have received the ſame, which he did not, becauſe he had and then did believe, that the very body of Chriſt is only in heaven and no where elſe. And furthermore the ſaid John Hallingdale ſaid, that Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Hooper, and generally all that of late have been burned for heretics, were no heretics at all, becauſe they did truly preach the goſpel; upon whoſe preaching he grounded his faith and conſcience, as he ſaid, according to the ſaying of St. John, Rev. 18. where he ſaith, That the blood of the prophets, and of the ſaints, and of all that were ſlain upon the earth, was found in the Babylonical church, by which, he ſaid, is underſtood the church where the pope is the head. After which examination, the ſaid John was ſent to priſon again: and the next day, being the 6th of the ſaid month, he was called before the biſhop again, who perſuading him with ſome wretched ſentences of the ſcripture, the ſaid John Hallingdale anſwered, Becauſe I will not, ſaith he, come to your Babylonical church, therefore (ſpeaking unto Bonner) you go about to condemn me. And being further demanded by biſhop Bonner, whether he would perſevere and ſtand in his opinions or no: he made anſwer, That he would continue and perſiſt in them unto the death. Then Bonner read the ſentence of condemnation. At which time the ſaid John affirmed openly, that, thanking God, he never came into the church ſince the abomination came into it: and ſo he was ſent to priſon again. Upon the ſame forenoon, William Sparrow was brought before the biſhop, and had the following articles laid to him.

Articles miniſtered to William Sparrow.

1. THAT thou William Sparrow waſt in times detected and preſented lawfully unto thy ordinary the biſhop of London, called Edmund, who alſo is now thine ordinary of the ſaid dioceſe, and thou waſt preſented and detected unto him for hereſy, error and unlawful opinions, which thou didſt believe ſet forth and hold.

2. That thou before the ſaid ordinary didſt openly and judicially confeſs the ſaid hereſies, errors and unlawful opinions, as appears plainly in the acts of the court, had and made before the ſaid ordinary.

3. That thou after the premiſes, didſt make thy ſubmiſſion in writing, and didſt exhibit and deliver the ſame as thy deed, to thy ſaid ordinary; openly confeſſing and recognizing thy hereſies, errors, unlawful opinions, and thine offences and tranſgreſſions in that behalf.

4. That thou after the premiſes didſt promiſe unto thy ſaid ordinary voluntarily and of thine own mind, that always after the ſaid ſubmiſſion, thou wouldſt in all points conform thyſelf unto the common order of the catholic church obſerved and kept here in this realm of England, and in no wiſe fall again to hereſies, errors, or unlawful opinions.

5. That thou ſince thy ſaid ſubmiſſion, haſt willingly fallen into certain hereſies and errors, and haſt holden and ſet forth divers unlawful opinions, to the right great hurt of thine own ſoul, and alſo to the hinderance and loſs of ſeveral others, eſpecially againſt the ſacrament of the altar, againſt auricular confeſſion, with other the ſacraments of the catholic church.

6. That thou ſince the ſaid commiſſion, haſt willingly gone about divers places within the dioceſe of London, and ſold divers heretical, erroneous, and blaſphemous ballads about, and waſt apprehended and taken with the ſaid ballads about thee, and committed to priſon.

Unto the 1ſt, 2d, 3d, and 4th articles, he anſwered affirmatively. To the 5th article he anſwered, That if he had ſpoke againſt them, he had ſpoke but the truth: for they be naught, meaning the contents of the ſaid article. To the 6th, he granted to the article, adding, that he did ſell the ſaid ballads, and that the ſame did contain God's word.

After which anſwers, the ſaid William Sparrow was ſent unto priſon. And the ſame day in the afternoon, being brought before the biſhop again, and there charged with his ſaid ſubmiſſion made the year before unto the biſhop, he anſwered thus; I am ſorry, ſaid he, that ever I made it, and it was the worſt deed that ever I did: adding further unto them, Hold up your abomination ſo long as you can. Alſo being laid unto him, and charged by the biſhop that he went to church, and there was confeſſed and heard maſs: he made anſwer and confeſſed, that he did ſo, but with a troubled conſcience, he ſaid, God knoweth. And being further demanded of Bonner, whether he would perſiſt and continue in the ſame? he made anſwer, That he would not go from his opinions: and adding thereunto, he ſaid, That which you call hereſy, ſpeaking to the biſhop, is good and godly, and if every hair of my head were a man, ſaid he, I would burn them all, rather than go from the truth.

Then being demanded what ground of learning he had to cleave to his opinions: he made anſwer and ſaid, That all the laws now uſed (meaning the eccleſiaſtical laws) are naught and abominable. Which words being ſpoken, the biſhop immediately read the ſentence of condemnation upon him, and ſo delivered him to the ſecular power, by whom he was ſent to priſon again.

Richard Gibſon, Martyr.

WITH the other two abovenamed, ſuffered alſo in the ſame fire Richard Gibſon, who firſt was caſt into the Compter in the Poultry (where he had been priſoner for the ſpace of two years for ſuretiſhip in a matter of debt, and then ſtood upon his deliverance) then upon ſuſpicion and evil-will was accuſed to biſhop Bonner, becauſe he was never confeſſed in the priſon, nor received at the popiſh altar: by reaſon whereof he was called for, and ſuſtained divers conflicts and examinations in the cauſe of his faith and religion. But firſt he ſeemed to make a certain ſubmiſſion which he alſo exhibited with the other 28 abovementioned: but becauſe it ſeemed ſomething in words to differ from the other, it appeared not to be received: or whether it was received or no, it is not fully certain. This is certain, that although his ſubmiſſion was recorded in the biſhop's regiſter, yet he was not delivered out from impriſonment till the day of his burning. The great matter which he was charged withal, was for not coming to confeſſion, being thereunto required, for not receiving of the ſacrament of the popiſh making, and for that he would not ſwear to anſwer to their interrogatories laid againſt him. Notwithſtanding after this his firſt examinations he continued in the priſon of the Compter from the month of May to November, when he was again produced againſt the final judiciary. Where is to be noted, that Mr. Gibſon being a very big and tall man, of a perſonable and heroical ſtature, was ſent for by Bonner, by a little man, a promoter, like Robin Papiſt, called Robin Caley.

This Robin Caley having the conducting of the ſaid gentleman from the Poultry, would needs hale him through Cheapſide, the gentleman deſiring him to turn ſome other way. But the more the gentleman intreated, the more fierce was he upon him; and drawing and holding him by the arm, would needs hale him through the high-ſtreet, that all the world might ſee what he could do in his office. Mr. Gibſon deſirous to be led without holding, intreated him to let his arm looſe, and he would go quietly with him whither he would, only craving that he might go by him freely without noting of the people. But he ſaucily anſwered him, Nay, thou ſhalt not eſcape me ſo, come on thy ways: thou ſhalt not chooſe, but come; and ſo reaching at his arm, would needs drag him unto the biſhop. The gentleman content to go, yet loth to be noted in the ſtreets, gently requeſted again and again, that refraining his hold, he would ſuffer him to go of his own free will, he ſhould not need to fear him, for he would not ſtart from him. To which he replied, Come on thy way, I will hold thee faſt, ſpite of thy beard, and whether thou wilt or no. Mr. Gibſon beholding his intolerable bragging, and greatly moved therewith, could bear no longer; but ſaid, Wilt thou? adding moreover, that if he did not immediately pluck away his hand, he would wring his neck from his body. Whereupon he let go his hold, and ſo they proceeded unto the biſhop to be examined again before him.

After this, another day being aſſigned him to appear again, much talk paſſed between him and Darbyſhire, then chancellor. But in fine, being required to ſwear that he ſhould anſwer unto all they would demand, he denied to anſwer unto all things the biſhop ſhould command him as ordinary: for he is not, ſaith he, mine ordinary, and ſo bad him go tell the biſhop. Before which biſhop, be being then commanded to appear the Friday following, was brought unto the Juſtice-hall without Newgate, where he had the like conflicts with the aforeſaid biſhop, and divers other juſtices. At length he was aſſigned the Saturday following, to be preſent at the biſhop's conſiſtory court, to hear his final ſentence. At which day and place, the ſaid examinate appearing as he was commanded, the biſhop, after other matter of communication, aſked him if he knew any cauſe why the ſentence ſhould not be read againſt him. To whom Mr. Gibſon anſwered, That the biſhop had nothing whereof juſtly to condemn him. The biſhop's reaſon was again objected to him, that men ſaid he was an evil man. To whom Gibſon replying again, Yea, ſaid he, and ſo may I ſay of you alſo. To be ſhort, after this, and ſuch other talk, the biſhop haſted on to the ſentence. Which being read, Gibſon yet again admoniſhed him to remember himſelf, and to ſave his ſoul, ſaid, That he would not hear the biſhop's babbling; and ſaid moreover, boldly proteſting and affirming that he was contrary, and an enemy to them all in his mind and opinion, although he had before kept it ſecret in his mind, for fear of the law. And ſpeaking to the biſhop, Bleſſed, ſaid he, am I, that am curſed at your hands. We have nothing now, but thus will I: for as the biſhop ſaith ſo muſt it be. And no hereſy it is to turn the truth of God's word into lyes, and that do you, meaning the biſhop and his fellows.

Thus this valiant ſoldier, fighting for the goſpel and ſincere doctrine of Chriſt's truth and religion, againſt falſhood and error, was committed, with his fellows, to the ſecular power.

And ſo theſe three godly men, John Hallingdale, Wm. Sparrow, and Mr. Gibſon, being thus appointed to the ſlaughter, were the 12th day after their condemnation (which was the 18th day of November) burnt in Smithfield. And being brought thither to the ſtake, after their prayer made, they were bound thereunto with chains, and wood ſet unto them, and after wood, fire, in which being compaſſed about, and the fiery flames conſuming their fleſh, at laſt they yielded glorioufly and joyfully their ſouls and lives into the holy hands of the Lord, to whoſe tuition and government I commend thee, good reader, Amen.

The Death of John Rough, Miniſter, and Margaret Mearing, burned at London, December 22.

JOHN Rough was born in Scotland, who (as himſelf confeſſeth in his anſwers to Bonner's articles) becauſe ſome of his kinsfolk would have kept him from his right of inheritance which he had to certain lands, did at the age of 17 years, in deſpite, and rather to diſpleaſe his friends, profeſs himſelf into the order of the black frier at Sterling, in Scotland; where he remained the ſpace of ſixteen years, until ſuch time as the lord Hamilton, earl of Arran, and governor of the realm of Scotland (caſting a favour unto him) did uſe unto the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, to have him out of his profeſſed order, that as a ſecular prieſt he might ſerve him for his chaplain. At which requeſt the archbiſhop cauſed the provincial of that houſe, having thereto authority, to diſpenſe with him for his habit and order. This ſuit being thus obtained by the earl, the ſaid Rough remained in his ſervice, one whole year: during which time it pleaſed God to open his eyes, and to give him ſome knowledge of his truth, and thereupon was by the ſaid governor ſent to preach in the freedom of Ayre, where he continued four years; and then after the death of the cardinal of Scotland, he was appointed to abide at St. Andrews, and there had aſſigned unto him a yearly penſion of 20 pounds from Henry VIII. king of England. Howbeit, at laſt weighing with himſelf his own danger, and alſo abhorring the idolatry and ſuperſtition of the country, and hearing of the freedom of the goſpel within this realm of England, he determined with himſelf not to tarry any longer there: and therefore, ſoon after the battle of Muſcleborough, he came firſt to Carliſle, and from thence unto the duke of Somerſet, then lord protector of England, and by his aſſignment he appointed unto him out of the king's treaſury 20 pounds of yearly ſtipend, and was ſent, as a preacher, to ſerve at Carliſle, Berwick and Newcaſtle, where he married. From whence he was called by the archbiſhop of York that then was, unto a benefice in the town of Hull, where he continued till the death of good king Edward VI.

But in the beginning of the reign of queen Mary (perceiving the alteration of religion, and the perſecution that would thereupon ariſe, and feeling his own weakneſs) he fled with his wife into Frizeland, and dwelt there at a place called Norden, labouring truly for his living, in knitting of caps, hoſe, and ſuch like things, till about the end of the month of October before his death. At which time lacking yarn, and other ſuch neceſſary proviſion for the maintenance of his occupation, he came again over into England, here to provide for the ſame, and the tenth day of November arrived at London. Where, hearing of the ſecret ſociety, and holy congregation of God's children there aſſembled, he joined himſelf unto them, and afterwards being elected their miniſter and preacher, did continue moſt virtuouſly exerciſed in that godly fellowſhip, teaching and confirming them in the truth of the goſpel of Chriſt. But in the end (ſuch was the providence of God, who diſpoſing all things to the beſt) the 12th day of December, he, with Cutbert Symſon and others, through the crafty and traiterous ſuggeſtion of a falſe hypocrite and diſſembling brother, named Roger Sergeant, a taylor, were apprehended by the vice-chamberlain of the queen's houſe, at the Saracen's head in Iſlington, where the congregation had then purpoſed to aſſemble themſelves to their accuſtomable exerciſes of prayer, and hearing the word of God: which pretence, for the ſafeguard of all the reſt, they yet at their examinations covered and excuſed, by hearing of a play that was then appointed to be at that place. The vice-chamberlain, after he had apprehended them, carried Rough and Symſon unto the council, who charged them to have aſſembled together to celebrate the communion of the ſupper of the Lord, and therefore after ſundry examinations they ſent unto the biſhop of London, with a letter ſigned with their hands, the copy whereof here follows.

A Letter ſent from the queen's Council to Bonner Biſhop of London, concerning the Examination of John Rough, Miniſter.

AFTER our hearty commendations to your good lordſhip, we ſend you here incloſed the examination of a Scotiſh man, named John Rough, who by the queen's command is juſt ſent to Newgate, being of the chief of them that upon Sunday laſt, under the colour of coming to ſee a play at the Saracen's head at Iſlington, had prepared a communion to be celebrated and received there among certain other ſeditious and heretical perſons. And foraſmuch as by the ſaid Rough's examination, containing the ſtory and progreſs of his former life, it well appeareth of what ſort he is: the queen's highneſs hath willed us to remit him unto your lordſhip, to the end that being called before you out of priſon, as oft as your lordſhip ſhall think good, ye may proceed. both to his further examination, and otherwiſe ordering of him according to the laws, as the caſe ſhall require. And thus we bid your lordſhip heartily well to fare. From St. James's, Decem. 15, 1557. Your lordſhip's loving friends, Nicholas Ebor. F. Shrewſbury, Ed. Haſtings, Anth. Mountague, John Bourne, Henry Iernegam.

Bonner, now minding to make quick diſpatch, did within three days after the receipt of the letter, ſend for Rough out of Newgate, to be examined before him and others; who when they perceived his conſtancy, determined a day after to bring him openly into the conſiſtory, there to adjudge and condemn him as an heretic. Which purpoſe they accompliſhed: for the twentieth day in the afternoon, in the preſence of the biſhops of London and St. David's, with Fecknam, abbot of Weſtminſter, and others, he was there produced. Where, after many perſuaſions Bonner read unto him the articles and anſwers, in which they charged him to have received the orders of the church, and therefore might not marry; and that he had refuſed to conſent to the Latin ſervice then uſed in the church. Whereunto he then anſwered, and ſaid, That their orders were nothing at all, and that he being a prieſt, might lawfully marry, and that the children which he had by his wife were lawful. And concerning the ſervice then uſed, he utterly deteſted it, ſaying, That if he ſhould live as long as did Methuſalah, yet he would never come to the church to hear the abominable maſs and other ſervice being as it was then. Upon which words the biſhop proceeded to the degradation of the ſaid Rough, and after condemning him as an heretic, committed his body to the ſecular power, who taking him into their cuſtody, carried him unto Newgate.

Moreover, as touching the ſaid Mr. Rough, this is further to be noted, that he being in the north country in the days of king Edward VI. was the cauſe of ſaving Dr. Watſon's life (who in queen Mary's days was biſhop of Lincoln) for a ſermon that he had preached there. The ſaid Watſon after that, being with Bonner at the examination of the ſaid Mr. Rough, to requite him in ſaving his life, detected him there to be a pernicious heretic, who did more hurt in the north parts than an hundred beſides of his opinion. Unto whom Mr. Rough ſaid, Why, Sir, is this the reward I have for ſaving your life, when you preached erroneous doctrine in the days of Edward VI. This Mr. Rough ſaid, he had lived thirty years, and yet had never bowed his knee to Baal; and being before Bonner, among other talk, he affirmed, that he had been twice at Rome, and there had ſeen plainly with his eyes, which he had many times heard of before, namely, that the pope was the very antichriſt; for there he ſaw him carried on men's ſhoulders, and the falſe-named ſacrament borne before him. Yet there was more reverence given to him, than to that which they counted to be their god. When Bonner heard this, riſing up, and making as though he would have torn his garment, Haſt thou, ſaid he, been at Rome, and ſeen our holy father the pope, and doſt thou blaſpheme him after this ſort; and with flying upon him, he plucked off a piece of his beard, and after making ſpeedy haſte to his death, he burnt him half an hour before ſix of the clock in the morning, becauſe the day belike ſhould not be far ſpent, before he had done a miſchievous deed.

A Letter written by John Rough, to ſome of his Friends, confirming and ſtrengthening them in the Truth, which he had before taught.

THE comfort of the Holy Ghoſt make you able to give conſolation to others in theſe dangerous days, when ſatan is let looſe, but to the trial only of the choſen, when it pleaſeth our God to ſift his wheat from the chaff. I have not leiſure and time to write the great temptations I have been under. I ſpeak to God's glory; my care was to have the ſenſes of my ſoul open, to perceive the voice of God, ſaying, whoſoever denieth me before men, him will I deny before my Father and his angels. And to ſave the life corporal, is to loſe the life eternal, And he that will not ſuffer with Chriſt, ſhall not reign with him. Therefore moſt tender ones, I have by God's Spirit given over the fleſh, with the fight of my ſoul, and the ſpirit hath the victory. The fleſh ſhall now before it be long, leave off to ſin, the ſpirit ſhall reign eternally. I have choſen death, to confirm the truth by me taught. What can I do more? Conſider with yourſelves, that I have done it for the confirmation of God's truth. Pray that I may continue unto the end. The greateſt part of the aſ-fault is paſt, I praiſe my God. I have in all my aſſaults felt the preſent aid of my God, I give him moſt hearty thanks therefore. Look not back, nor be aſhamed of Chriſt's goſpel, nor of the bonds I have ſuffered for the ſame, thereby ye may be aſſured it is the true word of God. The holy ones have been ſealed with the ſame mark. It is no time for the loſs of one man in the battle, for the camp to turn back. Up with mens hearts; blow down the dawbed walls of hereſy. Let one take the banner, and the other the trumpet; I mean not to make corporal reſiſtance, but pray, and ye ſhall have Elias his defence, and Elizeus's company to fight for you. The cauſe is the Lord's. Now my brethren, I can write no more, time will not ſuffer, and my heart with pangs of death is aſſaulted; but I am at home with my God yet alive. Pray for me, and ſalute one another with the holy kiſs. The peace of God reſt with you all, Amen. From Newgate priſon in haſte, the day of my condemnation.

John Rough.

Another Letter of John Rough, written unto the Congregation two Days before he ſuffered.

THE Spirit of conſolation be with you, aid you, and make you ſtrong to run to the fight that is laid before you, wherewithal God in all ages hath tried his elect, and hath found them worthy of himſelf, by coupling to their head Jeſus Chriſt; in whom, whoſo deſireth to live godly, the ſame muſt needs ſuffer perſecution. For it is given unto them, not only to believe, but alſo to ſuffer. And the ſervant or ſcholar cannot be greater than his lord and maſter: but by the ſame way the head is entered, the members muſt follow: no life is in the members which are cut from the body: likewiſe we have no life but in Chriſt: for by him we live, move, and have our being. My dear ſon, now departing this life to my great advantage, I make change of mortality with immortality, of corruption to put on incorruption, to make my body like to the corn caſt into the ground, which except it die firſt, it can bring forth no good fruit. Wherefore death is to me great advantage: for thereby the body ceaſeth from ſin, and after turneth into the firſt original: but after ſhall be changed, and made brighter than the ſun or moon. What ſhall I write of this corporal death, ſeeing it is decreed of God, that all men ſhall once die? Happy are they that die in the Lord, which is, to die in the faith of Chriſt, profeſſing and confeſſing the ſame before many witneſſes. I praiſe my God I have paſſed the ſame journey by many temptations, the devil is very buſy to perſuade, the world to entice with promiſes and fair words: which I omit to write leſt ſome might think I did hunt after vain-glory, which is fartheſt from my heart. Laſtly, the danger of ſome falſe brethren, who before the biſhop of London purpoſed to confeſs an untruth to my face: yet the God that ruled Balaam, moved their hearts: where they thought to ſpeak to my accuſation, he made them ſpeak to my purgation. What a journey (by God's power) I have made theſe eight days before this day, it is above fleſh and blood to bear: but as St. Paul ſaith, I may do all things in him which worketh in me, Jeſus Chriſt. My courſe, brethren, have I run, I have fought a good fight, the crown of righteouſneſs is laid up for me, my day to receive it is not long to. Pray brethren, for the enemy doth yet aſſault. Stand conſtant unto the end, then ſhall you poſſeſs your ſouls. Walk worthily in that vocation wherein you are called. Comfort the brethren. Salute one another in my name. Be not aſhamed of the goſpel of the croſs, by me preached, nor yet of my ſuffering; for with my blood I affirm the ſame. I go before, I ſuffer firſt the baiting of the butcher's dogs; yet I have not done what I ſhould have done: but my weakneſs, I doubt not, is ſupplied in the ſtrength of Jeſus Chriſt; and your wiſdom and learning will accept the ſmall talent, which I have diſtributed unto you (as I truſt) as a faithful ſteward: and what was undone, impute that to frailty and ignorance, and with your love cover that which is and was naked in me. God knoweth ye are all tender unto me, my heart burſteth for the love of you. Ye are not without your great paſtor of your ſoul, who ſo loveth you, that if men were not to be fought out (as God be praiſed, there is no want of men) he would cauſe ſtones to miniſter unto you. Caſt your care on that rock, the wind of temptation ſhall not prevail: faſt and pray, for the days are evil. Look up with your eyes of hope, for the redemption is not far off (but my wickedneſs hath deſerved that I ſhall not ſee it.) And alſo that which is behind of the blood of our brethren, which ſhall alſo be laid under the altar, ſhall cry for your relief. Time will not ſuffer me to write long letters. The Spirit of God guide you in and out, riſing and ſitting, cover you with the ſhadow of his wings, defend you againſt the tyranny of the wicked, and bring you happily unto the port of eternal felicity, where all tears ſhall be wiped from your eyes, and you ſhall always abide with the Lamb.

John Rough.

Margaret Mearing, Martyr.

IT is before declared, that in company of John Rough, was burned one Margaret Mearing, who, as the regiſter maketh mention, was at one time and day brought with the ſaid Rough forth to examination: where the biſhop having no private matters to charge her withal, did the eighteenth day of December object againſt her thoſe common and accuſtomable articles mentioned before. To which ſhe anſwered as follows.

1. That there is here in earth a catholic church, and that there is the true faith of Chriſt obſerved and kept in the ſame church.

2. Item, That there were only two ſacraments in the church, namely, the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt, and the ſacrament of baptiſm.

3. Item, That ſhe was baptized in the faith, and belief of the ſaid church, renouncing there, by her godfathers and godmothers, the devil and all his works, &c.

4. Item, That when ſhe came to the age of fourteen years, ſhe did not know what her true belief was, becauſe ſhe was not then of diſcretion to underſtand the ſame, neither yet was taught it.

5. Item, That ſhe had not gone from the catholic faith at any time; but ſhe ſaid that the maſs was abominable before the ſight of God, and before the ſight of all true chriſtian people, and that it is the plain cup of fornication, and the whore of Babylon. And as concerning the ſacrament of the altar, ſhe ſaid, ſhe believed there was no ſuch ſacrament in the catholic church. Alſo ſhe ſaid, that ſhe utterly abhorred the authority of the biſhop of Rome, with all the religion obſerved in the ſame antichriſt's church.

6. Item, She anſwered to the ſixth article, as to the firſt, before ſpecified.

7. Item, That ſhe hath refuſed to come to her pariſh-church, becauſe the true religion of Chriſt was not then uſed in the ſame: and further ſaid, That ſhe had not come unto the church by the ſpace of one year and three quarters then laſt paſt, neither yet did mean any more to come into the ſame in theſe idolatrous days.

8. Item, As touching the manner of her apprehenſion, ſhe ſaid, That Cluney, the biſhop's ſumner, did fetch her to the biſhop.

Theſe anſwers being then regiſtered, they were again (with the ſaid articles) propounded againſt her the twentieth day of December, and there being demanded, if ſhe would ſtand unto thoſe her anſwers, ſhe ſaid, I will ſtand to them unto death; for the very angels of heaven do do laugh you to ſcorn, to ſee your abomination that you uſe in the church. After which words the biſhop pronounced the ſentence of condemnation againſt her; and then delivering her unto the ſheriffs, ſhe was with the beforenamed John Rough carried unto Newgate. From whence they were both together led unto Smithfield, the twenty-ſecond of December, and there moſt joyfully gave their lives for the profeſſion of Chriſt's goſpel.

The Sufferings and cruel Torments of Cutbert Symſon, Deacon of the Chriſtian Congregation in London.

CUTBERT SYMSON was a man of a faithful and zealous heart to Chriſt and his true flock, inſomuch that he never ceaſed labouring, and ſtudying moſt earneſtly, not only how to preſerve them without corruption of the popiſh religion, but alſo his care was very vigilant how to keep them together without peril or danger of perſecution. The pains, travail, zeal, patience, and fidelity of this man, in caring and providing for this congregation, as it is not eaſily to be expreſſed, ſo it is wonderful to behold the providence of the Lord by viſion, concerning the troubles of this faithful miniſter and godly deacon, as in this here following may appear.

The Friday night before Mr. Rough, miniſter of the congregation (of whom mention was made before) was taken, being in his bed, he dreamed, that he ſaw two of the guards leading Cutbert Symſon, deacon of the ſaid congregation, and that he had the book about him, wherein were written the names of all them which were of the congregation. Whereupon, being ſore troubled, he awaked, and called his wife, ſaying, Kate, ſtrike a light, for I am much troubled with my brother Cutbert this night. When ſhe had ſo done, he gave himſelf to read in his book awhile, and there feeling ſleep to come upon him, he put out the candle, and ſo gave himſelf again to reſt. Being aſleep, he dreamed the like dream again; and, awaked therewith, he ſaid, Oh Kate, my brother Cutbert is gone. So they lighted a candle again, and roſe. And as the ſaid Mr. Rough was making him ready to go to Cutbert to ſee how he did, in the mean time the ſaid Cutbert came in with the book containing the names and accounts of the congregation. Whom when Mr. Rough had ſeen, ſaid he, brother Cutbert, you are welcome; for I have been ſore troubled with you this night, and ſo told him his dream. After he had ſo done, he deſired him to lay the book away from him, and to carry it no more about him. Unto which Cutbert anſwered, he would not do ſo; for dreams, he ſaid, were but phantaſies, and not to be credited. Then Mr. Rough ſtraitly charged him in the name of the Lord to do it. Whereupon the ſaid Cutbert took ſuch notes out of the book as he had deſired him to do, and immediately left the book with Mr. Rough's wife.

The next day following, in the night, the ſaid Mr. Rough had another dream in his ſleep, concerning his own trouble. The matter whereof was this: he thought in his dream that he was carried himſelf forcibly to the biſhop, and that the biſhop pluckt off his beard, and caſt it into the fire, ſaying theſe words, Now I may ſay, I have had a piece of an heretic burned in my houſe, and ſo accordingly it came to paſs.

Now to return to Cutbert again; as we have touched ſomething concerning theſe viſions, ſo now remaineth to mention his pains and ſufferings upon the rack and otherwiſe, like a good Laurence for the congregations ſake, as he wrote it with his own hand.

A true Report how he was uſed in the Tower of London, being ſent thither by the Council, the thirteenth Day of December,

ON the Thurſday after, I was called into the warehouſe, before the conſtable of the Tower, and the recorder of London, Mr. Cholmley; they commanded me to tell whom I did will to come to the Engliſh ſervice. I anſwered, I would declare nothing. Whereupon I was ſet in a rack of iron, the ſpace of three hours, as I judged.

Then they aſked me if I would tell them. I anſwered as before. Then was I looſed, and carried to my lodging again. On the Sunday after I was brought into the ſame place again before the lieutenant and the recorder of London, and they examined me. As before I had ſaid, I anſwered. Then the lieutenant did ſwear by God I ſhould tell. Then did they bind my two foreſingers together, and put a ſmall arrow betwixt them, and drew it through ſo faſt that the blood followed, and the arrow brake.

Then they racked me twice. Then was I carried to my lodging again, and ten days after the lieutenant aſked me if I would not confeſs that which they had before aſked me. I ſaid, I had ſaid as much as I would. Then five weeks after he ſent me unto the high prieſt, where I was greatly aſſaulted, and at whoſe hand I received the pope's curſe, for bearing witneſs of the reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt. And thus I commend you unto God, and to the word of his grace, with all them that unfeignedly call upon the name of Jeſus, deſiring God of his endleſs mercy, through the merits of his dear Son Jeſus Chriſt, to bring us all to his everlaſting kingdom, Amen. I praiſe God for his great mercy ſhewed upon us. Sing Hoſanna unto the higheſt with me Cutbert Symſon. God forgive me my ſins. I ask all the world forgiveneſs, and I do forgive all the world, and thus I leave this world, in hope of a joyful reſurrection.

A Note of Cutbert Symſon's Patience.

NOW as touching this Cutbert Symſon, this further is to be noted, that Bonner in his conſiſtory ſpeaking of Cutbert Symſon, gave this teſtimony of him there to the people, ſaying, Ye ſee this man, ſaith he, what a perſonable man he is; and after he had thus commended his perſon, added moreover, And furthermore concerning his patience, I ſay unto you, that if he were not an heretic, he is a man of the greateſt patience that yet ever came before me: for I tell you, he hath been thrice racked upon one day in the Tower, Alſo in my houſe he hath felt ſome ſorrow, and yet I never ſaw his patience broken, &c.

It is thought and ſaid of ſome, that that arrow which was grated betwixt his fingers, being tied together, was not in the Tower, but in the biſhop's houſe.

The day before the bleſſed deacon and martyr of God, Cutbert Symſon, after his painful racking, ſhould go to his condemnation before Bonner to be burned, being in the biſhop's coal-houſe there in the ſtocks, he had a certain viſion or apparition very ſtrange, which he himſelf with his own mouth declared to the learned man Mr. Auſten, to his own wife, and Thomas Symſon, and to others beſides, in the priſon of Newgate, a little before his death. The relation whereof I ſtand in no little doubt whether to report abroad or not, conſidering with myſelf the great diverſity of mens judgments by the reading of hiſtories, and variety of affections. Some I ſee will not believe it, ſome will deride the ſame, ſome alſo will be offended with ſetting forth things of that ſort uncertain, eſteeming all things to be uncertain and incredible, whatſoever is ſtrange from the common order of nature.

Others

Others will be perchance grieved, thinking with themſelves, or elſe thus reaſoning with me, that although the matter were as is reported, yet forſomuch as the common error of believing raſh miracles, phantaſies, viſions, dreams, and apparitions, thereby may be confirmed, more expedient it were the ſame to be unſet forth.

Theſe, and ſuch like, will be, I know, the ſayings of many. Whereunto briefly I anſwer, granting firſt, and admitting with the words of Baſil, Not every dream is ſtraitway a prophecy. Again, neither am I ignorant, that the papiſts in their books and legends of ſaints have their prodigious viſions and apparitions of angels, of our lady, of Chriſt, and other ſaints: which as I will not admit to be believed for true, ſo will they ask me again why ſhould I then more require theſe to be credited of them, than theirs of us.

Firſt, I write not this, binding any man preciſely to believe the ſame, as they do theirs, but only report of it as it hath been heard of perſons known, naming alſo the parties who were the hearers thereof, leaving the judgment thereof notwithſtanding free unto the arbitrement of the reader. Albeit, it is no good argument, proceeding from the ſingular or particular, to the univerſal, to ſay that viſions be not true in ſome: ergo, they be true in none. And if any ſhall muſe, or object again, Why ſhould ſuch viſions be given to him, or a few other ſingular perſons, more than all the reſt, ſeeing the other were in the ſame cauſe and quarrel, and died alſo martyrs as well as he? To this I ſay, concerning the Lord's times and doings I have not to meddle nor make, who may work where and when it pleaſeth him. And what if the Lord thought chiefly above the other, with ſingular conſolation to reſpect him, who is chiefly above the other, and ſingularly did ſuffer moſt exquiſite torments for his ſake? What marvel herein? But, as I ſaid, of the Lord's ſecret times I have not to reaſon. This only which hath out of the man's own mouth been received, ſo as I received it of the parties, I thought here to communicate to the reader, for him to judge thereof as God ſhall rule his mind. The matter is this.

The day before Symſon was condemned, he being in the ſtocks, Cluney his keeper cometh in with the keys, about nine of the clock at night (after his uſual manner) to view the priſon, and ſee whether all were preſent, who when he eſpied the ſaid Cutbert to be there, departed again, locking the doors after him. Within two hours after, about eleven of the clock toward midnight, the ſaid Cutbert (whether being in a ſlumber, or being awake, I cannot ſay) heard one coming in, firſt opening the outward door, then the ſecond, after the third door, and ſo looking in to the ſaid Cutbert, having no candle or torch that he could ſee, but giving a brightneſs and light moſt comfortable and joyful to his heart, ſaying unto him, Ha, and departed again. Who it was he could not tell, neither dare I define. This that he ſaw he himſelf declared four or five times to the ſaid Mr. Auſten, and to others. At the ſight whereof he received ſuch joyful comfort, that he alſo expreſſed no little ſolace in telling and declaring the ſame.

A Letter of Cutbert Symſon to his Wife, written in the Coal-houſe.

DEarly beloved in the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. I cannot write as I do wiſh unto you.

I beſeech you with my ſoul, commit yourſelf under the mighty hand of our God, truſting in his mercy, and he will ſurely help us, as ſhall be moſt unto his glory, and our everlaſting comfort, being ſure of this, that he will ſuffer nothing to come unto us, but that which ſhall be moſt profitable for us.

For it is either a correction for our ſins, or a trial of our faith, or to ſet forth his glory, or for all together; and therefore muſt needs be well done. For there is nothing that cometh to us by fortune or chance, but by our heavenly Father's providence. And therefore pray unto our heavenly Father, that he will ever give us his grace to conſider it. Let us give him moſt hearty thanks for theſe his fatherly corrections; for as many as he loveth he correcteth. And I beſeech you now be of good cheer, and count the croſs of Chriſt greater riches than all the vain pleaſures of England. I do not doubt (I praiſe God for it) but that you have ſupped with Chriſt at his Maundy, I mean, believe in him: for that is the effect, and then muſt you drink of his cup, I mean his croſs (for that doth the cup ſignify unto us). Take the cup with a good ſtomach, in the name of God, and then ſhall you be ſure to have the good wine, Chriſt's blood, to thy poor thirſty ſoul. And when you have the wine, you muſt drink it out of this cup. Learn this when you come to the Lord's Supper. In all things give thanks.

In the name of Jeſus Chriſt ſhall every knee bow, Cutbert Symſon.

Hugh Foxe and John Deveniſh.

WITH Cutbert Symſon likewiſe was apprehended and alſo ſuffered (as is before mentioned) Hugh Foxe, and John Deveniſh; who being brought unto their examinations with the ſaid Cutbert, before Bonner biſhop of London, March 19, had articles and interrogatories miniſtered to them by the ſaid officer.

The general Anſwers of Cutbert Symſon, Hugh Foxe, and John Deveniſh, to the articles propoſed to them by the biſhop.

TO the firſt article they all anſwered affirmatively; but John Deveniſh added, That that church is grounded upon the prophets and apoſtles, Chriſt being the head corner-ſtone, and how in that church there is the true faith and religion of Chriſt.

To the ſecond article they all confeſſed and believed, That in Chriſt's catholic church there are but two ſacraments, namely, baptiſm, and the ſupper of the Lord; otherwiſe they do not believe the contents of this article to be true in any part thereof.

To the third, fourth and fifth article they all anſwered affirmatively.

To the ſixth article they all anſwered, and denied to acknowledge the authority of the ſee of Rome to be lawful and good, either yet his religion.

To the ſeventh article they all anſwered affirmatively, that they have and will ſtill do while they live; and John Deveniſh adding thereto, ſaid that the ſacrament of the altar, as it is now uſed, is no ſacrament at all.

To the eighth article they all confeſſed, and believed all things above by them acknowledged and declared to be true, and that they be of the dioceſe of London, and juriſdiction of the ſame.

Theſe three above-named perſons, Cutbert, Foxe, and Deveniſh, as they were altogether apprehended at Iſlington, ſo they all three ſuffered together in Smithfield, about the 28th day of March, in whoſe perfect conſtancy the ſame Lord (in whoſe cauſe and quarrel they ſuffered) giver of grace, and governor of all things, be exalted for ever, Amen.

The Martyrdom of William Nichol at Haverford-weſt, in Wales.

WE find in all ages from the beginning, that ſatan hath not ceaſed at all times to moleſt the church of Chriſt with one affliction or other, to the trial of their faith, but yet never ſo apparently at any time to all the world, as when the Lord hath permitted him power over the bodies of his ſaints to the ſhedding of their blood, and and perceiving of their religion; for then ſleepeth he not, I warrant you, from the murdering of the ſame, unleſs they will fall down with Ahab and Jezebel to worſhip him, and ſo kill and poiſon their own ſouls eternally; as in theſe miſerable latter days of queen Mary we have felt, heard, and ſeen practiſed upon God's people. Among whom we find recorded an honeſt poor man, named William Nichol, who was apprehended by the champions of the pope, for ſpeaking certain words againſt the cruel kingdom of antichriſt, and the 9th day of April, 1558, was burnt in Wales, ending his life in a moſt happy and bleſſed ſtate, glorioufly giving his ſoul into the hands of that God, whoſe goodneſs be praiſed for ever, Amen.

This William Nichol (as we are informed) was ſo ſimple a good ſoul, that many eſteemed him half fooliſh. But what he was in that reſpect we know not, but this we are ſure, that he died a good man, and in a good cauſe, whatſoever they judge of him. And the more ſimplicity and feebleneſs of wit appeared in him, the more beaſtly and wretched doth it declare their cruel tyrannical act therein. The Lord give them repentance, if it be his bleſſed will, Amen, Amen.

The Martyrdom of William Seaman, Thomas Carman, and Thomas Hudſon, at Norwich, in the County of Norfolk.

IMmediately after William Nichol, ſucceeded in that honourable and glorious vocation of martyrdom three conſtant godly men at Norwich in Norfolk, who were cruelly put to death for the true teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt, the 19th of May, in the year 1558, whoſe names be theſe; William Seaman, Thomas Carman, and Thomas Hudſon.

William Seaman was an huſbandman, of the age of twenty-ſix years, dwelling in Mendleſham, in the county of Suffolk, who was divers times ſought for at the command of Sir John Tyrrel knight, and at laſt he himſelf ſearched his houſe and other places for him; notwithſtanding he ſomewhat miſſed of his purpoſe, God be thanked. Then he gave charge to his ſervants, Robert Baulding and James Clarke, with others, to ſeek for him. Who, having no officer, went in the evening to his houſe, he being at home, they took him and carried him to their maſter Sir John Tyrrel. This Baulding being Seaman's near neighbour, and one whom Seaman truſted as an extraordinary friend, notwithſtanding to do his maſter a pleaſure, now became an enemy to his chief friend, and was one of the buſieſt in the taking of him. And as they were going to carry him to their maſter Sir John Tyrrel in the night, it is credibly reported that there fell a light between them out of the element, and parted them, this Baulding being in company with the reſt when the light fell; and although he was then in the prime of his age, yet after that time never enjoyed a good day, but pined away even to death.

Well, for all that ſtrange ſight, as I ſaid, they carried him to their maſter. Who, when he came, aſked him why he would not go to maſs, and receive the ſacrament, and ſo to worſhip it: to which William Seaman anſwered, denying it to be a ſacrament, and ſaid it was an idol, and therefore would not receive it. After which words Sir John Tyrrel ſent him to Norwich, to Hopton, then biſhop, and there after conference and examination had with him, the biſhop read his bloody ſentence of condemnation againſt him; and afterward delivered him to the ſecular power, who kept him to the day of martyrdom.

The ſaid William Seaman left behind him when he died, a wife and three children very young: and with the ſaid young children his wife was perſecuted out of the ſaid town of Mendleſham, becauſe ſhe would not go to hear maſs, and all her corn and goods ſeized and taken away by Mr. Chriſtopher Cole's officers, he being lord of the ſaid town.

Thomas Carman (who, as is ſaid, pledged Richard Craſhfield at his burning, and thereupon was apprehended) being priſoner in Norwich, was about one time with the reſt examined and brought before the ſaid biſhop, who anſwered no leſs in his maſter's cauſe than the others; and therefore had the like reward that the others had, which was the biſhop's bloody bleſſing of condemnation, and delivered alſo to the ſecular power, who kept him with the others until the day of ſlaughter, which was not long after.

Thomas Hudſon was of Aileſham in Norfolk, by his occupation a glover, a very honeſt poor man, having a wife and three children, labouring always truly and diligently in his vocation, being of thirty years of age, and bearing ſo good a will to the goſpel, that he in the days of king Edward VI. two years before queen Mary's reign learned to read Engliſh of Anthony and Thomas Norgate of the ſame town, wherein he greatly profited about the time of alteration of religion: for when queen Mary came to reign, and had changed the ſervice in the church, putting in for wheat, chaff and darnel, and for good preaching, blaſphemous crying out againſt truth and godlineſs; he then avoiding all their ceremonies of ſuperſtition, abſented himſelf from his houſe, and went into Suffolk a long time, and there remained travelling from once place to another, as occaſion was offered. At laſt he returned back again to his houſe at Aileſham, to comfort his wife and children, being heavy and troubleſome with his abſence.

Now when he came home, and perceiving his continuance there would be dangerous, he and his wife deviſed to make him a place among his faggots to hide himſelf in, where he remained all the day reading and praying continually, for the ſpace of half a year, and his wife like an honeſt woman being careful for him, uſed herſelf faithfully and diligently towards him.

In the mean time came the vicar of the town (who was one of the biſhop's commiſſaries, a very wicked man) and inquired of Thomas Hudſon's wife for her huſband. Unto whom ſhe anſwered, as not knowing where he was. Then the ſaid Berry waxed angry, and threatened to burn her, becauſe ſhe would not tell where her huſband was. After that when Hudſon underſtood it, he grew every day more zealous than other, and continually read and ſang pſalms, the people openly reſorting to him, to hear his exhortations and prayers.

At laſt he walked abroad for certain days openly in the town, crying out continually againſt the maſs and all their trumpery, and in the end coming home in his houſe, he ſate him down, having his book by him, reading and ſinging pſalms continually without ceaſing for three days and three nights together, to the great wonder of many.

Then one John Crouch his next neighbour went to the conſtables, Robert Marſham and Robert Lawes in the night, to certify thereof: for Berry commanded openly to watch for him, and the conſtables underſtanding the ſame, went to catch him at break of day, the 22d of April 1558.

And when Hudſon ſaw them come in, he ſaid, Now mine hour is come: welcome friends, welcome. You be they that ſhall lead me to life in Chriſt. I thank God for it, and the Lord enable me thereto for his mercies ſake. Then they took him and led him to Berry the commiſſary, who was vicar of the town, and the ſaid Berry aſked him firſt where he kept his church for four years before. To which the ſaid Hudſon anſwered thus, whereſoever he was, there was the church.

Doſt thou not believe, ſaid Berry, in the ſacrament of the altar? What is it?

Hudſon. It is worms meat: my belief is in Chriſt crucified.

Berry. Doſt thou not believe the maſs to put away ſins?

Hudſon.

Hudſon. No, God forbid; it is a patched monſter, and a diſguſted puppet, more tedious a piecing than ever was Solomon's temple.

At which words Berry ſtamped, fumed, and ſhewed himſelf as a mad man, and ſaid, Well, thou villain, thou: I will write to the biſhop, my good lord, and truſt unto it, thou ſhalt be handled according to thy deſerts. O, Sir, ſaid Hudſon, there is no Lord but God, though there be many lords and many gods. With that Berry thruſt him back with his hand. And one Richard Cliffar ſtanding by, ſaid, I pray you, Sir, be good to the poor man. At which words Berry was more mad than before, and would have had Cliffar bound in a recognizance of forty pounds for his good behaviour both in word and deed; but his deſire took no effect. Then he asked Hudſon whether he would recant, or not: to which Hudſon anſwered, The Lord forbid! I had rather die many deaths than do ſo.

Then after long talk, the ſaid Berry, ſeeing it to no purpoſe to perſuade him, took his pen and ink, and wrote letters to the biſhop thereof, and ſent this Hudſon to Norwich bound like a thief to him, which was eight miles from thence, who went thither ſinging with joy, as merry as ever he was in his life before. He was a month in priſon, where he ſpent his time in reading and invocating the name of God.

Theſe three chriſtians and conſtant martyrs, William Seaman, Thomas Carman, and Thomas Hudſon, after they were (as ye have heard) condemned the 19th day of May 1558, were carried out of priſon to the place where they ſhould ſuffer, which was without Biſhopſgate at Norwich, called Lollard's pit. And being all there, they made their humble petitions to the Lord. That being done, they aroſe and went to the ſtake, and ſtanding all there with their chains about them, immediately Thomas Hudſon came forth from them under the chain, to the great ſurpriſe of all the ſpectators; many doubted his conſtancy, fearing he ſhould recant; others thought he wanted a reprieve for further conference; and ſome imagined he came forth to ask his parents bleſſing. In the midſt of this confuſion his two companions at the ſtake did all they could to comfort and encourage him, exhorting him in the bowels of Chriſt to be of good cheer, &c. But alas! he felt more in his conſcience than they could conceive, for he was encompaſſed with intolerable grief of mind, not for fear of death, but for lack of an inward ſenſible feeling of the love of his Saviour: and therefore, being very careful, he humbly fell upon his knees, and vehemently prayed to God, who at laſt, according to his old mercies, ſent him comfort; and then he aroſe in extaſy of joy, as a new man changed even from death to life, and ſaid; Now I thank God I am ſtrong, and care not what man can do unto me. So going again to his companions at the ſtake, they all ſuffered death moſt joyfully, conſtantly, and manfully together, to the terror of the wicked, the comfort of good people, and the glory of God, whom be praiſed for ever, Amen.

After this, the aforeſaid commiſſary Berry made a great ſtir about others who were ſuſpected in the town of Aileſham, and cauſed 200 to creep to the croſs at Pentecoſt, beſides other puniſhments which they ſuſtained. On a time this Berry gave a poor man of his pariſh of Marſham a blow with a flail, for a word's ſpeaking, that preſently thereon he died; and it is reported that the ſaid Berry held up his hand at the bar for the ſame. At another time one Alice Oxes of the ſame pariſh came to his houſe, and going into the hall he met her, and began in an ill humour, ſtruck her with his fiſt, whereupon ſhe was fain to be carried home, and the next day was found dead in her chamber. The number of whores and concubines he had is incredible to all but thoſe who lived near him: he was rich, and of great authority, and as great a reprobate, perſecuting the goſpel, and compelling men to idolatry; he burnt all the good books he could lay his hands on, and divorced many men and women for religion. When he heard that queen Mary was dead, and the glory of their triumph quailed, the Sunday after (being the 19th of November 1558) he made a great feaſt, and had one of his concubines there, with whom he was in his chamber until even-ſong: then he went to church where he had miniſtered baptiſm, and in his return home from even-ſong, between the church-yard and his houſe, being but a little ſpace (about the breadth of a church-yard) he fell down ſuddenly to the ground with a heavy groan, and never ſtirred after, neither ſhewed any one token of repentance. And thoſe that had his great riches ſince his death have ſo conſumed with them, that they be poorer now than they were before they had them. Now let the reader obſerve the difference between the end of a martyr, and the end of a perſecutor.

About this time Joan Seaman, mother to the aforeſaid William Seaman, being of the age of 66 years, was perſecuted by the ſaid Sir John Tyrrel alſo, becauſe ſhe would not go to maſs and receive againſt her conſcience: which good old woman being from her houſe, was glad ſometimes to lie in buſhes, groves, and fields, and ſometimes in her neighbour's houſe when ſhe could. And her huſband being at home about the age of eighty years, fell ſick, and ſhe hearing thereof, with ſpeed returned home to her houſe again, not regarding her life, but conſidering her duty, and ſhewed her diligence to her huſband moſt faithfully till God took him away by death. Then by God's providence ſhe fell ſick alſo, and died in her own houſe ſoon after. When one Mr. Symons the commiſſary heard of it, he dwelling in a town hard by called Thorndon, commanded that ſhe ſhould not have chriſtian burial, as they termed it, and her friends were compelled to lay her in a pit under a mote's ſide. Her huſband and ſhe kept a good houſe, and had a good report among their neighbours, willing always to receive ſtrangers, and to comfort the poor and ſick, and lived together in the holy eſtate of matrimony very honeſtly above forty years; and ſhe departed this life willingly and joyfully, with a ſtedfaſt faith and a good remembrance of God's promiſe in Chriſt Jeſus.

A woman called mother Bennet, a widow, who lived in the town of Wetherſet, near Mendleſham, was perſecuted out of the town for not going to maſs, but at laſt ſhe returned home again ſecretly to her houſe, and there departed this life joyfully. But Sir John Tyrrel and maſter Symons the commiſſary would not let her be buried in the church-yard. So was ſhe laid in a grave by the highway ſide.

This good old woman met one of mother Seaman's neighbours, and aſked her how mother Seaman did; and the neighbour anſwered, that ſhe did very well, God be thanked. O, ſaid mother Bennet, mother Seaman hath ſtepped a great ſtep before me; for ſhe was never covetous that I could perceive.

Her huſband in his mirth would ſay unto her; O woman, if thou wert ſparing, thou mighteſt have ſaved me an hundred marks more than thou haſt. To which ſhe would gently anſwer, O man be content, and let us be thankful, for God hath given us enough, if we can ſee it. Alas, good huſband, would ſhe ſay, I tell you truth, I cannot firken up my butter, and keep my cheeſe in the chamber, waiting for a great price, and let the poor want, and ſo diſpleaſe God. But, huſband, let us be rich in good works, and ſo ſhall we pleaſe the Lord, and have all good things given us, &c.

In the month of May likewiſe, William Harris, Richard Day, and Chriſtian George, ſuffered at Colcheſter, and there joyfully and fervently made their prayers to God. And being ſettled at the ſtake, and chained to the poſts, with the fire flaming fiercely round about them, they like conſtant chriſtians triumphantly praiſed God within the ſame, and offered up their bodies a lively ſacrifice unto his holy majeſty, in whoſe habitation they have have now their everlaſting tabernacles: his name be therefore praiſed for evermore, Amen.

The ſaid Chriſtian George's huſband had another wife burnt before this Chriſtian, whoſe name was Agnes George, who ſuffered, as you have heard, at Stratford the Bow. And after the death of the ſaid Chriſtian, he married an honeſt godly woman again, and ſo they both (I mean the ſaid Richard George and his laſt wife) in the end were taken alſo, and laid in priſon, where they remained till the death of queen Mary, and at laſt were delivered by our moſt gracious ſovereign lady queen Elizabeth.

In the month of June came out a proclamation from the king and queen, againſt wholeſome and godly books, which under the falſe title of hereſy and ſedition were wrongfully condemned in the ſaid proclamation.

By the King and Queen.

WHEREAS divers books, filled both with hereſy, ſedition and treaſon, have of late, and be daily brought into this realm out of foreign countries and places beyond the ſeas, and ſome alſo covertly printed within this realm, and caſt abroad in ſundry parts thereof, whereby not only God is diſhonoured, but alſo an encouragement given to diſobey lawful princes and governors: the king and queen's majeſties, for redreſs hereof, do by this preſent proclamation declare and publiſh to all their loving ſubjects, that whoſoever ſhall after the proclaiming hereof, be found to have any of the ſaid wicked and ſeditious books, or finding them, do not forthwith burn the ſame, without ſhewing or reading the ſame to any other perſon, ſhall in that caſe be reputed and taken for a rebel, and ſhall without delay be executed for that offence, according to the order of martial law.

Given at our manor of St. James's, the 6th day of June.

John Cawood, Printer.

The Apprehenſion of certain godly Men and Women praying together in the Fields about Iſlington.

SEcretly in a back cloſe in the field by Iſlington, were gathered together a company of innocent perſons, to the number of forty men and women. Who were ſitting together at prayer, and virtuouſly occupied in the meditation of God's holy word, firſt cometh a certain man to them unknown, who looking over unto them, ſtayed and ſaluted them, ſaying, that they looked like men that meant no hurt. Then one of the ſaid company aſked the man, if he could tell whoſe cloſe that was, and whether they might be ſo bold as to ſit there. Yea, ſaid he, becauſe ye ſeem unto me ſuch perſons as intend no harm; and ſo departed. Within a quarter of an hour after, came the conſtable of Iſlington, named King, with ſix or ſeven more, one with a bow, another with a bill, and the reſt with weapons. Six or ſeven of this company were left behind in a private place, to be ready in caſe they were wanted, while the conſtable and one with him went before to view them; they both went amongſt them, looking and viewing what they were doing, and what books they had; and ſo going a little forward, and returning back again, ordered them to deliver their books. They underſtanding that he was a conſtable, refuſed not ſo to do. Then came up the reſt of their fellows, before-mentioned, who bad them ſtand and not depart. They anſwered again, they would be obedient and ready to go whitherſoever they would have them; and they were firſt carried to a brew-houſe at a ſmall diſtance, while ſome of the company went to the neareſt juſtice, but he being not at home, they were carried before Sir Roger Cholmley. In the mean time ſome of the women eſcaped away from them, ſome in the cloſe where they ſat, and others before they came to the brew-houſe. For ſo they were carried, ten with one man, eight with another, with ſome more, with others leſs, in ſuch a manner as it was not hard for them to eſcape that would. In fine, they that were carried to Sir Roger Cholmley, were twenty-ſeven, and Sir Roger and the recorder taking their names in a bill, and calling them one by one, ſo many as anſwered to their names, he ſent to Newgate, which were twenty-two out of the twenty-ſeven. They continued in priſon ſeven weeks; and before they were examined, word was ſent by Alexander the keeper, that if they would hear a maſs, they ſhould all be delivered, but thirteen of them were burnt, ſeven in Smithfield, and ſix at Branford; two died in priſon, and the other ſeven, with much trouble (through God's providence) eſcaped death. Their names were theſe:

John Willes. Thomas Hinſhaw. R. Baily, woolpacker. Rob. Willes. Hudleys. T. Coaſt, haberdaſher, Roger Sandy.

The names of the ſeven martyrs that were apprehended amongſt others, in the cloſe at Iſlington, and afterwards burnt in Smithfield, were as follows:

Henry Pond. Rainol Eaſtland. Robert Southam. Matthew Ricarby. John Floyd. John Holiday. Roger Holland.

Theſe ſeven godly men had ſeveral articles adminiſtered to them by biſhop Bonner, in the uſual form; to which they returned their anſwers, and abſolutely refuſing to acknowledge the doctrine of the Romiſh church, were altogether condemned, the ſentence being read againſt them, and ſo all ſeven by ſecular magiſtrates being ſent all to Newgate the 17th of June, not long after, about the 27th of the ſaid month were brought to Smithfield, and there ended their lives in the glorious cauſe of Chriſt's goſpel. Their particular examinations never came to our hands, except only thoſe of Roger Holland, which here follow in the order and manner as we have received them by the information of ſome that were there preſent at the ſame.

The Examination and Condemnation of Rog. Holland.

THIS Roger Holland, a merchant-taylor of London, was firſt an apprentice with one Mr. Kempton, at the Black-boy in Watling-ſtreet, where he ſerved his apprenticeſhip with much trouble to his maſter, in breaking him of the licentious liberty which he had before been trained and brought up in, giving himſelf to riot, as dancing, fencing, gaming, banqueting, and wanton company; and beſides all this, being a ſtubborn and an obſtinate papiſt, far unlike to come to any ſuch end as God called him unto. His maſter, notwithſtanding his lewdneſs, truſted him with his accompts; and on a time he received the ſum of thirty pounds for his maſter, and falling into ill company, loſt every groat at dice, being paſt all hope which way to anſwer it, and therefore he propoſed to convey himſelf beyond the ſeas, either into France or Flanders. Having determined with himſelf thus to do, he called betimes in the morning on a ſervant in the houſe, an ancient and diſcreet maid, whoſe name was Elizabeth, who profeſſed the goſpel, with a life agreeing unto the ſame, and at all times much rebuking the wilful and obſtinate papiſtry, as alſo the licentious living of this Roger Holland. To whom he ſaid, Elizabeth, I would I had followed thy gentle perſuaſions and friendly rebukes; which if I had done, I had never come to this ſhame and miſery which I am now fallen into; for this night I have loſt thirty pounds of my maſter's money, which to pay him, and to make up mine accounts, I am not able. But this much I pray you deſire my miſtreſs, that ſhe would intreat my maſter to take this note of my hand, that I am thus much indebted unto him; and if ever I be able, I will ſee him paid, deſiring him that the matter may paſs with ſilence, and that none of my kindred and friends may ever underſtand this my lewd part: for if it ſhould come to my father's ears, it would bring his grey hairs with ſorrow to the grave: and ſo was he departing.

The maid conſidering that it might be his utter ruin: Stay, ſaid ſhe, and having a ſum of money by her, which was left her by a kinſman at his death, who was thought to be Dr. Redman, ſhe brought unto him thirty pounds, ſaying, Roger, here is thus much money, I will let thee have it, and I will keep this note. But ſince I do thus much for thee to help thee, and to ſave thy honeſty, thou ſhalt promiſe me to refuſe all lewd and wild company, all ſwearing and ribaldry talk; and if ever I know thee to play one twelve-pence at either dice or cards, then will I ſhew thy note unto my maſter. And furthermore thou ſhalt promiſe me to reſort every day to the lecture at All-hallows, and the ſermon at Paul's every Sunday, and to caſt away all thy books of popery and vain ballads, and get thee the Teſtament and book of ſervice, and read the ſcriptures with reverence and fear, calling unto God ſtill for his grace to direct thee in his truth. And pray fervently to God, deſiring him to pardon thy former offences, and not to remember the ſins of thy youth; and ever be afraid to break his laws, or offend his majeſty. Then ſhall God keep thee, and ſend thee thy heart's deſire.

After this time, within one half year, God had wrought ſuch a change in this man, that he was become an earneſt profeſſor of the truth, and deteſted all popery and ill company, ſo that he was in admiration to all the that had known him, and ſeen his former life and wickedneſs. Then he repaired to his father in Lancaſhire, and brought divers good books with him, and beſtowed them among his friends, ſo that his father and others began to taſte the ſweetneſs of the goſpel, and to deteſt the maſs, idolatry, and ſuperſtition; and in the end his father gave him fifty pounds to begin the world withal. Then he came to London again, and went to the maid that lent him the money to pay his maſter withal, and ſaid unto her, Elizabeth, here is thy money that I borrowed of thee, and for the friendſhip, good will, and good counſel I have received at thy hands, to recompence thee I am not able, otherwiſe than to make thee my wife; and ſoon after they were married, which was in the firſt year of queen Mary. And having a child by her, he cauſed Mr. Roſe to baptize it in his own houſe. Notwithſtanding he was bewrayed to the enemies, and he being gone into the country to convey the child away, that the papiſts ſhould not have it in their anointing hands, Bonner cauſed his goods to be ſeized on, and moſt cruelly uſed his wife.

After this he remained cloſely in the city, and in the country, in the congregations of the faithful, until the laſt year of queen Mary. Then he with the ſix others before named, were in, or not far from St. John's Wood, and ſo brought to Newgate upon May-day in the morning, 1558.

They being called before the biſhop, Doctor Chedſey, both the Harpsfields, and certain others, after many other fair and crafty perſuaſions of Doctor Chedſey, to allure him to their Babylonical church; thus the biſhop began with him.

Holland, I for my part do wiſh well unto thee, and the more for thy friend's ſake. And as Dr. Standiſh telleth me, you and he were both born in one pariſh, and he knoweth your father to be a very honeſt catholic gentleman: and Mr. doctor told me that he talked with you a year ago, and found you very wilfully addicted to your own conceit. Divers of the city have alſo ſhewed me of you, that you have been a great procurer of mens ſervants to be of your religion, and to come to your congregations; but ſince you be now in danger of the law, I would wiſh you to play a wiſe man's part; ſo ſhall you not want any favour I can do or procure for you, both for your own ſake, and alſo for your friends, who are men of worſhip and credit, and wiſh you well, and by my troth, Roger, ſo do I.

Then ſaid Mr. Egleſton, a gentleman of Lancaſhire, and near kinſman to Roger, being there preſent; I thank your good lordſhip; your honour meaneth good unto my couſin, I beſeech God he have the grace to follow your counſel.

Holland. Sir, you crave of God you know not what. I beſeech God to open your eyes to ſee the light of his word.

Egleſton. Roger, hold your peace, leſt you fare the worſe at my lord's hands.

Holland. No, I ſhall fare as it pleaſeth God, for man can do no more than God doth permit him.

Then the biſhop and the doctors, with Johnſon the regiſter, caſting their heads together, in the end ſaid Johnſon, Roger, how ſayſt thou? wilt thou ſubmit thyſelf unto my lord, before thou be entered into the book of contempt?

Holland. I never meant but to ſubmit myſelf unto the magiſtrate, as I learnt of St. Paul to the Romans, chap. 13. and ſo he recited the text.

Chedſey. Then I ſee you are no anabaptiſt.

Holland. I mean not yet to be a papiſt; for they and the anabaptiſts agree in this point, not to ſubmit themſelves to any other prince or magiſtrate, than thoſe that muſt firſt be ſworn to maintain them and their doings.

Chedſey. Roger, remember what I have ſaid, and alſo what my lord hath promiſed he will perform with further friendſhip. Take heed, Roger, for your ripeneſs of wit hath brought you into theſe errors.

Holland. Mr. doctor, I have yet your words in memory, though they are of no ſuch force to prevail with me.

Then they whiſpered together again, and at laſt Bonner ſaid, Roger, I perceive thou wilt not be ruled by good counſel, for any thing that either I or your friends can ſay.

Holland. I may ſay to you, my lord, as Paul ſaid to Felix and to the Jews, as doth appear in the 22d of the Acts, and in the 15th of the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians. It is not unknown to my maſter whom I was apprentice withal, that I was of this your blind religion that now is taught, and therein did obſtinately and wilfully remain, until the latter end of king Edward, in manner, having that liberty under your auricular confeſſion, that I made no conſcience of ſin, but truſted in the prieſt's abſolution, he for money doing alſo ſome penance for me: which after I had given, I cared no further what offences I did, no more than he minded after he had my money, whether he taſted bread and water for me, or no: ſo that lechery, ſwearing, and all other vices, I counted no offence of danger, ſo long as I could for money have been abſolved. So ſtraitly did I obſerve your rules of religion, that I would have aſhes upon Aſhwedneſday, though I had uſed never ſo much wickedneſs at night. And albeit I could not of conſcience eat fleſh upon the Friday, yet in ſwearing, drinking, or dicing all the night long, I made no conſcience at all. And thus was I brought up, and herein have I continued till now of late, that God hath opened the light of his word, and called me by his grace to repentance of my former idolatry and wicked life; for in Lancaſhire their blindneſs and whoredom is much more than may with chaſte ears be heard. Yet theſe my friends, which are not clear in theſe notable crimes, think the prieſt with his maſs can ſave them, though they blaſpheme God, and keep concubines beſides their wives, as long as they live. Yea, I know ſome prieſts very devout, my lord, yet ſuch as have ſix or ſeven children by four or five ſundry women.

Mr. doctor, now to your antiquity, unity and univerſality (for theſe Dr. Chedſey alledged as notes and tokens of their religion) I am unlearned. I have no ſophiſtry to ſhift my reaſons withal; but the truth I truſt I have, which needeth no painted colours to ſet her forth. The antiquity of our church is not from pope Nicholas, or pope Joan, but our church is from the beginning, even from the time that God ſaid unto Adam, that the ſeed of the woman ſhould break the ſerpent's head: and and ſo to faithful Noah? to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, to whom it was promiſed, that their ſeed ſhould multiply as the ſtars in the ſky; and ſo to Moſes, David, and all the holy fathers that were from the beginning unto the birth of our Saviour Chriſt. All they that believed theſe promiſes were of the church, though the number were oftentimes but few and ſmall, as in Elias's days, when he thought there was none but he that had not bowed their knees to Baal, when God had reſerved ſeven thouſand that never had bowed their knees to that idol: as I truſt there be ſeven hundred thouſand more than I know of, that have not bowed their knees to that idol your maſs, and your god Maozim: the upholding whereof is your bloody cruelty, while you daily perſecute Elias, and the ſervants of God, forcing them (as Daniel was in his chamber) cloſely to ſerve the Lord their God; and even as we by this your cruelty are forced in the fields to pray unto God, that his holy word may be once again truly preached amongſt us, and that he would mitigate and ſhorten theſe idolatrous and bloody days wherein all cruelty reigneth. Moreover our church hath been the apoſtles and evangeliſts, the martyrs and confeſſors of Chriſt, that have at all times and in all ages been perſecuted for the teſtimony of the word of God. But for the upholding of your church and religion, what antiquity can you ſhew? Yea, the maſs, that idol and chief pillar of your religion, is not yet four hundred years old, and ſome of your maſſes are younger, as that of St. Thomas Becket the traitor, wherein you pray, That you may be ſaved by the blood of St. Thomas. And as for your Latin ſervice, what are we of the laity the better for it? I think he that ſhould hear your prieſts mumble up their ſervice, although he did well underſtand Latin, yet ſhould he underſtand few words thereof, the prieſts do ſo champ them and chew them, and poſt ſo faſt, that they neither underſtand what they ſay, nor they that hear them; and in the mean time the people, when they ſhould pray with the prieſt, are ſet to the beads to pray our Lady's pſalter. So crafty is Satan to deviſe theſe his dreams, which you defend with faggot and fire, to quench the light of the word of God: which, as David ſaith, ſhould be a lanthorn to our feet. And again, wherein ſhall a young man direct his ways, but by the word of God? And yet you will hide it from us in a tongue unknown. St. Paul had rather to have five words ſpoken with underſtanding, than ten thouſand in an unknown tongue; and yet you will have your Latin ſervice and praying in a ſtrange tongue, whereof the people are utterly ignorant, to be of ſuch antiquity.

The Greek church, and a great part of chriſtendom beſides never received your ſervice in an unknown tongue, but in their own natural language, which all the people underſtand, neither yet your tranſubſtantiation, your receiving in one kind, your purgatory, your images, &c.

As for the unity which is in your church, what is it elſe but treaſon, murder, poiſoning one another, idolatry, ſuperſtition, wickedneſs? What unity was in your church when there were three popes at once? Where was your head of unity when you had a woman pope? Here he was interrupted, and could not be ſuffered to proceed.

The biſhop ſaid, Roger, theſe thy words are very blaſphemy, and by the means of thy friends thou haſt been ſuffered to ſpeak, and art over malepart to teach any here. Therefore keeper take him away.

The ſecond Examination of Roger Holland.

THE day that Henry Pond and the reſt were brought forth to be again examined, Dr. Chedſey ſaid, Roger, I truſt you now have better conſidered of the church than you did before.

Holland. I conſider thus much: that out of the church there is no ſalvation, as divers ancient doctors ſay.

Bonner. That is well ſaid. Mr. Egleſton, I truſt your kinſman will be a good catholic man. But Roger, you mean, I truſt, the church of Rome.

Holland. I mean that church which hath Chriſt for her head; which alſo hath his words and his ſacraments according to his word and inſtitution.

Then Chedſey interrupted him, and ſaid, Is that a Teſtament you have in your hand?

Holland. Yea, Mr. doctor, it is the New Teſtament. You will find no fault with the tranſlation, I think. It is our own tranſlation; it is according to the great Bible.

Bonner. How ſay you? How do you know that it is the Teſtament of Chriſt, but only by the church? For the church of Rome hath and doth preſerve it, and out of the ſame hath made decrees, ordinances, and true expoſitions.

No, ſaith Roger, the church of Rome hath and doth ſuppreſs the reading of the Teſtament. And what a true expoſition, I pray you, did the pope make thereof, when he ſet his foot on the emperor's neck, and ſaid, "Thou ſhalt walk upon the lion and the aſp: the "young lion and the dragon ſhalt thou tread under thy "foot, Pſal. 91."

Then ſaid the biſhop; ſuch unlearned wild heads as thou and others, would be expoſitors of the ſcripture. Would you then the ancient learned, as there be ſome here as well as I, ſhould be taught of you?

Holland. Youth delighteth in vanity. My wildneſs hath been ſomewhat the more by your doctrine, than ever I learned out of this book of God. But, my lord, I ſuppoſe ſome old doctors ſay, If a poor lay-man bring his reaſon and argument out of the word of God, he is to be credited before the learned, tho' they be never ſo great doctors. For the gift of knowledge was taken from the learned doctors, and given to poor fiſhermen. Notwithſtanding I am ready to be inſtructed by the church.

Bonner. That is very well ſaid, Roger. But you muſt underſtand that the church of Rome is the catholic church. Roger, for thy friend's ſake, I promiſe thee, I wiſh thee well, and I mean to do thee good. Keeper, ſee that he want nothing. Roger, if thou lackeſt any money to pleaſure thee, I will ſee thou ſhalt not want. This he ſpake upon him alone, his companions being apart, with many other fair promiſes, and ſo he was ſent to priſon again.

The laſt Examination of R. Holland.

THE laſt examination of Roger Holland was, when he with his fellow priſoners were brought into the conſiſtory, and there all excommunicated, except Roger, and ready to have their ſentence of judgment given, with many threatening words to affright them withal: the lord Strange, Sir Thomas Jarret, M. Egleſton, eſquire, and divers others of worſhip, both of Cheſhire and Lancaſhire, that were Roger Holland's kinſmen and friends, being there preſent, who had been earneſt ſuitors to the biſhop in his favour, hoping of his ſafety of life. Now the biſhop hoping yet to win him with his fair and flattering words, began after this manner:

Bonner. Roger, I have divers times called thee before home to my houſe, and have conferred with thee, and being not learned in the Latin tongue, it doth appear unto me that thou haſt a good memory, and very ſenſible ble in talk, but ſomething over haſty, which is a natural impediment incident to ſome men. And ſurely they are not the worſt natured men. For I myſelf ſhall now and then be haſty, but mine anger is ſoon over. So Roger, ſurely I have a good opinion of you, that you will not with theſe lewd fellows caſt yourſelf headlong from the church of your parents and your friends that are here, very good catholics, as it is reported unto me. And as I mean thee good, ſo, Roger, play the wiſe man's part, and come home with the loſt ſon, and ſay, I have run into the church of ſchiſmatics and heretics, from the catholic church of Rome; and you ſhall, I warrant you, not only find favour at God's hands, but the church that hath authority, ſhall abſolve you, and put new garments upon you, and kill the fatling to make thee good cheer withal, that is, in ſo doing, as meat doth refreſh and cheriſh the mind, ſo ſhalt thou find as much quietneſs of conſcience in coming home to the church, as did the hungry ſon that had been fed before with the hogs, as you have done with theſe heretics that ſever themſelves from the church. I give them a homely name, but they be worſe [putting his hand to his cap out of reverence] than hogs: for they know the church, and will not follow it. If I ſhould ſay thus much to a Turk, he would, I think, believe me. But, Roger, if I did not bear thee and thy friends good will, I would not have ſaid ſo much as I have done, but I would have let mine ordinary alone with you.

At theſe words his friends there preſent thanked the biſhop for his good will, and for the pains he had taken in his and their behalf.

Then the biſhop proceeded, ſaying, Well, Roger, how ſay you? Do you not believe, that after the prieſt had ſpoken the words of conſecration, there remaineth the body of Chriſt really and corporally under the forms of bread and wine? I mean the ſelf-ſame body as was born of the virgin Mary, that was crucified upon the croſs, that roſe again the third day.

Holland. Your lordſhip ſaith, the ſame body which was born of the virgin Mary, which was crucified upon the croſs, which roſe again the third day: but you leave out, which aſcended into heaven; and the ſcripture ſaith, he ſhall there remain until he come to judge the quick and the dead. Then he is not contained under the forms of bread and wine, by Hoc eſt corpus meum, &c.

Bonner. Roger, I perceive my pains and good-will will not prevail, and if I ſhould argue with thee, thou art ſo wilful, as all thy fellows be, ſtanding in thine own ſingularity and fooliſh conceit, that thou would'ſt ſtill talk to no purpoſe this ſeven years, if thou mighteſt be ſuffered. Anſwer whether thou wilt confeſs the real and corporal preſence of Chriſt's body in the ſacrament, or wilt not.

Holland. My lord, altho' God by his ſufferance hath here placed you, to ſet forth his truth and glory in us his faithful ſervants, notwithſtanding your meaning is far from the zeal of Chriſt; and for all your words, you have the ſame zeal that Annas and Caiaphas had, truſting t their authority, traditions and ceremonies, more than to the word of God.

Bonner. If I ſhould ſuffer him, he would fall from reaſoning to raving, as a frantic heretic.

Roger, ſaith the lord Strange, I perceive my lord would have you tell him, whether you will ſubmit yourſelf to him, or no.

Yea, ſaid Bonner, and confeſs this preſence that I have ſpoke of.

With this Roger turned to the lord Strange and the reſt of his kinſmen and friends, and very cheerfully kneeled down upon his knees, and ſaid, God by the mouth of his ſervant St. Paul hath ſaid, "Let every ſoul ſubmit himſelf unto the higher powers, and he that reſiſteth receiveth his own damnation; and as you are a magiſtrate appointed by the will of God, ſo do I ſubmit myſelf unto you, and to all ſuch as are appointed for magiſtrates.

Bonner. That is well ſaid, I ſee you are no anabaptiſt. How ſay you then to the preſence of Chriſt's body and blood in the ſacrament of the altar?

Holland. I ſay and beſeech you all to mark and bear witneſs with me, for ſo you ſhall do before the judgment-ſeat of God, what I ſpeak; for here is the concluſion: And ye my dear friends, turning to his kinſmen, I pray you ſhew my father what I do ſay, that he may underſtand I am a chriſtian man. I ſay and believe, and am therein fully perſuaded by the ſcriptures, that the ſacrament of the ſupper of our Lord, miniſtered in the holy communion according to Chriſt's inſtitution, I being penitent and ſorry for my ſins, and minding to amend and lead a new life, and ſo coming worthily unto God's board in perfect love and charity, do there receive by faith the body and blood of Chriſt. And tho' Chriſt in his human nature ſit at the right hand of his father, yet by faith I ſay, his death, his paſſion, his merits are mine, and by faith I dwell in him, and he in me. And as for the maſs, tranſubſtantiation, and the worſhipping of the ſacrament, they are mere impiety, and horrible idolatry.

I thought ſo much, ſaid Bonner, ſuffering him to ſpeak no more, now he would prove a very blaſphemous heretic as ever I heard. How irreverently doth he ſpeak of the bleſſed maſs? And ſo read his ſentence of condemnation, adjudging him to be burned.

All this while Roger was very patient and quiet, and when he ſhould depart, he ſaid, My lord, I beſeech you ſuffer me to ſpeak two words. The biſhop would not hear him, but bade him away. Notwithſtanding, being requeſted by one of his friends, he ſaid, Speak, what haſt thou to ſay?

Holland. Even now I told you, that your authority was from God, and by his ſufferance: and now I tell you, God hath heard the prayer of his ſervants, which hath been poured forth with tears for his afflicted ſaints, whom you daily perſecute, as now you do us. But this I dare be bold in God to ſpeak (by whoſe Spirit I am moved to ſay) that God will ſhorten your hand of cruelty, that for a time you ſhall not moleſt his church. And this you ſhall in a ſhort time well perceive, my dear brethren, to be moſt true. For after this day, in this place ſhall there not be any by him put to the trial of fire and faggot: And after that day there were none that ſuffered in Smithfield for the truth of the goſpel.

Then ſaid Bonner, Roger, thou art, I perceive, as mad in theſe thy hereſies as ever was John Butcher. In anger and fume thou wouldſt become a railing prophet. Though thou and all the reſt of would ſee me hanged, yet I ſhall live to burn, yea, I will burn all the ſort of you that come into my hands, that will not worſhip the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, for all thy prattling: And ſo he went his way.

Then Roger Holland began to exhort his friends to repentance, and to think well of them that ſuffered for the teſtimony of the goſpel, and with that the biſhop came back, charging the keeper that no man ſhould ſpeak to them without his licence, and if they did, they would be committed to priſon. In the mean time Henry Pond and Roger ſpake ſtill unto the people, exhorting them to ſtand in the truth: adding moreover, that God would ſhorten theſe cruel and evil days for his elects ſake.

The day they ſuffered, a proclamation was made, that none ſhould be ſo bold to ſpeak or talk any word unto them, or receive any thing of them, or to touch them, upon pain of impriſonment, without either bail or mainprize; with other cruel threatening words contained in the ſame proclamation. Notwithſtanding, the people cried out, deſiring God to ſtrengthen them: and they likewiſe ſtill prayed for the people, and the reſtoring of his word. At length Roger embracing the ſtake and the reeds, ſaid theſe words:

"Lord, I moſt humbly thank thy majeſty, that thou haſt called me from the ſtate of death, unto the light of thy heavenly word, and now unto the fellowſhip of thy ſaints, ſaints, that I may ſing and ſay, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hoſts. And Lord into thy hands I commit my ſpirit. Lord bleſs theſe thy people, and ſave them from idolatry." And ſo he ended his life, looking up into heaven, praying to, and praiſing God, with the reſt of his fellow ſaints. For whoſe joyful conſtancy the Lord be praiſed.

The Martyrdom of Six, who ſuffered at Branford for the true Teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt.

THESE ſix martyrs were of the company of thoſe who were apprehended in a cloſe near Iſlington, as is above-mentioned, and ſent to priſon. Whoſe names here follow:

Robert Mills,	Stephen Wright,
Stephen Cotton,	John Slade,
Robert Dynes,	William Pikes, a tanner.

Theſe ſix martyrs were burnt at Branford, ſeven miles from London, on the 14th of July, 1558. They had their articles miniſtered to them by T. Darbyſhire, Bonner's chancellor, at ſundry times, to which they made their anſwers much after the ſame manner as others have done before.

When theſe good men came before Bonner's chancellor, Thomas Darbyſhire, and had the articles miniſtered unto them, and they anſwered unto the ſame; in the end the chancellor commanded them to appear before him again the eleventh day of July at Paul's. Where when they came, he required of them, whether they would turn from their opinions to the mother holy church; and if not, that then, whether there were any cauſe to the contrary, but that he might proceed with the ſentence of condemnation? Whereunto they all anſwered, That they would not go from the truth, nor relent from any part of the ſame while they lived. Then he charged them to appear before him again the next day in the afternoon, between one and two of the clock, to hear the definitive ſentence read againſt them, according to the eccleſiaſtical laws then in force. At which time he ſitting in judgment talking with theſe godly and virtuous men, at laſt came into the ſaid place Sir Edward Haſtings and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, knights, two of queen Mary's officers of her houſe, and being there, they ſate them down over-againſt the chancellor, in whoſe preſence the chancellor condemned thoſe poor innocent lambs, and delivered them over to the ſecular power, who received, and carried them to priſon immediately, and there kept them in ſafety till the day of their death.

In the mean time this naughty chancellor ſlept not, I warrant you, but that day in which they were condemned, he made a certificate under the lord chancellor's office, from whence the next day after a writ was ſent to burn them at Branford, which accordingly was accompliſhed. Whereunto being brought, they made their humble prayers to the Lord Jeſus, undreſſed themſelves, went joyfully to the ſtake, whereunto they were bound, and the fire flaming about them, they yielded their ſouls, bodies, and lives into the hands of the omnipotent God, for whoſe cauſe they did ſuffer, and to whoſe protection I commend the gentle reader, Amen.

Among theſe ſix was one William Pikes a tanner, as ye have heard, who ſome time dwelt in Ipſwich, a very godly man, and of a virtuous diſpoſition, a good keeper of hoſpitality, and beneficial to the perſecuted in queen Mary's days. In the third year of queen Mary, a little after Midſummer, he then being at liberty, went into his garden, and took with him a Bible of Roger's tranſlation, where he, ſitting with his face towards the ſouth, reading in the ſaid Bible, ſuddenly fell down upon his book, between eleven and twelve of the clock, at mid-night, four drops of freſh blood, and he knew not from whence it came. At which he was ſore aſtoniſhed, and could by no means learn, as I ſaid, from whence it ſhould fall: and wiping out one of the drops with his finge, he called his wife and ſaid, In the virtue of God, wife, what meaneth this? Will the Lord have four ſacrifices? I ſee well enough the Lord will have blood: his will be done, and give me grace to abide the trial. Wife, let us pray, for I fear the day draweth nigh. Afterwards he daily expected to be apprehended, and it came to paſs accordingly, as ye have heard. Thus much I thought good to write, in order to ſtir up our dull minds in conſidering the wonderful works of the Lord, and reverently to honour the ſame.

When he was ſo ſick in Newgate that nobody expected him to live ſix hours, he expreſſed a great deſire of martyrdom, ſaying, that he had been twice in perſecution before, and that now he deſired the Lord, if it were his will, that he might glorify his name at the ſtake; and ſo as he prayed it came to paſs at Branford.

Verſes upon Bonner's Effigy.

MUSE not ſo much that nature's work
Is thus deformed now
With belly blown, and head ſo ſwoln,
For I ſhall tell you how:
This cannibal in three years ſpace
Two hundred martyrs ſlew:
They were his food, he ſo lov'd blood,
He ſpared none he knew,
It ſhould appear that blood feeds fat,
If men lie well and ſoft;
For Bonner's belly waxt with blood
Tho' he ſeem to faſt oft.
O bloody beaſt bewail the death
Of thoſe that thou haſt ſlain:
In time repent, ſince thou canſt not
Their lives reſtore again.

The ſcourging of Thomas Hinſhaw, by Biſhop Bonner.

WHEN biſhop Bonner found that his examinations, perſuaſions, threats, and impriſonments, were to no purpoſe with Thomas Hinſhaw, he, the ſaid biſhop, took him with him to Fulham, where immediately after his coming, he was ſet in the ſtocks remaining there all the firſt night with bread and water.

The next morning the biſhop came and examined him himſelf, and perceiving no yielding to his mind, he ſent Mr. Harpsfield to talk with him; who, after long talk, in the end fell to raging words, calling the ſaid Thomas Hinſhaw peeviſh boy, and aſked him whether he thought he went about to damn his ſoul or no, &c. Unto which the ſaid Thomas anſwered, that he was perſuaded that they laboured to maintain their dark and deviliſh kingdom, and not for any love to truth. Then Harpsfield, being in a mighty rage, told the biſhop thereof. Whereat the biſhop fumed and fretted, that for anger being ſcarce able to ſpeak, he ſaid, Doſt thou anſwer my archdeacon ſo, thou naughty boy? I ſhall handle thee well enough, be aſſured; ſo he ſent for a couple of rods, and cauſed him to kneel againſt a long bench in an arbor in his garden, where the ſaid Thomas, without any inforcement of his part, offered himſelf to the beating, and did abide the fury of the ſaid Bonner, ſo long as the fat panched biſhop could endure with breath, and till for wearineſs he was fain to ceaſe, and give place to his ſhameful act. He had two willow rods, but he waſted but one, and ſo left off.

Now after this ſcourging, the ſaid Thomas Hinſhaw notwithſtanding did ſuſtain divers conflicts and examinations ſundry times. At laſt being brought before the ſaid biſhop in his chapel at Fulham, there he had procured witneſſes, and gathered articles againſt him, which the young man denied, and would not affirm, or conſent to any interrogatory there and then miniſtered, do what they could.

About a fortnight after he fell ſick of a burning ague, whereby he was delivered upon entreaty unto his maſter Martin Pugſon in Paul's church-yard; for then the biſhop thought verily he was more like to die than to live. Which his ſickneſs endured a twelve-month or more, ſo that in the mean time queen Mary died. Then he ſhortly after recovered health, and eſcaped death, being at the writing of this, both witneſs and reporter of the ſame, the Lord therefore be praiſed, Amen.

The ſcourging of John Willes, by Biſhop Bonner.

BESIDES the above-named, was ſcourged alſo by the hands of the ſaid biſhop, one John Willes a capper, a right faithful and true honeſt man in all his dealings and conditions, who was brother to the aforeſaid Rich. Willes burned at Branford, as is before ſaid. Who alſo was apprehended in the ſame number with them at Iſlington, as alſo is mentioned before: and being brought before Bonner, and there examined, was commanded to the coal-houſe, with the aforeſaid Thomas Hinſhaw, where they remained one night in the ſtocks. From thence he was ſent to Fulham, where he, with the ſaid Hinſhaw, remained eight or ten days in the ſtocks; during which time he ſuſtained divers conflicts with the ſaid Bonner, who had him often in examination, urging him, and with a ſtick which he had in his hand, oft-times rapping him on the head, and flirting him under the chin, and on the ears, ſaying he looked down like a thief. Moreover, after he had aſſayed all manner of ways to cauſe him to recant, and could not, at length having him to his orchard, there within a little arbor, with his own hands beat him firſt with a willow rod, and that being worn well nigh to the ſtumps, he called for a birch rod, which a lad brought out of his chamber. The cauſe why he ſo beat him was this; Bonner aſked him when he had crept to the croſs. He anſwered, Not ſince he came to the years of diſcretion, neither would, though he ſhould be torn with wild horſes. Then Bonner bade him make a croſs in his forehead, which he refuſed to do. Whereupon he had him immediately to his orchard, and there calling for rods, ſhewed his cruelty upon him, as he had done upon Thomas Hinſhaw.

This done, he had him immediately to the pariſh church of Fulham with the ſaid Thomas Hinſhaw, and Robert Willes, to whom there being ſeverally called before him, he miniſtered certain articles, aſking if he would ſubſcribe to the ſame. To which he made his anſwer according to his conſcience, denying them all except one article which was concerning king Edward's ſervice in Engliſh. Shortly after this beating, Bonner ſent a certain old prieſt lately come from Rome, to him in priſon, to conjure out the evil ſpirit from him, who laying his hand upon his head, began with certain words pronounced over him, to conjure as he had been wont before to do. Willes marvelling what the old man was about, ſaid, I truſt no evil ſpirit is in me, and laughed him to ſcorn.

As this John Willes was divers times called before Bonner, ſo much communication paſſed between them as is too tedious to recite. It is enough to make the reader laugh to ſee the blind and unſavoury reaſons with which that biſhop endeavoured to delude the ignorant, ſome of which were in the following manner: Bonner going about to perſuade Willes not to meddle with matters of ſcripture, but rather to believe other men's teaching, who had more ſkill in the ſame, aſked him firſt, if he did believe the ſcripture: Yea, ſaid he, that I do. Then, quoth the biſhop, St. Paul ſaith, If the man ſleep, the woman is at liberty to go to another man. If thou wert aſleep having a wife, wouldſt thou be content thy wife to take to another man? and yet this is the ſcripture.

Alſo, if thou wilt believe Luther, Zuinglius, and ſuch, then thou canſt not go right; but if thou wilt believe me, &c. thou canſt not err: and if thou ſhouldſt err, yet thou art in no danger, thy blood ſhould be required at our hands. As if thou ſhouldſt go to a far country, and meet with a fatherly man, as I am, (theſe were his words) and aſk the way to the city, and he ſhould ſay, this way, and thou wilt not believe him, but follow Luther, and other heretics of late days, and go a contrary way: how wilt thou come to the place thou aſkeſt for? So if thou wilt not believe me, but follow the leading of other heretics, ſo ſhalt thou be brought to deſtruction, and burn both body and ſoul.

As truly as thou ſeeſt the bodies of them in Smithfield burnt, ſo truly their ſouls do burn in hell, becauſe they err from the true church.

Oft-times ſpeaking to the ſaid John Willes, he would ſay, They call me Bloody Bonner. A vengeance on you all: I would fain be rid of you, but you have a delight in burning. But if I might have my will, I would ſew up your mouths, and put you in ſacks and drown you.

The ſame day that he was delivered, Bonner came to the ſtocks where he lay, and aſked him how he liked his lodging, and his fare.

Well, ſaid Willes, if it would pleaſe God I might have a little ſtraw to lie or ſit upon.

Then, ſaid Bonner, thou wilt ſhew no token of a chriſtian man. And upon this his wife came in unknown to him, being very great with child, every hour expecting her labour, and intreated the biſhop for her husband, ſaying, that ſhe would not go from thence, but that ſhe would there ſtay, and be delivered in the biſhop's houſe, unleſs ſhe had her husband with her. How ſayſt thou, quoth Bonner to Willes, if thy wife miſcarry, or thy child, or children, if ſhe be with one or two, ſhould periſh, the blood of them would he require at thy hands. Then to this agreement he came, that he ſhould hire a bed in the town of Fulham, and her husband ſhould go home with her the morrow after, upon this condition, that his kinſman there preſent, one Robert Rouſe, ſhould bring the ſaid Willes to his houſe at Paul's the next day.

To which Willes would not agree, but inſiſted upon going then. At length, his wife being importunate for her husband, and Bonner ſeeing ſhe would not ſtir without him, fearing belike the rumour that might come upon his houſe thereby, and alſo probably fearing to be troubled with a lying-in-woman, bade Willes make a croſs, and ſay, In nomine Patris, & Filii, & Spiritus Sancti, Amen.

Then Willes began to ſay, In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, Amen. No, no, ſaith Bonner, ſay it me in Latin; Willes underſtanding the matter of that Latin to be good, ſaid the ſame, and ſo went home with his wife, his aforeſaid kinſman being charged to bring him the next day to Paul's; elſe, ſaid Bonner, if thou doſt not bring him, thou art an heretic as well as he. Notwithſtanding, the charge being no greater, his kinſman did not bring him, but he of his own accord came to the biſhop within a few days after, where he put to him a certain writing in Latin, to ſubſcribe unto, containing, as it ſeemed to him, no great matter, that he needed greatly to ſtick at, albeit, what the bill was, he could not certainly tell: ſo he ſubſcribed to the bill, and returned home. And thus much concerning the twenty-two taken at Iſlington.

The Hiſtory of Richard Yeoman, Dr. Taylor's Curate at Hadley.

RICHARD Yeoman, a devout old man, was Dr. Taylor's curate in Hadley, and well ſeen in the ſcriptures, and giving godly exhortations to the people: with him Dr. Taylor left his cure at his departure. But as as ſoon as Mr. Newall had gotten the benefice, he put out Mr. Yeoman, and ſet in a popiſh curate to maintain and continue their popiſh religion, which now they thought fully eſtabliſhed. Then he wandered from place to place, exhorting all men to ſtand faithfully to God's word, earneſtly to give themſelves unto prayer, with patience to bear the croſs now laid upon them for their trial, with boldneſs to confeſs the truth before the adverſaries, and with an undoubted hope to wait for the crown and reward of eternal felicity. But when he perceived his adverſaries to lie in wait for him, he went into Kent, and with a little packet of laces, pins, and points, and ſuch like things, he travelled from village to village, ſelling ſuch things, and by that ſhift ſubſiſted himſelf, his wife, and children.

At laſt juſtice Moyle of Kent took Mr. Yeoman, and ſet him in the ſtocks a day and a night, but having no evident matter to charge him with, he let him go again. So he came ſecretly again to Hadley, and tarried with his poor wife, who kept him ſecretly in a chamber of the town-houſe, commonly called the Guild-hall, more than a year. All which time the good old father abode in a chamber locked up all the day, and ſpent his time in devout prayer, and reading the ſcriptures, and in carding of wool which his wife did ſpin. His wife alſo did go and beg bread and meat for herſelf and her children, and by ſuch poor means they ſuſtained themſelves. Thus the ſaints of God ſuſtained hunger and miſery, while the prophets of Baal lived in jollity, and were coſtly pampered at Jezebel's table.

At laſt parſon Newall (I know not by what means) perceived that Richard Yeoman was ſo kept by his poor wife, and taking with him the bailiff's deputies and ſervants, came in the night-time, and brake up five doors upon Yeoman, whom he found in bed with his wife and children; whom when he had ſo found, he angrily cried, I thought I ſhould find an harlot and an whore together. And he would have plucked the cloaths off from them: but Yeoman held faſt the cloaths, and ſaid to his wife, Wife, ariſe, and put on thy cloaths. And unto the parſon he ſaid, Nay, parſon, no harlot, nor whore, but a married man and his wife, according to God's ordinance, and bleſſed be God for lawful matrimony. I thank God for this great grace, and I defy the pope, and all his popery. Then they led Richard Yeoman unto the cage, and ſet him in the ſtocks until it was day.

There was then alſo in the cage an old man named John Dale, who had ſat there three or four days, becauſe when the ſaid parſon Newall with his curate uſed the Romiſh ſervice in the church, he ſpake openly unto him, and ſaid, O miſerable and blind guides, will ye ever be blind leaders of the blind? will ye never amend? will ye never ſee the truth of God's word? will neither God's threats nor promiſes enter into your hearts? will the blood of martyrs nothing mollify your ſtony ſtomach! O indurate, hard-hearted, perverſe, and crooked generation! O damnable ſort, whom nothing can do good unto.

Theſe, or the like words he ſpake in fervency of ſpirit againſt the ſuperſtitious religion of Rome. Wherefore parſon Newall cauſed him forthwith to be attached, and ſet in the ſtocks in a cage. So was he kept there till Sir Henry Doile a juſtice came to Hadley.

When poor Yeoman was taken, the parſon called earneſtly upon Sir Henry Doile to ſend them both to priſon. Sir Henry Doile earneſtly intreated the parſon, to conſider the age of the men, and their mean condition: they were neither perſons of note, nor preachers; wherefore he would deſire him to let them be puniſhed a day or two, and ſo let them go, at leaſt John Dale, who was no prieſt: and therefore ſeeing he had ſo long ſate in the cage, he thought it puniſhment enough for this time. When the parſon heard this, he was exceeding mad, and in a great rage called them peſtilent heretics, unfit to live in the commonwealth of chriſtians. Wherefore I beſeech you, Sir, quoth he, according to your office, defend the holy church, and help to ſuppreſs theſe hereſies, &c. which are falſe to God, and thus boldly ſet themſelves, to the evil example of others, againſt the queen's gracious proceedings. Sir Henry Doile ſeeing he could do no good in the matter, and fearing alſo the danger of meddling too much in it, made out the writ, and cauſed the conſtables to carry them to Bury gaol. For now all the juſtices, though never ſo many, were afraid of a ſhaven crown, and ſtood in as much awe of them, as Pilate did of Annas and Caiaphas, and the phariſaical brood, who cried, "Crucify him, crucify him; if thou let this man go, thou art not Cæſar's friend."

Wherefore whatſoever their conſciences were, yet (if they would eſcape danger) they muſt needs be the popiſh ſlaves and vaſſals. So they took Richard Yeoman and John Dale pinioned, and bound them like thieves, ſet them on horſeback, and bound their legs under the horſes bellies, and ſo carried them to Bury gaol, where they were laid in irons; and becauſe they continually rebuked popery, they were thrown into the loweſt dungeon, where John Dale, through ſickneſs of the priſon, and evil keeping, died in priſon, whoſe body, when he was dead, was thrown out, and buried in the fields. He was a man of forty-ſix years of age, a weaver by his occupation, well learned in the holy ſcriptures, faithful and honeſt in all his converſation, ſtedfaſt in the confeſſion of the true doctrine of Chriſt ſet forth in king Edward's time; for which he joyfully ſuffered priſon and chains; and from this worldly dungeon he departed to Chriſt to eternal glory, and the bleſſed paradiſe of everlaſting felicity.

After that John Dale was dead, Richard Yeoman was removed to Norwich priſon, where after ſtrait and evil keeping, he was examined of his faith and religion. Then he boldly and conſtantly confeſſed himſelf to be of the faith and confeſſion that was ſet forth by king Edward VI. and from that he would in no wiſe vary. Being required to ſubmit himſelf to the holy father the pope: I defy him, quoth he, and all his deteſtable abominations: I will in no wiſe have to do with him, nor any thing that appertaineth to him. The chief articles objected to him, were his marriage, and the maſs ſacrifice. Wherefore, when he continued ſtedfaſt in confeſſion of the truth, he was condemned, degraded, and not only burnt, but moſt cruelly tormented in the fire. So he ended his poor and miſerable life, and ſo he entered into the bleſſed boſom of Abraham, enjoying with Lazarus the comfortable quietneſs that God hath prepared for his elect ſaints.

The Story of John Alcock.

THIS young man was by occupation a ſheerman, and came to Hadley to ſeek work; he being in church one Sunday, and parſon Newall coming by with the proceſſion, would not once move his cap, nor ſhew any ſign of reverence, but ſtood behind the font. The parſon perceiving this, when he was almoſt out of the church door, ran back again, and caught him, and called for the conſtable.

Then came Robert Rolfe, with whom this young man had wrought, and ſaid, What hath he done Mr. Parſon, that ye are in ſuch a rage with him?

He is an heretic and traitor, quoth the parſon, and deſpiſeth the queen's proceedings. Wherefore I command you in the queen's name, to have him to the ſtocks, and ſee he be forthcoming.

Well, quoth Rolfe, he ſhall be forthcoming. Proceed in your buſineſs, and be quiet.

Have him to the ſtocks, quoth the parſon.

I am conſtable, quoth Rolfe, and I may bail him, and will bail him; he ſhall not be put in the ſtocks, but he ſhall be forthcoming: So the good parſon went forth with his holy proceſſion, and ſo to maſs.

In

In the afternoon Rolfe ſaid to this young man, I am ſorry for thee, for truly the parſon will ſeek thy deſtruction, if thou take not good heed what thou anſwereſt him.

The young man ſaid, Sir, I am ſorry that it may hap to be a trouble to you. As for myſelf, I am not ſorry, but I commit myſelf into God's hands, and I truſt he will give me mouth and wiſdom to anſwer according to right.

Well, quoth Rolfe, yet beware of him, for he is malicious and a blood-ſucker, and beareth an old hatred againſt me, and he will handle you the more cruelly becauſe of diſpleaſure againſt me.

I fear not, quoth the young man: he ſhall do no more to me than God will give him leave: and happy ſhall I be if God will call me to die for his truth's ſake.

Then they went to the parſon, who at the firſt aſked him, Fellow, what ſayeſt thou to the ſacrament of the altar?

I ſay, quoth he, as ye uſe the matter, ye make a ſhameful idol of it, and ye are falſe idolatrous prieſts, all the ſort of you.

I told you (quoth the parſon) he was a ſtout heretic.

So after long talk, the parſon committed him to priſon, and the next day he rode up to London, and carried the young man with him, and ſo the young man came no more to Hadley, but after long impriſonment in Newgate, where after many examinations and troubles, for that he would not ſubmit himſelf to aſk forgiveneſs of the pope, and to be reconciled to the Romiſh religion, he was caſt into the lower dungeon, where with ill keeping and ſickneſs of the houſe, he died in priſon. Thus died he a martyr of God's Truth, which he heartily confeſſed, and received the garland of a well-fought battle at the hand of the Lord. His body was caſt out and buried in a dunghill; for the papiſts would in all things be like themſelves; therefore they would not ſo much as ſuffer the dead bodies to have convenient burial.

The Hiſtory of Thomas Benbridge, Gentleman and Martyr, wrongfully condemned and put to Death, for the Teſtimony of Chriſt.

THomas Benbridge, a gentleman, unmarried, in the dioceſe of Wincheſter, although he might have lived a gentleman's life, in the wealthy poſſeſſions of this word; yet to follow Chriſt, had rather enter into the ſtrait gate of perſecution, to the heavenly poſſeſſion of life in the Lord's kingdom, than here to enjoy preſent pleaſures with unquietneſs of conſcience. Wherefore manfully ſtanding againſt the papiſts, for the defence of the ſincere doctrine of Chriſt's goſpel, he ſpared not himſelf to confirm the truth of the ſame. For which cauſe he being apprehended for an adverſary to the Romiſh religion, was forthwith had to examination before the biſhop of Wincheſter, where he ſuſtained ſundry conflicts for the truth againſt the ſaid biſhop and his collegue; for which he was condemned, and ſome time after brought to the place of martyrdom by Sir Richard Peckſal, the ſheriff.

Where ſtanding at the ſtake, he began to untie his points, and to prepare himſelf; then he gave his gown to the keeper, being belike his fee. His jerkin was laid on with gold lace fair and brave, which he gave to Sir Richard Peckſal, the high-ſheriff. His cap of velvet he took off from his head, and threw it away. Then lifting his mind to the Lord, he made his prayers.

That done, being now faſtened to the ſtake, doctor Seaton willed him to recant, and he ſhould have his pardon; but when he ſaw it prevailed not to ſpeak, the ſaid dreaming doctor willed the people not to pray for him unleſs he would recant, no more than they would pray for a dog.

Mr. Benbridge ſtanding at the ſtake with his hands together in ſuch a manner as the prieſt holdeth his hands in his memento, the ſaid doctor Seaton came to him again, and exhorted him to recant: unto whom he ſaid, Away, Babylonian, away.

Then ſaid one that ſtood by, Sir, cut out his tongue; and another being a temporal man, railed on him worſe than doctor Seaton did, who, as it is thought, was ſet on by ſome other.

Thus when they ſaw he would not yield, he bade the tormentors ſet to fire, and yet he was nothing like covered with faggots. Firſt, the fire took away a piece of his beard, whereat he did not ſhrink at all. Then it came on the other ſide, and took his legs, and the nether ſtockings of his hoſe being leather, made the fire to pierce the ſharper, ſo that the intolerable heat thereof made him to cry, I recant: and ſuddenly he thruſt the fire from him. And having two or three of his friends by that wiſhed his life, they ſtept to the fire, and helped to take it from him alſo, who for their labour were ſent to priſon. The ſheriff alſo of his own authority took him from the ſtake, and ſent him to priſon again, for which he was ſent unto the Fleet, and lay there ſome time. But before he was taken from the ſtake, doctor Seaton wrote articles to have him ſubſcribe unto them; as touching the pope, the ſacrament, and ſuch other traſh. But the ſaid Mr. Benbridge made much ado ere he would ſubſcribe them, inſomuch that doctor Seaton ordered them to ſet to fire again. Then with much pain and grief of heart he ſubſcribed to them upon a man's back.

That being done, he had his gown given him again, and ſo was led to priſon. Being in priſon, he wrote a letter to doctor Seaton, and recanted thoſe words he ſpake at the ſtake, unto which he had ſubſcribed: for he was grieved that ever he ſubſcribed unto them. Whereupon expreſſing his conſcience, he was the ſame day ſevennight after burnt indeed, where the vile tormentors did rather broil than burn him. The Lord give his enemies repentance.

The Martyrdom of John Cooke, a Sawyer, Robert Myles, alias Plummer, Sheerman, Alexander Lane, a Wheelwright, James Aſhley, Batchelor.

THE examination of theſe forenamed perſons being ſeverally called before the biſhop of Norwich, and Sir Edward Walgrave, with others, was partly upon theſe articles, viz.

Firſt, Sir Edward Walgrave called John Cooke to him, and ſaid, How doth it happen, that you go not to your church?

Cooke. I have been there.

Sir Edward. What is the cauſe that you go not thither now in theſe days?

Cooke. Becauſe the ſacrament of the altar is an abominable idol, and the vengeance of God will come upon all them that do maintain it.

Sir Edward. O thou rank traitor, if I had as good commiſſion to cut out thy tongue, as I have to ſit here this day, thou ſhould'ſt be ſure to have it done.

Then he commanded the conſtable to take him away, ſaying, he was both a traitor and a rebel.

Then he called Robert Miles, and ſaid, How fortuneth it, that you will not go to church?

Miles. Becauſe I will follow no falſe Gods.

Then ſaid the biſhop, Who told thee that it was a God?

Even you, quoth Miles, and ſuch as you are.

Then the biſhop commanded him aſide, and to appear the next day.

Then he called Alexander Lane before him, and aſked him how it chanced that he would not go to the church?

He ſaid, that his conſcience would not ſerve him ſo

Sir Edward ſaid, How doſt thou believe?

Lane anſwered, Even as it is written in God's book.

Then Sir Edward commanded him to ſay his belief.

Then

Then Lane, being ſomewhat abaſhed, ſaid his belief to theſe words, which he miſſed unawares, "Born of the virgin Mary."

Then ſaid Sir Edward, What? was he not born of the virgin Mary?

Yes, ſaid Lane, I would have ſaid ſo.

Nay, ſaid Sir Edward, you are one of Cook's ſcholars, and ſo commanded him away, and to come before him the next day.

After the like manner they paſſed alſo with James Aſhley, whom they warned the next day likewiſe to appear before them again. So in fine they appearing again, had their condemnation. And thus theſe four bleſſed martyrs innocently ſuffered together at St. Edmund's-Bury, as is aforeſaid, about the beginning of Auguſt, not long before the ſickneſs of queen Mary.

The Martyrdom of two godly Perſons at Ipſwich for the everlaſting Teſtimony of Chriſt, Alexander Gouch, and Alice Driver.

MR. Noone, a juſtice in Suffolk, dwelling in Martleſham, hunting after good men, to apprehend them (as he was a bloody tyrant in the time of trial) at length had intelligence of one Alexander Gouch of Woodbridge, and Driver's wife of Groſborough, to be at Groſborough together, a little from his houſe, and immediately took his men with him, and went thither, and made diligent ſearch for them, where the poor man and woman were compelled to get into an hay-loft to hide themſelves from their cruelty. At length they came to ſearch the hay for them, and by gagging thereof with pitchforks, at laſt they found them: ſo they took them and led them to Melton gaol, where they remaining a time, at laſt were carried to Bury againſt the aſſize at St. James's-tide, and being there examined of matters of faith, did boldly ſtand to confeſs Chriſt crucified, defying the pope and his papiſtical traſh. And among other things, Driver's wife likened queen Mary in her perſecution, to Jezebel; and ſo in that ſenſe calling her Jezebel, for that Sir Clement Higham, being chief judge there, ordered her ears immediately to be cut off, which was accompliſhed accordingly, and ſhe joyfully yielded herſelf to the puniſhment, and thought herſelf happy that ſhe was counted worthy to ſuffer any thing for the name of Chriſt. After the aſſize at Bury, they were carried to Melton gaol again, where they remained a time. This Alexander Gouch was a man of the age of thirty-ſix years, or thereabouts, and by his occupation a weaver of ſhredding coverlets, dwelling at Woodbridge in Suffolk, and born at Uxford in the ſame county. Driver's wife was a woman about the age of thirty years, and dwelt at Groſborough, where they were taken, in Suffolk: her huſband did uſe huſbandry. Theſe two were carried from Melton goal to Ipſwich, where they remained, and were examined. Which examination, as it came to our hands hereafter followeth.

The Examination of Alice Driver, before Dr. Spenſer, the Chancellor of Norwich.

FIRST, ſhe coming into the place where ſhe ſhould be examined with a ſmiling countenance; Dr. Spenſer ſaid, Why woman, doſt thou laugh us to ſcorn?

Driver's wife. Whether I do or no, I might well enough, to ſee what fools ye be.

Then the chancellor asked her wherefore ſhe was brought before him, and why ſhe was laid in priſon?

Driver. Wherefore? I think I need not tell you: for ye know it better than I.

Spenſer. No, by my troth, woman, I know not why.

Driver. Then have ye done much wrong thus to impriſon me, and know no cauſe why; for I know no evil that I have done, I thank God, and I hope there is no man that can accuſe me of any notorious fact that I have done, juſtly.

Spenſer. Woman, woman, what ſayeſt thou to the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar? Doſt thou not believe that it is very fleſh and blood, after the words be ſpoken of conſecration?

Driver's wife at thoſe words held her peace, and made no anſwer. Then a great chuff-headed prieſt that ſtood by, ſpake, and asked her why ſhe made not the chancellor anſwer. With that the ſaid Driver's wife looked upon him auſterely, and ſaid, Why, prieſt, I come not to talk with thee, but I am come to talk with thy maſter: but if thou wilt I ſhall talk with thee, command thy maſter to hold his peace. And with that the prieſt put his noſe in his cap, and ſpake never a word more. Then the chancellor bid her make anſwer to that he had demanded of her.

Driver. Sir, pardon me though I make no anſwer, for I cannot tell what you mean thereby; for in all my life I never heard nor read of any ſuch ſacrament in all the ſcripture Spenſer. Why, what ſcriptures have you read, I pray you?

Driver. I have, I thank God, read God's book.

Spenſer. Why, what manner of book is that you call God's book?

Driver. It is the Old and New Taſtament. What call you it?

Spenſer. That is God's book, indeed, I cannot deny.

Driver. That ſame book have I read throughout, but yet never could find any ſuch ſacrament there; and for that cauſe I cannot make you an anſwer to that thing I know not. Notwithſtanding, for all that, I will grant you a ſacrament, called the Lord's ſupper: and therefore ſeeing I have granted you a ſacrament, I pray you ſhew me what a ſacrament is.

Spenſer. It is a ſign. And one Dr. Gaſcoine being by, confirmed the ſame, that it was the ſign of a holy thing.

Driver. You have ſaid the truth, Sir. It is a ſign indeed, I muſt needs grant: and therefore, ſeeing it is a ſign it cannot be the thing ſignified alſo. Thus far we do agree; for I have granted your own ſaying.

Then ſtood up the ſaid Gaſcoine, and made an oration with many fair words, but little to the purpoſe, both offenſive and odious to the minds of the godly. In the end of which long tale, he asked her if ſhe did not believe the omnipotency of God, and that he was Almighty, and able to perform that he ſpake. She anſwered, Yes, and ſaid, I do believe that God is Almighty, and able to perform that he ſpake and promiſed.

Gaſcoine. Very well. Then he ſaid to his diſciples, "Take, eat, this is my body:" Ergo, it was his body. For he was able to perform that he ſpake, and God uſeth not to lye.

Driver. I pray you did he ever make any ſuch promiſe to his diſciples, that he would make the bread his body?

Gaſcoine. Thoſe be the words. Can you deny it?

Driver. No, they be the very words indeed, I cannot deny it; but I pray you, was it not bread that he gave unto them?

Gaſcoine. No, it was his body.

Driver. Then was it his body that they did eat over-night?

Gaſcoine. It was his body.

Driver. What body was it then that was crucified the next day?

Gaſcoine. It was Chriſt's body.

Driver. How could that be, when the diſciples had eaten him over-night? except he had two bodies, as by your argument he had; one they did eat over-night, and he was crucified the next day. Such a doctor! ſuch a doctrine! Be you not aſhamed to teach the people, that Chriſt had two bodies? In the 22d of Luke, "He took bread and brake it to his diſciples, ſaying, Take, &c. and Do this in remembrance of me. St. Paul ſaith, 1 Cor. 11. Do this in remembrance of me: for as often as ye ſhall eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye ſhall ſhew the Lord's death till he come." And therefore I marvel you bluſh not before all this people, to lye ſo manifeſtly as ye do.

With that Gaſcoine held his peace, and made her no anſwer; for, as it ſeemed, he was aſhamed of his doings. Then the chancellor lift up his head off from his cuſhion, and commanded the gaoler to take her away.

Driver. Now ye be not able to reſiſt the truth, ye command me to priſon again. Well, the Lord in the end ſhall judge our cauſe, and to him I leave it. So away ſhe went with the gaoler.

The ſecond Examination of Alice Driver.

THE next day ſhe came before them again, and the chancellor then asked her, what ſhe ſaid to the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar?

Driver. I will ſay nothing to it: for you will neither believe me nor yourſelves: for yeſterday I asked you what a ſacrament was, and you ſaid, it was a ſign; and I agreed thereto, and ſaid it was the truth, confirming it by the ſcriptures, ſo that I went not from your own words; and now ye come and ask me again of ſuch a ſacrament as I told you I never read of in the ſcriptures.

Spenſer. Thou lyeſt, naughty woman, we did not ſay that it was a ſign.

Driver. Why maſters be ye not the men that you were yeſterday? will ye eat your own words? are you not aſhamed to lye before all this multitude here preſent, who heard you ſpeak the ſame?

Then ſtood up Dr. Gaſcoine, and ſaid, ſhe was deceived; for there are three churches, the malignant church, the church militant, and the church triumphant. So he would fain have made the matter, but he could not tell which way.

Driver. Sir, is there mention made of ſo many churches in the ſcriptures?

Gaſcoine. Yea.

Driver I pray you where find you this word (church) written in the ſcripture?

Gaſcoine. It is written in the New Teſtament.

Driver. I pray you, Sir, ſhew the place were it is written.

Gaſcoine. I cannot tell the place, but there it is. With that ſhe deſired him to look into his Teſtament: then he fumbled and ſought about him for one: but at that time he had none, and that he knew well enough, though he ſeemed to ſearch for it. At laſt ſhe ſaid, Have ye none here, Sir?

Gaſcoine. No.

Driver. I thought ſo much indeed, that ye were little acquainted withal. Surely you be a good doctor. You ſay you ſit here to judge according to the law, and how can you give judgment, and have not the book of the law with you? At which words Gaſcoine was out of countenance, and aſked her if ſhe had one.

No, ſaid ſhe.

Then, ſaid he, I am as good a doctor as you.

Driver. Well, Sir, I had one, but you took it from me (as you would take me from Chriſt, if you could), and ſince would ye not ſuffer me to have any book at all; ſo burning is your charity. But you may well know, I thank God, that I have exerciſed the ſame; elſe could I not have anſwered you (to God's glory be it ſpoken) as I have. Thus ſhe put them all to ſilence, that one looked on another, and had not a word to ſpeak.

Driver. Have you no more to ſay? God be honoured. You be not able to reſiſt the Spirit of God in me poor woman. I was an honeſt poor man's daughter, never brought up in the univerſity as you have been, but I have driven the plough before my father many a time: yet notwithſtanding in the defence of God's truth, and in the cauſe of my maſter Chriſt, by his grace I will ſet my foot againſt the foot of any of you all, in the maintenance and defence of the ſame; and if I had a thouſand lives, they ſhould go for payment thereof. So the chancellor roſe up, and read the ſentence of condemnation in Latin, and committed her to the ſecular power, and ſo ſhe went to priſon again as joyful as the bird of day, praiſing and glorifying the name of God.

Alexander Gouch, Martyr.

THIS Alexander Gouch was examined chiefly of the ſacrament and other ceremonies of the popiſh church. And for that his belief was, that Chriſt was aſcended into heaven, and there remaineth, and that the ſacrament was the remembrance of his death and paſſion, and for refuſing the maſs, and the pope to be ſupreme head of Chriſt's church; for theſe cauſes was he condemned, and died with Alice Driver at Ipſwich, the 4th of November, which was the Monday after All-ſaints, 1558, Dr. Miles Spenſer being chancellor, they both ended their lives with earneſt zeal, nothing fearing to ſpeak their conſcience when they were commanded to the contrary.

Theſe two perſons being come to the place where the ſtake was ſet by ſeven of the clock in the morning, notwithſtanding they came the ſame morning from Melton gaol, which is ſix miles from Ipſwich, being in their prayers, and ſinging of pſalms both of them together, Sir Henry Dowell then being ſheriff, was very much offended with them, and willed the bailiffs of Ipſwich to bid them make an end of prayers, they kneeling upon a broom faggot, one of the bailiffs, whoſe name was Richard Smart, commanded them to make an end, ſaying, On, on, have done; make an end, nail them to the ſtake; yet they continued in prayer.

Then Sir Henry ſent one of his men, whoſe name was Richard Cove, that they ſhould make an end.

Then Gouch ſtood up and ſaid unto the ſheriff, I pray you Mr. Sheriff, let us pray a little while, for we have but a little time to live here.

Then ſaid the bailiff, Come off, have them to the fire.

Then the ſaid Gouch and Alice Driver ſaid, Why maſter ſheriff, and maſter bailiff, will you not ſuffer us to pray?

Away, ſaid Sir Henry, to the ſtake with them.

Gouch anſwered, Take heed Mr. Sheriff, if you forbid prayer, the vengeance of God hangeth over your heads. Then they being tied to the ſtake, and the iron chain being put about Alice Driver's neck, O, ſaid ſhe, here is a goodly neckerchief, bleſſed be God for it. Then divers came and took them by the hands as they were bound ſtanding at the ſtake. The ſheriff cried, Lay hands on them, lay hands on them. With that a great number ran to the ſtake. The ſheriff ſeeing that, let them all alone, ſo that there was not one taken.

There was one Bate a barber, a buſy doer about them, who having then a freeze gown upon him, ſold it immediately, ſaying, It ſtunk of heretics, with other foul words. Within three or four weeks after this, God's hand was upon him, and he died very miſerably in Ipſwich.

Although our hiſtory haſteth apace, the Lord be praiſed, to the happy death of queen Mary, yet ſhe died not ſo ſoon but that ſome were burned before her death; and more would have been burned ſoon after, if God's proviſion had not prevented her with death. In the number of them which ſuffered in the ſame month when queen Mary died, were three that were burned at Bury, whoſe names were theſe, Philip Humfrey, John David, and Henry David his brother.

Concerning

Concerning the burning of theſe three, here is to be noted, that Sir Clement Higham, about a fortnight before the queen died, iſſued out a writ for the burning of them, notwithſtanding that the queen was then known to be paſt remedy of her ſickneſs.

Although in ſuch a great number of perſons, who in ſundry parts of this realm were put to death in queen Mary's time, it be hard exactly to recite every particular perſon that ſuffered, but that ſome eſcaped us either unknown, or omitted, yet I cannot paſs over a certain poor woman, burned in the ſaid queen's reign, in the city of Exeter (whoſe name I have not yet learned:) who dwelling ſome time about Cornwall, having a huſband and children there, much addicted to the ſuperſtitious ſect of popery, was many times rebuked by them, and driven to go to the church, to their idols and ceremonies, to confeſſion, to follow the croſs in proceſſion, to give thanks to God for reſtoring Antichriſt again in this realm, &c. which when her ſpirit could not abide to do, ſhe made her prayer to God, calling for help and mercy, and ſo at length lying in her bed, about midnight ſhe thought there came to her a certain motion and feeling of ſingular comfort. Whereupon in ſhort ſpace, ſhe began to grow in contempt of her huſband and children, and ſo taking nothing from them, but even as ſhe went, departed from them, ſeeking her living by labour and ſpinning as well as ſhe could, here and there for a time. In which time notwithſtanding ſhe never ceaſed to utter her mind as well as ſhe durſt againſt their popery; howbeit ſhe at that time was brought home to her huſband again. Where ſhe at laſt was accuſed by her neighbours, and ſo brought up to Exeter, to be preſented to the biſhop and his clergy. The name of the biſhop who had her in examination was Dr. Troublevile. His chancellor, as I gather, was Blackſtone. The chiefeſt matter whereupon ſhe was charged and condemned, was for the ſacrament, which they call, of the altar, and for ſpeaking againſt idols, as by the declaration of thoſe which were preſent, I underſtand which report the talk between her and the biſhop was on this wiſe.

Biſhop. Thou fooliſh woman, I hear ſay, that thou haſt ſpoken certain words againſt the moſt bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, the body of Chriſt. Fie for ſhame. Thou art an unlearned perſon, and a woman: wilt thou meddle with ſuch high matters, which all the doctors of the world cannot define? wilt thou talk of ſo high myſteries? Keep thy work, and meddle with that thou haſt to do. It is no woman's matter, at cards and tow to be ſpoken of. And if be as I am informed, thou art worthy to be burned.

Woman. My lord, I truſt your lordſhip will hear me ſpeak.

Biſhop. Yea, marry, for that cauſe I ſent for thee.

Woman. I am a poor woman, and do live by my hands, getting a penny truly, and of what I get I give part to the poor.

Biſhop. That is well done. Art thou not a man's wife?

And here the biſhop entered into talk of her huſband.

To whom ſhe anſwered again, declaring that ſhe had a huſband and children; and had them not. So long as ſhe was at liberty, ſhe refuſed neither husband nor children; but now ſtanding here as I do, ſaid ſhe, in the cauſe of Chriſt and his truth, where I muſt either forſake Chriſt or my husband, I am contented to ſtick only to Chriſt, my heavenly ſpouſe, and renounce the other. And here ſhe making mention of the words of Chriſt, "He that leaveth not father or mother, ſiſter or brother, husband, &c." The biſhop inferred, that Chriſt ſpake that of the holy martyrs, which died becauſe they would not do ſacrifice to the falſe gods.

Woman. Surely, Sir, and I will rather die than I will do any worſhip to that idol, which with your maſs you make a god.

Biſhop. Yea, you callet, will you ſay that the ſacrament of the altar is a foul idol?

Woman. Yes, truly, there never was ſuch an idol as your ſacrament is made by your prieſts, and commanded to be worſhipped of all men, with many fond phantaſies, where Chriſt did command it to be eaten and drank in remembrance of his moſt bleſſed paſſion for our redemption.

Biſhop. See this prattling woman. Doſt thou not hear, that Chriſt did ſay over the bread, "This is my body," and over the cup, "This is my blood?"

Woman, Yes, forſooth, he ſaid ſo, but he meant, that it is his body and blood, not carnally, but ſacramentally.

Biſhop. Lo, ſhe hath heard prating among theſe new preachers, or heard ſome peeviſh book. Alas, poor woman, thou art deceived.

Woman. No, my lord, what I have learned was of godly preachers, and of godly books, which I have heard read. And if you will give me leave, I will give a reaſon why I will not worſhip the ſacrament.

Biſhop. Marry, ſay on, I am ſure it will be goodly gear.

Woman. Truly ſuch gear as I will loſe this poor life of mine for.

Biſhop. Then you will be a martyr, good wife.

Woman. Indeed, if the denying to worſhip that bready god be my martyrdom, I will ſuffer it with all my heart.

Biſhop. Say thy mind.

Woman. You muſt bear with me a poor woman.

Biſhop. So I will.

Woman. I will demand of you, whether you can deny your creed, which doth ſay, That Chriſt perpetually doth ſit at the right hand of his Father, both body and ſoul, until he come again? or whether he be there in heaven our advocate, and do make prayer for us unto God his Father? If it be ſo, he is not here on earth in a piece of bread. If he be not here, and if he do not dwell in temples made with hands, but in heaven, what, ſhall we ſeek him here? if he did offer his body once for all, why make you a new offering? if with once offering he made all perfect, why do ye with falſe offering make all unperfect? if he be to be worſhipped in ſpirit and in truth, why do you worſhip a piece of bread? if he be eaten and drank in faith and truth, if his fleſh be not profitable to be among us, why do you ſay you make his fleſh and blood, and ſay it is profitable for body and ſoul? Alas, I am a poor woman, but rather than I will do as you do, I would live no longer. I have ſaid, Sir.

Biſhop. I promiſe you, you are a jolly proteſtant. I pray you in what ſchools have you been brought up?

Woman. I have upon the ſundays viſited the ſermons, and there have I learned ſuch things as are ſo fixed in my breaſt, that death ſhall not ſeparate them.

Biſhop. O fooliſh woman, who will waſte his breath upon thee, or ſuch as thou art? But how chanceth it, that thou wenteſt away from thy husband? if thou wert an honeſt woman, thou wouldeſt not have left thy husband and children, and run about the country like a fugitive.

Woman. Sir, I laboured for my living; and as my maſter Chriſt counſelleth me, when I was perſecuted in one city, I fled into another.

Biſhop. Who perſecuted thee?

Woman. My husband and my children. For when I would have them to leave idolatry, and to worſhip God in heaven, he would not hear me, but he with his children rebuked me, and troubled me. I fled not for whoredom, nor for theft, but becauſe I would be no partaker with him and his, of that foul idol the maſs, and whereſoever I was, as oft as I could, upon Sundays and holydays, I made excuſes not to go to the popiſh church.

Biſhop. Belike then you are a good houſewife, to fly from your husband and the church.

Woman.

Woman. My houſwifry is but ſmall; but God give me grace to go to the true church.

Biſhop. The true church? what doſt thou mean?

Woman. Not your popiſh church, full of idols and abominations, but where two or three are gathered together in the name of God, to that church will I go as long as I live.

Biſhop. Belike then you have a church of your own. Well, let this mad woman be put down to priſon till we ſend for her huſband.

Woman. No, I have but one huſband, who is here already in this city, and in priſon with me, from whom I will never depart. And ſo their communication for that time brake off. Blackſtone and others perſuaded the Biſhop that ſhe was not in her right ſenſes, which is no new thing for the wiſdom of God to appear fooliſhneſs to the carnal men of this world, and therefore they conſulted together that ſhe ſhould have liberty to go at large. So the keeper of the biſhop's priſon had her home to his houſe, where ſhe fell to ſpinning and carding, and did work as a ſervant in the ſaid keeper's houſe, and ſhe went about the city when and where ſhe pleaſed, and many people took great delight in talking with her: And all her diſcourſe was about the ſacrament of the altar, which of all things they could leaſt abide.

Then her huſband was ſent for; but ſhe refuſed to go home with him, with the blemiſh of the cauſe and religion, in defence whereof ſhe there ſtood before the biſhop and the prieſts.

Then divers of the prieſts endeavoured to perſuade her to leave her wicked opinion about the ſacrament of the altar, the natural body and blood of our Saviour Chriſt. But ſhe made them anſwer, that it was nothing but very bread and wine, and that they might be aſhamed to ſay, that a piece of bread ſhould be turned by a man into the natural body of Chriſt, which bread doth corrupt, and mice oftentimes do eat it, and it doth mould, and is burned: God's body will not be ſo handled, nor kept in priſon, or boxes, or aumbries. Let it be your god, it ſhall not be mine; for my Saviour ſitteth on the right hand of God, and doth pray for me. And to make that ſacrament or ſignificative bread inſtituted for a remembrance, the very body of Chriſt, and to worſhip it, is very fooliſhneſs, and deviliſh deceit.

Now truly, ſaid they, the devil hath deceived thee.

No, ſaid ſhe, I truſt the living God hath opened mine eyes, and cauſed me to underſtand the right uſe of the bleſſed ſacrament, which the true church doth not uſe, but the falſe church doth abuſe.

Then ſtept forth an old friar, and aſked her what ſhe ſaid of the holy pope.

I, ſaid ſhe, ſay, that he is antichriſt and the devil.

Then they all laughed.

Nay, ſaid ſhe, you have more need to weep than to laugh, and to be ſorry that ever you were born, to be the chaplains of that whore of Babylon; I defy him, and all his falſhood; and get you away from me, you do but trouble my conſcience. You would have me follow your doings; I will firſt loſe my life. I pray you depart.

Why, thou fooliſh woman, ſaid they, we come to thee for thy profit and ſoul's health.

O Lord God, ſaid ſhe, what profit ariſeth by you that teach nothing but lyes for truth? how ſave your ſouls, when you preach nothing but damnable lyes, and deſtroy ſouls?

How proveſt thou that? (ſaid they.)

Do you not damn your ſouls, ſaid ſhe, when you teach the people to worſhip idols, ſtocks, and ſtones, the works of men's hands? and to worſhip a falſe God of your own making of a piece of bread, and teach that the pope is God's vicar, and hath power to forgive ſins? and that there is a purgatory, when God's Son hath by his paſſion purged all? and ſay, you make God, and ſacrifice him, when Chriſt's body was a ſacrifice once for all? Do you not teach the people to number their ſins in your ears, and ſay they be damned, if they confeſs not all: when God's word ſaith, who can number his ſins? Do you not promiſe them Trentals and Diriges, and maſſes for ſouls, and ſell your prayers for money, and make them buy pardons, and truſt to ſuch fooliſh inventions of your own imaginations? Do you not altogether againſt God? Do ye not teach us to pray upon beads, and to pray unto ſaints, and ſay they can pray for us? Do you not make holy water and holy bread to fray devils? Do you not a thouſand more abominations? And yet you ſay, you come for my profit and to ſave my ſoul. No, no, one hath ſaved me. Farewel you with your ſalvation. Much other talk there was between her and them, which here were too tedious to expreſs.

In the month's liberty, which was granted her by the biſhop, as is before-mentioned, ſhe went into St. Peter's church, and there found a cunning Dutchman, that had made new noſes to certain fine images which were diſfigured in king Edward's time; to whom ſhe ſaid, what a madman art thou to make them new noſes, which within a few days ſhall all loſe their heads? The Dutchman accuſed her, and laid it hard to her charge. And ſhe ſaid unto him, thou art accurſed, and ſo are thy images. He called her whore. Nay, ſaid ſhe, thy images are whores, and thou art a whore-hunter; for doth not God ſay, You go a whoring after ſtrange gods, figures of your own making? and thou art one of them. Then ſhe was ſent for, and clapped faſt, and from that time ſhe had no more liberty.

During the time of her impriſonment, divers reſorted to viſit her, ſome ſent by the biſhop, ſome of their own voluntary will; amongſt whom was one Daniel, a great preacher ſometime of the goſpel, in the days of king Edward, in thoſe parts of Cornwal and Devonſhire: whom after that ſhe perceived by his own confeſſion to have revolted from that which he preached before, thro' the grievous impriſonments, as he ſaid, and fear of perſecution which he had partly ſuſtained by the cruel juſtices in thoſe parts, earneſtly ſhe exhorted him to repent with Peter, and to be more conſtant in his profeſſion.

Moreover, there reſorted to her a certain worthy gentlewoman, the wife of one Walter Rauly, a woman of noble wit, and of a good and godly opinion; who coming to the priſon, and talking with her, ſhe ſaid her creed to the gentlewoman, and when ſhe came to the article, He aſcended, there ſhe ſtaid, and bade the gentlewoman to ſeek his bleſſed body in heaven, not on earth, and told her plainly, that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands, and that ſacrament to be nothing elſe but a remembrance of his bleſſed paſſion, and yet, ſaid ſhe, as they now uſe it, it is but an idol, and far wide from any remembrance of Chriſt's body; which, ſaid ſhe, will not continue, and ſo take it, good miſtreſs. So that as ſoon as ſhe came home to her huſband, ſhe declared to him, that in her life ſhe never heard a woman (of ſuch ſimplicity to look on) talk ſo godly, ſo perfectly, ſo ſincerely, and ſo earneſtly; inſomuch, that if God were not with her, ſhe could not ſpeak ſuch things, to which I am not able to anſwer, though I can read, and ſhe cannot.

Alſo there came to her one William Keede, and John his brother, not only brethren in the fleſh, but alſo in the truth, and men in that country of great credit, whoſe father R. Kede all his life ſuffered nothing but trouble for the goſpel. Theſe two good and faithful brethren were preſent with her both in the hall, and alſo at the priſon, and (as they reported) they never heard the like woman, of ſo godly talk, ſo faithful or ſo conſtant; and as godly exhortations ſhe gave them.

Thus this good matron was by many ways tried, both by hard impriſonment, threatenings, taunts and ſcorns, called an anabaptiſt, a mad woman, a drunkard, a runagate. She was proved by liberty to go whither ſhe would; ſhe was tried by flattery, with many fair promiſes; ſhe was tried with her huſband, her goods and children, children; but nothing could prevail; her heart was fixed, she had caſt her anchor, utterly contemning this wicked world; a rare enſample of conſtancy to all profeſſors of Chriſt's goſpel.

In the bill of my information it is ſo reported to me, that albeit ſhe was of ſuch ſimplicity, and without learning, yet you could declare no place of ſcripture, but ſhe would tell you the chapter; yea, ſhe would recite you the names of all the books of the bible. For which cauſe one Gregory Baſſet, a rank papiſt, ſaid ſhe was out of her wit, and talked of the ſcripture as a dog rangeth far off from his maſter when he walketh in the fields, or as a ſtolen ſheep out of his maſter's hands, ſhe knew not whereat, as all heretics do; with many other ſuch taunts, which ſhe utterly defied. Whereby as Almighty God is highly to be praiſed, working ſo mightily in ſuch a weak veſſel, ſo men of ſtronger and ſtouter nature have alſo to take example how to ſtand in like caſe; when as we ſee this poor woman, how manfully ſhe went through with ſuch conſtancy and patience.

At laſt when they perceived her to be paſt remedy, and had conſumed all their threatenings, that neither by impriſonment or liberty, by menaces nor flattery, they could bring her to ſing any other ſong, nor win her to their vanities and ſuperſtitious doings, then they cried out. An anabaptiſt, an anabaptiſt. Then at a day they brought her from the biſhop's priſon to the Guild-hall, and after that delivered her to the temporal power, according to their cuſtom, where ſhe was by the gentlemen of the country exhorted yet to call for grace, and to leave her opinions: and, go home to thy husband, ſaid they, thou art an unlearned woman, thou art not able to anſwer to ſuch high matters.

I am not, ſaid ſhe, yet with my death I am content to be a witneſs of Chriſt's death; and I pray you make no longer delay with me: my heart is fixed, I will never ſay otherwiſe, nor turn to their ſuperſtitious doings.

Then the biſhop ſaid, the devil did lead her.

No, my lord, ſaid ſhe, it is the Spirit of God which leadeth me, and which called me in my bed, and at midnight opened his truth to me.

Then there was a great ſhout and laughing among the prieſts and others.

During the time that this good woman was thus under theſe prieſts hands, amongſt many other baitings and ſore conflicts which ſhe ſuſtained by them, here is moreover not to be forgotten, how that Mr. Blackſtone aforeſaid, being treaſurer of the church, had a concubine, who ſundry times reſorted to him, with other of his goſſips: ſo that always when they came, this ſaid good woman was called forth to his houſe, there to make his minion with the reſt of his company ſome mirth, he examining her with ſuch mocking and grinning, deriding the truth, that it would have vexed any chriſtian heart to have ſeen it. Then when he had long uſed his fooliſhneſs in this ſort, and had ſported himſelf enough in deriding this chriſtian martyr; in the end he ſent her to priſon again, and there kept her very miſerably, except that ſometimes he would ſend for her, when his aforeſaid gueſts came to him, to uſe with her his accuſtomed folly. But in fine, theſe vile wretches (after many combats and ſcoffing perſuaſions) when they had played the part of the cat with the mouſe, at length condemned her, and delivered her over to the ſecular power.

Then the ſentence being given, That ſhe ſhould go to the place from whence ſhe came, and from thence to be led to the place of execution, there to be burned with flames till ſhe be conſumed; ſhe lifted up her voice, and thanked God, ſaying, I thank thee my Lord my God; this day have I found that which I have long ſought. But ſuch out-cries as were again, and ſuch mockings were never ſeen upon a poor innocent woman: all which ſhe moſt patiently took. And yet this favour they pretended after her judgment, that her life ſhould be ſpared, if ſhe would turn and recant. Nay, that will I not, ſaid ſhe: God forbid that I ſhould loſe the life eternal for this carnal and ſhort life. I will never turn from my heavenly husband to my earthly husband; from the fellowſhip of angels to mortal children: and if my husband and children be faithful, then am I theirs; God is my Father, God is my mother, God is my ſiſter, my brother, my kinſman, God is my friend moſt faithful.

Then was ſhe delivered to the ſheriff, innumerable people beholding her, and led by the officers to the place of execution, without the walls of Exeter, called Southenhey, where again theſe ſuperſtitious prieſts aſſaulted her; and ſhe prayed them to have no more talk with her, but cried ſtill, God be merciful to me a ſinner, God be merciful to me a ſinner. And ſo while they were tying her to the ſtake, thus ſtill ſhe cried, and would give no anſwer to them, but with much patience took her cruel death, and was with flames of fire conſumed; and ſo ended this mortal life, as conſtant a woman in the faith of Chriſt as ever was upon the earth. She was as ſimple a woman to appearance as a man might behold; of a very little and ſhort ſtature, ſomewhat thick, about fifty-four years of age. She had a cheerful countenance, ſo lively as though ſhe had been prepared for the day of her marriage to meet the Lamb; moſt patient in her words and anſwers; ſober in apparel, meat, and drink, and would never be idle; but a great comfort to as many as would talk with her; good to the poor; and in her trouble ſhe would take no money; becauſe, ſaid ſhe, I am going to a city where money beareth no maſtery; whilſt I am here, God hath promiſed to feed me. Thus was her mortal life ended. For whoſe conſtancy God be everlaſtingly praiſed, Amen.

Touching the name of this woman, as I have ſince learned, ſhe was the wife of one named Preſt, dwelling in the dioceſe of Exeter, nor far from Launceſton.

The Perſecution and Martyrdom of Richard Sharpe, Thomas Benion, and Thomas Hale.

RIchard Sharp, weaver of Briſtow, was brought the ninth day of March, 1556, before Mr. Dalby, chancellor of the town or city of Briſtow, and after examination concerning the ſacrament of the altar, was perſuaded by the ſaid Dalby and others to recant; and the 29th of the ſame month was enjoined to make his recantation before the pariſhioners in his pariſh church. Which when he had done, he felt in his conſcience ſuch a tormenting hell, that he was not able quietly to work in his occupation, but decayed and changed both in colour and liking of his body: who ſhortly after upon Sunday came into his pariſh church, called Temple, and after high maſs came to the quire door, and ſaid with a loud voice, Neighbours, bear me record that yonder idol [and pointed to the altar] is the greateſt and moſt abominable that ever was; and I am ſorry that ever I denied my Lord God. Then the conſtables were commanded to apprehend him, but none ſtepped forth, but ſuffered him to go out of the church. After, by night he was apprehended and carried to Newgate, and ſhortly after he was brought before the lord chancellor, denying the ſacrament of the altar to be the body and blood of Chriſt, and ſaid it was an idol; and therefore was condemned to be burned by the ſaid Dalby. He was burnt the 7th of May, 1557, and died godly, patiently, and conſtantly, confeſſing the articles of our faith.

Thomas Hale, Martyr.

THE Thurſday night before Eaſter, in the year 1557, came one Mr. David Harris, alderman, and John Stone, to the houſe of one Thomas Hale, a ſhoemaker of Briſtow, and cauſed him to riſe out of his bed, and brought him forth from his door. To whom the ſaid

Thomas Hale ſaid, You have ſought my blood theſe two years, and now much good may it do you. He being committed to the watchmen, was carried to Newgate the 24th of April in the year aforeſaid, was brought before Mr. Dalby the chancellor, committed by him to priſon, and after by him condemned to be burnt for ſaying, The ſacrament of the altar was an idol. He was burnt the 7th day of May, with the aforeſaid Richard Sharp, patiently embracing the fire with his arms. They were both bound back to back.

Thomas Benion.

THOMAS Benion a weaver, at the commandment of the commiſſioners, was brought by a conſtable, the 13th day of Auguſt, 1557, before Mr. Dalby chancellor of Briſtow, who committed him to priſon for ſaying there was nothing but bread in the ſacrament, as they uſed it. Wherefore, the twentieth day of Auguſt he was condemned by the ſaid Dalby to be burnt for denying five of their ſacraments, and affirming two, that is, the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt, and the ſacrament of baptiſm. He was burnt the 27th of the ſaid month in the ſame year, and died godly, conſtantly, and patiently, with confeſſing the articles of our chriſtian faith.

The Martyrdom of John Corneford of Wortham, Chriſtopher Brown of Maidſtone, John Herſt of Aſhford, Alice Snoth, Katherine Knight, alias Tynley, an aged Woman.

THESE five were the laſt that ſuffered in queen Mary's reign, for the teſtimony of that word for which ſo many had died before, and gave up their lives meekly and patiently, ſuffering the violent malice of the papiſts: who although they then might have either well ſpared them, or elſe deferred their death, knowing of the ſickneſs of queen Mary; yet ſuch was the implacable ſpite of that generation, that there be ſome that ſay, the archdeacon of Canterbury the ſame time being at London, and underſtanding the danger of the queen, immediately made poſt-haſte home to diſpatch theſe, whom he had before then in his cruel cuſtody.

The matter why they were judged to the fire, was for believing the body not to be in the ſacrament of the altar, unleſs it be received; ſaying moreover, that we receive another thing alſo beſides Chriſt's body, which we ſee, and is a temporal thing, according to St. Paul, "The things that be ſeen, be temporal, &c."

Item, For confeſſing that an evil man doth not receive Chriſt's body, "Becauſe no man hath the Son, except it be given him of the Father."

Item, That it is idolatry to creep to the croſs, and St. John forbidding it, ſaith, Beware of images.

Item, For confeſſing that he ſhould not pray to our lady, and other ſaints, becauſe they be not omnipotent.

For theſe and other ſuch like articles of chriſtian doctrine, were theſe committed to the fire. Againſt whom when the ſentence ſhould be read, and they excommunicate, after the manner of the papiſts, one of them, John Corneford by name, ſtirred with a vehement ſpirit of the zeal of God, proceeding in a more true excommunication againſt the papiſts, in the name of them all, pronounced ſentence againſt them, in theſe words as follow:

"In the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Son of the moſt mighty God, and by the power of his Holy Spirit, and the authority of his holy catholic and apoſtolic church, we do here give into the hands of Satan to be deſtroyed, the bodies of all thoſe blaſphemers and heretics, that do maintain any error againſt his moſt holy word, or do condemn his moſt holy truth for hereſy, to the maintenance of any falſe church or feigned religion, ſo that by this thy juſt judgment, O moſt mighty God, againſt thy adverſaries, thy true religion may be known to thy great glory and our comfort, and to the edifying of all our nation. Good Lord ſo be it, Amen."

This ſentence of excommunication being the ſame time openly pronounced and regiſtered, proceeding ſo, as it ſeemeth, from an inward faith and hearty zeal to God's truth and religion, took ſuch effect againſt the enemy, that within ſix days after queen Mary died, and the tyranny of all Engliſh papiſts with her. Albeit, notwithſtanding the ſickneſs and death of that queen, whereof they were not ignorant, yet the archdeacon; with others of Canterbury, thought to diſpatch the martyrdom of theſe men before.

In which fact, the tyranny of this archdeacon ſeemeth to exceed the cruelty of Bonner, who notwithſtanding he had ſome the ſame time under his cuſtody, yet he was not ſo importunate in haling them to the fire, as appeareth by father Lining and his wife, and divers others, who being the ſame time under the cuſtody of Biſhop Bonner, were delivered by the death of queen Mary.

Theſe godly martyrs in their prayer which they made before their martyrdom, deſired God that their blood might be the laſt that ſhould be ſhed, and ſo it was.

This Katherine Tinley was the mother of one Robert Tinley, dwelling in Maidſtone, which Robert was in trouble all queen Mary's time. To whom his mother coming to viſit him, asked him how he took this place of ſcripture which ſhe had ſeen, not by reading of the ſcripture (for ſhe had yet in manner no taſte of religion) but had found it by chance in a book of prayer, "I will pour out my Spirit upon all fleſh, and your ſons and your daughters ſhall propheſy; your old men ſhall dream dreams, and your young men ſhall ſee viſions. And alſo upon the ſervants, and upon the maids in thoſe days will I pour my Spirit, &c." Which place after that he had expounded to her, ſhe began to take hold on the goſpel, growing more and more in zeal and love thereof, and ſo continued unto her martyrdom.

Among ſuch women as were burned at Canterbury, it is recorded of a certain maid, and ſuppoſed to be this Alice Snoth mentioned in this ſtory, or elſe to be Agnes Snoth above-mentioned, that when ſhe was brought to be executed, ſhe being at the ſtake, called for her godfather and godmothers. The juſtice hearing her, ſent for them, but they durſt not come. Notwithſtanding the juſtices willed the meſſenger to go again, and to ſhew them that they ſhould incur no danger thereof.

Then they hearing that, came to know the matter of their ſending for. When the maid ſaw them, ſhe asked them what they had promiſed for her, and ſo ſhe immediately rehearſed her faith, and the commandments of God, and required of them, if there were any more that they had promiſed in her behalf, and they ſaid, No.

Then, ſaid ſhe, I die a chriſtian woman, bear witneſs of me; and ſhe was conſumed in fire, and gave up her life joyfully for the teſtimony of Chriſt's goſpel, to the terror of the wicked, and comfort of the godly, and alſo to the ſtopping of the ſlanderous mouths of ſuch as falſly do quarrel againſt the faithful martyrs, for going from that religion wherein by their godfathers and godmothers they were firſt baptized.

The Hiſtory and Condemnation of John Hunt and Richard White, who eſcaped the Fire by the Death of Queen Mary.

BESIDES theſe martyrs above-named, there were ſeveral others impriſoned in divers parts of the realm, whereof ſome were but newly taken and not yet examined, ſome examined but not condemned, certain were both examined and condemned, but for lack of the writ eſcaped.

Others

Others there were alſo, both condemned, and the writ alſo was brought down for their burning, and yet by the death of the chancellor, the biſhop, and of queen Mary, happening together about one time, they moſt happily and marvellouſly were preſerved, and lived many years after. In the number of whom was one John Hunt and Richard White, impriſoned at Salisbury. Touching which hiſtory ſomething here is to be ſhewed.

Theſe two good men, and faithful ſervants of the Lord, had remained a long time in priſon at Salisbury, and other places thereabouts, the ſpace of two years and more. During which time, oft-times they were called to examination, and manifold ways were impugned by the biſhops and prieſts. All whoſe examinations, as I thought not much needful here to proſecute or to ſearch out, for the length of the volume; ſo neither again did I think it good to leave no memory at all of the ſame, but ſome part to expreſs, namely of the examination of Richard White before the biſhop of Saliſbury, the biſhop of Glouceſter, with the chancellor and other prieſts, not unworthy here to be rehearſed.

The biſhop of Saliſbury at that time was Dr. Capon. The biſhop of Glouceſter was Dr. Brookes. Theſe with Dr. Geffery the chancellor of Saliſbury, and a great number of prieſts ſitting in judgment, Richard White was brought before them. With whom firſt the biſhop of Glouceſter, who had the examination of him, began thus.

Brookes. Is this the priſoner?

Chancellor. Yea, my lord.

Brookes. Friend, wherefore cameſt thou hither?

White. My lord, I truſt to know the cauſe: for the law ſaith, In the mouth of two or three witneſſes things muſt ſtand.

Capon. Did not I examine thee of thy faith when thou cameſt hither?

White. No, my lord, you did not examine me, but commanded me to the Lollard's-Tower, and that no man ſhould ſpeak with me. And now I do require mine accuſer.

Then the regiſter ſaid, The mayor of Marlborough apprehended you for words that you ſpake there; and for that I commanded you to be conveyed hither to priſon.

White. You had the examination of me in Marlborough. Say what I have ſaid. And I will anſwer you.

Chancellor. Thou ſhalt confeſs thy faith ere thou depart; and therefore ſay thy mind freely, and be not aſhamed ſo to do.

White. I am not aſhamed of the goſpel of Chriſt, becauſe it is the power of God to ſalvation unto all that believe: and St. Peter ſaith, "If any man do ask thee a reaſon of the hope that is in thee, make him a direct anſwer and that with meekneſs." Who ſhall have the examination of me?

Chancellor. My lord of Glouceſter ſhall have the examination of thee.

White. My lord, will you take the pains to wet your coat in my blood? be not guilty thereof; I warn you beforehand.

Brookes. I will do nothing contrary to our law.

White. My lord, what is it that you do requeſt at my hands?

Brookes. I will poſe thee upon certain articles, and principally upon the ſacrament of the altar: How doſt thou believe of the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar? Believeſt thou not the real, carnal, and corporal preſence of Chriſt in the ſame, even the very ſame Chriſt that was born of the virgin Mary, that was hanged on the croſs, that ſuffered for our ſins? (and at theſe words they all put off their caps, and bowed their bodies).

White. My lord, what is a ſacrament?

Brookes. It is the thing itſelf the which it repreſenteth.

White. That cannot be: for he that repreſenteth a prince cannot be the prince himſelf.

Brookes. How many ſacraments findeſt thou in the ſcriptures called by the name of ſacraments?

White. I find two ſacraments in the ſcriptures, but not called by the names of ſacraments. But I think St. Auguſtine gave them the firſt names of ſacraments.

Brookes. Then thou findeſt not that word Sacrament in the ſcriptures?

White. No, my lord.

Brookes. Did not Chriſt ſay, This is my body, and are not his words true?

White. I am ſure the words are true; but you play by me as the devil did by Chriſt: for he ſaid, If thou be, &c. Matt. 4. For it is, &c. Pſal. 91. But the words that followed after be clean left out, which are theſe: Thou ſhalt walk on the lion and the aſp, &c. Theſe words the devil left out, becauſe they were ſpoke againſt himſelf; and even ſo do you recite the ſcriptures.

Brookes. Declare thy faith upon the ſacrament.

White. Chriſt and his ſacraments are alike, becauſe of the natures; for in Chriſt are two natures, a divine and an human nature; ſo likewiſe in the ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood there be two natures, which I divide into two parts, that is, external and internal. The external part is the element of bread and wine, according to the ſaying of St. Auguſtine. The internal part is inviſible grace, which by the ſame is repreſented. So is there an external receiving of the ſame ſacrament, and an internal. The external is with the hand, the eye, the mouth, and the ear. The internal is by the Holy Ghoſt in the heart, which worketh in me faith; whereby I apprehend all the merits of Chriſt, applying the ſame wholly unto my ſalvation. If this be truth, believe it; and if it be not, reprove it.

Dr. Hoſkins. This is Oecolampadius's doctrine, and Hooper taught it the people.

Brookes. Doſt thou not believe, that after the words of conſecration there is the natural preſence of Chriſt's body?

White. My lord, I will anſwer you if you will anſwer me to one queſtion. Is not this article of our belief true; "He ſitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty:" If he be come from thence to judgment, ſay ſo.

Brookes. No. But if thou wilt believe the ſcriptures, I will prove to thee that Chriſt was both in heaven and in earth at one time.

White. As he is God he is in all places; but as for his manhood, he is but in one place.

Brookes. St. Paul ſaith, 1 Cor. 15. "Laſt of all he was ſeen of me," &c. Here St. Paul ſaith he ſaw Chriſt, and St. Paul was not in heaven.

White. St. Paul's chief purpoſe was by this place to prove the reſurrection. But how do you prove that Chriſt, when he appeared to St. Paul, was not ſtill in heaven; like as he was ſeen of Stephen, ſitting at the right hand of God? St. Auguſtine ſaith, the head that was in heaven, did cry for the body and members which were on the earth, and ſaid, "Saul, Saul, why perſecuteſt thou me?" And was not Paul taken up into the third heaven, where he might ſee Chriſt; as he witneſſeth, 1 Cor. 15. For there he doth but only ſay he ſaw Chriſt, but concerning the place he ſpeaketh nothing. Wherefore this place of ſcripture proveth not that Chriſt was both in heaven and earth at one time.

Brookes. I told you before he would not believe. Here be three opinions, the Lutherans, the Oecolampadians, and we the Catholics. If you the Oecolampadians have the truth, then the Lutherans and we the Catholics be out of the way. If the Lutherans have the truth, then you the Oecolampadians and we the Catholics be out of the way. But if we the Catholics have the truth, as we have indeed, then the Lutherans and you the Oecolampadians are out of the way, as you are indeed, for the Lutherans do call you heretics.

White.

White. My lord, ye have troubled me greatly with the ſcriptures.

Brookes. Did I not tell you it was not poſſible to remove him from his error? Away with him to the Lollard's-Tower, and diſpatch him as ſoon as ye can.

This was the effect of my firſt examination. More examinations I had after this, which I have no time now to write out.

Amongſt many other examinations of the aforeſaid Richard White, it happened one time, that Dr. Blackſtone, chancellor of Exeter, ſate upon him, with divers others, who alledging certain doctors, as Chryſoſtom, Cyprian, Tertullian, againſt the ſaid Richard White, and being reproved by him for his falſe patching of the doctors, fell into ſuch a trembling and ſhaking, (his conſcience belike accuſing him) that he was fain, ſtooping down, to lay both his hands upon his knees to ſtay his body from trembling.

Then the ſaid John Hunt and Richard White, after many examinations and long captivity, at length were called for, and brought before Dr. Geffrey the biſhop's chancellor, there to be condemned, and ſo they were. The high ſheriff at that preſent was Sir Anthony Hungerford, who being then at the ſeſſions, was there charged with theſe two condemned perſons, with other malefactors there condemned likewiſe the ſame time, to ſee them put to death.

In the mean time Mr. Clifford of Boſco in Wiltſhire, ſon-in-law to the ſaid Sir Anthony Hungerford the ſheriff, came to his father, exhorting and counſelling him in no caſe to meddle with the death of theſe two innocent perſons; and if the chancellor and prieſts would needs be inſtant upon him, yet he ſhould firſt require the writ to be ſent down De comburendo for his diſcharge.

Sir Anthony Hungerford hearing this, and underſtanding juſtice Brown to be in the town the ſame time, went to him to aſk his advice and counſel in the matter, who told him that without the writ ſent down from the ſuperior powers, he could not be diſcharged, and if the writ were ſent, then he muſt by the law do his charge.

The ſheriff underſtanding by juſtice Brown how far he might go by the law, and having at that time no writ for his warrant, let them alone, and the next day after taking his horſe, departed.

The chancellor all this while marvelling what the ſheriff meant, and yet diſdaining to go unto him, but looking rather the other ſhould have come firſt to him, at laſt hearing that he was rid away, took his horſe and rid after him; who at length overtaking the ſheriff, declared unto him how he had committed certain condemned priſoners to his hand, whoſe duty had been to have ſeen execution done; the matter, he ſaid, was great, and therefore willed him to look well unto it how he would anſwer the matter. And thus began he fiercely to lay his charge.

Wherein note, good reader, by the way, the cloſe and covert hypocriſy of the papiſts in their dealings; who in the form and ſtile of their own ſentence condemnatory, pretend a petition unto the ſecular power, in the wounds of Jeſus Chriſt, that the rigour of the law might be mitigated, and that their life may be ſpared. And how ſtandeth this now with their doings and dealings, when this chancellor (as ye ſee) is not only contented to give ſentence againſt them, but alſo hunteth after the officer, not ſuffering him to ſpare them, although he would? What diſſimulation is this of men, going and doing contrary to their own words and profeſſion? But let us return to our matter again.

The ſheriff hearing the chancellor's words, and ſeeing him ſo urging upon him, told him again that he was no babe, which now was to be taught of him. If he had any writ, to warrant and diſcharge him in burning thoſe men, then he knew what he had to do. Why, ſaid the chancellor, did not I give you a writ, with my hand and eight more of the cloſe ſet unto the ſame? Well, quoth the ſheriff, that is no ſufficient diſcharge for me; and therefore as I told you, if ye have a ſufficient writ and warrant from the ſuperior powers, I know then what I have to do in my office; otherwiſe, if you have no other writ but that, I tell you, I will neither burn them for you, nor any of you all, &c.

Where note again, good reader, how by this it may be thought and ſuppoſed, that the other poor ſaints and martyrs of God, ſuch as had been burned at Salisbury before, were burned belike without any authoriſed or ſufficient writ from the ſuperiors, but only the information of the chancellor and of the cloſe, through the uncircumſpect negligence of the ſheriffs, who ſhould have looked more ſubſtantially upon the matter. But this I leave and refer unto the magiſtrates. Let us return to the ſtory again.

Doctor Geffery the chancellor thus ſent away from the ſheriff, went home, and there fell ſick upon the ſame (for anger belike) as they ſignified unto me, who were the parties themſelves, both godly and grave perſons, who were then condemned, the one of them, which is Richard White, being yet alive.

The under-ſheriff to this Sir Anthony Hungerford above-named, was one Mr. Michell, a godly man. So that not long after this came down the writ to burn the above-named Richard White, and John Hunt, but the under-ſheriff receiving the ſaid writ, ſaid, I will not be guilty of theſe men's blood, and immediately burnt the writing, and departed his way. Within four days after the chancellor died. Concerning whoſe death this cometh by the way to be noted, that theſe two aforeſaid, John Hunt, and Richard White, being the ſame time in a low and dark dungeon, being Saturday, toward evening (according to their accuſtomed manner) fell to evening prayer. Who kneeling there together, as they ſhould begin their prayer, ſuddenly fell both to ſuch a ſtrange weeping and tenderneſs of heart (but how they could not tell) that they could not pray one word, but ſo continued a great ſpace, burſting out in tears. After that night was paſt, and the morning come, the firſt word they heard, was, that the chancellor their great enemy was dead. The time of whoſe death they found to be the ſame hour, when they fell in ſuch a ſudden weeping. The Lord in all his works be praiſed, Amen. Thus much concerning the death of that wicked chancellor.

Richard White and John Hunt, after the death of the chancellor, the biſhop alſo being dead a little before, continued ſtill in priſon till the happy coming in of queen Elizabeth: and ſo were at liberty.

The Martyrdom of a young Lad of eight Years old, ſcourged to Death in Biſhop Bonner's Houſe in London.

IF bloody torments and cruel death of a poor innocent, ſuffering for no cauſe of his own, but in the truth of Chriſt and his religion, do make a martyr, no leſs deſerveth the child of John Fetty to be reputed in the catalogue of holy martyrs, who in the houſe of biſhop Bonner unmercifully was ſcourged to death, as by the ſequel of this ſtory here following may appear.

Amongſt thoſe that were perſecuted and miſerably impriſoned for the profeſſion of Chriſt's goſpel, and yet mercifully delivered by the providence of God, there was one John Fetty, a godly poor man, dwelling in the pariſh of Clerkenwell, and was by vocation a taylor, of the age of twenty-four years or thereabouts, who was accuſed and complained of unto one Brokenbury, a parſon of the ſame pariſh, by his own wife, becauſe he would not come unto the church, and be partaker of their idolatry and ſuperſtition; and therefore, through the ſaid prieſt's procurement, he was apprehended by Richard Tanner and his fellow conſtables there, and one Martin the headborough. Howbeit, immediately upon his apprehenſion prehenſion, his wife (by the juſt judgment of God) was ſtricken mad and diſtract of her wits, which declared a marvellous example of the juſtice of God againſt ſuch unfaithful and moſt unnatural treachery. And although this example perhaps for want of knowledge and inſtruction in ſuch caſes little moved the conſciences of thoſe ſimple poor men to ceaſe their perſecution; yet natural pity towards that ungrateful woman wrought ſo in their hearts, that for the preſervation and ſupport of her and her two children (like otherwiſe to periſh) they for that preſent let her husband alone, and would not carry him to priſon, but yet he ſuffered him to remain quietly in his own houſe. During which time, he as it were forgetting the wicked and unkind fact of his wife, did yet ſo cheriſh and provide for her, that within the ſpace of three weeks (through God's merciful providence) ſhe was well amended, and had recovered again ſome ſtay of her wits and ſenſes.

But ſuch was the power of ſatan in the malicious heart of that wicked woman, that notwithſtanding his gentle dealing with her, yet ſo ſoon as ſhe had recovered ſome health, ſhe did again accuſe her husband; whereupon he was a ſecond time apprehended, and carried unto Sir John Mordant, knight, one of the queen's commiſſioners, and he upon examination ſent him by Cluny, the biſhop's ſumner, unto the Lollards Tower: where he was put into the painful ſtocks, and had a diſh of water ſet by him, with a ſtone put into it. To what purpoſe God knoweth, except it were to ſhew that he ſhould look for little other ſuſtenance. Which is credible enough, if we conſider their like practices upon divers before-mentioned in this hiſtory, as amongſt others, upon Richard Smith, who died through their cruel impriſonment; touching whom, when a godly woman came to Dr. Story, to have leave that ſhe might bury him, he asked her if he had any ſtraw or blood in his mouth; but what he meant thereby I leave to the judgment of the wiſe.

After the aforeſaid John Fetty had thus lain in priſon by the ſpace of fifteen days, hanging in the ſtocks, ſometimes by one leg and one arm, ſometimes by the other, and ſometimes by both, it happened that one of his children (a boy of the age of eight or nine years) came unto the biſhop's houſe to ſee if he could get leave to ſpeak with his father. At his coming thither, one of the biſhop's chaplains met him, and asked him what he lacked, and whom he would have. The child anſwered, that he came to ſee his father. The chaplain asked him who was his father. The boy told him, and pointing towards Lollards Tower, ſhewed him that his father was there in priſon. Why, ſaid the prieſt, thy father is an heretic: The child being of a bold and quick ſpirit, and alſo godly brought up, and inſtructed by his father in the knowledge of God, anſwered and ſaid; My father is no heretic; for you have Balaam's mark.

With that the prieſt took the child by the hand, and carried him into the biſhop's houſe, and there amongſt them they did moſt ſhamefully and without all pity ſo whip and ſcourge, being naked, this tender child, that he was all in a gore of blood, and then in jolly brag of their catholic tyranny, they cauſed Cluny, having his coat upon his arm, to carry the child in his ſhirt unto his father, being in priſon, the blood running down his heels.

At his coming unto his father the child fell down upon his knees, and asked his bleſſing. The poor man then beholding his child, and ſeeing him ſo cruelly arrayed, cried out for ſorrow, and ſaid, alas, Will, who hath done this to thee? The boy anſwered, that as he was ſeeking how to come to ſee his father, a prieſt with Balaam's mark took him into the biſhop's houſe, and there was he ſo handled. Cluny therewith violently plucked the child away out of his father's hands, and carried him back again into the biſhop's houſe, where they kept him three days after.

And at three days end, Bonner (minding to make the matter whole, and ſomewhat to appeaſe the poor man, for this their horrible fact) determined to releaſe him; and therefore cauſed him early in the morning to be brought out of Lollards Tower into his bed-chamber, where he found the biſhop bathing himſelf againſt a great fire: and at his firſt entering into the chamber, Fetty ſaid, God be here, and peace. God be here, and peace! ſaid Bonner; that is neither God ſpeed, nor good morrow. If ye kick againſt this peace, ſaid Fetty, then this is not the place that I ſeek for.

A chaplain of the biſhop's ſtanding by, turned the poor man about, and thinking to deface him, ſaid in mocking wiſe: What have we here, a player? Whilſt Fetty was thus ſtanding in the biſhop's chamber, he eſpied hanging about the biſhop's bed a great pair of black beads; whereupon he ſaid, My lord, I think the hangman is not far off; for the halter, pointing to the beads, is here already. At which words the biſhop was in a marvellous rage.

Then he immediately after eſpied alſo ſtanding in the ſaid biſhop's chamber in the window a little crucifix. Then he asked the biſhop what it was; and he anſwered that it was Chriſt. Was he handled ſo cruelly as he is here pictured, ſaid Fetty?

Yea, that he was, ſaid the biſhop.

And even ſo cruelly will you handle ſuch as come before you: For you are unto God's people as Caiaphas was unto Chriſt.

The biſhop being in a great fury, ſaid, Thou art a vile heretic, and I will burn thee, or elſe I will ſpend all that I have unto my gown.

Nay, my lord, ſaid Fetty, ye were better to give it to ſome poor body, that he may pray for you. But yet Bonner bethinking himſelf of the danger that the child was in by their whipping, and what peril might enſue thereupon, thought better to diſcharge him: which thing was accompliſhed.

Whereupon, after this and ſuch like talk, the biſhop at laſt diſcharged him, willing him to go home, and carry his child with him; which he did, and that with a heavy heart to ſee his poor boy in ſuch extreme pain and grief. But within fourteen days after the child died, whether through his cruel ſcourging, or any other infirmity, I know not; and therefore I refer the truth thereof unto the Lord, who knoweth all ſecrets, and alſo to the diſcreet judgment of the wiſe reader. But however it was, the Lord yet uſed their cruel and deteſtable fact, as a means of his providence for the delivery of this good poor man and faithful chriſtian; his name therefore be ever praiſed, Amen.

The cruel handling and burning of Nicholas Burton, an Engliſh Merchant, in Spain.

I Think it not amiſs in this place to mention the ſtory of Nicholas Burton, being ſuch as is not unworthy to be known, as well for the example of his ſingular conſtancy, as alſo for the noting of the extreme dealing and cruel revenge of thoſe catholic inquiſitors of Spain, who under the pretenſed viſor of religion, do nothing but ſeek their own private gain and advantage, with crafty rifling and ſpoiling of other mens goods, as by noting of this ſtory may appear.

The fifth day of November, about the year of our Lord 1560, this Nicholas Burton, citizen ſometime of London, and merchant, dwelling in the pariſh of Little Saint Bartholomew, peaceably and quietly following his traffic in the trade of merchandize, and being in the city of Cadiz, in the party of Andoluzia in Spain, there came into his lodging a Judas (or, as they term them) a familiar of the fathers of the inquiſition. Who asked for the ſaid Nicholas Burton, feigned that he had a letter to deliver to his own hands; by which means he ſpake with him immediately. And having no letter to deliver to him, then the ſaid promoter or familiar, at the motion of the devil his maſter, whoſe meſſenger he was, invented another lye, and ſaid, that he would take lading for London in ſuch ſhips as the ſaid Nicholas Burton had freighted to lade, if he would let any; which was partly to know where he laded his goods, that they might attach them, and chiefly to detract the time until the ſerjeant of the inquiſition might come and apprehend the body of the ſaid Nicholas Burton; which they did incontinently. Who then well perceiving that they were not able to burden nor charge him that he had written, ſpoke, or done any thing there in that country againſt the eccleſiaſtical or temporal laws of the ſame realm, boldly aſked them what they had to lay to his charge that they did ſo arreſt him, and bade them to declare the cauſe, and he would anſwer them. Notwithſtanding they anſwered nothing, but commanded him with cruel threatening words to hold his peace, and not to ſpeak one word to them. And ſo they carried him to the filthy common priſon of the town of Cadiz, where he remained in irons fourteen days among thieves. All which time he ſo inſtructed the poor priſoners in the word of God, according to the good talent which God had given him in that behalf, and alſo in the Spaniſh tongue to utter the ſame, that in ſhort ſpace he had well reclaimed ſeveral of thoſe ſuperſtitious and ignorant Spaniards to embrace the word of God, and to reject their popiſh traditions. Which being known unto the officers of the inquiſition, they conveyed him laden with irons from thence to a city called Sevil, into a more cruel and ſtraiter priſon called Triana, where the ſaid fathers of the inquiſition proceeded againſt him ſecretly according to their accuſtomable cruel tyranny, that never after he could be ſuffered to write or to ſpeak to any of his nation; ſo that to this day it is unknown who was his accuſer.

Afterward, the 20th of December, they brought the ſaid Nicholas Burton, with a great number of other priſoners, for profeſſing the true chriſtian religion, into the city of Sevil, to a place where the ſaid inquiſitors ſate in in judgment, which they called Auto, with a canvas coat, whereupon in divers parts was painted the figure of a huge devil, tormenting a ſoul in a flame of fire, and on his head a copping tank of the ſame work.

His tongue was forced out of his mouth by a cloven ſtick faſtened upon it, that he ſhould not utter his conſcience and faith to the people, and ſo he was ſet with another Engliſhman of Southampton, and divers others condemned men for religion, as well Frenchmen, as Spaniards, upon a ſcaffold overagainſt the ſaid inquiſition, where their ſentences and judgments were read and pronounced againſt them. And immediately after the ſaid ſentences given, they were carried from thence to the place of execution, without the city, where they moſt cruelly burnt him, for whoſe conſtant faith, God be praiſed.

This Nicholas Burton, by the way, and in the flames of fire, had ſo cheerful a countenance, embracing death with all patience and gladneſs, that the tormentors and enemies which ſtood by ſaid, that the devil had his ſoul before he came to the fire; and therefore they ſaid his ſenſes of feeling were paſt him.

It happened that after the arreſt of N. Burton aforeſaid, immediately all the goods and merchandize which he brought with him into Spain, by the way of traffic, were, according to their common uſage, ſeized and taken into the ſequeſter; among which they alſo rolled up much that appertained to another Engliſh merchant, wherewith he was credited as factor. Whereof ſo ſoon as news was brought to the merchant as well of the impriſonment of his factor, as of the arreſt made upon his goods, he ſent his attorney into Spain with authority from him to make claim to his goods, and to demand them, whoſe name was John Fronton, citizen of Briſtow.

When his attorney was landed at Sevil, and had ſhewed all his letters and writings to the holy houſe, requiring them that ſuch goods might be delivered into his poſſeſſion; anſwer was made him, that he muſt ſue by bill, and retain an advocate (but all was doubtleſs to delay him) and they, forſooth, of courteſy aſſigned him one to frame his ſupplication for him, and other ſuch bills of petition as he had to exhibit into their holy court, demanding for each bill eight rials, albeit they ſtood him in no more ſtead than if he had put up none at all. And for the ſpace of three or four months this fellow miſſed not twice a day attending every morning and afternoon at the inquiſitor's palace, ſuing unto them upon his knees for his diſpatch, but eſpecially to the biſhop of Tarracon, who was at that very time chief in the inquiſition at Sevil, that he of his abſolute authority would command reſtitution to be made thereof, but the booty was ſo good and ſo great, that it was very hard to come by it again.

At length, after he had ſpent four whole months in ſuits and requeſts, and all to no purpoſe, he received this anſwer from them, That he muſt ſhew better evidence, and bring more ſufficient certificates out of England for proof of this matter, than thoſe which he had already preſented to the court. Whereupon the party forthwith poſted to London, and with all ſpeed returned to Sevil again with more ample and large letters teſtimonial, and certificates, according to their requeſts, and exhibited them to the court. Notwithſtanding the inquiſitors ſtill ſhifted him off, excuſing themſelves by lack of leiſure, and for that they were occupied in more weighty affairs, and with ſuch anſwers put him off for four months after.

At laſt, when the party had well nigh ſpent all his money, and therefore ſued the more earneſtly for his diſpatch, they referred the matter wholly to the biſhop. Of whom, when he repaired unto him, he made this anſwer, That for himſelf, he knew what he had to do; howbeit he was but one man, and the determination appertained to the other commiſſioners as well as unto him: and thus by poſting and paſſing it from one to another, the party could obtain no end of his ſuit. Yet for his importunity ſake, they were reſolved to diſpatch him; it was on this ſort: one of the inquiſitors, called Gaſco, a man very well experienced in theſe practices, willed the party to reſort unto him after dinner. The fellow being glad to hear this news, and ſuppoſing that his goods ſhould be reſtored unto him, and that he was called in for that purpoſe to talk with the other that was in priſon, to confer with him about their accounts, rather through a little miſunderſtanding, hearing the inquiſitors caſt out a word, that it ſhould be needful for him to talk with the priſoner, and being thereupon more than half perſuaded, that at length they meant good faith, did ſo, and repaired thither about the evening. Immediately upon his coming, the goaler was forthwith charged with him, to ſhut him up cloſe in ſuch a priſon where they appointed him.

The party hoping at the firſt that he had been called for about ſome other matter, and ſeeing himſelf contrary to his expectation caſt into a dark dungeon, perceived at length that the world went with him far otherwiſe than he ſuppoſed it would have done. But within two or three days after he was brought forth into the court, where he began to demand his goods: and becauſe it was a device that well ſerved their turn, without any more circumſtance they bade him ſay his Ave Maria: "Ave Maria gratia plena, Dominus tecum, benedicta tu in mulieribus, & benedictus fructus ventris tui Jeſus, Amen."

The ſame was written word by word as he ſpake it, and without any more talk of claiming his goods, becauſe it was needleſs, they commanded him to priſon again, and entered an action againſt him as an heretic, foraſmuch as he did not ſay his Ave Maria after the Romiſh manner, but ended it very ſuſpiciouſly; for he ſhould have added moreover; "Sancta Maria mater Dei

Dei, ora pro nobis peccatoribus;" by abbreviating whereof it was evident enough, ſaid they, that he did not allow the mediation of ſaints.

Thus they picked a quarrel to detain him in priſon a longer ſeaſon, and afterwards brought him forth upon their ſtage diſguiſed after their manner: where ſentence was given, that he ſhould loſe all the goods which he ſued for; though they were not his own, and beſides this ſuffer a year's impriſonment.

A Treatiſe concerning thoſe that were ſcourged by the Papiſts for the Cauſe of the Goſpel.

AFTER the bloody ſlaughter of God's ſaints and ſervants thus ended and diſcuſſed, let us now proceed (by God's aſſiſtance) to treat of ſuch as for the ſame cauſe of religion have been, though not yet put to death, yet whipped and ſcourged by the enemies of God's word, firſt beginning with Richard Wilmot, and Thomas Fairfax, who about the time of Anne Aſkew, were miſerably rent and tormented with ſcourges and ſtripes, for their faithful ſtanding to Chriſt, and his truth, as by the ſtory and examination of them both may appear.

The Scourging of Richard Wilmot and Thomas Fairfax.

AFTER the firſt recantation of Dr. Crome for his ſermon which he made the fifth Sunday in Lent at St. Thomas Acres, being the Mercer's chapel; his ſermon was on the epiſtle of the ſame day, written in the tenth chapter to the Hebrews: wherein he very learnedly proved by the ſame place of ſcripture and others, that Chriſt was the only and ſufficient ſacrifice unto God the Father for the ſins of the whole world, and that there was no more ſacrifice to be offered for ſin by the prieſts, foraſmuch as Chriſt hath offered his body on the croſs, and ſhed his blood for the ſins of the people, and that once for all. For which ſermon he was apprehended by Bonner, and brought before S. Gardiner, and others of the council, where he promiſed to recant his doctrine at Paul's Croſs the ſecond Sunday after Eaſter. And accordingly he was there, and preached, Bonner, with all his doctors, ſitting before him: but he ſo preached and handled his matter, that he rather verified his former ſaying, than denied any part of that which he before had preached. For which the proteſtants praiſed God, and heartily rejoiced. Biſhop Bonner and his champions were not at all pleaſed therewith, but yet notwithſtanding they took him home with them, and was ſo handled among the wolfiſh generation, that they made him come to the croſs again the next Sunday. And becauſe the magiſtrates ſhould now hear him, and be witneſs of this recantation which was moſt blaſphemous, to deny Chriſt's ſacrifice to be ſufficient for penitent ſinners, and to ſay that the ſacrifice of the maſs was good, godly, and an holy ſacrifice, propitiatory and available both for the quick and the dead: becauſe, I ſay, that they would have the nobles to hear this blaſphemous doctrine, the viperous generation procured all the chief of the council to be there preſent.

Now to come to our matter; at this time the ſame week, between the firſt ſermon and the laſt, and while Dr. Crome was in durance, one Richard Wilmot being an apprentice in Bow-lane, of the age of eighteen years, and ſitting at work in his maſter's ſhop, in the month of July, one Lewis, a Welchman, being one of the guard, came into the ſhop, having things to do for himſelf. One aſked him what news at the court? and he anſwered, that the old heretic Dr. Crome had recanted now indeed before the council, and that he ſhould on Sunday next be at Paul's Croſs again, and then declare it. Then Wilmot, ſitting at his maſter's work, and hearing him ſpeak theſe words, and rejoicing in the ſame, began to ſpeak unto him, ſaying, that he was ſorry to hear this news: for, ſaid he, if Crome ſhould ſay otherwiſe than he hath ſaid, then is he contrary to the truth of God's word, and contrary to his own conſcience, which ſhall before God accuſe him.

Lewis anſwered and ſaid, that he had preached and taught hereſy; and therefore it was meet that he ſhould in ſuch a place revoke it.

Wilmot told him that he would not ſo ſay, neither did he hear him preach any doctrine contrary to God's written word, but that he proved his doctrine, and that ſufficiently, by the ſcriptures.

Lewis then aſked him how he knew that?

Wilmot anſwered, by the ſcriptures of God, wherein he ſhall find God's will and pleaſure, what he willeth all men to do, and what not to do; and alſo by them he ſhould prove and try all doctrines, and the falſe doctrine from the true.

Lewis ſaid, it was never well ſince the Bible was tranſlated into Engliſh: and that he was both an heretic and a traitor that cauſed it to be tranſlated into Engliſh (meaning Cromwel) and therefore was rewarded according to his deſerts.

Wilmot anſwered again, what his deſerts and offences were to his prince a great many do not know, neither is it of any force whether they do or no; once, he was ſure that he loſt his life for offending his prince, and the law did put it in execution; adding moreover, concerning that man, that he thought it pleaſed God to raiſe him from a low eſtate, and to place him in high authority, partly unto this, that he ſhould do that which all the biſhops in the realm yet never did, in reſtoring again God's holy word, which being hid long before from the people in a ſtrange tongue, and now coming abroad among us, will bring our biſhops and prieſts, ſaid he, in leſs eſtimation among the people.

Lewis aſked, why ſo?

Wilmot ſaid, becauſe their living and doctrine is not agreeable to his word.

Then ſaid Lewis, I never heard but that all men ſhould learn of the biſhops and prieſts, becauſe they are learned men, and have been brought up in learning all the days of their lives. Wherefore they muſt needs know the truth, and our fathers did believe their doctrine and learning, and I think they did well, for the world was far better then than it is now.

Wilmot anſwered, I will not ſay ſo: For we muſt not believe them becauſe they are biſhops, neither becauſe they be learned, neither becauſe our forefathers did follow their doctrine. For I have read in God's book, how that biſhops and learned men have taught the people falſe doctrine, and likewiſe the prieſts from time to time, and indeed thoſe people our forefathers believed as they taught, and as they thought, ſo thought the people. But for all this, Chriſt calleth them falſe prophets, thieves, and murderers, blind leaders of the blind, willing the people to take heed of them, leſt they ſhould both fall into the ditch.

Moreover we read, that the biſhops, prieſts, and learned men, have been commonly reſiſters of the truth from time to time, and have always perſecuted the prophets in the old laws as their ſucceſſors did perſecute our Saviour Chriſt and his diſciples in the new law. We muſt take heed therefore that we credit them no further than God will will have us, neither follow them nor our forefathers otherwiſe than he commandeth us. For Almighty God hath given to all people, as well to kings and princes, as biſhops, prieſts, learned and unlearned men, a commandment and law, unto which he willeth all men to be obedient. Therefore if any biſhop or prieſt preach or teach, or prince or magiſtrate command any thing contrary to his commandment, we muſt take heed how we obey them. For it is better for us to obey God than man.

Marry, Sir, quoth Lewis, you are an holy doctor indeed. By God's blood, if you were my man, I would ſet you about your buſineſs a little better, and not ſuffer you to look upon books, and ſo would your maſter if he were wiſe. And with that in came his maſter, and a young man with him, who was a ſervant to Mr. Daubney in Watling-ſtreet.

His maſter asked him what the matter was.

Lewis ſaid, that he had a knaviſh boy here to his ſervant, and how that if he were his, he would rather hang him than keep him in his houſe.

Then his maſter being ſomewhat moved, asked his fellows what the matter was.

They ſaid, they began to talk about Dr. Crome.

Then his maſter aſked what he had ſaid, ſwearing a great oath, that he would make him to tell him.

He ſaid, that he truſted he had ſaid nothing, wherewith either he or Mr. Lewis might juſtly be offended. I pray, quoth Wilmot, ask him what I ſaid.

Marry, ſaid Lewis, this he ſaid, That Dr. Crome did preach and teach nothing but the truth, and how that if he recanted on Sunday next, he ſhould be ſorry to hear it, and that if he do, he is made to do it againſt his conſcience. And more he ſaith, that we muſt not follow our biſhops' doctrine and preaching: for, ſaith he, they be hinderers of God's word, and perſecutors of that; and how Cromwel (that traitor) did more good in ſetting forth the Bible, than all our biſhops have done theſe hundred years: Thus reporting the matter worſe than it really was.

His maſter hearing this, was in a great fury, and rated him, ſaying, that either he would be hanged or burned, ſwearing that he would take away all his books and burn them.

The young man (Mr. Daubney's ſervant) ſtanding by hearing this, began to ſpeak on his part unto Lewis; and his talk confirmed all the ſayings of the other to be true.

This young man was learned, his name was Thomas Fairfax. Lewis hearing this man's talk as well as the other's, went his way in a rage to the court.

On the morrow they heard news, that the ſaid Wilmot and Fairfax were ſent for to come to the lord mayor. The meſſenger was Mr. Smart the ſword-bearer of London. They came before dinner to the mayor's houſe, and were commanded to ſit down at dinner in the hall; and when dinner was done, they were both called into a parlour, where the mayor and Sir Roger Cholmley was, who examined them ſeverally, the one not hearing the other.

The effect of their talk was this; Sir Roger Cholmley ſaid to Wilmot, that my lord mayor and he had received a commandment from the council, to ſend for him and his company, and to examine them of certain things which were laid to their charge.

Then ſaid Mr. Cholmley to him, Sirrah, what countryman art thou? He anſwered, that he was born in Cambridgeſhire, and in ſuch a town. Then he asked him, how long he had been in the city. He told him.

Then he asked what learning he had, He ſaid, little learning and ſmall knowledge. Then, deridingly, he asked how long he had known Dr. Crome. He ſaid, about two years. Then he called him a lying boy, and ſaid (the ſaid Wilmot) was his ſon.

The other ſaid unto him, that was unlike, for that he never ſaw his mother, nor ſhe him. Cholmley ſaid he lyed. Wilmot ſaid he could prove it to be true. Then he asked him how he liked his ſermon that he made at St. Thomas Acres chapel in Lent. He ſaid that indeed he heard him not. He ſaid, Yes, and the other, Nay. Then ſaid he, What ſay you to his ſermon made at the Croſs the laſt day, heard you not that?

Wilmot. Yes, in that ſermon he deceived a great number of people.

Cholmley. How ſo?

Wilmot. For that they looked that he ſhould have recanted his doctrine that he taught before, and did not, but rather confirmed it.

Cholmley. Yea, Sir, but how ſay you now to him? for he hath recanted before the council; and hath promiſed on Sunday next to be at the Croſs again: how think ye in that?

Wilmot. If he ſo did, I am the more ſorry to hear it; and ſaid, he thought he did it for fear and ſafeguard of his life.

Cholmley. But what ſay you? was his firſt ſermon hereſy or not?

Wilmot. No, I ſuppoſe it was no hereſy. For if it were, St. Paul's epiſtle to the Hebrews was hereſy, and Paul an heretic that preached ſuch doctrine; but God forbid that any chriſtian man ſhould ſo think of the holy apoſtle; neither do I ſo think.

Cholmley. Why, how knoweſt thou that St. Paul wrote thoſe things that are in Engliſh now, to be true, whereas Paul never wrote Engliſh or Latin?

Wilmot. I am certified that learned men of God, that did ſeek to advance his word, did tranſlate the ſame out of the Greek and Hebrew into Latin and Engliſh, and that they durſt not preſume to alter the ſenſe of the ſcripture of God, and laſt will and teſtament of Chriſt Jeſus.

Then the lord mayor, being in a great fury, asked him what he had to do to read ſuch books, and ſaid, that it was pity that his maſter did ſuffer him ſo to do, and that he was not ſet better to work; and in fine ſaid unto him, that he had ſpoken evil of my lord of Wincheſter and biſhop Bonner, thoſe reverend and learned fathers and counſellors of this realm, for which his fact he ſaw no other but he muſt ſuffer, as was due to the ſame. And Mr. Cholmley ſaid, Yea, my lord, there are ſuch a ſort of heretics and traitorly knaves taken now in Eſſex by my lord Rich, that it is too wonderful to hear. They ſhall be ſent to the biſhop ſhortly, and ſhall be hanged and burned all.

Wilmot. I am ſorry to hear that of my lord Rich, for that he was my godfather, and gave me my name at my baptiſm.

Cholmley asked him when he ſpake with him. He ſaid, not theſe twelve years.

Cholmley. If he knew that you were ſuch a one, he would do the like by you, and in ſo doing he ſhould do God great ſervice.

Wilmot. I have read the ſame ſaying in the goſpel, that Chriſt ſaid to his diſciples, "The time ſhall come, ſaith he, that whoſoever killeth you, ſhall think that he ſhall do God good ſervice."

Well, Sir, ſaid Cholmley, becauſe you are ſo full of your ſcripture, and ſo well learned, we conſider you lack a quiet place to ſtudy in. Therefore you ſhall go to a place where you ſhall be moſt quiet, and I would wiſh you to ſtudy how you will anſwer to the council of thoſe things which they have to charge you with, for elſe it is like to coſt you your beſt joint. I know my lord of Wincheſter will handle you well enough, when he heareth thus much. Then was the officer called in to have him to the Compter in the Poultry, and the other to the other Compter, not one of them to ſee another; and thus they remained eight days. In which time their maſters made great ſuit to the lord mayor, and to Sir Roger Roger Cholmley, to know their offences, and that they might be delivered.

At length they procured the wardens of the company of Drapers to labour with them in their ſuit to the mayor. The mayor went with them to the council: but at that time they could find no grace at Wincheſter's hand, and Sir Anthony Browne's, but that they had deſerved death, and that they ſhould have the law.

At length, through much intreaty, he granted them this favour, that they ſhould not die as they had deſerved, but ſhould be tied to a cart's tail, and be whipped three market days through the city. Thus they came home that day, and went another day, and the maſter and wardens of the company petitioned on their knees to have this open puniſhment releaſed, forſomuch as they were ſervants of ſo worſhipful a company, and that they might be puniſhed in their own hall before the wardens and certain of the company, which at length was granted.

The next day they appeared before the maſters in the hall, their own maſters being preſent, where they were charged with hereſy and treaſon, for which, they were told, they deſerved death, and this was declared with a long proceſs by Mr. Brookes the maſter of the company, declaring what great labour and ſuit the mayor and wardens had made for them, to ſave them from death, which they (as he ſaid) had deſerved, and from open ſhame, which they ſhould have had, being judged by the council to have been whipped three days through the city at a cart's tail, and from theſe two dangers had they laboured to deliver them, but not without great trouble and charge. For (ſaid he) the company hath promiſed to the council for this their mercy towards them, an hundred pounds, notwithſtanding we muſt ſee them puniſhed in our hall within ourſelves for thoſe their offences. After theſe and many other words, he commanded them to prepare themſelves to receive their puniſhment.

Then they were put aſunder, and ſtripped from the waſte upward one after another, and had into the midſt of the hall, where they were wont to make their fire, there was a great ring of iron, to which there was a rope tied faſt, and one of their feet tied faſt to that.

Then came down two men diſguiſed in mummers apparel, with viſors on their faces, and they beat them with great rods till the blood flowed out of their bodies. As for Wilmot, he could not lie in his bed for ſix nights after, for Brookes played the tyrant with them; ſo that with the pain and fear, they were never in health afterwards, as the ſaid Wilmot with his own mouth hath credibly informed us, and we can do no leſs than teſtify the ſame.

Thus have we briefly rehearſed this little tragedy, wherein we may note the malice of the enemies at all times to thoſe who profeſs Chriſt, and take his part, of what eſtate or degree ſoever they be, according to the apoſtle's ſaying, "It is given unto you not only to believe, but alſo to ſuffer with him." To whom be honour and glory, Amen.

The Scourging of Thomas Green, Printer, written by his own Hand.

IN the reign of queen Mary, I Thomas Green being brought before Dr. Story by my maſter, whoſe name is John Wayland, a Printer, for a book called Antichriſt, which had been diſtributed to certain honeſt men; he asked me where I had the book, and ſaid I was a traitor. I told him I had the book of a Frenchman. Then he asked me more queſtions, but I told him I could tell him no more. Then he ſaid, it was no hereſy, but treaſon, and that I ſhould be hanged, drawn, and quartered, and ſo he called for Cluny, the keeper of the Lollards-Tower, and bade him ſet me faſt in the ſtocks.

I was not in the Lollards-Tower two hours, but Cluny came and took me out, and carried me to the coal-houſe, and there I found a Frenchman lying in the ſtocks, and he took him out, and put a bolt and a fetter on my right leg, and another on my left hand, and ſo he ſet me croſs fettered in the ſtocks, and took the Frenchman away with him, and there I lay a day and a night. On the morrow after, he came and ſaid, Let us ſhift your hand and your leg, becauſe you ſhall not be lame; and he made as though he pitied me, and ſaid, Tell me the truth and I will be your friend.

And I ſaid, I had told the truth, and could tell no otherwiſe. Then he put only my leg in the ſtocks, and ſo went his way, and there I remained ſix days, and could come to no anſwer.

Then Dr. Story ſent for me, and asked whether I would tell him the truth, where I had the book. I ſaid I had told him, of a Frenchman. He asked me where I came acquainted with the Frenchman, where he dwelt, and where he delivered me the book. I ſaid, I came acquainted with him in Newgate, I coming to my friends which were put in for God's word and truth's ſake, and the Frenchman coming to his friends alſo, there we talked together, and became acquainted one with another, and did eat and drink together there with our friends in the fear of God.

Then Story ſcoffed at me, and ſaid, Then there was, brother in Chriſt, and brother in Chriſt, and reviled me, and called me an heretic, and aſked me, if I had the book of him in Newgate? I ſaid No; and I told him, as I went on my buſineſs in the ſtreet, I met him, and he aſked me how I did, and I him alſo; ſo falling into diſcourſe, he ſhewed me that book, and I deſired him that he would let me have it.

In this examination Story ſaid, it was a great book, and aſked me whether I bought it, or had it given me. I told him I bought it. Then he ſaid, I was a thief, and had ſtolen my maſter's money. And I ſaid, A little money ſerved, for I gave him but four pence, but I promiſed him, that at our next meeting I would give twelve pence more. And he ſaid, that was boldly done, for ſuch a book as ſpake both treaſon and hereſy.

Then Story required me to bring him two ſureties, and watch for him that I had the book of, and I ſhould have no harm. I made him anſwer, I would bring no ſureties, nor could I tell where to find them. Then ſaid he, This is but a lye; and ſo called for Cluny, and bade him lay me faſt in the coal-houſe, ſaying, he would make me tell another tale at my next coming: and ſo I lay in the ſtocks day and night, but only when I eat my meat, and there remained ten days before I was called for again.

Then Doctor Story ſent for me again, and aſked if I would yet tell him the truth; I ſaid, I neither could nor would tell him any other truth than I had done already. And while I was there ſtanding, there were two brought which I took to be priſoners.

Then Mrs Story fell in a rage, and ſware a great oath, that it were a good deed to put a hundred or two of theſe heretic knaves in an houſe, and I myſelf, ſaid ſhe, would ſet in on fire. So I was committed to priſon again, where I remained fourteen days, and came to no anſwer.

Then Story ſent for me again, and called me into the garden, where I found with him my lord of Windſor's chaplain, and two gentlemen more, and he told them all what they had ſaid and done. They ſaid, the book was a wondrous evil book, and had both treaſon and hereſy in it. Then they aſked me what I ſaid of thy book. And I ſaid I knew no evil by it.

At which words Story chafed, and ſaid he would hang me up by the hands with a rope, and ſaid alſo he would cut out my tongue, and my ears alſo from my head.

After this they alledged two or three things more unto me out of the book. And I anſwered, I had not read the book throughout, and therefore I could give no judgment of it.

Then my lord of Windſor's chaplain and the other two gentlemen took me aſide, and intreated me very gently, ſaying, Tell us where you had the book, and of whom, and I will ſave you harmleſs. I made them anſwer, that I had told all I could to Doctor Story, and began to tell it them again: but they ſaid, they knew that already; ſo they left that talk, and went again with me to Story.

Then Story burdened me with my faith, and ſaid I was an heretic. Whereupon the chaplain aſked me how I did believe. Then I began to rehearſe the articles of my belief, but he bade me let that alone. Then he aſked me how I believed in Chriſt? I made him anſwer, that I believed in Chriſt, who died and roſe again the third day, and ſitteth on the right hand of God the Father.

Whereupon Story asked me mockingly, What is the right hand of God? I made him anſwer, I thought it was his glory. Then ſaid he, ſo they ſay all. And he asked me when he would be weary of ſitting there? Then inferred my lord of Windſor's chaplain, asking me what I ſaid of the maſs? I ſaid, I never knew what it was, nor what it meant, for I underſtood it not, becauſe I never learned any Latin, and ſince the time I had any knowledge, I had been brought up in nothing but in reading of Engliſh, and with ſuch men as have taught the ſame; with many more queſtions, which I cannot rehearſe.

Moreover he aſked me, if there were not the very body of Chriſt, fleſh, blood and bone, in the maſs, after the prieſt had conſecrated it. And I made him anſwer; as for the maſs I cannot underſtand it; but in the New Teſtament I read, that as the apoſtles ſtood looking after the Lord when he aſcended up into heaven, an angel ſaid to them, "Even as you ſee him aſcend up, ſo ſhall he come again." And I told them another ſentence, where Chriſt ſaith, "The poor ſhall you have always with you, but me ye ſhall not have always."

Then Mr. Chaplain put many more queſtions to me, to which I made no anſwer. Among others he brought Chryſoſtom and St. Hierome, for his purpoſe. To whom I anſwered, that I neither minded nor was able to anſwer their doctors, neither knew whether they alledged them right, or no; but to that which is written in the New Teſtament I would anſwer. Here they laughed me to ſcorn, and called me fool, and ſaid, they would reaſon no more with me.

Then Doctor Story called for Cluny, and bade him take me away, and ſet me faſt, and let no man ſpeak with me. So was I ſent to the coal-houſe, where I had not been a week, but there came in fourteen priſoners: but I was kept ſtill alone without company, in a priſon, called Salt-houſe, having upon my leg a bolt and a fetter, and my hands manacled together with irons, and there continued ten days, having nothing to lie on, but bare ſtones, or a board.

On a time, whilſt I lay there in priſon, the biſhop of London coming down a pair of ſtairs on the backſide untruſſed, in his hoſe and doublet, looked through the grate, and asked wherefore I was put in, and who put me in.

I made him anſwer, That I was put in for a book called Antichriſt, by Doctor Story. And he ſaid, You are not aſhamed to declare wherefore you were put in, and ſaid it was a very wicked book, and bade me confeſs the truth to Story. I ſaid, I had told the truth to him already, and deſired him to be good unto me, and help me out of priſon, for they had kept me there a long time. And he ſaid, he could not meddle with it; Story had begun it, and he muſt end it.

Then I was removed out of the Salt-houſe, to give place to two women, and carried to the Lollards Tower, and put in the ſtocks; and there I found two priſoners, one called Lion, a Frenchman, and another with him: and ſo I was kept in the ſtocks more than a month both day and night, and no man ſuffered to come to me, or to ſpeak with me, but only my keeper, who brought me meat.

Thus we three being together, Lion the Frenchman ſung a pſalm in the French tongue, and we ſang with him, ſo that we were heard down in the ſtreet, and the keeper coming up in a great rage, ſware that he would put us all in the ſtocks, and ſo took the Frenchman, and commanded him to kneel down upon his knees, and put both his hands in the ſtocks, where he remained all that night till the next day.

After this, I being in Lollards Tower ſeven days, at my laſt being with Story, he ſwore a great oath, that he would rack me, and make me tell the truth. Then Story ſending for me, commanded me to be brought to Wallbroke, where he and the commiſſioners dined; and by the way my keeper told me that I ſhould go to the Tower, and be racked. So when they had dined, Story called for me in, and there I ſtood before them, and ſome ſaid I was worthy to be hanged for having ſuch heretical books. After I had ſtaid a little while before them, Story called for the keeper, and commanded him to carry me to the Lollards Tower again, and ſaid, he had other matters of the queen's to do with the commiſſioners, but he would find another time for me. While I lay yet in the Lollards Tower, the woman which brought the books over, being taken, and her books, was put in the Clink in Southwark by Huſſey, one of the arches; and I Thomas Green do teſtify before God now, that I never diſcovered the man nor the woman of whom I had the books.

Then I lying in the Lollards Tower, being ſent for before Mr. Huſſey, he required of me, wherefore I was put into the Lollards Tower, and by whom. To whom I made anſwer, that I was put there by Dr. Story for a book called Antichriſt. Then he made as though he would be my friend, and ſaid he knew my friends, and my father and mother, and bade me tell him of whom I had the book, and ſaid, Come on, tell me the truth. I told him as I had told Dr. Story before.

Then he was very angry, and ſaid, I love thee well, and therefore I ſent for thee, and looked for a further truth; but I could tell him no other; whereupon he ſent me again to the Lollards Tower. At my going away he called me back again, and ſaid, that Dixon gave me the books, being an old man, dwelling in Birchin-lane; and I ſaid he knew the matter better than I. So he ſent me away to the Lollards Tower, where I remained ſeven days and more.

Then Mr. Huſſey ſent for me again, and required of me to tell him the truth. I told him I could tell him no other truth than I had told Dr. Story before.

Then he began to tell me of Dixon, of whom, he ſaid, I had the books, who had made the matter manifeſt before; and he told me of all things touching Dixon, and the books, more than I could myſelf, inſomuch, that he told me how many I had, and that he had a ſack full of the books in his houſe, and knew where the woman lay, better than myſelf. Then I ſaw the matter ſo open and manifeſt before my face, that it ſignified nothing for me to ſtand in it. He aſked me where I had done the books, and I told him I had but one, and that Dr. Story had. He ſaid I lyed, for I had three at one time, and he required me to tell him of one.

Then I told him of one that John Beane had of me, being 'prentice with Mr. Tottle. So he promiſed me before and after, and as he ſhould be ſaved before God, that he ſhould have no harm. And I kneeling down upon my knees, deſired him to take my blood, and not to hurt the young man. Then he ſaid, becauſe you have been ſo ſtubborn, the matter being made manifeſt by others, and not by you, being ſo long in priſon, tell me if you will ſtand to my judgment. I ſaid, yea, take my blood, and hurt not the young man.

Then he told me I ſhould be whipped like a thief and a vagabond; and ſo I thanked him, and went my way with my keeper to the Lollards Tower, where I remained two or three days, and ſo was brought by the keeper Cluny, by the commandment of the commiſſioners, to Chriſt's Hoſpital, ſometime the Grey Friars, and accordingly had there for that time the correction of thieves and vagabonds, and ſo was delivered to Trinian, the porter, and put into a ſtinking dungeon.

And after a few days, I finding friendſhip, was let out of the dungeon, and lay in a bed in the night, and walked in a yard by the dungeon in the day-time, and ſo remained priſoner a month and more.

At length Dr. Story came, and two gentlemen with him, and called for me, and I was brought before them. Then he ſaid to the gentlemen, Here cometh this heretic, of whom I had the book called Antichriſt, and began to tell them how many times I had been before him, and ſaid, I have intreated him very gently, and he would never tell me the truth till it was found out by others. Then ſaid he, It were a good deed to cut out thy tongue, and thy ears off thy head, to make thee an example to all other heretic knaves. And the gentlemen ſaid, Nay, tnat were pity. Then he aſked, if I would not become an honeſt man: and I ſaid, Yes, for I hrve offended God many ways. Whereupon he burdened me with my faith; I told him that I had made him anſwer of my faith before my lord Windſor's chaplain as much as I could.

So in the end he commanded me to be ſtripped, he ſtanding by me, and called for two of the beadles and the whips to whip me; and the two beadles came with a cord, and bound my hands together, and the one end of the cord to a ſtone pillar. Then one of my friends, called Nicholas Prieſtman, hearing them call for whips, hurled in a bundle of rods, which ſeemed ſomething to pacify the mihd of his cruelty; and they ſcourged me with rods. But as they were whipping of me, Story aſked me if I would go unto my maſter again, and I ſay nay. And he ſaid, I perceive now he will be worſe than ever he was before: but let me alone, quoth he, I will find him out, if he be in England. And ſo with many other things which I cannot rehearſe, when they had done whipping of me, they bade me pay my fees, and go my ways.

Dr. Story commanded that he ſhould have an hundred ſtripes, but the gentlemen ſo intreated, that he had not ſo many, Story ſaying, If I might have my will, I would ſurely cut out his tongue.

The Copy of Stephen Cotten's Letter, written to his Brother, declaring how he was beaten twice by Biſhop Bonner, before he was burnt at Bradford.

BRother, in the name of the Lord Jeſus, I commend me unto you, and I do heartily thank you, for your godly exhortation and counſel in your laſt letter declared to me. And albeit I do perceive by your letter you are informed, that as we are divers perſons in number, ſo we are of contrary ſects, conditions, and opinions, contrary to the good opinion you had of us at your laſt being with us in Newgate; be you moſt aſſured, good brother, in the Lord Jeſus, we are all of one mind, one faith, one aſſured hope in the Lord Jeſus, whom I truſt we altogether with one ſpirit, one brotherly love, do daily call upon for mercy and forgiveneſs of our ſins, with earneſt repentance of our former lives, and by whoſe precious bloodſhedding we truſt to be ſaved only, and by no other means. Wherefore, good brother, in the name of the Lord, ſeeing theſe impudent people, whoſe minds are altogether bent to wickedneſs, envy, uncharitableneſs, evil-ſpeaking, do go about to ſlander us with untruth, believe them not, neither let their wicked ſayings once enter into your mind. And I truſt one day to ſee you again, although now I am in God's priſon; which is a joyful ſchool to them that love their Lord God, and to me being a ſimple ſcholar moſt joyful of all.

Good brother, once again I do in the name of the Lord Jeſus, exhort you to pray for me, that I may fight ſtrongly in the Lord's battle, to be a good ſoldier to my captain Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, and deſire my ſiſter alſo to do the ſame, and do not ye mourn or lament for me, but be ye glad and joyful of this my trouble: For I truſt to be looſed out of this dungeon ſhortly, and to go to everlaſting joy, which never ſhall have end. I heard how ye were with the commiſſioners. I pray you ſue no more for me, good brother. But one thing I ſhall deſire of you, to be at my departing out of this life, that you may bear witneſs with me that I ſhall die, I truſt in God, a true chriſtian, and, I hope, all my companions in the Lord our God: and therefore believe not theſe evil diſpoſed people, who are the authors of all untruths.

I pray you provide me a long ſhirt againſt the day of our deliverance; for the ſhirt you gave me laſt, I have given to one of my companions, who had more need than I; and as for the money and meat you ſent for us, the biſhop's ſervants delivered none to us, neither he whom you had ſo great a truſt in. Brother, there is none of them to truſt to, for qualis magiſter, talis ſervus. I have been twice beaten, and threatened to be beaten again by the biſhop himſelf. I ſuppoſe we ſhall go into the country to Fulham, to the biſhop's houſe, and there be arraigned. I would have you to hearken as much as you can. For when we ſhall go, it ſhall be ſuddenly done. Thus fare you well. From the coal-houſe, this preſent Friday.

Your brother, Stephen Cotten.

The Scourging of James Harris.

IN this ſociety of the ſcourged profeſſors of Chriſt, was alſo one James Harris, of Billerica, in Eſſex, a ſtripling of the age of ſeventeen years; who being apprehended, and ſent up to Bonner, in the company of Margaret Ellis, by Sir John Mordaunt, Knight, and Edmund Tyrrel, juſtices of peace (as appeareth by their own letters before-mentioned) was by Bonner divers times ſtrictly examined. In which examinations he was charged not to have come to his pariſh church for the ſpace of one year or more. Whereunto he granted, confeſſing therewithal, that once, for fear, he had been at the church, and there had received the popiſh ſacrament of the altar, for which he was heartily ſorry, deteſting the ſame with all his heart.

After this and ſuch like anſwers, Bonner (the better to try him) perſuaded him to go to confeſſion. The lad, ſomewhat to fulfil his requeſt, conſented to go, and did. But when he came to the prieſt, he ſtood ſtill, and ſaid nothing. Why, quoth the prieſt, ſayeſt thou nothing? What ſhall I ſay, ſaid Harris? Thou muſt confeſs thy ſins, ſaid the prieſt. My ſins, ſaid he, be ſo many, that they cannot be numbered. With that the prieſt told Bonner what he had ſaid, and he of his accuſtomed devotion, took the poor lad into his garden, and there, with a rod gathered out of a cherry-tree, did moſt cruelly whip him.

The Scourging of Robert Williams, a Smith.

RObert Williams, who being apprehended in the ſame company, was ſo tormented after the like manner with with rods in his arbour, who there ſubſcribing and yielding himſelf by promiſe to obey the laws, after being let go, refuſed ſo to do: whereupon he was earneſtly ſought for, but could not be found, for that he kept himſelf cloſe, and went not abroad but by ſtealth: and now in the mean time of this perſecution, this Robert Williams departed this life, and ſo eſcaped the hands of his enemies. The Lord therefore be honoured for ever, Amen.

And foraſmuch as I have begun to write of Bonner's ſcourging, by the occaſion thereof cometh to mind to infer by the way his beating of other boys and children, and drawing them naked through the nettles, in his journey rowing towards Fulham. The ſtory, though it touch no matter of religion, yet becauſe it toucheth ſomething the nature and diſpoſition of that man, and may refreſh the reader, wearied percaſe with other doleful ſtories, I thought not to omit.

Bonner paſſing from London to Fulham by water, having John Willes and Thomas Hinſhaw above-mentioned with him, both priſoners for religion, by the way as he went, was ſaying even-ſong with Harpsfield, his chaplain, in the barge, and being about the middle of their devout oriſons, they eſpied ſome young boys, ſwimming and waſhing themſelves in the Thames, overagainſt Lambeth, or a little above: unto whom he went, and gave very gentle language and fair ſpeech, until he had ſet his men on land. That done, his men ran after the boys, to get them, as the biſhop commanded them before, beating ſome with nettles, drawing ſome through buſhes of nettles naked, and ſome they made to leap into the Thames to ſave themſelves, that it was marvel they were not drowned.

Now as the children for fear did cry, and as this ſkirmiſhing was between them, immediately came a greater lad thither, to know what the matter meant that the boys made ſuch a noiſe. Whom when the biſhop eſpied, he aſked him whether he would maintain them in their doings or no. Unto whom the young fellow made anſwer ſtoutly, Yea. Then the biſhop commanded him to be taken alſo; but he ran away with ſpeed, and there avoided the biſhop's bleſſing. Now when the biſhop ſaw him run away, and another man ſitting upon a rail in the way where he ran, he willed him likewiſe to ſtop the boy: and becauſe he would not, he commanded his men to fetch that man to him alſo; but he hearing that, ran away as faſt as he could, and by leaping over the ditch, eſcaped the biſhop in like manner.

Then the biſhop, ſeeing the ſucceſs of his battle to prove no better, cried to a couple of ferry boys to run and hold him that laſt ran away. And becauſe they ſaid they could not (as indeed it was true) therefore he cauſed his men to take and beat them. The boys hearing that, leapt into the water to ſave themſelves; notwithſtanding they were caught, and in the water by the biſhop's men held and beat.

Now, after the end of this great skirmiſh, the biſhop's men returned to their maſter again into the barge, and he and Harpsfield, his chaplain, went to their even-ſong afreſh where they left, and ſo forſooth the reſt of their ſervice, as clean without malice, as an egg without meat. The Lord give him repentance (if it be his will) and grace to become a new man, Amen.

The Whipping of a Beggar at Saliſbury.

UNTO theſe above ſpecified is alſo to be added the miſerable whipping of a poor ſtarved beggar, who, becauſe he would not receive the ſacrament at Eaſter in the town of Colingborow, was brought to Saliſbury with bills and glieves to the chancellor Doctor Geffery, who caſt him into the dungeon, and after cauſed him miſerably to be whipped by two catchpoles. The ſight whereof made all godly hearts to rue it, to ſee ſuch tyranny to be ſhewed upon ſuch a ſimple and ſilly wretch: for they that ſaw him have reported, that they never ſaw a more ſimple creature. But what pity can move the hearts of mercileſs papiſts.

Beſides theſe above-named, divers others alſo ſuffered the like ſcourgings and whippings in their bodies for their faithful ſtanding in the truth. Of whom it may be ſaid, as it is written of the apoſtles in the acts: "Which departed from the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to ſuffer for the name of Jeſus."

Another Treatiſe of ſuch as being purſued in Queen Mary's Time, were in great Danger, and yet through the good Providence of God, mercifully were preſerved.

ALthough the ſecret purpoſe of Almighty God, which diſpoſeth all things, ſuffered a great number of his faithful ſervants, both men and women, and that of all ages and degrees, to fall into the enemies hands, and to abide the brunt of this perſecution, to be tried with rods, with whips, with racks, with fetters, famine, with burning of hands, plucking off beards, with burning alſo both hand, beard, body, &c.

Yet notwithſtanding ſome there were again, and that a great number, who miraculouſly by the merciful providence of God, againſt all mens expectation, in ſafety were delivered out of the fiery rage of this perſecution, either by quitting the realm, or ſhifting of place, or the Lord ſo blinding the eyes of the perſecutors, or diſpoſing the opportunity of time, or working ſome ſuch means or other for his ſervants, as not only ought to ſtir them up to perpetual thanks, but alſo may move all men both to behold and magnify the wondrous works of the Almighty.

About what time it began to be known that queen Mary was ſick, divers good men were in hold in divers quarters of the realm; ſome at Bury, ſome at Saliſbury, as John Hunt and Richard White, of whom we have ſtoried before, and ſome at London, amongſt whom was William Living, with his wife, and John Lithal, of whom ſomething remaineth now compendiouſly to be touched.

The Perſecution and Deliverance of William Living, with his Wife, and of John Lithal, Miniſters.

ABOUT the latter end of queen Mary's reign, ſhe then being ſick, came one Cox, a promoter, to the houſe of William Living, about ſix of the clock, accompanied with one John Launce of the Greyhound. They being not ready, they demanded for buttons, ſaying, they ſhould be as well paid for them as any; and he would come about three hours after for them again.

In the mean time he procured one Mr. Dean the conſtable, and George Hancock the beadle of that ward, and ſearching his books, found a book of aſtronomy, called the work of Joannes de Sacro Boſco de Sphæra, with figures, ſome round, ſome triangle, ſome quadrangle, &c. which book, becauſe it was gilt, ſeemed to him the chief book there, and that he carried open in the ſtreet, ſaying, I have found him at length. It is no wonder the queen be ſick, ſeeing there be ſome conjurers in privy corners; but now I truſt he ſhall conjure no more, and ſo brought him and his wife from Shoe-lane, through Fleet-ſtreet, into Paul's church-yard, with the conſtable, the beadle, and two others following them, till they entered into Darbiſhire's houſe, who was biſhop Bonner's chancellor: and after the conſtable and they had talked with Darbiſhire, he came forth, and walked in his yard, and ſaid to him,

What is your name?

Living. William Living.

Darbiſhire. What are you? a prieſt?

Living. Yea.

Darbiſhire. Is this your wife that is come with you?

Living. That ſhe is.

Darbiſhire. Where were you made prieſt?

Living. At Obourne.

Darbiſhire. In what biſhop's days?

Living. By the biſhop of Lincoln, that was king Henry's ghoſtly father in cardinal Wolſey's time.

Darbiſhire. You are a ſchiſmatic and a traitor.

Living. I would be ſorry that were true. I am certain I was never a traitor, but always have taught obedience according to the tenor of God's word; and when tumults and ſchiſms have been ſtirred, I have preached God's word, and aſſuaged them in the time of king Edward.

Darbiſhire. What, you are a ſchiſmatic. You be not in the unity of the catholic church: for you pray not as the church of Rome doth: you pray in Engliſh.

Living. We are certain we be in the true church.

Darbiſhire. There be that doubt thereof, forſomuch as there is but one true church. Well, you will learn againſt I talk with you again, to know the church of Rome, and to be a member thereof.

Living. If the church of Rome be of that church whereof Chriſt is the head, then I am a member thereof, for I know no other church but that.

Darbiſhire. Well, Cluny, take him with thee to the Coal-houſe.

Then he called Cluny again, and ſpake ſecretly to him, but what he ſaid, I know not.

Then ſaid Cluny, Wilt thou not come? And ſo plucked me away violently, and brought me to his own houſe in Pater-noſter-row, where he robbed me of my purſe, my girdle, and my pſalter, and a New Teſtament of Geneva, and then brought me to the Coal-houſe to put me in the ſtocks, ſaying, put in your legs and your hands, and except you fine with me, I will put a collar about your neck. What is the fine, quoth I? Forty ſhillings, quoth he. I am never able to pay it, ſaid I.

Then, ſaid he, you have friends that be able. I denied it: and ſo he put both my legs into the ſtocks till ſupper time, which was ſix of the clock, and then a couſin of my wife brought me meat, who ſeeing me to ſit there, ſaid, I will give you forty pence, and let him go at liberty; and he took her money, and preſently let me go forth in her ſight, to eat my ſupper. And at ſeven of the clock, he put me in the ſtocks again, and ſo I remained till two of the clock the next day, and ſo he let me forth till night. This woman above-mentioned was Griffin's firſt wife, a brother dwelling then in Aldermanbury, and yet alive in Cheapſide.

The Thurſday following in the afternoon was I called to the Lollards Tower, and there put into the ſtocks, having the honour to put my leg in the hole that Mr. John Philpot's leg was in, and ſo lay all that night, nobody coming to me either with meat or drink.

At eleven of the clock on the Friday, Cluny came to me with meat, and let me forth, and about one of the clock he brought me to Darbiſhire's houſe, who drew forth a ſcroll of names, and aſked me if I knew none of them? I ſaid, I knew none of them but Foſter. And ſo I kneeled down upon my knees, and prayed him that he would not enquire thereof any further. And with that came forth two godly women, who ſaid, Mr. Darbiſhire, it is enough, and ſo became ſureties for me, and paid to Cluny fifteen ſhillings for my fees, and bad me go with them.

And thus much concerning William Living. After this came his wife to examination, whoſe anſwers to Darbiſhire the chancellor, here likewiſe follow.

The Examination of Julian Living, Wife to William Living.

Darbiſhire. AH, ſirrah; I ſee by your going you be one of the ſiſters.

Julian. I wear not my gown for ſiſterhood, neither for nunnery, but to keep me warm.

Darbiſhire. Nun? no, I dare ſay you be none. Is that man your huſband?

Julian. Yea.

Darbiſhire. He is a prieſt.

Julian. No, he ſaith no maſs.

Darbiſhire. What then? he is a prieſt. How dareſt thou to marry him?

Then he ſhewed me a roll of certain names of citizens.

To whom I anſwered, I knew none of them.

Then, ſaid he, you ſhall be made to know them.

Then, ſaid I, do no other than juſtice and right; for the day will come, that thou ſhalt anſwer for it.

Darbiſhire. Why, woman, thinkeſt thou not that I have a ſoul?

Julian. Yes, I know you have a ſoul; but whether it be to ſalvation or damnation, I cannot tell.

Darbiſhire. Ho Cluny, have her to the Lollards Tower. And ſo he took me, and carried me to his houſe, where was one Dale, a promoter, which ſaid to me, Alas, good woman, wherefore be you here?

What is that to you? ſaid I.

You be not aſhamed, quoth Dale, to tell me wherefore you come hither?

No, quoth I, that I am not; for it is for Chriſt's Teſtament.

Chriſt's Teſtament? quoth he: it is the devil's Teſtament.

O Lord, quoth I, God forbid that any man ſhould ſpeak any ſuch word.

Well, well, quoth he, you ſhall be ordered well enough. You care not for burning, quoth he. God's blood, there muſt be ſome other means found for you.

What, quoth I, will you find any worſe than you have found?

Well, quoth he, you hope, and you hope; but your hope ſhall be ſlope. For though the queen fail, ſhe that you hope for ſhall never come at it; for there is my lord cardinal's grace, and many more between her and it.

Then, quoth I, my hope is in none but God.

Then ſaid Cluny, Come with me; and ſo I went to the Lollards Tower. On the next day Darbiſhire ſent for me again, and enquired of thoſe citizens that he enquired of before.

I anſwered, I knew them not.

Where were you, quoth he, at the communion on Sunday was fortnight?

And I ſaid, in no place.

Then the conſtable of Saint Bride's being there, made ſuit for me.

And Darbiſhire demanded of him, if he would be bound for me.

He anſwered, Yea. And ſo he was bound for my appearance betwixt that and Chriſtmas.

Then Darbiſhire ſaid, You be conſtable, and ſhould give her good counſel.

So I do, quoth he. For I bid her go to maſs, and to ſay as you ſay. For by the maſs, if you ſay the crow is white, I will ſay ſo too.

And thus much concerning the examination of William Living and his wife, whom although thou ſeeſt here delivered through the requeſt of women, his ſureties, yet it was no doubt, but that the deadly ſickneſs of queen Mary abated and bridled then the cruelty of thoſe papiſts, which otherwiſe would never have let them go.

The

The Trouble and Deliverance of John Lithall.

AT the taking of William Living, it happened that ſome of his books were in the cuſtody of one John Lithall; which known, the conſtable of the ward of Southwark, with other of the queen's ſervants, were ſent to his houſe, who breaking up his doors and cheſts, took away not only the books of the ſaid William Living, but alſo all his own books, writings, and bills of debts, which he never had again. All this while Lithall was not at home. The next Sunday after, as he was returned, and known to be at home, John Avales, and ſome of the queen's ſervants, beſet his houſe all the night, with ſuch careful watch, that as he in the morning iſſued out of doors, thinking to eſcape their hands, John Avales burſting out upon him, cried, Stop the traitor, ſtop the traitor. Whereat Lithall being amazed, looked back. And ſo John Avales came running to him, with others that were with him, ſaying, Ah, ſirrah, you are a pretty traitorly fellow indeed, we have had ſomewhat to do to get you. To whom he anſwered, That he was a truer man to the queen's majeſty than he. For you, ſaid he, are commanded by God to keep holy the ſabbath-day, and you ſeek to ſhed your neighbour's blood on the ſabbath-day. Remember that you muſt anſwer it to God. But he ſaid, Come on you villain, you muſt go before the council. So was Lithall brought into Paul's church-yard to the biſhop's chancellor, by John Avales, ſaying, that he had there caught the captain of theſe fellows, and ſo cauſed him to be called to examination before Dr. Darbiſhire, who began with him on this wiſe:

Chancellor. What countryman are you?

Lithall. I am an Engliſhman, born in Staffordſhire.

Chancellor. Where were you brought up?

Lithall. In this our country of England.

Chancellor. In what univerſity?

Lithall. In no univerſity, but in a free-ſchool.

Chancellor. We had certain books from your houſe, and writing, wherein is both treaſon and hereſy.

Lithall. Sir, there is neither treaſon nor hereſy in them.

Then the chancellor asked for certain other men that I knew.

Lithall. If you have ought to lay to my charge, I will anſwer it; but I will have no other man's blood upon my head.

Chancellor. Why come you not to the church? Of what church be you, that you come not to your own pariſh church?

Lithall. I am of the church of Chriſt, the fountain of all goodneſs.

Chancellor. Have you no miniſters of your church but Chriſt?

Lithall. We have others.

Chancellor. Where be they?

Lithall. In the whole world, diſperſed, preaching and profeſſing the goſpel and faith only in our Saviour Jeſus, as he commanded them.

Chancellor. You boaſt much every one of you of your faith and belief: let me hear therefore the effect how you believe.

Lithall. I believe to be juſtified really by Chriſt Jeſus, according to the ſaying of St. Paul to the Epheſians, without either deeds or works, or any thing that may be invented by man.

Chancellor. Faith cannot ſave without works.

Lithall. That is contrary to the doctrine of the apoſtles.

Chancellor. John Avales, you and the keeper have this fellow to priſon.

Then John Avales and Cluny the keeper had me into Paul's, and would have had me ſeen the apoſtle's maſs.

Lithall. I knew none the apoſtles had, and therefore I will ſee none.

Cluny and John Avales. Come and kneel down before the rood, and ſay a Pater-noſter, and an Ave-Mary in the worſhip of the five wounds.

Lithall. I am forbidden by God's own mouth to kneel to any idol or image: therefore I will not.

Then they pulled me with great extremity, one having me by one arm, and the other by the other; but God gave me at that preſent time more ſtrength than both theſe, his name be praiſed for it. Then when they could not make me to kneel before the rood, neither to ſee the maſs, there gathered a great company about us, and all againſt me. Some ſpit on me, and ſaid, Fie on thee heretic; and others ſaid, it was pity I was not burned already. Then they carried me to Lollards-Tower, and hanged me in a great pair of ſtocks, in which I lay three days and three nights, till I was ſo lame that I could neither ſtir nor move. Then I offered the keeper ſome money and gold that I had about me, to releaſe me out of the ſtocks: and he ſaid, I would not be ruled by him, either to ſee maſs, or to kneel before the rood, and therefore I ſhould lie there ſtill. But I ſaid, I would never do the thing that ſhould be againſt my conſcience: and though you have lamed my body, yet my conſcience is whole, I praiſe God for it. So ſhortly after he let me out of the ſtocks, more for the love of money (as it may be thought) than for any other affection, and within four or five days my wife got leave of Mr. Chancellor to come to me, to bring me ſuch things as were needful for me; and there I lay five weeks and odd days. In which time divers of my neighbours and friends made ſuit to the chancellor for my deliverance: the biſhop, as they ſaid, at that time being ſick at Fulham. So my neighbours being there, about twenty of them, the chancellor ſent for me out of the Lollards-Tower to his own houſe, and ſaid as follows:

Chancellor. Lithall, here are ſome of thy neighbours who have been with me to intreat for thee, and they have informed me, that thou haſt been a very honeſt and quiet neighbour among them, and I think it be God's will that I ſhould deliver thee before my lord come home. For if he come, and thou go home again, I will be burned for thee; for I know his mind already in that matter.

Lithall. I give you hearty thanks for your gentleneſs, and my neighbours for their good report.

Chancellor. Lithall, if thy neighbours will be bound for thy forthcoming whenſoever thou ſhalt be called for; and alſo if thou wilt be an obedient ſubject, I ſhall be content to deliver thee.

Neighbour. If it pleaſe your worſhip, we will be bound for him in body and goods.

Chancellor. I will require no ſuch bonds of you, but that two of you will be bound in twenty-pound a-piece, that he ſhall come to anſwer when he ſhall be called.

Lithall. Where find you, Mr. Chancellor, in all the ſcriptures, that the church of God did bind any man for the profeſſion of his faith; which profeſſion you have heard of me, that all our juſtification, righteouſneſs and ſalvation cometh only and freely by the merits of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; and all the inventions and works of men, be they never ſo glorious, be altogether vain, as the wiſe man ſaith.

Chancellor. Lo, where he is now. I put no ſuch matter to you; for in that I believe as you do: but yet St. James ſaith, "That a man is juſtified by works."

Lithall. St. James ſpake to them that boaſted themſelves of faith, and ſhewed no works of faith: but O, Mr. Chancellor, remember I pray you, how all the promiſes and prophecies of the holy ſcripture, even from the firſt promiſe that God made to Adam, and ſo even to the latter end of the Revelation of St. John, do teſtify that in the name of Jeſus, and only by his merits, all that believe ſhall be ſaved from all their ſins and offences.

Iſaiah

Iſaiah ſaith, chap. 65. "I am found of them that ſought me not, and am manifeſt to them that ask not after me." But againſt Iſrael he ſaith, "All day long have I ſtretched out my hand to a people that believe not." And when the jailor asked St. Paul, What he ſhould do to be ſaved? the apoſtle ſaid, Acts 16. "Believe on the Lord Jeſus, and thou ſhalt be ſaved, and all thy houſhold." Again, St. John ſaith in the Revelation, that there was none, neither in heaven nor in earth, neither under the earth, that was able to open the book, nor the ſeals thereof, but only the Lamb Jeſus our only Saviour. And St. Paul ſaith, Heb. 9. "With one offering hath he made perfect for ever them that are ſanctified."

Chancellor. With vain-glory you rehearſe much ſcripture, as all the reſt of you do: but you have no more underſtanding than ſo many ſheep. But to the purpoſe; Will you that your neighbours ſhall enter into bonds for you, or not?

Lithall. By my mind they ſhall not. Wherefore I deſire you that you would not bind me, but let me ſerve God with my conſcience freely. For it is written, Rev. 13. "They that lead into captivity, ſhall go into captivity; and they that ſtrike with the ſword ſhall periſh with the ſword." Alſo it is written in the goſpel of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, Matt. 18. "That whoſo doth offend one of theſe little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a mill-ſtone were hanged about his neck, and that he were caſt into the depth of the ſea." Of which I am aſſured by his Holy Spirit that I am one. Wherefore be you well aſſured that ſuch mercy as you ſhew, unto you ſhall be ſhewed the like.

Chancellor. You are a mad man. I would not bind you, but that I muſt needs have ſomewhat to ſhew for your deliverance. Then he called two of my neighbours, Thomas Daniel and Saunders Maybe, who offered themſelves to be bound, and called me before them, and ſaid, I have a letter of his own hand-writing, with his name and ſeal at it, with a book alſo againſt the regiment of women, for which I could make him to be hanged, drawn and quartered; but on my faith I will him no more hurt than I mean to my own ſoul.

Lithall. I deſire you that be my neighbours and friends, tha you will not enter into bonds former: for you know not the danger thereof, neither I myſelf: it goeth againſt my conſcience that ye ſhould do ſo.

Chancellor. Why, I will not bind you to do any thing againſt your conſcience.

Then they made the bond and ſealed to it, and willed me that I ſhould ſeal to it alſo; and I ſaid, that I would not, neither could I obſerve the bond, and therefore I would not ſet to my hand.

Chancellor. It is pity that thou haſt ſo much favour ſhewed thee: yet for theſe honeſt men's ſakes I will diſcharge thee.

Notwithſtanding all theſe diſſembling words of Mr. Darbiſhire, pretending for favour of his ſureties to ſet him at liberty, it was no ſuch thing, nor any zeal of charity that moved him ſo to do: but only fear of the time, underſtanding the dangerous and irrecoverable ſickneſs of queen Mary, which then began ſomewhat to aſſuage the cruel proceeding of theſe perſecutors, whereby they durſt not do that they would: or elſe Lithall was not like to have eſcaped ſo eaſily.

Moreover, there was one Edward Grew, prieſt, and Appline, his wife, compelled to fly from their dwelling at a town called Brooke; and the man being very aged, travelled abroad to keep a good conſcience. At laſt he was taken and laid in Colcheſter-caſtle, where he remained till queen Elizabeth came to her regal ſeat, and by the alteration of religion he was delivered. His wife, good woman, was in great care for him, and to her power did what ſhe could to ſuccour him.

William Brown, parſon of Little Stanham, in the county of Suffolk, made a ſermon in the ſaid town, ſoon after the burial of our good king Edward; and in his ſermon he ſaid, There goeth a report that our good king is buried with a maſs by the biſhop of Wincheſter, he having a mitre upon his head. But if it were ſo, ſaid he, they are all traitors that do ſo, becauſe it is both againſt the truth, and the laws of this realm, and it is great idolatry and blaſphemy, and againſt the glory of God; and they are no friends either to God, the king, or yet unto the realm, that do ſo. For this his preaching one Robert Blomefield, an adverſary to the truth, being then conſtable of the town, and bailiff under Sir John Jerningham, knight (the chief lord of the town) immediately rode forth, and brought home with him one Edward Golding, who was then under-ſheriff, Sir Thomas Cornwallis, being then high-ſheriff.

So the ſaid Golding and Blomefield ſent for certain men of the ſame town, and examined them for the ſermon; whereupon they made but a ſmall anſwer. Then the ſheriff made a bill, and ſo terrified the men, that two or three of them ſet to their hands, and one of them never enjoyed himſelf after, but it was a grief to him till he died.

Then they took men with them to the parſon's houſe, and in the night they took him, and with watchmen kept him till it was day. Then ſhould he have been carried the next day to the council; but the ſaid Robert Blomefield was taken ſo ſick, that he was like to die: ſo that he could not carry him for his life.

Then the ſaid ſheriff ſent him to Ipſwich again, and there he was for a time. Then he was ſent to Bury priſon, and from thence to the council, and then into the Fleet: and ſo he lay in priſon from the beginning of harveſt till near Chriſtmas, and ſaid, God gave him ſuch anſwers to make when he was examined, that he was delivered with quietneſs of conſcience. And having his liberty, he came again to the aforeſaid town; and becauſe he would not go to maſs, his living was taken away, and he, and his wife, were conſtrained to flee here and there for his life and conſcience. In the laſt year of queen Mary's reign God took him out of this life in peace.

Where moreover it is to be benoted, that this Robert Blomefield abovenamed, immediately after he had apprehended the ſaid Brown, fell very ſick: and although at that time he was a wealthy man, and of great ſubſtance (beſide his land, which was better than twenty-pound a year) after this time God plagued his houſhold, that his eldeſt ſon died, and his wife had a pining ſickneſs till ſhe departed this life alſo. Then he married another, a rich widow; but all would not help, and nothing would proſper. For he had a ſore pining ſickneſs, being full of blotches and ſores, whereby he waſted away, both body and goods, till he died. So when he died, he was above one hundred and eighty pounds in debt, and it was never heard of any repentance he had. But a little before his death he threatened a good man, one Simon Harlſton, to put him forth to the officers, becauſe he did wear no ſurplice when he ſaid ſervice. Wherefore it is pity ſuch baits of popery are left to the enemies to take chriſtians in. God take them away, or eaſe us from them: for God knoweth they be the cauſe of much blindneſs and ſtrife amongſt men.

Furthermore, out of the ſaid town were conſtrained to fly, Robert Boela, and John Trapne, becauſe they would not go to maſs, and receive the ſacrament of the altar.

The Perſecution of Elizabeth Young.

YE heard before of the ſcourging of Thomas Green, how he was troubled and beaten by Dr. Story, for a certain book called Antichriſt, which he received of a woman, becauſe in no caſe he would detect her.

This

This woman was one Elizabeth Young, who coming from Embden to England, brought with her divers books, and diſperſed them abroad in London; for which ſhe being at length apprehended and laid faſt, was brought to examination thirteen times before the catholic inquiſitors of heretical pravity. Some of which examinations have come to our hands, and are as follow:

The firſt Examination of Elizabeth Young, before Mr. Huſſy.

Huſſy. WHERE was you born, and who was your father and mother?

Young. Sir, all this is but vain talk, and very ſuperfluous. It is to fill my head with fantaſies, that I ſhould not be able to anſwer unto ſuch things as I came for. You have not, I think, put me in priſon to know who is my father and mother. But I pray you go to the matter that I came hither for.

Huſſy. Wherefore wenteſt thou out of the realm?

Young. To keep my conſcience clean.

Huſſy. When waſt thou at maſs?

Young. Not theſe three years.

Huſſy. Then waſt thou not there three years before that?

Young. No, Sir, nor yet three years before that: for if I were, I had evil luck.

Huſſy. How old art thou?

Young. Forty, and upwards.

Huſſy. Twenty of thoſe years you went to maſs.

Young. Yea, and twenty more I may, and yet come home as wiſe as I went thither firſt, for I underſtand it not.

Huſſy. Why wilt thou not go to the maſs?

Young. Sir, my conſcience will not ſuffer me. For I had rather all the world ſhould accuſe me, than mine own conſcience.

Huſſy. What if a louſe or a flea ſtick upon the skin, and bite thy fleſh? thou muſt make a conſcience in taking her off, is there not a conſcience in it?

Young. That is but an eaſy argument to diſplace the ſcriptures, and eſpecially in ſuch a part as my ſalvation dependeth upon. For it is but an eaſy conſcience that a man can make.

Huſſy. But why wilt thou not ſwear upon the evangeliſts before a judge?

Young. Becauſe I know not what a book-oath is.

Then he began to teach her the book-oath.

Young. Sir, I do not underſtand it, and therefore I will not learn it.

Huſſy. Then ſaid he, thou wilt not underſtand it; and with that roſe up and went his way.

The ſecond Examination of Elizabeth Young, by Dr. Martin.

Martin. THOU art come from beyond the ſea, and haſt brought with thee books of hereſy and treaſon, and thou muſt confeſs to us who tranſlated them, printed them, and who ſent them over (for once I knew thee to be but a meſſenger) and in ſo doing the queen's highneſs will be good to thee (for ſhe hath forgiven greater things than this) and thou ſhalt find as much favour as is poſſible. But if thou be ſtubborn, and wilt not confeſs, thou wilt be very ill handled: for we know the truth already; but this we do, only to ſee whether thou wilt be true of thy word or no.

Young. Sir, ye have my confeſſion, and more than that I cannot ſay.

Martin. Thou muſt ſay more, and ſhalt ſay more. Doſt thou think that we will be fully anſwered by this confeſſion that thou haſt made? thou rebel whore, and traitor heretic, thou doſt refuſe to ſwear upon the evangeliſts before a judge, I hear ſay. Thou ſhalt be racked inchmeal, thou traitorly whore and heretic, but thou ſhalt ſwear before a judge before thou go: yea, and thou ſhalt be made to confeſs how many books thou haſt ſold, and to whom.

Young. Sir, I underſtand not what an oath is, and therefore I will take no ſuch thing upon me. And no man hath bought any books of me as yet, for thoſe books that I had, your commiſſioners have them all.

Martin. Thou traitorly whore, we know that thou haſt ſold a number of books, yea, and to whom; and how many times thou haſt been here, and where thou layeſt, and every place that thou haſt been in; doſt thou think that thou haſt fools in hand?

Young. No, Sir, ye be too wiſe for me; for I cannot tell how many places I have been in myſelf, but if it were in Turkey I ſhould have meat and drink and lodging for my money.

Martin. Thou rebel whore, thou haſt ſpoken evil words of the queen, and thou dwelleſt among a ſort of traitors and rebels that cannot give the queen a good word.

Young. I am not able to accuſe any man thereof, neither is there any man that can prove any ſuch things of me as you lay to my charge. For God's word hath taught me my duty to the queen, and therefore I am ſure you accuſe me wrongfully.

Martin. Thou rebel and traitorly whore, thou ſhalt be ſo racked and tormented, that thou ſhalt be an example to all ſuch traitorly whores and heretics; and thou ſhalt be made to ſwear by the holy evangeliſts, and confeſs to whom thou haſt ſold all and every of theſe heretical books that thou haſt ſold: for we know what number thou haſt ſold, and to whom; but thou ſhalt be made to confeſs it in ſpite of thy blood.

Young. Here is my carcaſe, do with it what you will, and more than that you cannot have. Mr. Martin, ye can have no more than my blood.

Then he raved as though he had been ſtark mad, and ſaid, Martin? why calleſt thou me Martin?

Young. Sir, I know you well enough, for I have been before you ere now. Ye delivered me once at Weſtminſter.

Martin. Where didſt thou dwell then?

Young. I dwelt in the Minories.

Martin. I delivered thee and thy huſband both; and I thought then that thou wouldeſt have done otherwiſe than thou doſt now. For if thou hadſt been before any biſhop in England, and ſaid the words that thou didſt before me, thou hadſt fryed a faggot: and though thou didſt not burn then, thou art like to burn or hang now.

Young. Sir, I promiſed you then, that I would never be fed with an unknown tongue, and no more will I yet.

Martin. I ſhall feed thee well enough. Thou ſhalt be fed with that, I warrant thee, which will be little to thine eaſe.

Young. Do what God ſhall ſuffer you to do: for more ye ſhall not. And then he aroſe, and ſo departed, and went to the keeper's houſe, and asked his wife, whom ſhe had ſuffered to come to this traitorly whore? (as he called her). Then ſaid the keeper's wife, As God receive my ſoul, here came neither man, woman, nor child to aſk for her.

Martin. If any man, woman, or child, come to ask for her, I charge thee on pain of death that they be laid faſt: and give her one day bread, and another day water.

Young. If ye take away my meat, I truſt that God will take away my hunger. And ſo he departed, ſaying, that was too good for her. And then ſhe was ſhut up under two locks in the Clink, where ſhe was before.

The third Examination, before Dr. Martin.

Martin. ELIZABETH, wilt thou confeſs theſe things that thou haſt been examined upon; for thou thou knoweſt that I have been thy friend, and in ſo doing I will be thy friend again; giving her many fair words, and then demanding of her how many gentlemen were beyond the ſeas?

Young. It is too much for me to tell you how many are on the other ſide.

Martin. No, I mean but in Frankfort and Embden, where thou haſt been.

Young. Sir, I did never take account of them, it is a thing that I look not for.

Martin. When ſhall I have a true word come out of thy mouth?

Young. I have told you the truth, but becauſe that it ſoundeth not to your mind, therefore you will not credit it.

Martin. Wilt thou yet confeſs? and if thou wilt, that which I have promiſed I will not do: and if thou wilt not, I promiſe thee thou muſt go even hence to the rack, and therefore confeſs.

Young. I can ſay no more than I have ſaid.

Martin. Well, foraſmuch as ſhe will confeſs no more, have her away to the rack, and then ſhe will be marred.

Then anſwered a prieſt that ſat there, and ſaid, Woman, take an oath, and confeſs: wilt thou be hurt for other men?

Young. I can confeſs no more than I have. Do with my carcaſe what ye will.

Martin. Did ye ever hear the like of this heretic? what a ſtout heretic is this? We have the truth, and we know the truth, and yet look whether ſhe will confeſs. There is no remedy but ſhe muſt needs to the rack, and therefore away with her; and ſo commanded her out of the door, and called her keeper unto him, and ſaid to him, There is no remedy but this heretic muſt be racked; and talked with him more, but what it was ſhe did not hear.

Then he called her in again, and ſaid, Wilt thou not confeſs, and keep thee from the rack? I adviſe thee ſo to do; for if thou wilt not, thou knoweſt not the pain yet, but thou ſhalt do.

Young. I can confeſs no more; do with my carcaſe what ye will.

Martin. Keeper, away with her. Thou knoweſt what I ſaid. Let her know the pain of the rack. And ſo ſhe departed, thinking no leſs, but that ſhe ſhould have gone to the rack, till ſhe ſaw the keeper turn toward the Clink again. And thus did God alienate their hearts, and diminiſh their tyrannous power, unto the time of further examinations; for ſhe was brought before the biſhop, the dean, and the chancellor, and other commiſſioners, firſt and laſt thirteen times.

The fourth Examination before the Biſhop of London, Sir Roger Cholmley, Dr. Cook, the Recorder of London, Dr. Roper, and Dr. Martin.

FIRST ſhe being preſented by Dr. Martin before the biſhop of London, Dr. Martin began to declare againſt her, ſaying, The lord chancellor hath ſent you here a woman, who hath brought books over from Embden, where all theſe books of hereſy and treaſon are printed, and hath therewith filled all the land with treaſon and hereſy; neither yet will ſhe confeſs who tranſlated them, nor who printed them, nor yet who ſent them over. Wherefore my lord chancellor committeth her unto my lord of London, to do with her as he ſhall think good. For ſhe will confeſs nothing but that ſhe bought theſe ſaid books in Amſterdam, and ſo brought them over to ſell for gain.

Dr. Cook. Let her head be truſſed in a ſmall line, and make her to confeſs.

Martin. The book is called Antichriſt, and ſo may well be called, for it ſpeaketh againſt Jeſus Chriſt and the queen. Beſides that, ſhe hath a certain ſpark of the anabaptiſts, for ſhe refuſeth to ſwear upon the four evangeliſts before a judge: for I myſelf and Mr. Huſſy have had her before us four times, but we cannot bring her to ſwear. Wherefore my lord chancellor would that ſhe ſhould abſtain and faſt, for ſhe hath not faſted a great while: for ſhe hath lain in the Clink a good while, where ſhe had too much her liberty.

Then ſaid the biſhop, Why wilt thou not ſwear before a judge? that is the right trade of the anabaptiſts.

Young. My lord, I will not ſwear that this hand is mine.

No! ſaid the biſhop, and why?

Young. My lord, Chriſt ſaith, That whatſoever is more than yea, yea, or nay, nay, it cometh of evil. And moreover, I know not what an oath is: and therefore I will take no ſuch thing upon me.

Then ſaid Cholmley, Twenty pounds it is a man in a woman's clothes: twenty pounds it is a man.

Bonner. Think ye ſo, my lord?

Cholmley. Yea, my lord.

Young. My lord, I am a woman.

Biſhop. Swear her upon a book, ſeeing it is but a queſtion aſked.

Then ſaid Cholmley, I will lay twenty pounds it is a man.

Then Dr. Cook brought her a book, commanding her to lay her hand thereto.

Young. No, my lord, I will not ſwear, for I know not what an oath is. But I ſay that I am a woman, and have children.

Biſhop. That know not we; wherefore ſwear.

Cholmley. Thou ill-favour'd whore, lay thy hand upon the book; I will lay on mine. And ſo he laid his hand on the book.

Young. So will not I.

Then the biſhop ſpoke a word in Latin out of Saint Paul, as concerning ſwearing.

Young. My lord, if you ſpeak to me of Saint Paul, then ſpeak Engliſh; for I underſtand you not.

Biſhop. I dare ſwear that thou doſt not.

Young. My lord, Saint Paul ſaith, that five words ſpoken in a language that may be underſtood, are better than many in a ſtrange tongue.

Cook. Swear before us, whether thou be a man or a woman.

Young. If ye will not believe me, then ſend for women into a ſecret place, and I will be ſearched.

Cholmley. Thou art an ill-favour'd whore.

Biſhop. How believeſt thou in the ſacrament of the altar?

Young. If it pleaſe you that I ſhall declare my faith, I will; and if it be not good, teach me better, and I will believe it.

Cook. That is well ſaid; declare thy faith.

Young. I believe in God the Father Almighty, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, three perſons and one God. I believe all the articles of my creed. I believe all things written in the ſcripture, and all things agreeable to the ſcripture, given by the Holy Ghoſt to the church of Chriſt, ſet forth and taught by the church of Chriſt. I believe that Jeſus Chriſt, the only Son of God, that immaculate Lamb, came into the world to ſave ſinners; and that in him, by him, and through him, I am made clean from my ſins, and without him I could not. I believe that in the holy ſacraments of Chriſt's body and blood, which he did inſtitute and ordain, and left among his diſciples that night before he was betrayed; when I do receive this ſacrament in faith and ſpirit, I do receive Chriſt.

Biſhop. No more, I warrant you, but the ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood, received but in ſpirit and faith, with thoſe heretics.

Cholmley. Ah, whore, ſpirit and faith, whore?

Young. This ſacrament never man could or did make, but only He, that did what no man could do.

Martin. Then thou muſt allow that graſs is a ſacrament; for who could make graſs, but he only?

Young. Sir, he hath ſuffered, and made a ſufficient ſacrifice once for all, and ſo hath he made his ſacrament ſufficient once for all: for there never was man that could ſay, "Take, eat, this is my body that is broken for you," but only Jeſus Chriſt, who had his body broken for the ſins of the world; which ſacrament he hath left here amongſt us for a teſtimonial of his death, even to the world's end.

Martin. Who taught thee this doctrine? did Scory?

Young. Yea, biſhop Scory, and others, that I have heard.

Biſhop. Why, is Scory biſhop now?

Young. If that offend you, call him Doctor Scory, if you will.

Roper. I knew when he was but a poor doctor.

Martin. What do you call Scory?

Young. Our ſuperintendant.

Biſhop. Lo! their ſuperintendant!

Martin. And what are ye called?

Young. Chriſt's congregation.

Biſhop. Lo! Chriſt's congregation, I warrant you!

Doctor Cook. What living hath Scory?

Young. As far as I do know he liveth by his own, for I know no man that giveth him ought.

Recorder. Yes, I warrant you, he hath enough ſent him out of England.

Young. Sir, I know no ſuch thing.

Cholmley. Hark, whore, hark; how I do believe.

Young. My lord, I have told you my belief.

Cholmley. Hark, thou ill-favoured whore, how I do believe. When the prieſt hath ſpoken the words of conſecration, I do believe that there remaineth the very body that was born of the virgin Mary, was hanged on the croſs, was dead and buried, and deſcended into hell, and roſe again on the third day, and aſcended into heaven, and ſitteth at the right hand of God. The ſame body when the prieſt hath ſpoken the words, cometh down, and when the prieſt lifteth up his body on this wiſe (he lifting up his hands, ſaid) there it is.

Young. I have told you alſo how I do believe.

Martin. Away with her.

Cholmley. Ah ill-favoured whore! nothing but ſpirit and faith, whore?

Martin. Away with her, we have more to talk withal.

Then ſhe was carried into the coal-houſe, and ſearched for books, and then put into the ſtock-houſe, and her knife, girdle, and apron taken from her.

The fifth Examination before the Biſhop of London's Chancellor.

Chancellor. WHAT age are you of?

Young. Forty years and upwards.

Chancellor. Why, thou art a woman of fair years: why ſhouldſt thou meddle with the ſcriptures? it is neceſſary for thee to believe, and that is enough. It is more fit for thee to meddle with thy diſtaff, than to meddle with the ſcriptures. What is thy belief? I would hear it; for it cannot be good, in that thou art brought into priſon.

Young. Sir, if it will pleaſe you to hear, I will declare it unto you. But I pray you that you will take your pen and write it, and then examine it; and if you find any thing therein that is not fit for a chriſtian woman, then teach me better, and I will learn it.

Chancellor. Well ſaid. But who ſhall judge between thee and me?

Young. The ſcripture.

Chancellor. Wilt thou ſtand by that?

Young. Yea, Sir.

Chancellor. Well, go thy way out at the door a little while, for I am buſy, and I will call for thee anon again.

Then he called me again, and ſaid, Now woman, the time is too long to write: Say thy mind, I will bear it in my head.

Then Elizabeth began, and declared her faith to him as ſhe had done before to the biſhop.

Chancellor. Woman, ſpirit and faith I do allow, but doſt not thou believe that thou doſt receive the body of Chriſt really, corporally, and ſubſtantially?

Young. Theſe words, really and corporally, I underſtand not; as for ſubſtantially, I take it, you mean I ſhould believe that I ſhould receive his human body (which is upon the right hand of God, and can occupy no more places at once) and that I believe not.

Chancellor. Thou muſt believe this, or elſe thou art damned.

Young. Sir, can you give me belief?

Chancellor. No, God muſt give it thee.

Young. God hath given me no ſuch faith or belief.

The chancellor then declared a text of St. Paul in Latin, and then in Engliſh, ſaying, I could make thee believe, but that thou haſt a cankered heart, and wilt not believe. Who then can make thee to believe?

Young. You ſaid even now, that faith or belief cometh of God, and ſo I believe, and then may not I believe an untruth to be true?

Chancellor. Doſt thou not believe that Chriſt's fleſh is fleſh in thy fleſh?

Young. No, Sir, I believe not that; for my fleſh ſhall putrify and rot.

Chancellor. Chriſt ſaid, my fleſh is fleſh in fleſh.

Young. Whoſo receiveth him fleſhly, ſhall have a fleſhly reſurrection.

Chancellor. Chriſt ſaith in St. John, chap. 6. "My fleſh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed."

Young. Chriſt preached to the Capernaites, ſaying, "except ye eat the fleſh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye ſhall not have life in you:" And the Capernaites murmured at it. And his diſciples alſo murmured, ſaying among themſelves, "This is an hard ſaying, and who can abide it?" Chriſt underſtood their meaning, and ſaid, Are ye alſo offended? will ye alſo go away? What and if ye ſhall ſee the Son of man aſcend up to heaven, from whence he came, will that offend you? It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the fleſh profiteth nothing." I pray you, Sir, what meaneth Chriſt by that?

Chancellor. O God forbid. Would you have me to interpret the ſcriptures? We muſt leave that for our old ancient Fathers, who have ſtudied ſcripture a long time, and have the Holy Ghoſt given unto them.

Young. Why, Sir, have you not the Holy Ghoſt given and revealed unto you?

Chancellor. No, God forbid that I ſhould ſo believe; but I hope, I hope: But ye ſay, ye are of the ſpirit. Will you ſay that you have no profit in Chriſt's fleſh?

Young. Sir, we have our profit in Chriſt's fleſh, but not as the Capernaites did underſtand it: for they underſtood that they muſt eat his fleſh as they did eat ox fleſh and others, and drink his blood, as we drink wine or beer out of a bowl. But ſo we muſt not receive it. But our profit that we have by Chriſt, is to believe that his body was broken upon the croſs, and his blood ſhed for our ſins; that is the very meaning of Chriſt, that ſo we ſhould eat his fleſh, and drink his blood, when he ſaid; "My fleſh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed."

Chancellor. How doth thy body live, if Chriſt's fleſh is not fleſh in thy fleſh;

Young. Sir, I was a body before I had a ſoul; which body God had created, and yet it could not live, till God had breathed life into me, and by that life doth my body live. And when it ſhall pleaſe God to diſſolve my life, my fleſh will offer itſelf unto the place from whence it came, and through the merits of Chriſt my ſoul will offer itſelf to the place from whence it came.

Chancellor.

Chancellor. Why, doth not Chriſt ſay, "My fleſh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed?" Canſt thou deny that?

Young. I deny not that; for Chriſt's fleſh and blood are meat and drink for my ſoul, the food of my ſoul. For whoſoever believeth that Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God hath died, and ſhed his blood for his ſins, his ſoul feedeth thereon for ever.

Chancellor. When thou receiveſt the ſacrament of the altar, doſt thou not believe that thou doſt receive Chriſt's body?

Young. Sir, as often as I receive the ſacrament, I believe, that ſpiritually and by faith I receive Chriſt. And of this ſacrament, I know Chriſt himſelf to be the author, and none but he. And this ſame ſacrament is an eſtabliſhment to my conſcience, and an augmenting to my faith.

Chancellor. Why, did not Chriſt take bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave it to his diſciples, ſaying, "Take, eat, this is my body that is given for you?" Did he give them his body, or no?

Young. He alſo took the cup, and gave thanks to his Father, and gave it to his diſciples, ſaying, "Drink ye all hereof: for this is the cup of the New Teſtament in my blood, which ſhall be ſhed for many." Now, I pray you, Sir, let me ask you one queſtion: Did he give the cup the name of his blood, or the wine that was in the cup?

Then he was very angry, and ſaid, Doſt thou think that thou haſt an hedge-prieſt in hand?

Young. No, Sir, I take you not to be a hedge-prieſt; I take you for a doctor.

Chancellor. So methinketh. Thou wilt take upon thee to teach me.

Young. No, Sir, but I let you know what I know; and by one argument ſhall know more. Chriſt ſaid, "As oft as you do this, do this in remembrance of me;" but a remembrance is not of a thing preſent, but abſent. Likewiſe St. Paul ſaith, So oft as ye ſhall eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye ſhall ſhew forth the Lord's death till he come:" Then we muſt not look for him here, until his coming again at the latter day. Again, is not this article of our belief true, "He ſitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; from thence he ſhall come to judge both the quick and the dead?" But if he come not before he come to judgment, how then is he preſent in your ſacrament of the altar? Wherefore I believe that the human body of Chriſt occupieth no more than one place at once; for when he was here, he was not there.

The ſixth Examination of Mrs. Young before the Chancellor.

Chancellor. WOMAN, the laſt time that thou waſt before me, our talk was concerning the ſacrament.

Young. Sir, true it is, and I truſt that I ſaid nothing that ye can deny by the ſcriptures, Chancellor. Yes, thou wilt not believe that Chriſt's fleſh is fleſh in thy fleſh.

Young. No, Sir, God hath given me no ſuch belief; for it cannot be found by the ſcriptures.

Chancellor. Wilt thou believe nothing but what is in the ſcripture? Why how many ſacraments doſt thou find in the ſcripture?

Young. The church of Chriſt doth ſet down two.

Chancellor. I will as well find ſeven by the ſcripture, as thou ſhalt find two.

Young. Sir, I talk not to you thereof, but I ſay that the church of Chriſt ſetteth out two, and I have been taught no more.

Chancellor. What are thoſe two?

Young. The ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood, and the ſacrament of baptiſm.

Chancellor. What ſayſt thou to the ſacrament of wedlock?

Young. I have not heard it called a ſacrament, but the holy eſtate of matrimony, which ought to be kept of all men that take it upon them.

Chancellor. How ſayſt thou by prieſts? Is it good that they ſhould marry? is it to be kept of them?

Young. I come not hither to reaſon any ſuch matter; for I am no divine, and alſo it is no part of my faith.

Chancellor. Can ye not tell? ye ſhall tell before ever you go.

Young. Sir, then muſt ye keep me a good while; for I have not ſtudied the ſcriptures for it.

Chancellor. No? why ye will not be aſhamed to flee unto the higheſt myſtery, even to the ſacrament at the firſt daſh, and ye are not afraid to argue with the beſt doctor in the land.

Young. God's myſteries I will not meddle with, but all things that are written, are written for our edification.

Chancellor. What ſay you by prayers for the dead? is it not meet, that if a man's friend be dead, his friend commend his ſoul unto God?

Young. There is no chriſtian man that will commend his friend nor his foe unto the devil. And whether it be good for him when he is dead or no, ſure I am, that it is good when he is alive.

Chancellor. Then thou alloweſt not prayer to be good for them when they be dead, and lying in purgatory. Is it not meet that prayer be made unto God for them?

Young. Sir, I never heard in the ſcriptures of purgatory, but in the ſcripture I have heard of heaven and hell.

Chancellor. Why, ye have nothing but the skimming of the ſcriptures. Our ancient fathers could find out in the bottom of the ſcriptures, that there is a purgatory. Yea, they could find it in the New Teſtament, that a prieſt ſhall take the ſacrament, and go to the altar, and make an oblation, and offer it up every day.

Young. Sir, that could never be found in the Bible nor Teſtament, as far as ever I could hear.

Chancellor. Whom doſt thou hear read either the Bible or Teſtament, but a ſort of ſchiſmatics, bawdy biſhops, and hedge prieſts (which have brought into the church a ſtinking communion, which was never heard of in any place in the world, but here in England) which have deceived the king, and all the nobility, and all the whole realm?

Young. Sir, it is a vile name that you give them all.

Chancellor. Where are all the hedge knaves become now, that they come not to their anſwer?

Young. Anſwer, Sir, why, they have anſwered both with the ſcriptures, and alſo with their blood; and then where were you that ye came not forth to anſwer in their times? I never knew any of you that were troubled, but two, and that was not for God's word, it was for their diſobedience.

Chancellor. No, I pray you? did ye not know that we were killed, hanged, burned, and headed?

Young. Sir, I never knew that any of you ever was either hanged, killed, burned, or headed.

Chancellor. No? did ye never hear that the biſhop of Rocheſter loſt his head for the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome?

Young. Then he died not for God's word.

Chancellor. Well, thou wilt believe nothing but that which is written in God's word. Where canſt thou find the ſabbath written in the ſcripture by the name of the ſabbath? For the right ſabbath-day will I prove to be Saturday. Or where canſt thou find the articles of the creed in the ſcripture by the name of the articles? or where canſt thou find in the ſcripture, that Chriſt went down into hell?

Young.

Young. What place or part in the ſcripture can ye find to diſprove any of theſe things?

Chancellor. What prieſt haſt thou lain withal, that thou haſt ſo much ſcripture? thou art ſome prieſt's woman, I think, for thou wilt take upon thee to reaſon, and teach the beſt doctor in all the land.

Young. I was never yet prieſt's wife, nor yet prieſt's woman.

Chancellor. Have I touched your conſcience?

Young. No, Sir, you have not touched my conſcience, but beware you hurt not your own.

Chancellor. Thou haſt read a little in the Bible or Teſtament, and thou thinkeſt thou art able to reaſon with a doctor, that hath gone to ſchool thirty years, and before God I think if I had talked thus much with a Jew as I have done with thee, he would have turned ere this time. But I may ſay by you as Chriſt ſaid by Jeruſalem, ſaying, O Jeruſalem, Jeruſalem, how often would I have gathered thee together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens, but thou wouldſt not." And ſo would we gather you together in one faith, and ye will not: and therefore your own blood be upon your own heads; for I can do no more but teach you. Thou art one of the rankeſt heretics that ever I heard: for thou believeſt nothing but what is in the ſcripture, and therefore thou art damned.

Young. I do believe all things written in the ſcripture, and all things agreeable to the ſcripture, given by the Holy Ghoſt to the church of Chriſt, ſet forth and taught by the church of Chriſt; and ſhall I be damned becauſe I will not believe an untruth?

Then the chancellor called the keeper, ſaying, Cluny, take her away, thou knoweſt what thou haſt to do with her. And ſo ſhe departed, and was brought again to the ſtock-houſe, and there ſhe lay certain days, and both her hands manacled in one iron; and afterward ſhe was removed into the Lollards Tower, and there ſhe remained with both her feet in the ſtocks and irons till the next time of examination.

The ſeventh Examination of Mrs. Young, before the Chancellor and the Biſhop's Scribe.

Chancellor. WOMAN, thou haſt been twice before me, but we could not agree, and here be certain articles which my lord the biſhop of London would that thou ſhouldſt make anſwer unto, which are theſe: Firſt, how many ſacraments thou doſt allow?

Young. Sir, as many as Chriſt's church doth allow, and that is two.

Then ſaid the ſcribe, Thou waſt taught ſeven before king Edward's days.

Chancellor. Which two ſacraments be thoſe that thou doſt allow?

Young. The ſacrament of the body and blood of Jeſus Chriſt, and the ſacrament of baptiſm.

Chancellor. Doſt thou not believe that the pope of Rome is the ſupreme head of the church, immediately under God in earth?

Young. No, Sir, no man can be the head of Chriſt's church; for Chriſt himſelf is the head, and his word is the governor of all that be of the church, whereſoever they be ſcattered abroad.

Chancellor. Doſt thou not believe that the biſhop of Rome can forgive thee all thy ſins heretical, deteſtable, and damnable, that thou haſt done from thine infancy unto this day?

Young. Sir, the biſhop of Rome is a ſinner as I am, and no man can forgive me my ſins, but he only that is without ſin, and that is Jeſus Chriſt who died for my ſins.

Chancellor. Doſt thou not know that the pope ſent over his Jubilees, that all that ever would faſt and pray, and go the church, ſhould have their ſins forgiven them.

The ſcribe. Sir, I think that ſhe was in the realm then.

Chancellor. Haſt thou not deſired God to defend thee from the tyranny of the biſhop of Rome, and all his deteſtable enormities?

Young. Yes, that I have.

Chancellor. And art thou not ſorry for it?

Young. No, Sir, not a whit.

Chancellor. Haſt thou not ſaid, that the maſs was wicked, and the ſacrament of the altar moſt abominable?

Young. Yes, that I have.

Chancellor. And art not thou ſorry for it?

Young. No, Sir, not a whit.

Chancellor. Art thou not content to go to the church and hear maſs?

Young. I will not go to the church, either to maſs or matins, till I may hear it in a tongue that I can underſtand: for I will be fed no longer in a ſtrange language. And always the ſcribe did write every one of theſe articles, as they were demanded, and anſwered unto.

Then the ſcribe asked her from whence ſhe came.

The chancellor ſaid, This is ſhe that brought over all theſe books of hereſy and treaſon.

Then the ſcribe ſaid to her, Woman, where hadſt thou all theſe books?

Young. I bought them in Amſterdam, and brought them over to ſell, thinking to gain thereby.

The ſcribe. What is the name of the book?

Young. I cannot tell.

Scribe. Why, wouldſt thou buy books, and know not their names?

Then ſaid Cluny the keeper, Sir, my lord biſhop did ſend for her by name, that ſhe ſhould come to maſs, but ſhe would not.

Chancellor. Yea, did my lord ſend for her by name, and would ſhe not go to maſs?

Young. No, Sir, I will never go to maſs, till I do underſtand it, by the leave of God.

Chancellor. Underſtand it! why, who the devil can make thee underſtand Latin, thou being ſo old?

Then the ſcribe commanded her to ſet her hand to all theſe things.

Then ſaid ſhe, Let me hear them read firſt.

Scribe. Maſter chancellor, ſhall ſhe hear it read?

Chancellor. Ay, ay, let the heretic hear it read.

Then ſhe heard it read, and ſo ſigned it.

The eighth Examination of Elizabeth Young before the Biſhop.

Biſhop. IS this the woman that hath three children?

Keeper. Yea, my lord.

Biſhop. Woman, here is a ſupplication put into my hands for thee. In like caſe there was another ſupplication put up to me for thee before this, in which thou madeſt as though I ſhould keep thy children.

Young. My lord, I did not know of this ſupplication, nor yet of the other.

Biſhop. Mr. Dean, is this the woman you have ſued ſo earneſtly for?

Dean. Yea, my lord.

Dean. Woman, what remaineth in the ſacrament of the altar, when and after that the prieſt hath ſpoken the words of conſecration?

Young. A piece of bread. But the ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood, which he did inſtitute, and leave among his diſciples the night before he was betrayed, miniſtered according to his word, that ſacrament I do believe.

Dean. How doſt thou believe concerning the body of of Chriſt? where is his body, and how many bodies hath he?

Young, Sir, in heaven, he ſitteth on the right hand of God.

Dean. From whence came his human body?

Young. He took it of the virgin Mary.

Dean. That is fleſh, blood, and bones, as mine is. But what ſhape hath his ſpiritual body? hath it face, hands, and feet?

Young. I know no other body that it hath, but that body whereof he meant when he ſaid, "This is my body, which is given for you; and this is my blood, which ſhall be ſhed for you." Whereby he plainly meaneth that body, and no other, which he took of the virgin Mary, having the perfect ſhape and proportion of a human body.

Story. Thou haſt a wiſe body: for thou muſt go to the ſtake.

Dean. Art thou content to believe in the faith of Chriſt's church? But to ask of thee what Chriſt's church is, or where it is, I let it paſs.

Young. Sir, to that church I have joined my faith, and from it I purpoſe never to turn, by God's help.

Dean. Wouldſt thou not be at home with thy children with a good will?

Young. Sir, if it pleaſe God to give me leave.

Dean. Art thou willing to confeſs thyſelf to be an ignorant and fooliſh woman, and to believe as our holy father the pope of Rome doth; and as the lord cardinal doth, and as my lord the biſhop of London, thine ordinary, doth, and as the king and queen, and all the nobility of England do; yea, and the emperor, and all the noble perſons of Chriſtendom?

Young. Sir, I was never wiſe; but in few words I ſhall make you a brief anſwer how I do believe all things that are written in the ſcriptures given by the Holy Ghoſt unto the church of Chriſt, ſet forth and taught by the church of Chriſt. Hereon I ground my faith, and not on man.

Then ſaid Story, And who ſhall be judge?

Young. Sir, the ſcripture.

Story. And who ſhall read it?

Young. He unto whom God hath given the underſtanding.

Biſhop. Woman, be reformable: for I would thou wert gone; and maſter dean here hath earneſtly ſued for thee.

Dean. Woman, I have ſued for thee indeed, and I promiſe thee, if thou wilt be reformable, my lord will be good unto thee.

Young. I have been before my lord biſhop, and before matter chancellor, three times, and have declared my faith, Dean. And yet I know that maſter chancellor will ſay, that thou art a rank heretic.

Story. Away with her.

Biſhop. Maſter dean, you know that I may not tarry, nor you neither. Let her keeper bring her home to your own chamber ſoon at four o'clock at afternoon, and if that ye find her reaſonable, then let her go, for I would that ſhe were gone.

Then ſaid the dean, With a good will, my lord, and ſo ſhe was ſent unto the place from whence ſhe came, until it was four of the clock in the afternoon.

The ninth Examination before the Dean, before whom ſhe was delivered.

Dean. ART thou a fool now, as thou waſt to-day?
Young. Sir, I have learnt but ſmall wiſdom ſince.
Dean. Doſt thou think that I am better learned than thou?

Young. Yes, Sir, that I do.

Dean. Thinkeſt thou that I can do thee good?

Young. Yes Sir; and if it pleaſe God that ye will.

Dean. Then I will do thee good indeed. What doſt thou receive when thou receiveſt the ſacrament which Chriſt left among his diſciples the night before he was betrayed?

Young. Sir, that that his diſciples did receive.

Dean. What did they receive?

Young. Sir, that that Chriſt gave them, they received.

Dean. What anſwer is this? was Chriſt there preſent?

Young. Sir, he was there preſent; for he inſtituted his own ſacrament.

Dean. He took bread, and he brake it, and he gave it to his diſciples, and ſaid, "Take, eat, this is my body which ſhall be broken for you." When thou receiveſt it, doſt thou believe that thou receiveſt his body?

Young. Sir, when I receive, I believe that through faith I do receive Chriſt.

Dean. Doſt thou believe that Chriſt is there?

Young. Sir, I believe that he is there to me, and by faith I do receive him.

Dean. He alſo took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to his diſciples, and ſaid, "Drink ye all thereof; This is the cup of the New Teſtament in my blood, which is ſhed for many for the remiſſion of ſins." When thou doſt receive it after the inſtitution that Chriſt ordained among his diſciples, the night before he was betrayed, doſt thou believe that Chriſt is there?

Young. Sir, by faith I believe he is there, and by faith I do believe that I do receive him.

Dean. Now thou haſt anſwered me, Remember that thou ſayeſt, that when thou doſt receive according to the inſtitution of Chriſt, thou doſt receive Chriſt.

Young. Sir, I believe Chriſt not to be abſent from his own ſacrament.

Dean. How long wilt thou continue in that belief?

Young. Sir, as long as I do live, by the help of God; for it is, and hath been my belief.

Dean. Wilt thou ſay this before my lord?

Young. Yes, Sir.

Dean. Then I dare deliver thee. Why, thou calf, why wouldſt thou not ſay ſo to-day?

Young. Sir, he aſked me no ſuch queſtion.

Dean. Then ye would ſtand in diſputation how many bodies Chriſt had.

Young. Sir, indeed that queſtion ye did aſk me.

Dean. Who ſhall be the ſureties that thou wilt appear before my lord of London and me upon Friday next?

Young. Sir, I have no ſureties; nor know I where to have any.

Then ſpake the dean unto two women that ſtood there, who had earneſtly ſued for her, ſaying, Women, will ye be her ſureties, that ſhe ſhall appear before my lord of London and me upon Friday next?

Women. Yea, Sir, and it pleaſe you.

Dean. Take heed that I find you no more a brabler in the ſcripture.

Young. Sir, I am no brabler in the ſcripture, nor yet any man can burden me therewith.

Dean. Yes, I have heard of you well enough what ye are.

Then ſaid he to the women, what if a man ſhould touch your conſcience, do you not ſmell of hereſy alſo?

Women. No, Sir.

Dean. Yes, a little of the frying-pan; or elſe wherefore have you two ſo earneſtly ſued for her?

The one woman anſwered, Becauſe that her children were like to periſh; and therefore God put me in mind to ſue for her.

Then ſaid the other woman, And I provided her child a nurſe, and I am threatened to ſtand to the keeping of her child, and therefore it ſtandeth me in hand to ſue to have her out.

Dean. Woman, give thanks unto theſe honeſt women, who have ſo earneſtly ſued for thee, and I promiſe thee ſo have I. Theſe great heretics will receive nothing but in ſpirit and faith; and ſo he roſe and departed.

Young. Sir, God be praiſed, and I thank you for your goodneſs and theirs alſo, and ſo he went away: and upon the Friday next, becauſe ſhe was accuſed, her two ſureties went thither, and were diſcharged.

The Perſecution of Elizabeth Lawſon.

IN the town of Bedfield, in the county of Suffolk, dwelt an ancient godly matron, named Elizabeth Lawſon, about the age of ſixty years, who was apprehended as an heretic by the conſtables of the ſame town, named Robert Kitrich, and Thomas Elas, in the year 156, becauſe ſhe would not go to church to hear maſs, and receive the ſacrament, and believe in it.

Firſt, they laid her in a dungeon, and after that ſhe was carried to Norwich, and from thence to Bury-gaol, where at laſt ſhe was condemned to be burnt. In the mean time Sir John Sylliard had her home unto his houſe, he being high ſheriff that year, where ſhe was hardly kept, and wrapped in irons, till at length, when they could by no means move her to recant, ſhe was ſent to priſon again with ſhameful revilings.

Thus ſhe continued in priſon the ſpace of two years and three quarters. In the mean time there was burnt her ſon and many more, whereby ſhe would often ſay, "Good Lord, what is the cauſe that I may not yet come to thee with thy children? Well good Lord thy bleſſed will be done, and not mine."

Not long after this, moſt happily, followed the death of queen Mary, after whem ſucceeded queen Elizabeth. At which time this E. Lawſon remained yet ſtill in Bury priſon, till at laſt ſhe was bailed upon ſureties, or elſe ſhe could not be delivered. For ſhe being a condemned perſon, neither the temporality, nor yet ſpiritual authority would diſcharge her without ſureties. Now ſhe being abroad, and her ſureties made afraid by wicked men, ſaid they would caſt her again into priſon, except ſhe would ſee them diſcharged.

Then ſhe got a ſupplication to go to the queen's majeſty, and came to a friend of hers to have his council therein; who willed her to ſtay awhile, becauſe ſhe was old, the days ſhort, the expences great and weather foul (for it was a little before Chriſtmas) and to tarry until ſummer. In the mean time God brake the bond, and ſhortened her journey; for he took her home to himſelf out of this life of peace.

This good old woman, long before ſhe went to priſon, had the falling ſickneſs and told a friend of hers, one Simon Harlſton, after ſhe was apprehended, that ſhe never had it more, but lived in good health and joy of heart, through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

She had a very unkind huſband, who while ſhe was in priſon, ſold her raiment, and would not help her; and after ſhe was out of priſon, ſhe returned home unto him, yet would he ſhew her no kindneſs, nor help her neither; and yet the houſe and land that he dwelt in he had by her; wherefore as long as ſhe lived ſhe was maintained by the congregation.

The ſaid E. Lawſon alſo had a ſiſter, wife to one Robert Hollon in Miekfield in the ſame county of Suffolk, who likewiſe was perſecuted and driven out from houſe to houſe, and a young man her ſon with her, becauſe they would not go to the church to hear maſs, and receive the ſacrament of the altar.

The Perſecution of T. Chriſtenmaſs and W. Wats.

IN this perillous rage of queen Mary's reign were two men perſecuted, one called Thomas Chriſtenmaſs, the other William Wats of Tunbridge in Kent. As theſe two men travelled from place to place, not reſting two nights together in one place, they happened to go to Rocheſter in Kent, where they at the town's end met with a damſel of eight years of age, but whither ſhe went they knew not. It was then night, and they being weary, were willing to lie in the ſame town, but could not tell where, they feared ſo the bloody catholics. At laſt they deviſed to aſk the damſel whether there were any heretics in the town or no? and ſhe ſaid, Yea. They asked her where. She anſwered them, At ſuch an inn, telling them the name, and where the inn was. Shortly after, as they were gone from her, they bethought themſelves better, and God ſo moving their hearts, they went to the child again, and aſked her how ſhe knew the innkeeper (of whom ſhe ſpake before) was an heretic. Marry, quoth ſhe, well enough, and his wife alſo. How knoweſt thou, pretty maiden? ſaid they. I pray thee tell us. How know I? ſaid ſhe. Marry becauſe they go to the church; and thoſe that will not hold up their hands there; they will preſent them; and he himſelf goes from houſe to houſe, to compel them to come to church. When theſe two men heard this, they gave God praiſe, and avoided that houſe, taking the warning of that maid (of good bringing up as it ſhould ſeem) to be God's marvellous providence towards them.

In the laſt year but one of queen Mary's reign, William Wats lived at Seale in Kent, where being apprehended, and brought by the conſtables before the biſhop and juſtices at Tunbridge, who endeavoured to perſuade him to turn from the truth, but all in vain, though they ſpent much time, and uſed many flattering words.

At dinner-time the conſtables took Wats to a victualling-houſe, where after they had well victualled themſelves, they fell aſleep, ſuppoſing their priſoner had been ſure enough under their hands. Wat's wife being in the houſe with her huſband, and very careful for his well-doing, ſeeing them all faſt aſleep deſired her huſband to go away, as God had given him an opportunity, but he refuſing ſo long, that at laſt a ſtranger hearing ſomething of the diſpute, aſked what the matter was, and why ſhe was ſo earneſt with her huſband: the wife told him. Then ſaid the ſtranger to Wats, Father, go thy ways in God's name, and tarry no longer: the Lord hath opened the way unto thee. Upon which words he went his way, and his wife departed from him, and went home to her houſe at Seale, thinking her huſband had gone another way. Now as ſhe was going in at her door, telling her friends of his deliverance, immediately came the ſaid Wats in alſo, and they all being amazed thereat, willed him in all haſte to get him away; for they thought there would be ſearch for him immediately.

Then Wats ſaid, He would eat meat firſt, and alſo pray; which he did, and afterwards departed thence. So ſoon as he was out of the doors, and had hid himſelf in an holly-buſh, immediately came the ſaid conſtables with thirty perſons into the ſaid houſe to ſearch for him, where they pierced the feather-beds, broke open his cheſts, and made great havock; and as they were ſearching, the conſtable cried, I will have Wats, I will have Wats, I tell thee, I will have Wats; but God be thanked Wats could not be found. And when they ſaw it needleſs to ſearch for him, in the end they took his wife, and ſet her in a pair of ſtocks, where ſhe remained two days, and ſhe was bold in the truth, and at laſt delivered through the providence of God; whoſe name be glorified in all his works, Amen.

There was at London a certain honeſt godly perſon, a painter, named Dabney, whom John Avales in the time of queen Mary had brought before Bonner to be examined for his faith. It happened the ſame time, when the ſaid Dabney was there, that the biſhop was occupied with the examination of others, ſo that he was bid to ſtand by, and to wait the biſhop's leiſure. Upon the ſame, or not long after, ſuddenly came word to the biſhop to prepare him in all ſpeed, the general proceſſion tarried for him. The biſhop hearing that, ſetting all buſineſs apart, buſtleth himſelf with all ſpeed poſſible, to to the church, there to furniſh the proceſſion. By reaſon whereof Dabney, who newly came to the houſe, was there left alone, while every man elſe was buſied in preparing and ſetting themſelves forward according as the caſe required.

To be ſhort, as the time called on, Bonner with his houſhold makes all poſſible haſte to the proceſſion. Dabney being left alone, came down to the outward court next the gate, there walking heavily by himſelf, looking for nothing leſs than to eſcape that danger. The porter, who was only left at home, ſeeing the man walk alone, ſuppoſing he had been ſome citizen there left behind, and waiting for opening the gate, went and opened the wicket, aſking if he would go out. Yea, ſaid he, with a good will, if ye will let me out. With all my heart, with all my heart, quoth the porter, and I pray you ſo do.

And thus the ſaid Dabney taking the occaſion offered of God, being let out by the porter, eſcaped out of the wolf's mouth. The proceſſion being done, when the biſhop returned home, Dabney was gone, and could not be found: whereupon ſearch was made, but eſpecially John Avales laid wait for him: who after long ſearching, when he could not get him, at length received fifteen crowns of his wife to let him alone when he ſhould ſee him; and ſo that good man eſcaped.

A like example of God Almighty's goodneſs towards his afflicted ſervants in that dangerous time of perſecution, may alſo appear evidently in one Alexander Wimſhurſh, a prieſt, ſometime of Magdalen-college in Oxford, and then a papiſt, but ſince an earneſt enemy to Antichriſt, and a man better inſtructed in the true fear of God. It happened that one promoted him to biſhop Bonner for religion, upon what occaſion I do not underſtand. According to the old manner in ſuch caſes provided, he ſent forth Robin Caly, otherwiſe called Robin Papiſt, one of his whelps, to bring in the game, and to cauſe this ſilly poor man to appear before him. Little Robin, like a proper man, beſtirreth him in his buſineſs, and ſmelleth him out, and when he had taken him, bringeth him along by Cheapſide, not ſuffering him to talk with any of his acquaintance by the way, though they were of his old friends of Oxford that offered to ſpeak unto him.

When they came into St. Paul's, he eſpied Dr. Chedſey there walking up and down, to whom, becauſe he was able in ſuch a caſe to do him ſervice, and for that he had been of his old acquaintance in Oxford, he was very deſirous to ſpeak to him ere he went through. Chedſey, perceiving that Robin Caly did attend upon him, ſaid that he durſt not meddle in the matter. Yes (ſaith little Robin) you may talk with him if it pleaſe you maſter doctor. To be ſhort, Alexander openeth his caſe, and in the end deſireth, for old acquaintance ſake, that he would find means he might be rather brought before doctor Martin to be examined, than any other. Nay, ſaith he (alledging the words of Chriſt unto Peter in the laſt chapter of St. John,) You remember, brother, what is written in the goſpel; "When thou waſt young, thou didſt gird thyſelf, and wenteſt whither thou wouldeſt: but being aged, other men ſhall gird thee, and lead thee whither thou wouldſt not." Thus abuſing the ſcripture to his private meaning, whereas notwithſtanding he might eaſily have accompliſhed ſo ſmall a requeſt, if it had liked him.

Thence was he carried to Story and Cook, commiſſioners, there to learn what ſhould become of him. Before them he did uſe himſelf boldly and ſtoutly, as they on the other ſide did urge him with captious queſtions very cruelly. When they had baited the poor man their fill, they aſked him where his whore was. She is not my whore, ſaid he, but my lawful wife. She is thy whore, ſaid they. She is not my whore, ſaid he again, but my wife, I tell you. So when they perceived that he would not give place unto them, nor attributed to them ſo much as they looked for at his hand, according to the ordinary manner, they commanded him to priſon. And now mark well the providence of God in his preſervation.

He was brought into Cluny's houſe, at Pater-noſter-row, thence to be carried to Lollards Tower out of hand, but that Cluny (as it happened) his wife and his maid were ſo earneſtly occupied about preſent buſineſs, that as then they had not leiſure to lock up their priſoner. In the hall where Alexander ſate was a ſtrange woman, whoſe huſband was then preſently in trouble for religion, which perceived by ſome one occaſion or other, that this man was brought in for the like cauſe. Alack good man, ſaith ſhe, if you will you may eſcape the cruel hands of your enemies, foraſmuch as they be all away that ſhould look unto you. God hath opened the way unto you for a deliverance, and therefore loſe not the opportunity thereof, if you be wiſe. Being perſuaded with theſe and ſuch like words, he went out of the doors, and eſcaped their hands.

Boſom's Wife.

THIS good woman being at Richmond with her mother, was greatly urged to go to church. At length, through great importunacy, ſhe came; being in the church, and ſitting with her mother in the pew, contrary in all things to the doings of the papiſts, ſhe behaved herſelf ſo, that when they kneeled ſhe ſtood, when they turned forward ſhe turned backward, &c.

This being notorious in the church, the conſtable and churchwarden attached her in the queen's name, charging her and her mother to appear the next day at Kingſton, which accordingly they did, and happening to meet the officers croſſing the river, ſaluted them by their names, but at that time the officers had no power to ſpeak to them, though afterwards they ſtampt and ſtared, and were mad with themſelves for letting them paſs, as was declared by the waterman in the boat. Whereupon the good woman taking her journey to London, eſcaped their cruelty.

John Davis, under Twelve Years of Age.

IN the year 1546, and the laſt year of king Henry VIII. John Davis, a child of twelve years and under, who dwelling in the houſe of Mr. Johnſon apothecary, in the town of Worceſter, his uncle, uſing ſometimes to read in the Teſtament and other Engliſh books, was complained of by his miſtreſs; who was an obſtinate perſon, and conſulted with one Thomas Parton, and Alice Brook, wife to Nicholas Brook, organ-maker, with certain of the canons, and Mr. Johnſon, chancellor to Dr. Heath their biſhop. The means whereby he was intrapped was wrought by the foreſaid Alice Brook, who procured her ſon Oliver, ſchool-fellow with the ſaid John Davis, to feign friendſhip with him, and under pretence to be inſtructed, to ſee his Engliſh books, and eſpecially to get ſomething of his writing againſt the ſix articles: which being had, was ſoon brought to the canons of the church and the chancellor. Whereupon Thomas Parton came to apprehend him, and his uncle was forced againſt his will to bind the poor boy's arms behind him; and ſo he was brought to the officers of the town, where he lay from the 14th of Auguſt till the laſt of September. Then was he commanded to the freeman's priſon, where one Richard Howborough, coming to perſuade him from burning, willed him to prove firſt with a candle: who then holding his finger, and the other a candle under it a good ſpace, yet (as the party himſelf aſſured me) felt no burning thereof, neither would the other that held the candle believe him a great while, till he had had looked, and ſaw no ſcorching of the candle at all appeared.

The child was removed from thence to an inner priſon, called Peephole, where the low bailiff, named Robert Yould, laid upon him a pair of bolts, ſo that he could not lift up his little legs, but leaning on a ſtaff, ſlipt them forward upon the ground: with theſe bolts his lying was upon the cold ground, having not one lock of ſtraw nor cloth to cover him, ſave only two ſheep-ſkins, neither durſt father or mother, or any of his friends come to him. Beſides this, and many great threats of the papiſts, there was a mad man put to him in the priſon, with a knife about him, wherewith he oft-times in his frantic rage proffered to thruſt him in.

After this came to him one Joyliff and Yewer, two canons, who had his writings againſt the ſix articles, and his ballad, called, "Come down for all your ſhaven crown:" to ſee whether he would ſtand to that he had written. Which done, with many great raging words, not long after ſate Mr. Johnſon the chancellor in the Guildhall upon the poor lad. Where firſt were brought in his accuſers and ſworn, then were ſworn alſo twenty-four men which went on his queſt, and found him guilty, but he never came before the chancellor. Upon this he was ſent to the common goal among thieves and murderers, there to tarry the coming of the judges, and ſo to be had ſtrait to execution. But the mighty mercy of the Lord, who helpeth the deſolate and miſerable when all other help is paſt, ſo provided for this innocent lad, that the purpoſe of all his heard-hearted enemies was diſappointed: for before the judges came, God took away Henry the eighth out of this life. By reaſon whereof the force of the law was then ſtayed, howbeit he was nevertheleſs arraigned, being held up in a man's arms at the bar before the judges, who were Portman and Marven: who when they perceived that they could not burn him, would have him preſently whipped. But Mr. Bourne declared to the judges, how he had whipping enough. After that he had lain a week more in priſon, he had him home to his houſe, his wife anointed his legs herſelf with ointment, which then were ſtiff and numbed with irons, till at length when Mr. Bourne and his wife ſaw they could not win him to the belief of their ſacrament, they put him away, leſt he ſhould infect their ſon Anthony, as they thought, with hereſy.

Thus John Davis was mercifully preſerved, after he had ſuffered impriſonment from the 14th day of Auguſt till within ſeven days of Eaſter, who is yet alive, and a profitable miniſter this day in the church of England: Bleſſed be the Lord.

Mrs. Roberts.

MIſtreſs Roberts, a gentlewoman, yet living (as I underſtand) in the town of Hawkhurſt in Suſſex, being earneſtly addicted to the truth of the goſpel, and no leſs conſtant in that which ſhe had learned therein, ſo kept herſelf during all the brunt of queen Mary's time, that ſhe never came to their popiſh ſervice, nor polluted her conſcience with their idolatrous maſs. There dwelt at the ſame time not far off a juſtice called Sir John Gilford, who being as fervent on the contrary ſide to ſet forward the proceedings of queen Mary, thought to prove maſteries with this gentlewoman, in forcing her into the church. And firſt ſending his wife, he attempted her by fair words, and gentle perſuaſions, to conform herſelf to the prince's laws, and to come, as other chriſtian people did, to the church. Notwithſtanding, ſhe conſtantly perſiſting in the ſincerity of the truth, would by no perſuaſions be won to do therein againſt her conſcience; and ſo kept at home a certain time, till again Mr. Gilford thinking not to give her over ſo, ſent his officers and ſervants to her, by force and power to hale her out of her houſe to the church, and ſo did. Where, by the way, ſhe for grief of conſcience, ſwooned, and ſo of neceſſity was brought home again, and falling into an ague, was for that time diſpenſed with. When ſhe had recovered her health again, he came in perſon to compel her to come to church, whether ſhe would or no. But (as the proverb goeth) Who can prevent that which God would have done? For when Mr. Gilford had purpoſed as pleaſed him, the Lord ſo diſpoſed for this good woman, that as he was coming up ſtairs toward her chamber, ſuddenly his old diſeaſe the gout ſeized him, and ſo terribly tormented him, that he could go no further: And ſo he, that purpoſed to carry her to the church againſt her will, was forced himſelf to be carried home to his houſe to his pain, proteſting and ſwearing that he would never from henceforth trouble that gentlewoman more, and no more he did.

Mrs. Anne Lacy.

MIſtreſs Anne Lacy, widow, in Nottinghamſhire, was in great danger in queen Mary's time, inſomuch that the proceſs was out againſt her, and ſhe ready to have been apprehended, being ſo nearly purſued, that ſhe was driven to hide her bible and other books in a dunghill. Mr. Lacy, her brother, was then juſtice of peace: but to whom (as I have heard) ſhe was but very little beholden. Nevertheleſs, where kindred faileth, yet God's grace never faileth ſuch as ſtick to him; for, in this mean time, as the proceſs came out againſt her, queen Mary died, and ſo ſhe eſcaped.

Croſſman's Wife.

SHE lived at Tibnam Longrow, in Norfolk; and for not going to church, was ſought for at her houſe by the conſtable of the hundred, who, when he came to her houſe, ſhe being at home with a child ſucking in her arms, ſtept into a corner on the one ſide of the chimney, and they ſeeking about the chambers, the child never cried (although before they came, it did) as long as they were there; and ſo by this means the Lord preſerved her.

The Congregation at Stoke, in Suffolk.

THERE were ſome likewiſe that avoided the violent rage of the adverſaries, by means only of their number, and mutual according in godlineſs, wherein they did ſo hold together, that without much ado none well could be troubled: whereof we have an example in a certain town in Suffolk, called Stoke. After the three ſharp years of queen Mary's perſecution being paſt, yet notwithſtanding the inhabitants of the town aforeſaid, eſpecially the women, came not to their church to receive, after the popiſh manner, the ſacrament. Who, if they had been but few, they could by no means have eſcaped impriſonment. But becauſe there were ſo many, the papiſts thought it beſt not to lay hands upon them. Only they appointed them ſixteen days reſpite after Eaſter, wherein as many as would, ſhould receive the ſacrament; thoſe that would not, ſhould ſtand to the peril that would follow. Of this company, which were many, giving their hands together, the chief were theſe:

Eve, an old woman of ſixty years. Alice Coker, her daughter. Elizabeth Foxe. Agnes Cutting. Alice Spencer. Henry Canker. Joan Fouke. Agnes Spaulding. John Steyre, and his brother. John Foxe.

Theſe, after the order was taken for their not coming to the church, took counſel among themſelves what was beſt to be done, and at length concluded by promiſe one to another, that they would not receive at all. Yet

ſome

ſome of them afterward, being perſuaded with fair promiſes, that the communion ſhould be miniſtered unto them according to king Edward's book, went to the pariſh prieſt (whoſe name was Cotes) and asked him after which ſort he would adminiſter the ſacrament. He anſwered to ſuch as he favoured, that he would give it after the right ſort; the reſt ſhould have it after the popiſh manner.

To be ſhort, none did communicate ſo, but only John Steyre, and John Foxe; of which the one gave his wife leave to do as ſhe thought beſt. The other went about with threats to compel his wife, ſaying, that otherwiſe he would divorce himſelf from her. As for the reſt, they withdrew themſelves from church, reſorting to their wonted company, only Foxe's wife tarried ſtill at home, in heavineſs, whoſe huſband practiſed with the curate in the mean time, that the next day after he ſhould give her the ſacrament, which was the ſeventeenth day after Eaſter. But the very ſame day, unknowing to her huſband, ſhe went ſecretly to her company, and with tears declared how violently her huſband had dealt with her. The other women bade her notwithſtanding to be of good cheer, and ſaid they would make their earneſt prayers to God for her and her huſband; and indeed, when they had ſo done, the matter took very good ſucceſs. For the next day after Goodman Foxe came of his own accord unto them, a far other man than he was before, and bewailed his own raſhneſs, praying them that they would forgive him, promiſing ever after to be more ſtrong in faith, to the great rejoicing both of them and his wife.

About half a year after this, the biſhop of Norwich ſendeth forth certain of his officers or apparitors thither, which gave them warning every one to come to the church the next Sunday following. If they would not come, they ſhould appear before the commiſſary out of hand, to render account of their abſence. But the women having ſecret knowledge of this before, kept themſelves out of the way on purpoſe, to avoid the ſummons or warning. Therefore when they were not at the church at the day appointed, the commiſſary did firſt ſuſpend them, according to the biſhop of Rome's law, and within three weeks after did excommunicate them. Therefore when they perceived that an officer of the town was ſet to take ſome of them, they conveying themſelves privily out of the town, eſcaped all danger.

The Congregation in London.

NO leſs wonderful was the preſervation of the congregation in London, which from the firſt beginning of queen Mary, to the latter end thereof, continued, notwithſtanding whatſoever the malice, device, ſearching and inquiſition of men, or ſtrictneſs of laws could work to the contrary. Such was the merciful hand of the Lord, according to his accuſtomed goodneſs, ever working with his people. Of this bountiful goodneſs of the Lord, many and great examples appeared in the congregation which now I ſpeak of. How oft, and in what great danger did he deliver them?

Firſt, In Black-friers, when they ſhould have reſorted to Sir Thomas Carden's houſe, privy watch was laid for them, but yet through God's providence the miſchief was prevented, and they delivered.

Again, they narrowly eſcaped about Aldgate, where ſpies were laid for them: and had not Thomas Simſon, the deacon, eſpied them, and bid them diſperſe themſelves away, they had been taken. For within two hours the conſtables coming to the houſe, after they were gone, demanded of the wife, what company had been there. To whom ſhe, to excuſe the matter, made anſwer again, ſaying, that half a dozen good fellows had been there at breakfaſt as they went a Maying.

Another time alſo, about the great conduit, they paſſing there through a narrow alley, into a clothworker's loft, were eſpied, and the ſheriffs ſent for: but before they came, they having privy knowledge thereof, immediately ſhifted away out of the alley, John Avales ſtanding alone in the Mercers Chapel ſtaring at them.

Another like eſcape they made in a ſhip at Billingſgate, belonging to a certain good man of Leigh, where in the open ſight of the people that were aſſembled together, and yet, through God's mighty power, eſcaped.

Betwixt Ratcliff and Redriff, in a ſhip called Jeſus ſhip twice or thrice they aſſembled, having there cloſely, after their accuſtomed manner, both ſermon, prayer, and communion, and yet through the protection of the Lord they returned, altho' not uneſpied, yet untaken.

Moreover, in a cooper's houſe in Pudding Lane, ſo near they were to perils and dangers, that John Avales coming into the houſe where they were, talked with the man of the houſe, and after he had aſked a queſtion or two, departed; God ſo working, that either he had no knowledge of them, or no power to take them.

But they never eſcaped more hardly, than once in Thames-ſtreet, in the night-time, where the houſe being beſet with enemies, they were delivered by the means of a mariner, who being at that preſent in the ſame company, and ſeeing no other way to avoid pluck'd off his ſlops, and ſwam to the next boat, and ſo rowed the company over, uſing his ſhoes inſtead of oars, and ſo jeopardy was diſpatched.

What ſhould I ſpeak of the extreme danger which that goodly company was in at the taking of Mr. Rough their miniſter, and Cuthbert Symſon their deacon, had not God's providence given knowledge before to Mr. Rough in his ſleep, that Cuthbert Symſon ſhould leave behind him at home the book of all their names, which he was wont to carry about with him; whereof mention is made before.

In this church or congregation there were ſometimes forty, ſometimes an hundred, ſometimes two hundred, ſometimes more, ſometimes leſs. About the latter time of queen Mary it greatly increaſed. From the firſt beginning, which was about the firſt entry at queen Mary's reign, they had divers miniſters; firſt Mr. Scamier, then Thomas Foule, after him Mr. Rough, then Mr. Auguſtine Bernher, and laſt Mr. Bentham; concerning the deliverance of which Mr. Bentham (being now biſhop of Coventry and Lichfield) God's mighty providence moſt notably is to be conſidered. The ſtory is this:

On a time when ſeven martyrs were burnt in Smithfield, a proclamation was iſſued out, ſtrictly forbidding all perſons whatſoever either to ſalute, or pray for the priſoners as they came to the ſtake: the godly people hearing this, great numbers of them aſſembled together, reſolving to comfort and encourage them by their prayers; and when they came towards the ſtake well guarded by officers armed with bills and glieves as uſual, the whole congregation ran in upon them, kiſſing and embracing them, (not minding the officers and their weapons) and carried them to the ſtake, and might as well have carried them off, for ought the officers could do to prevent it.

This done, and the people giving place to the officers, the proclamation was read with a loud voice to the people in the names of the king and queen, That no man ſhould pray for them, nor once ſpeak a word unto them, &c. Mr. Bentham, then miniſter of the congregation, ſeeing the fire ſet to the martyrs, turned his eyes to his people, and ſaid, We know they are the people of God, and therefore we cannot chuſe but ſay, God ſtrengthen them: and then he boldly ſaid, Almighty God, for Chriſt's ſake ſtrengthen them. With that all the people with one conſent, and one voice, ſaid, Amen, Amen. The noiſe whereof was ſo great, that the officers could not tell what to ſay, or whom to accuſe. And thus much concerning the congregation of the faithful aſſembling together in London in the time of queen Mary.

Another time, as Mr. Bentham was going through St. Katherine's, intending to take a walk in the air, he was inforced by two or three men to go along with them. Mr. Bentham being amazed at the ſuddenneſs of the matter, required what their purpoſe was, or whither they would have him go. They anſwered, that by the occaſion of a man there found drowned, the coroner's queſt was called and charged to ſit upon him, of which queſt he muſt of neceſſity be one, &c. He endeavoured to excuſe himſelf, alledging that he had no ſkill, and leſs experience in ſuch matters; and if it would pleaſe them to let him go, they would meet with another more fit for their purpoſe. But when with this they would not be ſatisfied, he further urged, that he was a ſcholar in the univerſity of Oxford, and thereby was privileged from being of any inqueſt. The coroner demanded the ſight of his privilege. He ſaid, if he would give him leave, he would fetch it. Then ſaid the coroner, the queen muſt be ſerved without delay, and ſo conſtrained him to be at the hearing of the matter. Then a book was offered him to ſwear upon; upon his opening it, he found it to be a popiſh primmer, and refuſed to ſwear thereon; and declared moreover what ſuperſtition in the book was contained. What! ſaid the coroner; I think we have an heretic among us. And upon that, after much reaſoning, he was committed to the cuſtody of an officer till further examination: by occaſion whereof he hardly could have eſcaped, had not the Lord helped where man was not able. What followed? as they were thus contending about matters of hereſy, ſuddenly cometh the coroner out of the admiralty, diſannulling and repealing the order and calling of that inqueſt, for that it was (as he ſaid) pertaining to his office; and therefore the other coroner and his company in that place had nothing to do. And ſo the firſt coroner was diſcharged and diſplaced; by reaſon whereof Mr. Bentham eſcaped their hands.

Edward Bennet.

ABOUT the ſecond year of queen Mary, Edward Bennet, then dwelling at Queenhithe, was deſired by Mr. Tingle, priſoner then in Newgate, to bring him a New Teſtament. He procuring one of Mr. Coverdale's tranſlation, wrapt it in a handkerchief, ſaying to George the keeper, who aſked him what he had, that it was a piece of powdered beef. Let me ſee it, ſaid he. Perceiving what it was, he brought him to Sir Roger Cholmley, who examined him why he did ſo, ſaying that book was not lawful, and ſo committed him to Woodſtreet Compter, where he continued 25 weeks.

Dr. Story coming to this priſon to examine other priſoners, this Bennet looking out at the grate, ſpake to him, deſiring him to be good unto him, and to help him out, for he had lain long in priſon. To whom Dr. Story anſwered, Waſt thou not before me in Chriſt's-church? Yes, forſooth, ſaid Bennet. Ah, ſaid Story, thou doſt not believe in the ſacrament of the altar? Marry I will help thee out; come, ſaid he to the keeper, turn him out, I will help him: and ſo took Bennet with him, and brought him to Cluny in Pater-noſter-row, and bade him bring him to the Coal-houſe, and there he was in the ſtocks a week.

Then the biſhop ſent for him to talk with him, and firſt aſked him if he were confeſſed? No, ſaid Bennet. He aſked him if he would be confeſſed? No, ſaid he. Then he aſked him if the prieſt could take away his ſins? No, ſaid Bennet, I do not ſo believe.

Then he and Harpsfield laughed at him, and mocked him, asking him if he did not believe that whatſoever the prieſt here bound in earth, ſhould be bound in heaven, and whatſoever he looſeth in earth, ſhall be looſed in heaven? No, ſaid Bennet; but I believe that the miniſter of God preaching God's word truly and adminiſtering the ſacraments according to the ſame, whatſoever he bindeth in earth, ſhould be bound in heaven, and whatſoever he looſeth, &c. Then the biſhop putting him aſide, ſaid he ſhould go to Fulham and be whipped.

Mr. Buſwell a prieſt then came to him lying in the Coal-houſe in the ſtocks, and brought Cranmer's recantation, ſaying, that he had recanted. My faith, ſaid the other, lieth in no man's book, but in him which hath redeemed me. The next Saturday Bennet, with five others, were called for to come to maſs in the chapel. The maſs being done, and they coming out, five of them went to priſon, and were afterwards burned. Bennet being behind, and coming towards the gate, the porter, opening to a company going out, asked if there were no priſoners there. No, ſaid they. Bennet ſtanding in open ſight before them, with other ſerving men who were there by reaſon that Bonner made many prieſts that day, when the gates were opened, went out amongſt them, and ſo eſcaped.

Again, in the laſt year of queen Mary, the ſame Bennet being taken again with the twenty-four beyond Iſlington, and brought to Sir Roger Cholmley's, the people coming very thick, did cut off ſome of them, to the number of eight, which were behind, among whom was Bennet. Then he knocked at the gate to come in; the porter ſaid, that he was none of the company. He ſaid yes, and knocked again. Then there ſtood by one of the congregation, named Johnſon, who ſaid, Edward, thou haſt done well, do not tempt God: go thy way. And ſo he taking the warning as ſent of God, with a quiet conſcience eſchewed burning.

Jeffery Hurſt, Brother-in-law to George Marſh, Martyr.

IN the town of Shakerley, in Lancaſhire, dwelt one Jeffery Hurſt, the ſon of an honeſt yeoman, who beſides him eleven children, the ſaid Jeffery being the twelfth and eldeſt: and their father being willing to bring them up, ſo that they ſhould be able another day to help themſelves, he did bind this Jeffery prentice unto the craft of nailing, to make all kind of nails, which occupation he learned, and ſerved out the time of ſeven years, which being expired, he gave himſelf at times to learn of his other brethren which went to ſchool: and as he was very willing to the ſame, ſo God ſent him knowledge; wherein he perſevered and went forwards in ſuch ſort, that he could write and read indifferently, and in longer continuance came by more knowledge, and ſo having the Bible and divers other books in his houſe, did come to knowledge in the ſcripture. After this he took to wife the ſiſter of Mr. George Marſh, of whoſe martyrdom mention is made before, and being very familiar with him, did greatly mend his knowledge. Now when queen Mary was entered the firſt year of her reign, he kept himſelf away from their doings, and came not to the church: whereupon he was laid in wait for and called heretic, and lollard, and ſo for fear of further danger he was compelled to leave his wife and child, and fly into Yorkſhire, and there being not known did lead his life, returning ſometimes by night to his houſe to comfort his wife, and bringing with him ſome preacher or other, who uſed to preach unto them ſo long as the time would ſerve, and ſo departed by night again. The names of the preachers were Mr. Reneſes, Mr. Beſt, Mr. Brodbanke, Mr. Ruſſel; and every time they came thither, they were about twenty, or twenty-four ſometimes, but ſixteen at leaſt, who had there alſo ſometimes a communion. And thus in much fear did he with others lead his life, till the laſt year of the reign of queen Mary. Then it chanced that the ſaid Jeffery Hurſt, after the death death of his father, came home and kept close for seven or eight weeks.

There dwelt not far off, at Morlefs, a certain juftice of peace, and of the quorum, named Thomas Lelond, who hearing of him, appointed a time to come to his father's houfe where he then dwelt, to rifle the houfe for books, and to fearch for him alfo, and fo did. Jeffery and his company having knowledge of his coming, took the books which were in the houfe, as the Bible, the communion book, and the New Teftament of Tindal's tranflation, and divers others, and threw them all underneath a tub or fat, conveying alfo the faid Jeffery under the fame, with a great deal of ftraw underneath him: for as it chanced they had the more time, becaufe when the juftice came almoft to the door, he ftayed and would not enter the houfe till he had fent for Hurft's mother's landlady, Mrs. Shakerley; and then with her confent intended to go forwards. In the mean time, Jeffery by fuch as were with him, was willed to lay in his window the Teftament of Tindal's tranflation, and a little book containing the third part of the Bible, with the book of Eccleſiaſticus, to try what they would fay unto them.

This done, miftrefs Shakerley came. Unto whom the juftice immediately declared the caufe of his coming, and how he was forry to attempt any fuch thing againft any of her tenants for her fake, but notwithftanding he muft needs execute his office. And again you muft (faid he) note this, that a fcabbed fheep is able to infect a great number; and efpecially having, as he hath, fo many brethren and fifters, he is able to marr them all, if he be not looked unto in time. And thus concluding, Mr. Lelond entered into the houfe, and being come in, fet himfelf in a chair in the middle of the houfe; and fending Sir Ralph Parkinfon his prieft, and one of his men, and one of Mrs. Shakerley's men about the houfe, to fearch and rifle the chefts (who did fo) in the mean time he talked with Hurft's mother, almoft fixty years of age; and chiding with her that fhe would fuffer her fon fo to order and behave himfelf like an heretic, faid, Thou old fool, I know myfelf that this new learning fhall come again; but for how long? even for three months or four months, and no longer. But I will lay thee, old fool, in Lancafter dungeon for this, and well worthy.

Now as concerning the fearchers, they found nothing but Latin books, as grammar, and fuch like. Thefe be not what we look for (faid they) we muft fee farther, and fo looked into Hurft's chamber, where they found the foreſaid books. Then Sir Ralph taking up the Teftament, looked on it, and fmiled. His maſter ſeeing that, faid, Now Sir Ralph, what have we here? Forſooth, faith he, a Teftament of Tindal's tranflation, plain herefy, and none worfe than it. Then faid he, all their goods are loft to the queen, and their bodies to prifon, and was wonderfully hafty; notwithftanding through the means of Mrs. Shakerley, he was content to ſtay a little.

Then the prieft looked on the other book. What fay ye to that Sir Ralph? is that as bad as the other? No, faid he, but it is not good that they fhould have fuch Engliſh books to look on; for this and fuch others may do much harm. Then he aſked his mother where her eldeſt ſon was, and her daughter Alice? She anſwered ſhe could not tell; they had not been with her a long time. And he ſwore by God's body, he would make her tell where they were, or he would lay her in Lancaſter dungeon; and yet he would have them notwithſtanding too. To be ſhort, for fear, he had his brother J. Hurſt and his mother bound in an hundred pound to bring the parties before him in fourteen days time, and ſo he departed, and the prieſt put both the books in his boſom, and carried them away with him. Then John Hurſt went after them, deſiring that he might have the book which the prieſt found no fault with; but he ſaid, they ſhould anſwer to them both, and which ſoever was the better, neither was good.

As this paſt on, when the time was come that Jeffery Hurſt and his ſiſter ſhould be examined, the juſtice ſent for them betimes in the morning, and had prepared a maſs to begin withal, aſking Jeffery Hurſt if he would firſt go and ſee his Maker, and then he would talk further with him. To whom Jeffery anſwered and ſaid, Sir, my Maker is in heaven, and I am aſſured in going to your maſs I ſhall find no edification thereby; and therefore I pray you hold me excuſed.

Well, well, ſaid he, I perceive I ſhall find you an heretic, by God; but I will go to maſs, and I will not loſe it for all your prattling. Then he went into his chapel, and when maſs was done he ſent for them, and cauſed his prieſt to read a ſcroll unto them as concerning the ſeven ſacraments; and ever as he ſpake of the body and blood of Chriſt, he put off his cap, and ſaid; Lo ye may ſee, you will deny theſe things, and care not for your prince; but you ſhall feel it ere I have done with you, and all the faculty of you; with other talk more between them, I know not what; but in the end they were licenſed to depart under ſureties to appear again before him within three weeks, and then to go to Lancaſter. Hewbeit, in the mean time it ſo pleaſed God, that within four days of the day appointed, it was noiſed that the queen was dead, and within fourteen days after the ſaid Jeffery Hurſt had ſent home his two books, and nothing was ſaid unto him.

It followed after this that God's word began to take place, and the queen's viſitors came down into that country, who choſe four men in the pariſh, to wit, Simon Smith, Jeffery Hurſt, Henry Brown, George Eccerſly, which four were proteſtants, to ſee the queen's proceedings take place; who according to their power did ſo, notwithſtanding it little prevailed; and therefore the ſaid Jeffery being ſore grieved with the office, fell ſick, in which ſickneſs it pleaſed God to call him, making a very godly end; God have the praiſe for it.

Now to return to the aforeſaid Thomas Lelond again, he continuing ſtill in his office, did very ſeldom come to the church, but ſaid he was aged, and might not labour, and there kept with him Sir Ralph Parkinſon his prieſt, who could (as it was ſaid) adminiſter the communion unto the people, and ſing maſs unto his maſter: yes, and (as the fame reported) did a prettier feat than all that, for he begat two children by a ſervant in his houſe, his maſter knowing it, and ſaying nothing, for that he would not loſe his good maſs-prieſt.

Furthermore, this was noted in the ſame juſtice Lelond's behaviour at ſervice-time, that he had a little dog which he would play with all ſervice-time, and the ſame dog had a collar full of bells, ſo that the noiſe of them moleſted and troubled others as well as himſelf, from hearing the ſervice. Alſo it was obſerved in the ſame juſtice, that as he ſate in his chapel at ſervice-time, his manner was on a willow-bark to knit knots, for that he could not be ſuffered to have his beads, and to put the ſame upon a ſtring alſo. Witneſs hereof Edward Hurſt with others.

Furthermore, as concerning Henry Brown one of the four choſen men above-mentioned, this is alſo to be added, that the ſaid Henry Brown dwelling in the town of Pinnington in the ſame pariſh, 1564, had a little boy, who as he was playing in the town, one Glave's wife gave unto the boy a pair of beads made of wood for him to play withal. The little boy, being glad thereof to have ſuch a fine thing, went home and ſhewed them his father. His father ſeeing the beads, took them and burnt them, and when he had ſo done, went forth and asked who had given unto his little boy that pair of beads.

That did I, ſaid Glave's wife.

Well, ſaid he, I have burnt them.

Haſt thou ſo, ſaid ſhe? and thruſt him from her. They ſhall be the deareſt beads that ever thou ſaweſt, and immediately went and complained unto the juſtice, how Brown had burned her beads.

At this the juſtice was very angry, and directed his letter unto the conſtable of the ſame town, by his own hand ſubſcribed; the title of which ſuperſcription on the backſide was this, "To the conſtables of Pinnington give this."

This done, the conſtables according to their charge brought him before the juſtice at the time appointed; and when the juſtice came to talk with him, he was in ſuch a heat, that he called him thief, and ſaid that he had robbed his neighbour in burning of her beads, and that there were rings and other jewels on them, and that he might as well have picked her purſe; wherefore, ſaid he, I will lay thee in Lancaſter dungeon for this trick.

Whilſt they were thus talking, there came all his ſervants about them from their work, ſaying; Is this maſter doctor Brown that will burn beads? I pray you Sir, let us have him here and preach. I will give you a quarters wages, ſaith one; and I will give money, ſaith another, and he ſhall be maſter doctor; with much deriſion and ſcoffing at this poor man.

He hearing this, ſpake again boldly, and ſaid; Did you ſend for me to make a laughing ſtock of me? you be in office, and ought rather to come to the church, and ſee ſuch papiſtry aboliſhed yourſelf, than thus to trouble me for doing my duty: but I tell you plainly, that you do not come to church as you ought to do, and therefore with more things that I have to charge you withal, I ſay you do not well. When all this miſdemeanor by the juſtice laid to his charge would not prevail, and alſo witneſs came in of the papiſt who knew the beads, and teſtified that they were plain, and coſt but a halfpenny, he then went into his parlour in a chafe, and one maſter Exberſton a papiſt with him; which Exberſton turned back, and ſaid, Is it you Henry Brown, that maketh this ſtir? you are one of them that pulled down croſſes in the church, and pulled down the rood-ſollor, and all the ſaints; you were beſt now to go paint a black devil, and ſet him up and worſhip him, for that will ſerve well for your religion. And thus under ſuretiſhip he departed till July following, and then he ſaid he ſhould go to Lancaſter priſon, and ſo he came away.

The time drew on that he ſhould appear, but God ſtaid the matter, and in July, as the foreſaid Thomas Lelond ſate in his chair talking with his friends, he fell down ſuddenly dead, not much moving any joint: and thus was his end; from ſuch God defend us.

William Wood of Kent.

William Wood, baker, dwelling in the county of Kent, was examined before Dr. Kenall, chancellor of the dioceſe of Rocheſter, Dr. Chedſey, the mayor of Rocheſter, and Mr. Robinſon the ſcribe, on the 19th day of October, and in the ſecond year of queen Mary, in St. Nicholas's church in Rocheſter.

Scribe. William Wood, you are preſented becauſe you will not come to the church, nor receive the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar; How ſay you? have you received or have you not?

Wood. I have not received it, nor dare I receive it, as you now miniſter it.

Kenall. Thou heretic, what is the cauſe that thou haſt not received the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar? and at this word they all put off their caps and made low obeiſance.

Wood. There be three cauſes that make my conſcience afraid that I dare not receive it. The firſt, Chriſt did deliver it to his twelve apoſtles and ſaid, Take, eat, and drink ye all of this, &c. and ye eat and drink up all alone. The ſecond cauſe is; you hold it to be worſhipped, contrary to God's commandment, Thou ſhalt not bow down nor worſhip. The third cauſe is; you miniſter it in a ſtrange tongue, contrary to St. Paul's doctrine, I had rather have five words with underſtanding, than ten thouſand with tongues: by reaſon whereof the people be ignorant of the death of Chriſt.

Kenall. Thou heretic, wilt thou have any plainer words than theſe, "Take, eat, this is my body?" wilt thou deny the ſcripture?

Wood. I will not deny the holy ſcriptures, God forbid, but with my heart I do faithfully believe them. St. Paul ſaith, "God calleth thoſe things that are not, as though they were:" and Chriſt ſaith, "I am a vine: I am a door." St. Paul ſaith, "The rock is Chriſt:" All which are figurative ſpeeches, wherein one thing is ſpoken, and another thing is underſtood.

Robinſon. You make a very long talk of this matter: learn, Wood, learn.

Kenall. Nay, theſe heretics will not learn: look how this heretic glorieth in himſelf: thou fool, art thou wiſer than the queen and her council, and all the learned men of this realm?

Wood. And pleaſe you, Mr. chancellor, I think you would be loth to have ſuch glory, to have your life and goods taken away, and to be thus called upon, as you rail upon me. But the ſervant is not greater than his maſter. And where you do mock me, and ſay that I am wiſer than the queen and her council, St. Paul ſaith, "The wiſdom of the wiſe of this world is fooliſhneſs before God; and he that will be wiſe in this world, ſhall be accounted but a fool."

Kenall. Doſt not thou believe that after theſe words ſpoken by a prieſt, "Hoc eſt corpus meum, This is my body," there remaineth no more bread and wine, but the very fleſh and blood of Chriſt, as he was born of the virgin Mary, really and ſubſtantially, in quantity and quality, as he did hang upon the croſs?

Wood. I pray you, Mr. chancellor, give me leave, for my learning, to aſk you one queſtion, and I will anſwer you after.

Kenall. It is ſome wiſe queſtion, I warrant you.

Wood. God ſpake to the prophet Ezekiel, ſaying, "Thou ſon of man, take a raſor, and ſhave off the hair of thy head and of thy beard, and take one part and caſt it into the air; take the ſecond part and put it into thy coat lap; and take the third part, and caſt it into the fire: and this is Jeruſalem." I pray you Mr. chancellor, was this hair that the prophet did caſt into the fire, or was it Jeruſalem?

Kenall. It did ſignify Jeruſalem.

Wood. Even ſo this word of Chriſt, "This is my body," is not to be underſtood, that Chriſt's carnal, natural, and real body is in the ſame, in quantity and quality as it was born of the virgin Mary, and as he was crucified on the croſs, is preſent or incloſed in the ſacrament: but it doth ſignify Chriſt's body, as St. Paul ſaith, "So oft as ye eat of this bread and drink of this cup, you ſhall ſhew forth the Lord's death till he come." What ſhall the apoſtle mean by this word, "Till he come," if he were here carnally, naturally, corporally, and really, in the ſame quantity and quality as he was born of the virgin Mary, and as he did hang on the croſs, as you ſay? but St. Paul ſaith, "You ſhall ſhew the Lord's death till he come." This doth argue that he is not here as you would have us to believe.

Chedſey. I will prove that Chriſt is here preſent under the form of bread, but not in quantity and quality.

Kenall. Yes, he is here preſent in quantity and quality.

Chedſey. He is here preſent under a form, and not in quantity and quality.

Yes, ſaid Kenall.

No, ſaid Chedſey.

I will prove him here in quantity and quality, ſaid Kenall.

I will

I will prove the contrary, ſaid Chedſey.

And theſe two doctors were ſo earneſt in this matter, the one to affirm, the other to deny, contending ſo fiercely one with the other, that they foamed at the mouth, and one was ready to ſpit in another's face, ſo that in great fury and rage the two doctors roſe up from the judgment ſeat, and Dr. Kenall departed out of the church in great rage and fury immediately.

Wood. Behold good people, they would have us to believe, that Chriſt is naturally, really, in quantity and quality, preſent in the ſacrament, and yet they cannot tell themſelves, nor agree with themſelves how he is there.

At theſe words the people made a great ſhout, and the mayor ſtood up and commanded the people to be quiet, and to keep ſilence. And the God that did deliver St. Paul out of the hands of the high prieſts, by the contention that was between the phariſees and ſadducees, did even ſo deliver me at that time out of the mouths of the bloody papiſts, by means of the contention of theſe two doctors. Bleſſed be the name of the Lord, who hath promiſed to lay no more upon his people, than he will enable them to bear, and in the midſt of temptation can make a way for them (how, and when it pleaſeth him) to eſcape out of all dangers.

Many other like examples of God's helping hand have been declared upon his elect ſaints and children, a remarkable inſtance of which may be ſeen in Simon Grinæus, mentioned in the commentary of Melancthon, in his own words as followeth.

The Hiſtory of Simon Grinæus, collected out of Melancthon's Commentaries upon the tenth chapter of Daniel.

WHEN I was (ſaith he) at the aſſembly holden at Spire, in the year of our Lord 1539, by chance Simon Grinæus came thither unto me from the univerſity of Heidelberg, where he heard Faber the biſhop of Vienna, in a ſermon defend and maintain many deteſtable errors. When the ſermon was done, he followed Faber out of the church, and ſaluted him reverently, telling him that he had ſomewhat to ſay to him: the biſhop was willing to talk with him.

Then Grinæus ſaid unto him, that he was very ſorry that a man of ſuch learning and authority ſhould openly maintain ſuch errors as were both contumelious againſt God, and alſo might be refuted by the manifeſt teſtimonies of the ſcriptures. Ireneus writeth (ſaith he) that Polycarpus was wont to ſtop his ears whenſoever he heard any erroneous and wicked doctrine. With what mind then (think you) would Polycarpus have heard you argue and reaſon what it is the mouſe eateth, when he gnaweth the conſecrated hoſt? Who would not bewail ſuch ignorance and blindneſs of the church? With this the biſhop brake off his talk, and asked his name. This man diſſembling nothing, gently told him, that his name was Grinæus.

This biſhop (as many well know) was alſo timorous and fearful in the company of learned men. Wherefore he fearing the learning, eloquence, and fervent zeal of Grinæus, eſpecially in ſuch a matter as this was, feigned as though he had been ſent for by the king, and that he had no leiſure now to reaſon upon this matter. He pretended that he was very deſirous of acquaintance and longer talk with Grinæus, intreating him, that both for his own private cauſe, and alſo for the common-wealth, he would come again the next day unto him, and ſo ſhewed him his lodging, and appointed him an hour when he ſhould come: Grinæus, thinking that he had ſpoken unfeignedly, promiſed ſo to do.

When he was departed from the biſhop, he immediately came to us, and was ſcarcely ſate at the table (for it was ſupper-time) reciting part of the talk he had with the biſhop unto me and others there preſent, when as I ſitting with my company, was ſuddenly called out of the parlour by a certain ancient fatherly man, who ſhewing a ſingular gravity in his countenance, words, and behaviour, ſpake unto me, and ſaid, that the ſerjeants would by and by come unto our lodging, being ſent by the king's command, to carry Grinæus to priſon, whom the biſhop had accuſed to the king; commanding that Grinæus ſhould immediately depart out of the town; and exhorted me, that in no caſe we ſhould delay the time: and ſo bidding me farewel, departed. But what old man this was, I neither knew then, nor ever after could underſtand. I returning again to my company, bade them riſe, and told them what the old man had ſaid unto me.

By and by, we taking Grinæus in the midſt of us, carried him through the ſtreet to the river of Rhene, whereas after we had ſtaid upon the higher bank a while, until Grinæus with his companion were carried over in a ſmall boat, returning again to our lodging, we underſtood that the ſerjeants had been there, when we were but a little way gone out of the houſe. Now in what great danger Grinæus ſhould have been, if he had been carried to priſon by this cruelty of the biſhop every man eaſily may conjecture: wherefore we judged, that that moſt cruel intent and purpoſe of him, was diſappointed by God's merciful providence. And as I cannot ſay, what old man it was that gave me that warning, even ſo likewiſe the ſerjeants made ſuch quick ſpeed, that except Grinæus had been covered and defended by the angels through the marvellous providence of God, he could never have eſcaped.

Concerning the truth of this matter, there be many good men yet alive, who know both the ſame, and alſo were preſent at the doing thereof. Therefore let us give thanks unto God, who hath given us his angels to be our keepers and defenders, whereby with more quiet minds we may fulfil and do the office of our vocation.

With ſuch like examples of God's mighty and merciful cuſtody, the church of Chriſt in all ages doth abound, as by manifold experiences may appear as well among the Germans, as alſo in other places and ages: but in no place more, nor in any time more plentiful, than in this perſecuting time of queen Mary, in this our realm of England, as partly hath been already ſhewn, and part yet remaineth (God willing) moreover hereunto to be added.

The Lady Catherine, Ducheſs of Suffolk.

STEPHEN Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, ſurmiſing the lady Catherine, baroneſs of Willoughby and Ereſby, and ducheſs dowager of Suffolk, to be one of his ancient enemies, becauſe he knew he deſerved no better of her, deviſed, in the holy time of the firſt Lent in queen Mary's reign, a holy practice of revenge, firſt by touching her in the perſon of her huſband, Richard Berty, eſquire, for whom he ſent an attachment (having the great ſeal at his devotion) to the ſheriff of Lincolnſhire, with a ſpecial letter, commanding moſt ſtraitly the ſame ſheriff to attach the ſaid Richard immediately, and without bail to bring him up to London to his lordſhip. Mr. Berty being clear in conſcience, and free from offence toward the queen, could not conjecture any cauſe of this ſtrange proceſs, unleſs it were ſome quarrel for religion, which he thought could not be ſo ſore as the proceſs pretended.

The ſheriff, notwithſtanding the commandment, adventured only to take a bond of Mr. Berty with two ſureties, in a thouſand pound, for his appearance to be made before the biſhop on Good Friday following, at which day Mr. Berty appeared, the biſhop then lying at his houſe by St. Mary Overies. Of whoſe preſence when the biſhop underſtood by a gentleman of his chamber, he came out of his gallery into his dining chamber in a great great rage, where he found a crowd of ſuitors, ſaying he would not that day hear any, but came forth only to know of Mr. Berty, how he being a ſubject, durſt ſo arrogantly ſet at light two former proceſſes of the queen.

Mr. Berty anſwered, that albeit my lord's words might ſeem to the reſt ſomewhat ſharp towards him, yet he conceived great comfort of them. For whereas he before thought it extremity to be attached, having uſed no obſtinacy or contumacy, now he gathered of thoſe words, that my lord meant not otherwiſe but to have uſed ſome ordinary proceſs; albeit indeed none came to his hands.

Yea marry, ſaid the biſhop, I have ſent you two Subpœna's to appear immediately, and I am ſure you received them, for I committed the truſt of them to no worſe man but to Mr. Solicitor, and I ſhall make you an example to all Lincolnſhire for your obſtinacy.

Mr. Berty denying the receipt of any, humbly praved his lordſhip to ſuſpend his diſpleaſure and the puniſhment till he had good trial thereof, and then, if it pleaſe him, to double the pain for the fault, if any were.

Well, ſaid the biſhop, I have appointed myſelf this day (according to the holineſs of the ſame) for devotion, and I will not further trouble myſelf with you: but I enjoin you in a thouſand pound not to depart without leave, and to be here again to-morrow at ſeven of the clock. Mr. Berty came at the time appointed, at which time the biſhop had with him Mr. ſerjeant Stamford, to whom he moved certain queſtions of the ſaid Mr. Berty, becauſe Mr. ſerjeant was towards the lord Wriotheſley, late earl of Southampton, and chancellor of England, with whom the ſaid Mr. Berty was brought up. Mr. ſerjeant made very friendly report of Mr. Berty, of his own knowledge for the time of their converſation together. Whereupon the biſhop cauſed Mr. Berty to be brought in, and firſt making a falſe train (as God would without fire) before he would deſcend to the quarrel of religion, he aſſaulted him in this manner.

Biſhop of Wincheſter. The queen's pleaſure is, that you ſhall make preſent payment of 4000 pound, due to her father by duke Charles, late huſband to the ducheſs your wife, whoſe executor ſhe was.

Berty. Pleaſeth it your lordſhip, that debt is eſtalled, and is according to that eſtallment duly anſwered.

Biſhop. Tuſh, the queen will not be bound to eſtallments in the time of Kett's government: for ſo I eſteem the late government.

Berty. The eſtallment was appointed by king Henry the eighth: beſides, the ſame was by ſpecial commiſſioners confirmed in king Edward's time; and the lord treaſurer being an executor alſo to the duke Charles ſolely and wholly, took upon him before the ſaid commiſſioners to diſcharge the ſame.

Biſhop. If it be true that you ſay, I will ſhew you favou. But of another thing Mr. Berty I will admoniſh you, as meaning you well. I hear evil of your religion, yet I can hardly think evil of you, whoſe mother I know to be as godly and catholic as any within this land; yourſelf brought up with a maſter, whoſe education if I ſhould diſallow, I might be charged as author of his error. Beſides, partly I know you myſelf, and underſtand of my friends enough to make me your friend: wherefore I will not doubt of you; but I pray you, if I may aſk the queſtion of my lady your wife, is ſhe now as ready to ſet up the maſs, as ſhe was lately to pull it down, when ſhe cauſed in her progreſs, a dog in a rochet to be carried, and called by my name? or doth ſhe think her lambs now ſafe enough, who ſaid to me, when I vailed my bonnet to her out of my chamber window in the Tower, That it was merry with the lambs, now the wolf was ſhut up? Another time my lord her huſband, having invited me and divers ladies to dinner, deſired every lady to chooſe him whom ſhe loved beſt, and ſo place themſelves: my lady, your wife, taking me by the hand, for my lord would not have her to take himſelf, ſaid, That foraſmuch as ſhe could not ſit down with my lord whom ſhe loved beſt, ſhe had choſen him whom ſhe loved worſt.

Of the device of the dog, quoth Mr. Berty, ſhe was neither the author nor the allower. The words, though in that ſeaſon they ſounded bitter to your lordſhip, yet if it would pleaſe you without offence to know the cauſe, I am ſure the one will clear the other. As touching ſetting up of maſs, which ſhe learned, not only by ſtrong perſuaſions of divers excellent learned men, but by univerſal conſent and order whole ſix years paſt, inwardly to abhor, if ſhe ſhould outwardly allow, ſhe ſhould both to Chriſt ſhew herſelf a falſe chriſtian, and to her prince a maſquing ſubject. You know, my lord, one by judgment reformed, is more worth than a thouſand tranſformed temporiſers. To force a confeſſion of religion by mouth, contrary to that in the heart, worketh damnation where ſalvation is pretended.

Yea marry (quoth the biſhop) that deliberation would do well if ſhe were required to come from an old religion to a new: but now ſhe is to return from a new to an ancient religion; wherein when ſhe made me her goſſip, ſhe was as earneſt as any.

For that, my lord (ſaid Mr. Berty) not long ſince, ſhe anſwered a friend of hers uſing your lordſhip's ſpeech; That religion went not by age, but by truth: and therefore ſhe was to be turned by perſuaſion, and not by commandment.

I pray you (quoth the biſhop) think you it poſſible to perſuade her?

Yea verily (ſaid Mr. Berty) with the truth: for ſhe is reaſonable enough.

The biſhop thereunto replying, ſaid, It will be a marvellous grief to the prince of Spain, and to all the nobility that ſhall come with him, when they ſhall find but two noble perſonages of the Spaniſh race within this land, the queen, and my lady your wife, and one of them gone from the faith.

Mr. Berty anſwered, that he truſted they ſhould find no fruits of infidelity in her.

So the biſhop perſuaded Mr. Berty to labour earneſtly for the reformation of her opinion, and offering large friendſhip, releaſed him of his bond for further appearance.

The ducheſs and her huſband, daily more and more underſtanding by their friends that the biſhop meant to call her to an account of her faith, whereby extremity might follow, deviſed ways how they might paſs the ſeas by the queen's licence. Mr. Berty had a ready means; for there remained great ſums of money due to the old duke of Suffolk (one of whoſe executors the ducheſs was) beyond the ſeas, the emperor himſelf being one of thoſe debtors.

Mr. Berty communicated this his purpoſed ſuit for licence to paſs the ſeas, and the cauſe to the biſhop, adding, that he took this time moſt fit to deal with the emperor, by reaſon of likelihood of marriage between the queen and his ſon.

I like your device well, ſaid the biſhop, but I think it better that you tarry the prince's coming, and I will procure you his letters alſo to his father.

Nay, ſaid Mr. Berty, under your lordſhip's correction, and pardon for ſo liberal ſpeech, I ſuppoſe the time will then be leſs convenient: for when the marriage is conſummated, the emperor hath his deſire, but till then he will refuſe nothing to win credit with us.

By St. Mary, ſaid the biſhop, ſmiling, you gueſs ſhrewdly. Well, proceed in your ſuit to the queen, and it ſhall not lack my helping hand.

Mr. Berty found ſo good ſucceſs, that he obtained the queen's licence, not only to paſs the ſeas, but to paſs and repaſs them as often as ſeemed good unto him, till he had finiſhed all his buſineſs and cauſes beyond the ſeas. So he paſſed the ſeas at Dover about the beginning of June, in the firſt year of her reign, leaving the ducheſs behind, who by agreement and conſent between her and her huſband husband, followed, taking barge at Lion-key very early in the morning, on the firſt day of January next enſuing, not without ſome peril.

There was none of thoſe that went with her made privy to her going till the inſtant, but an old gentleman, called Mr. Robert Cranwell, whom Mr. Berty had eſpecially provided for that purpoſe. She took her daughter with her, an infant of one year old, and the meaneſt of her ſervants, for ſhe doubted the beſt would not adventure that fortune with her. They were in number four men, one a Greek born, who was a rider of horſes, another a joyner, the third a brewer, the fourth a fool, one of the kitchen, one gentlewoman, and a laundreſs.

As ſhe departed her houſe called the Barbican, betwixt four and five of the clock in the morning, with her company and baggage, one Atkinſon, a herald, keeper of her houſe, hearing a noiſe, roſe and came out with a torch in his hands as ſhe was yet iſſuing out of the gate; wherewith being amazed, ſhe was forced to leave a mail with neceſſaries for her young daughter, and a milk-pot with milk in the ſame gate-houſe, commanding all her ſervants to haſte away before to Lion-key: and taking with her only the two women and her child, ſo ſoon as ſhe went forth of her own houſe, perceiving the herald to follow, ſhe ſtept in at the Charter-houſe hard by. The herald coming out of the ducheſs's houſe, and ſeeing no body ſtirring nor aſſured (tho' by the mail ſuſpecting) that ſhe was departed, returned in; and while he ſtaid ranſacking parcels left in the mail, the ducheſs iſſued into the ſtreets, and proceeded in her journey, ſhe knowing the place only by the name where ſhe ſhould take her boat, but not the way thither, nor any with her. Likewiſe her ſervants having divided themſelves, none but one knew the way to the ſaid Lion-key.

So ſhe appeared like a mean merchant's wife, and the reſt like mean ſervants, walking in the ſtreets unknown, ſhe took the way that led to Finſbury field, and the others walked the city ſtreets, as they lay open before them, till by chance, more than diſcretion, they met all ſuddenly together a little within Moregate, from whence they paſſed directly to Lion-key, and there took barge in a morning ſo miſty, that the ſteerman was loth to launch out, but that they urged him. So ſoon as the day permitted, the council was informed of her departure, and ſome of them came forthwith to her houſe to enquire of the manner thereof, and took an inventory of her goods, beſides further orders deviſed for ſearch and watch to apprehend and ſtay her.

The fame of her departure reached Leigh, a town at the Land's end, before her approaching thither. By Leigh dwelt one Goſling, a merchant of London, an old acquaintance of Cranwell's, whither the ſaid Cranwell brought the ducheſs, naming her Mrs. White, the daughter of Mr. Goſling, for ſuch a daughter he had who never was in that country. She there repoſed herſelf, and made new garments for her daughter, having loſt her own in the mail at Barbican.

When the time came that ſhe ſhould take ſhip, being conſtrained that night to lie at an inn in Leigh (where ſhe was again almoſt betrayed) yet notwithſtanding by God's good working ſhe eſcaped that hazard; at length, as the tide and wind ſerved, they went aboard, and being carried twice into the ſeas, almoſt into the coaſt of Zeland, by contrary wind were driven to the place from whence they came; and at the laſt recoil, certain perſons came to the ſhore, ſuſpecting ſhe was within that ſhip; yet having examined one of her company that was on ſhore for freſh proviſion, and finding by the ſimplicity of his tale only the appearance of a mean merchant's wife to be on ſhipboard, he ceaſed to ſearch any further.

To be ſhort, as ſoon as the ducheſs had landed at Brabant, ſhe and her women were apparelled like the women of Netherland with hooks; and ſo ſhe and her huſband took their journey towards Cleveland, and being arrived at a town therein called Santon, took a houſe there, until they might further deviſe of ſome ſure place where to ſettle themſelves.

About five miles from Santon, is a free town, called Weſell, under the ſaid duke of Cleve's dominion, and one of the Hans-towns, privileged with the company of the Steel-yard in London, whither divers Walloons were fled for religion, and had for their miniſter one Francis Peruſell, then called Francis de Rivers, who had received ſome courteſy in England at the ducheſs's hands. Mr. Berty being yet at Stanton, practiſed with him to obtain a protection from the magiſtrates for his abode and his wife's at Weſell; which was the ſooner procured, because the ſtate of the ducheſs was not diſcovered; but only to the chief magiſtrate, earneſtly bent to ſhew them pleaſure, while this protection was in ſeeking.

In the mean while at the town of Stanton was a muttering, that the ducheſs and her huſband were greater perſonages than they gave themſelves forth; and the magiſtrates not very well inclined to religion, the biſhop of Arras alſo being dean of the great miniſter; order was taken, that the ducheſs and her huſband ſhould be examined of their condition and religion of the ſudden. Which was diſcovered by a gentleman of that country to Mr. Berty, he without delay taking no more than the ducheſs, her daughter, and two others with them, as tho' he meant no more than to take the air, about three of the clock in the afternoon in February, on foot, without hiring of horſe or waggon, for fear of diſcloſing his purpoſe, meant privily that night to get to Weſell, leaving the reſt of his family at Stanton.

After they had travelled one Engliſh mile from the town, there fell a mighty rain of continuance, whereby a long froſt and ice before congealed, was thawed, which doubled more the wearineſs of thoſe new lacquies. But being now on the way, and overtaken with the night, they ſent their two ſervants which only went with them) to villages as they paſſed, to hire ſome carr for their eaſe, but none could be hired. In the mean time, Mr. Berty was forced to carry the child, and the ducheſs his cloak and rapier. At laſt, betwixt ſix and ſeven of the clock in the dark night, they reached Weſell, and repairing to the inns for lodging, and ſome repoſe, after ſuch a painful journey, found hard entertainment; for going from inn to inn, offering large money for ſmall lodging, they were refuſed by all the innholders, ſuſpecting Mr. Berty to be a launce-knight, and the ducheſs to be his woman. The child for cold and ſuſtenance cried pitifully, the mother wept as faſt, the heavens rained as faſt as the clouds could pour.

Mr. Berty, deſtitute of all other ſuccour of hoſpitality, reſolved to bring the ducheſs to the porch of the great church in the town, and ſo to buy coals, victuals, and ſtraw for their miſerable repoſe there that night, or at leaſt by God's help he might provide her better lodging. Mr. Berty at that time underſtood not much Dutch, and by reaſon of bad weather, and late ſeaſon of the night, he could not happen upon any that could ſpeak Engliſh, French, Italian, or Latin, till at laſt going towards the church-porch, he heard two ſtriplings talking Latin, to whom he approached, and offered them two ſtivers to bring him to ſome Walloon's houſe.

By theſe boys, and God's good conduct, he chanced at the firſt upon the houſe where Mr. Peruſell ſupped that night, who had procured them the protection of the magiſtrates of that town. At the firſt knock, the good man of the houſe himſelf came to the door, and opening it, asked Mr. Berty what he was. Mr. Berty ſaid, an Engliſhman, that ſought for one Mr. Peruſell's houſe. The Walloon deſired Mr. Berty to ſtay awhile, who went back, and told Mr. Peruſell, that the ſame Engliſh gentleman, of whom they had talked at ſupper-time, had ſent by likelihood his ſervant to ſpeak with him. Whereupon Mr. Peruſell came to the door, and beholding Mr. Berty, the ducheſs, and their child, their faces, apparel, and bodies ſo far from their old forms, deformed deformed with wet, weather, and heavineſs, could not ſpeak to them, nor they to him for tears. At length recovering themſelves, they ſaluted one another, and ſo together entered the houſe, God knoweth full joyfully; Mr. Berty changing his apparel with the good man, the ducheſs with the good wife, and their child with the child of the houſe.

Within few days after, by Mr. Purſell's means, they hired a very fair houſe in the town, and did not delay to ſhew themſelves what they were, in ſuch good ſort as their preſent condition permitted. It was by this time through the whole town, what diſcourteſy the innholders had ſhewed unto them at their entry, inſomuch as on the Sunday following, a preacher in the pulpit openly in ſharp terms rebuked that great incivility toward ſtrangers, by allegation of ſundry places out of the holy ſcriptures, diſcourſing how not only princes ſometime are received in the image of private perſons, but angels in the ſhape of men, and that God of his juſtice would make them ſtrangers one day in another land, to have more ſenſe of the afflicted heart of a ſtranger.

The time thus paſſing forth, as they thought themſelves thus happily ſettled, ſuddenly a watch-word came from Sir John Maſon, then queen Mary's embaſſador in the Netherlands, that my Lord Paget had feigned an errand to the Baths that way: and whereas the duke of Brunſwick was ſhortly with ten enſigns to paſs by Weſell for the ſervice of the houſe of Auſtria againſt the French king, the ſaid ducheſs and her huſband ſhould be with the ſame company intercepted.

Wherefore, to prevent the cruelty of theſe enemies, Mr. Berty with his wife and child departed to a place called Wineheim, under the Palſgrave's dominion; where under his protection they continued till their neceſſaries began to fail them, and they, almoſt fainting under ſo heavy a burden, began to fail of hope.

At which time, in the midſt of their deſpair, there came ſuddenly letters to them from the palatine of Vilva, and the king of Poland being inſtructed of their hard eſtate by a baron, named Joannes Alaſco, that was ſome time in England, offering them large courteſy. This proviſion unlooked for, greatly revived their heavy ſpirits. Yet conſidering they ſhould remove from many of their countrymen and acquaintance, to a place ſo far diſtant, a country not haunted with the Engliſh, and perhaps upon their arrival not finding as they looked for, the end of their journey ſhould be worſe than the beginning; they deviſed thereupon with one Mr. Carloe, late biſhop of Chicheſter, that if he would vouchſafe to take ſome pains therein, they would make him a fellow of that journey. So finding him prone, they ſent with him letters of great thanks to the king and palatine, and alſo with a few principal jewels (which only they had left of many) to ſolicit for them, that the king would vouchſafe under his ſeal, to aſſure them of the thing which he had ſo honourably by letters offered.

That ſuit, by the forwardneſs of the palatine, was as ſoon granted as uttered. Upon which aſſurance the ſaid ducheſs and her huſband, with their family, entered the journey, in April, 1557, from the caſtle of Wineheim, where they before lay, towards Frankfort. In which journey, it were long here to deſcribe what dangers fell by the way upon them and their whole company, by reaſon of the landgrave's captain, who, under a quarrel pretended for a ſpaniel of Mr. Berty's, ſet upon them in the highway with his horſemen, thruſting their boreſpears through the waggon where the children and women were, Maſter Berty having but four horſemen with him. In which ſcuffle it happened that the captain's horſe was ſlain under him.

Whereupon a rumour was ſpread immediately through the towns and villages about, that the landgrave's captain ſhould be ſlain by certain Walloons, which exaſperated the countrymen the more fiercely againſt Mr. Berty, as afterward it proved. For as he was motioned by his wife to ſave himſelf by the ſwiftneſs of his horſe, and to recover ſome town thereby for his reſcue, he ſo doing, was in worſe caſe than before: for the townſmen and the captain's brother, ſuppoſing no leſs but that the captain had been ſlain, preſſed ſo eagerly upon him, that he had been there taken and murdered among them, had not he (as God would have it) eſpying a ladder leaning to a window, by which he got into the houſe, and went up into the garret, where, with his dagger and rapier he defended himſelf for a time: but at length the burgh-maſter coming thither with another magiſtrate, who could ſpeak Latin, he was adviſed to ſubmit himſelf to the order of the law. Mr. Berty, knowing himſelf to be clear, and the captain to be alive, was the more bold to ſubmit himſelf to the judgment of the law, upon condition that the magiſtrate would receive him under ſafe conduct, and defend him from the rage of the multitude. Which being promiſed, he willingly delivered up his weapons, and peaceably ſurrendered himſelf into the hands of the magiſtrates, and ſo was committed to ſafe cuſtody till the truth of this cauſe could be tried.

Then Mr. Berty wrote a letter to the landgrave, and another to the earl of Erbagh, dwelling about eight miles off, who came early in the morning to the town where the ducheſs was brought with her waggon, Mr. Berty alſo being in the ſame town under cuſtody.

The earl, who had ſome intelligence before of the ducheſs, after he was come and had ſhewed her ſuch courteſy as he thought belonged to her eſtate and dignity, the townſmen perceiving the earl behave himſelf ſo humbly to her, began to conſider more of the matter, and further underſtanding the captain to be alive, both they, and eſpecially the authors of this ſtir, drew in their horns, ſhrunk away, and made all the friends they could to Mr. Berty and his lady, beſeeching them not to report their doings after the worſt manner.

And thus Mr. Berty and his wife, eſcaping that danger, proceeded in their journey toward Poland, where in concluſion they were quietly entertained by the king, and placed honourably in the earldom of the ſaid king of Poles in Sanogelia, called Crozan, where Mr. Berty with the ducheſs having the king's abſolute power of government over the ſaid earldom, continued in honour, peace and plenty, till the death of queen Mary.

Thomas Horton, Miniſter.

THomas Horton uſed oftentimes to travel between Germany and England, for the benefit and ſuſtenance of the poor Engliſh exiles there: ſo he journeying on a time between Maeſtricht and Cologn, chanced to be taken by certain rovers, and ſo being led by them away was in no little danger: and yet this danger of his was not ſo great, but the preſent help of the Lord was greater to aid and deliver him out of the ſame.

Thomas Sprat, of Kent, Tanner.

HE had been ſome time a ſervant to one juſtice Brent, a heavy perſecutor, and therefore forſaking his maſter for religion ſake, he went to Calice (accompanied by one William Porrege, who was afterwards a miniſter) from whence they uſed often for their neceſſary affairs, to have recourſe into England.

In the fourth year of queen Mary they landed at Dover, and taking their journey together toward Sandwich, ſuddenly upon the way, three miles from Dover, they happened to meet juſtice Brent, the two Blachendens, and other gentlemen with their ſervants, to the number of ten or twelve horſes. One of the Blachendens happened pened to know William Porrege, the other had only heard of his name.

Sprat firſt eſpying his maſter Brent, was much ſurpriſed, ſaying to his companion, Yonder is Mr. Brent, God have mercy upon us. Well, quoth Porrege, ſeeing now there is no remedy, let us go on our way. And ſo thinking to paſs by them, they kept themſelves at a diſtance, Sprat alſo ſhadowing his face with his cloak.

One of Mr. Brent's ſervants knowing Sprat, called out to his maſter, ſaying, Yonder is Thomas Sprat; at which words they all ſtopt their horſes, and called for Thomas Sprat to come to them. They call you, ſaid William Porrege; now there is no remedy but we are taken: and ſo would have perſuaded him to go to them, and being called for, for that there was no eſcaping from ſo many horſemen in thoſe plains and downs, where was no wood near them by a mile, and but one hedge about a ſtone's throw off. All this notwithſtanding, Sprat ſtaid, and would not go. Then they called again, ſitting ſtill on horſeback. Ah, ſirrah, quoth the juſtice, why come ye not hither? and ſtill his company moved him to go, ſeeing there was no hope of getting away. Nay, ſaid Sprat, I will not go to them; and therewith took to his legs, running to the hedge that was next to him. They ſeeing that, ſet ſpurs to their horſes, thinking it impoſſible for him to eſcape their hands. When he got to the hedge, ſcrambling through the buſhes, they were at his heels and ſtruck at him with their ſwords; one of the Blachendens (both of them haters of God's word) cruelly crying, Cut one of his legs off.

He had no ſooner got through the hedge, but one of juſtice Brent's ſervants (a fellow that had ſome time been his fellow-ſervant) followed him on foot; the reſt rode up the other ſide of the hedge, to meet him at the end.

While they were following Sprat, only one remained with William Porrege (which was one of the Blachendens, but not he that knew him) who began to queſtion him, not aſking what was his name (as God would have it) for then he had been known and taken; but from whence he came, and how he got into Sprat's company; and whither he was going? He anſwered, that he came from Calice, and Sprat came over with him in the paſſage-boat, and they were both going to Sandwich: and ſo without any more queſtions he let him depart. But to return;

As Sprat was purſued on the one ſide of the hedge by his old fellow-ſervant in his boots, and on the other ſide by horſemen, his fellow-ſervant cried out, You had as good tarry, for we will have you, we will have you: yet notwithſtanding he ſtill kept his courſe till he came to a ſteep down-hill at the end of the hedge, down which he ran from them, for the horſemen could not follow him without fetching a great compaſs about. After he had ran almoſt a mile, he got to a wood, but by that time they were juſt behind him; but night coming on, and it began to rain, they purſued him no further. And thus by the providence of God they both got clear.

Not long after this, one of the two cruel Blachendens was cruelly murdered by his own ſervant.

John Cornet.

THIS young man was apprentice to a muſician at Colcheſter, and being ſent by his maſter to a wedding (in the ſecond year of queen Mary) in a town hard by, called Rough-hedge, was requeſted by a company there of good men, the conſtable being preſent, to ſing ſome ſongs of the ſcripture, he happened to ſing a ſong called, News out of London, which tended againſt the maſs, and againſt the queen's miſ-proceedings.

Whereupon the next day he was accuſed by the parſon of Rough-hedge, called Yackſley, and ſo committed, firſt to the conſtable, where his maſter gave him over, and his mother forſook, and curſed him. From thence was ſent to juſtice Cannall, and then to the earl of Oxford, where he was firſt put in irons and chains, and after that ſo manacled, that the blood ſpirted out of his fingers ends, becauſe he would not confeſs the names of thoſe who allured him to ſing. After that, he was ſent again to Rough-hedge, and there whipped till the blood followed, and baniſhed the town for ever.

Thomas Bryce.

HE being in the houſe of John Seal, in the pariſh of Horting, the bailiffs and other neighbours were ſent by Sir John Baker to ſearch for, and apprehend him, and though they perfectly knew his ſtature and the colour of his garments, yet then they had no power to know him, though he ſtood before their faces. So miraculouſly did the Almighty dazzle their eyes, that they aſked for him, and looked on him, yet notwithſtanding he quietly took his bag of books, and departed out of the houſe without any hand laid upon him.

Alſo another time, about the ſecond year of queen Mary, the ſaid Thomas Bryce, with John Bryce, his elder brother, coming then from Weſell, meeting together at their father's houſe, as they travelled towards London, to give warning there to one Springfield, which elſe was like to be taken unawares by his enemies waiting for him upon Gad's-hill, fell in company with a promoter, who dogged them and followed them to Graveſend, into the town, and laid the houſe for them where they were, all the ways as they ſhould go to the water's ſide, ſo that it had not been poſſible for them to have avoided the preſent danger of thoſe proſecutors, had not God's provident care otherwiſe diſpoſed for his ſervants, through the hoſtler of the inn, covertly to convey them by a ſecret paſſage; whereby they took barge a mile out of town, and ſo in the end both the lives of them, and alſo of Springfield, were preſerved, through God's gracious protection.

Gertrude Crokhay.

GErtrude Crokhay, dwelling at St. Katherine's, by the Tower of London, and being then in her huſband's houſe, it happened then in the Year 1558, that the pope's childiſh St. Nicholas went about the pariſh. Which ſhe underſtanding, ſhut her door againſt him, not ſuffering him to enter into her houſe.

Then doctor Mallet hearing thereof, and being then maſter of the ſaid St. Katherine's, the next day came to her with twenty at his tail, thinking belike to affright her, and aſked why ſhe would not the night before let in St. Nicholas, and receive his bleſſing, &c. To whom ſhe anſwered thus: Sir, I know not St. Nicholas that came hither. Yes, quoth Mallet, here was one that repreſented St. Nicholas.

Indeed, Sir, ſaid ſhe, here was one that was my neighbour's child, but not St. Nicholas: for St. Nicholas is in heaven. I was afraid of them that came with him to have my purſe cut by them: for I have heard of men robbed by St. Nicholas's clerks, &c. So Mallet perceiving that nothing could be gotten at her hands, went his way as he came, and ſhe for that time ſo eſcaped.

Then in the year 1557, a little before Whitſontide, it happened that the ſaid Gertrude anſwered for a child that was baptized of one Thomas Saunders, which child was chriſtened ſecretly in a houſe after the order of the ſervice book in king Edward's time: and that being ſoon known to her enemies, ſhe was ſought for. Who underſtanding nothing thereof, went beyond the ſea into Guelderland, to ſee certain lands that ſhould come to her children in the right of her firſt huſband, who was a ſtranger born: and being there about a quarter of a year, at length coming homeward by Antwerp, ſhe chanced to meet with one John Johnſon, a Dutchman, alias John de Villa of Antwerp, ſhipper, who ſeeing her there, went out of malice to the Margrave, and accuſed her to be an anabaptiſt, whereby ſhe was taken and carried to priſon. The cauſe why he did thus was, becauſe he claimed of Mr. Crokhay her huſband a piece of money which was not his due, for a ſhip that Mr. Crokhay bought of him, and becauſe he could not get it, he wrought this diſpleaſure. Well, ſhe being in priſon, lay there a fortnight. In which time ſhe ſaw ſome that were priſoners there, who privily were drowned in Rheniſh wine-fats, and after ſecretly put into ſacks, and caſt into the river. Now ſhe, good woman, expecting to be ſo ſerved, took thereby ſuch fear, that it brought the beginning of her ſickneſs, of which at length ſhe died.

Then at laſt ſhe was called before the Margrave, and charged with anabaptiſtry: which ſhe there utterly denied, and deteſted the error, declaring before him in Dutch her faith boldly, without any fear. So the Margrave hearing the ſame, in the end being well pleaſed with the profeſſion, at the ſuit of ſome of her friends delivered her out of priſon, but took away her book; and ſo ſhe came over into England again.

Thomas Roſe, a Preacher.

HE was a Devonſhire man, born in Ermouth, and being made prieſt in that country, was brought out of it by one Mr. Fabian, to Polſted in Suffolk, where the ſaid Mr. Fabian was parſon, and in a ſhort time after by his means was placed in the town of Hadley, where he, firſt coming to ſome knowledge of the goſpel, began there to treat upon the creed, and thereupon took occaſion to inveigh againſt purgatory, praying to ſaints and images, about the time that Mr. Latimer began to preach at Cambridge, in the time of Bilney and Arthur: inſomuch that many embracing the truth of Chriſt's goſpel, againſt the ſaid purgatory, and other points, and the number of them daily increaſing, the adverſaries began to ſtir againſt him, inſomuch that Mr. Bate (who afterwards became a godly zealous man) was then brought to preach againſt the ſaid Thomas Roſe; notwithſtanding this, he continued ſtill very vehemently againſt images, and the Lord ſo bleſſed his labours, that many began to contrive how they might deface and deſtroy them, and eſpecially four men, whoſe names were, Ring, Debnam, Marſh, and Gard, who uſually reſorted to his ſermons, by which they were ſo inflamed, that ſoon after they ventured to deſtroy the rood of the court of Dover, which coſt three of them their lives, and were hanged in chains, becauſe they would not accuſe Thomas Roſe as their counſellor. The ſaid Roſe had the coat of the rood brought to him afterwards, who burnt it. The rood was ſaid to have done many and great miracles, yet being in the fire, could not help himſelf, but burned like a block, as indeed it was.

At this time there were two ſore enemies in Hadley; Walter Clerk and John Clerk, two brethren: theſe complained to the council, that an hundred men were not able to fetch Thomas Roſe out of Hadley, who then was upon examination of his doctrine committed to the commiſſaries keeping. And indeed ſuch was the zeal of a number towards the truth then in that town, that they were much offended that their miniſter was ſo taken from them, and had therefore by force brought him from the commiſſary, if certain wiſe men had not otherwiſe perſuaded them, who at length alſo with more quiet placed him in his office again: which ſo enraged the two brethren, Walter Clerk and John Clerk, that they complained to the council, as aforeſaid; whereupon a ſerjeant at arms was ſent from the council to arreſt Thomas Roſe, and bring him before them. Then his adverſaries laid to his charge, that he was privy to the burning of the rood at Dover-court, and upon this he was committed to priſon in the biſhop of Lincoln's houſe, in Holbourn, where he remained from Shrovetide to Whitſontide, and great part of the time in the ſtocks.

The ſtocks was very high and large, ſo that day and night he lay with his back on the ground, upon a little ſtraw, with his heels ſo high, that the blood was fallen from his feet, which were ſo benumbed, that he could hardly feel them for a long time. By this treatment he fell ſick, and the keeper often hearing him cry and groan through extremity of pain, was moved with pity, and went to the biſhop and told him, that he would not keep him to die under his hand, and upon this he had ſome more eaſe and liberty. Now at this time his mother was come from Hadley to ſee him, but ſhe was not ſuffered to ſpeak with him (ſuch was their cruelty) but the biſhop flattered her, and gave her a pair of pardon-beads, and bade her go home and pray, for ſhe might not ſee him; which thing pierced the hearts both of the mother and the ſon. At this time alſo certain men of Hadley, very deſirous to ſee him, endeavoured to ſpeak with him, but might not be ſuffered, till at length they gave him four ſhillings, and yet then might not ſpeak to him, or ſee him, otherwiſe than through a grate. And thus continued he till Midſummer in priſon. Then he was removed to Lambeth, the firſt year of Dr. Cranmer's conſecration, who uſed him much more courteouſly than ever the biſhop of Lincoln did, and at length wrought his deliverance, and ſet him at liberty: but yet ſo, that he was bound not to come within twenty miles of Hadley. After this he came to London, and there preached the goſpel half a year, till Hadley men hearing thereof, laboured to have him to Hadley again, and indeed by means of Sir John Rainford, knight, obtained at the archbiſhop's houſe to have him thither: howbeit, by means one was placed in the cure at Hadley, he could not enjoy his office again there, but went to Stratford, three miles off, and there continued in preaching the word three years, till at length the adverſaries procured an inhibition from the biſhop of Norwich, to put him to ſilence. But a great number laboured to have him continue in preaching, and ſubſcribed a ſupplication to the archbiſhop, with one hundred and twenty hands, who under their ſeals alſo teſtified of his honeſt demeanor, ſo that the adverſaries this way not prevailing, they indicted him at Bury in Suffolk, ſo that he was conſtrained to flee to London, and to uſe the aid of the lord Audly, then lord chancellor, who removed the matter from them, and called it before him, and after examination of the matter, ſet him free, and ſent him by a token to the lord Cromwell, then lord privy ſeal, for a licence from the king to preach; which thing obtained by the lord Cromwell his means (who hereupon alſo had admitted the ſaid Thomas Roſe his chaplain) forthwith he was ſent into Lincolnſhire and to York. In the mean time ſuch complaint was made to the duke of Norfolk, for that he preached againſt auricular confeſſion tranſubſtantiation, and ſuch other points contained in the ſix articles (which then to have done by law was death) that the duke in his own perſon not only ſought him at Norwich, but alſo beſet all the ports for him, from Yarmouth to London, and being lieutenant, commanded, that whoſoever could take the ſaid Thomas Roſe, ſhould hang him on the next tree. Howbeit, the ſaid Thomas Roſe at his coming home, having warning hereof by certain godly perſons, was conveyed away, and paſſed over into Flanders, and ſo to Zurich in Switzerland, where a time he remained with Mr. Bullinger, and afterwards went to Baſil, and there hoſted with maſter Grinæus, till letters came that maſter doctor Barnes ſhould be biſhop of Norwich, and things ſhould be reformed, and he reſtored. But when he came into England again, it was not ſo, and therefore forthwith fled again beyond the ſeas, being ſo beſet, as if the mighty providence of God had not ſent him in readineſs to receive him the ſelf ſame man, boat, and and boy that before carried him over, it had not been poſſible for him to have eſcaped. But ſuch was the goodneſs of God towards him, that he ſafely was conveyed, and lived at Barow the ſpace of three years, till at length purpoſing to come over into England, about buſineſs that he had, he, his wife, and their child, being about a year and three quarters old, upon the ſea, the ſhip being in great danger, wherein they ſailed, for the maſt being hewn down in that peril, they were carried whitherſoever the waves toſſed them; ſo they with divers others expected nothing but death. Howbeit, at length they were taken priſoners, and carried into Diepe in France, having all their ſtuff taken from them, and forty pound in money. There they remained priſoners from Michaelmas to All-hallontide, in great heavineſs, not knowing what would become of them, but depending only upon God's providence. It pleaſed God at that ſame time, that one Mr. Young of the town of Rye (who had heard him preach before) came thither for the redeeming of certain Engliſhmen there taken priſoners. This Mr. Young moved to ſee them in this caſe, much pitied them, and comforted them, and told them he would pay their ranſom, and ſo he did, had them away, and brought them to Rye, and from thence by ſtealth came they to London. At length the honourable earl of Suſſex, hearing of the ſaid Thomas Roſe, ſent for him, his wife, and his child, and had them to his houſe at Attleborough, where they continued, till at length it was blazed abroad, that the earl was a maintainer of ſuch a man to read in his houſe, as had preached againſt the catholic faith (as they term it); the earl being at the parliament, and hearing thereof, wrote a letter to warn him to make ſhift for himſelf, and to avoid. So that from thence he paſſed to London, making hard ſhift for a year there and ſomewhat more, till the death of king Henry. After the king's death, he and others, who in the king's general pardon were excepted (and therefore dead men, if they had been taken whilſt king Henry lived) by certain of the council were ſet at liberty, and at length, after king Edward was crowned, were licenſed to preach again by the king; who gave unto the ſaid Thomas Roſe the benefice of Weſt Ham, by London. But at the death of that virtuous and noble prince, he was deprived of all, and ſo ſhould alſo have been of his life, had not God appointed him friends, who received him in London ſecretly, as their teacher in the congregation, among whom for the poor priſoners at their aſſemblies forty-one in a night oftentimes were gathered. And thus he continued amongſt them, and with the lady Vane, almoſt a year in the reign of queen Mary. But altho' he oftentimes eſcaped ſecretly whilſt he read to the godly in ſundry places of London, yet at length, through a Judas that betrayed them, he with thirty-five more were taken in Bow-church-yard at a ſheerman's houſe on New-year's day at night. The reſt being committed to priſon, the ſaid Thomas Roſe was had to Stephen Gardiner, the biſhop of Wincheſter, who would not ſpeak with him that night, but committed him to the Clink till the Tueſday after.

The firſt Examination of Thomas Roſe, at Saint Mary Overy's, before the Biſhop of Wincheſter.

Roſe. I Wonder, my lord, that I ſhould be thus troubled for that which by the word of God hath been eſtabliſhed, and by the laws of this realm hath been allowed, and by your own writing, ſo notably in your book, De vera obedientia, confirmed.

Biſhop. Ah, ſirrah, haſt thou gotten that?

Roſe. Yea, my lord, I thank God, and do confeſs myſelf much thereby confirmed. For as touching the doctrine of ſupremacy, againſt the biſhop of Rome's uſurped authority, no man hath ſaid further. And as I remember, you confeſs it, that when this truth was revealed unto you, you thought the ſcales to fall from your eyes.

Biſhop. Thou lieſt like a varlet, there is no ſuch thing in my book: but I ſhall handle thee, and ſuch as thou art, well enough. I have long looked for thee, and at length have caught thee; I will know who be thy maintainers, or elſe I will make thee a foot longer.

Roſe. My lord, you ſhall do as much as pleaſeth God, and no more, yet the law is in your hand; but I have God for my maintainer, and none other. At theſe words one of his ſervants ſtepped forth, and ſaid, My lord, I heard this man preach by Norwich, in Sir John Robſter's houſe; and in his prayer he deſired God to turn queen Mary's heart, or elſe to take her out of the world: and this was in king Edward's time.

Roſe. My lord, I made no ſuch prayer, but next after the king, I mentioned her in this manner, ſaying, Ye ſhall pray for my lady Mary's grace, that God will vouchſafe to endue her with his Spirit, that ſhe graciouſly may perceive the myſteries contained within his holy laws, and ſo render unto him her heart purified with true faith, and true and loyal obedience to her ſovereign lord and king, to the good example of the inferior ſubjects. And this, my lord, is already anſwered in mine own hand-writing to the council.

Unto this he ſaid little, but turning his face to ſome that were by him, this is he, ſaid the biſhop, that my lord of Norwich told me had gotten his maid with child.

Roſe. This is no hereſy, my lord, although it be a lye. Indeed certain wicked perſons raiſed this report of me, for the hatred they bare to the doctrine which I preached: but for purgation of myſelf herein, I had no leſs than ſix of the council's hands, that there might be due and diligent examination for this matter in the country by men of worſhip appointed for that purpoſe, who can all teſtify, I thank God, that I am moſt clear from ſuch wickedneſs, and indeed they have cleared me from it; and therefore I doubt not but all good men will eſpy the miſchievous device of mine adverſaries, which (when other ways failed) by ſuch ſiniſter means went about to draw me into diſcredit and hatred: but God, who is the helper of the innocent, and ſearcher of mens hearts, hath and doth defend me, and hath laid open things that were hid, to their ſhame. One of the chief reporters of this, that I ſhould ſo abuſe myſelf, was one Mr. Clerk, ſervant, and in ſome eſtimation with the old treaſurer of England, reputed and taken for a conjurer, who afterward hanged himſelf in the Tower. Then the biſhop commanded that I ſhould be carried to the Tower, and kept ſafely, where I lay till the week before Whitſontide. After which time I was twice called, when as the biſhop came to the Tower about other priſoners. Notwithſtanding the biſhop had no great talk with me, but ſpake friendly. Howbeit, one Sir Richard Southwell, knight, ſtill accuſed me for my prayer, and ſaid I did put a difference betwixt lady Mary and lady Elizabeth, for that I prayed in king Edward's faith, and prayed that he would confirm lady Elizabeth in that which was well begun in her. Unto this the biſhop ſaid little. But in the week before Pentecoſt, I was conveyed from the Tower to Norwich, there to be examined by the biſhop and his clergy, as concerning my faith, the manner whereof here followeth.

The ſecond Examination of Thomas Roſe before Dr. Hopkins, Biſhop of Norwich, in the Preſence of Sir W. Woodhouſe, Mr. Steward the Chancellor, Dr. Barret, with divers others, Anno 1553.

AFTER I was preſented by my keeper, the biſhop immediately aſked me what I was. I told him I had been a miniſter.

Biſhop.

Biſhop. What is this to the purpoſe? were ye a frier or a prieſt?

Roſe. Frier was I never, but a prieſt have I been, and beneficed by the king's majeſty.

Biſhop. Where were ye made prieſt?

Roſe. In Exeter, in the county where I was born. Then the biſhop required of me my letters of orders. I told him I knew not where they were become, for they were things of me not greatly regarded.

Biſhop. Well, you are ſent to me to be examined; what ſay you, will you ſubmit yourſelf to the order of the church of England?

Roſe. My lord, I truſt I am not out of the order of Chriſt's church in England, neither do I know myſelf an offender thereagainſt.

Biſhop. What? yes, ye have preached moſt damnable and deviliſh doctrine.

Roſe. Not ſo, my lord. The doctrine by me here preached was both true, ſincere and holy. But indeed the doctrine that is now ſet forth, is moſt wicked and damnable, yea, and that both againſt God's laws and man's. But as for the doctrine by me preached, it is grounded upon the word of God, ſet out alſo by the authority of two moſt mighty kings, with the conſent of all the nobility and clergy of the ſame: ſo that I preached nothing but their lawful proceedings, having their lawful authority under their broad ſeal for confirmation of the ſame, for which my doing ye cannot juſtly charge me. For why, ſince the law ceaſed, I have kept ſilence, ſo that the council which ſent me unto you have not charged me therewith. Wherefore ye do me open wrong to burden me with that wherein I am free.

Chancellor. What, Sir? ye are very captious; anſwereſt thou my lord after ſuch a ſort?

Roſe. Sir, I anſwer for myſelf, and according to the truth: wherewith ye ought not to be offended, if ye be of God.

Chancellor. Thou art an evil man. Waſt thou not abjured before now?

Roſe. No, ye untruly report me, and are in no wiſe able to prove that which ye have ſpoken: ſo that your words appear to proceed altogether of malice, which I have not deſerved at your hands. But in this I well perceive ye are made an inſtrument to utter other men's malice conceived of old.

Chancellor. What ſayeſt thou to the real preſence in the ſacrament?

Roſe. I know right well ye were made an inſtrument to ſeek innocent blood: well, ye may have it, if God permit, it is preſent at hand, for I am not come hither to lye, but to die (if God ſee it good) in defence of that which I have ſaid. Wherefore ye may begin when ye ſhall think good, for I have ſaid nothing but the truth, and that which in thoſe days was by all men allowed for truth, and againſt which ye at that time durſt not once whiſper, although ye now brag never ſo much.

Biſhop. Well father Roſe, whatſoever hath been done in times paſt, ſhall not now be called in queſtion, ſo that ye now ſubmit yourſelf. For not only you, but all the whole realm hath been out of the right way, both high and low, ſpiritual and temporal, but all notwithſtanding have ſubmitted themſelves and acknowledged their faith. Wherefore if ye will be accounted for an Engliſhman, ye muſt likewiſe ſubmit yourſelf.

Roſe. My lord, I am an Engliſhman born, and do moſt humbly require of the chriſtian congregetion of England, to be counted as a particular member of the ſame, and with all due reverence ſubmit myſelf as in the form and manner following: That whatſoever law or laws ſhall be ſet forth in the ſame for the eſtabliſhment of Chriſt's true religion, and that according to the faith and doctrine of the holy patriarchs and prophets, Jeſus Chriſt and his holy apoſtles, with the faithful fathers of Chriſt's primitive church, I do not only hold it and believe it, but alſo moſt reverently obey it. At which my aſſertion, the biſhop ſeemed to be greatly rejoiced, and ſaid, Well, then we ſhall ſoon be at a point: but you ſhall take this for no day of examination, but rather of communication, ſo that ye ſhall now depart, and conſider with yourſelf until we call for you again: and ſo ended our firſt meeting.

The third Examination of Thomas Roſe.

ON Friday following, I was called again into Chriſt-church within their lady's chapel (as they termed it), where was gathered a great part of the whole city of Norwich, and after I was by my keeper preſented, the biſhop began with a great proteſtation, and after many words, demanded of me, Whether according to my former promiſe I would ſubmit myſelf or no. I anſwered as before I had done, That according to my former proteſtation, I would moſt gladly obey. Then ſaid the chancellor (to utter his gentleneſs) I think you do but feign.

Roſe. The fault then, ſaid I, ſhall be in yourſelf, and not in me. For if you burden me with nothing but ſcriptures, and the fathers of Chriſt's primitive church, then as I ſaid before, ſo I ſay again, I ſhall moſt gladly obey.

Chancellor. Well then, ſeeing you challenge to be member of the church of England, your mother here for a trial of obedience provoketh you, as mothers are wont to allure you, to receive this little gift at her hand.

Roſe. Fo ſooth, ſaid I, if ſhe offer it to me, as received of God my Father, I ſhall gladly receive it, as from the hand of my very true and ghoſtly mother.

Chancellor. What ſay you to ear-confeſſion? Is it not a law eccleſiaſtical, and neceſſary for the church of England?

Roſe. Some ways it might be permitted, and ſome ways not, and that becauſe it had its original of God and his bleſſed word; and yet I deny not, but that a man being troubled in his conſcience, and reſorting to a diſcreet, ſober and chriſtian learned man for the quieting of his mind, might well be permitted: but to blind a man under pain of damnation, once every year, to number his ſins into the ears of a filthy lecherous prieſt, is not of God, neither can be proved by his word.

Biſhop. Ah, Sirrah, ye will admit nothing but ſcripture, I ſee well.

Roſe. No truly, my lord, I admit nothing but ſcripture for the regimen of the ſoul: for why, faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God, and where the word of God is not, there ought no belief to be given. For whatſoever is not of faith is ſin. And here they left off ſpeaking any more of that matter.

But then Mr. Chancellor began to whet his teeth at me, ſaying, Yea, but you have preached, that the real, natural, and ſubſtantial preſence of Chriſt is not in the ſacrament of the altar: what ſay ye to that?

Roſe. Verily, I ſay that you are a bloody man, and ſeek to quench your thirſt with the blood of an innocent, and therefore to ſatisfy you in that behalf, I ſay verily unto you, that ſo I have here preached: and although contrary to law, you charge me with the ſame, yet will I in no wiſe deny it, though juſtly I might do it, but ſtand thereunto, even to ſeal it with my blood, deſiring all that be here preſent, to teſtify the ſame, and believe it as the only truth.

Biſhop. I charge you all to believe it not.

Roſe. Yea, but my lord, if ye will needs have credence given you, you muſt bring God's word to maintain your ſayings.

Biſhop. Why, doth not Chriſt ſay, This is my body? And can there be any plainer words ſpoken?

Roſe. It is true, my lord, the words be as plain as can be; and even ſo be theſe, where it is ſaid, I am a door, a vine, and Chriſt called a ſtone, a lion, and yet is he naturally naturally none of theſe: for they be all figurative ſpeeches, as both the ſcriptures and fathers do ſufficiently prove.

At which ſaying, the biſhop would have had me ſtay, ſaying, I ſhould have another day wherein I might take better advice.

Roſe. Not ſo, my lord, for I am at a full point with myſelf in that matter, and am right well able to prove both your tranſubſtantiation, with the real preſence, to be againſt the ſcriptures, and the ancient fathers of the primitive church. For Juſtin, which is one of the moſt ancient writers that ever wrote upon the ſacrament, writeth in his ſecond apology, that the bread, water and wine in the ſacrament, are not to be taken as other meats and drinks, but are meats purpoſely ordained to give thanks unto God, and therefore are called EUCHARISTIA, and alſo have the names of the body and blood of Chriſt: and that it is not lawful for any man to eat and drink of them, but ſuch as profeſs the religion of Chriſt, and live alſo according to their profeſſion: and yet, ſaith he, the ſame bread and drink is changed into our fleſh and blood, nouriſheth our bodies. By which ſaying it is evident, that Juſtin meant, that the bread and wine remain ſtill, or elſe they could not have turned into our fleſh and blood, and nouriſh our bodies.

At which my ſaying they were greatly troubled, but inforced themſelves to have denied the doctor, and would ſuffer me to ſpeak no more, but ſtraightway was I carried away unto my lodging: and ſo ended the ſecond day of mine appearance, which was the Friday to Whitſun-week, and then was I appointed to appear again on the Monday following. Howbeit, upon what occaſion I know not, it was deferred unto the Wedneſday, which was Corpus Chriſti eve.

In the mean time the biſhop ſent two of his chaplains to me, with whom I had communication about the real preſence: and after long reaſoning to and fro concerning this point; at length I drave them to this iſſue, whether they did confeſs that Chriſt in the ſelf-ſame body which was conceived of the virgin Mary, and wherein he ſuffered and roſe again, do in the ſelf ſame body naturally, ſubſtantially, and really ſit at the right hand of God the Father, without return from hence, until the day of general judgment, or not? Whereupon they anſwered, Yes truly, we confeſs it, hold it, and believe it. Then I again demanded of them, Whether they did affirm, after the words pronounced by the miniſter, there to remain fleſh, blood, bones, hair, nails, as is wont moſt groſly to be preached, or not? And they with great deliberation anſwered, that they did not only abhor the teaching of ſuch groſs doctrine, but alſo would deteſt themſelves, if they ſhould ſo think.

At which two principal points, wherein they fully condemned my doctrine which I ever taught, I was not a little comforted and rejoiced, but marvellouſly encouraged. Whereupon I demanded of them again, what manner of body they then affirmed to be in the ſacrament? Forſooth, ſaid they, not a viſible, palpable, or circumſcriptable body, for that is always at the Father's right hand: but in the ſacrament it is inviſible, and can neither be felt, ſeen, nor occupy any place, but is there by the omnipotency of God's holy word, they know not how. And for this they brought in St. Auguſtine, although by them not truly underſtood, yet would they admit no other ſenſe than their own, but would take upon them to confirm it with Martin Luther, Melanchthon, Bucer, and Calvin: ſo that I perceiving their obſtinacy in that behalf, gave them over for that time, and afterwards talked with Dr. Barret, whom I alſo found of the ſame opinion. For, ſaid he, if ye would diſſent from the fathers of the primitive church, of which St. Auguſtine is one, ye ſhall be contended to die out of the favour of God. Well, I gave them all over, being obſtinate in their errors; however to bring them to confeſs that openly which they had granted privately, I granted them according to the ſcriptures, and my former proteſtation, a preſence, although not as they ſuppoſed.

After all this, the honourable earl of Eſſex came to me, and that gentle knight, Sir William Woodhouſe, with great perſuaſions; to whom I ſaid, after long talk, That I would do all that I might, ſaving my conſcience, which I would in no wiſe pollute; and neither have I, as knoweth God, by whom all men muſt be judged.

The laſt Examination of T. Roſe before the Biſhop.

NOW to come to my laſt appearance, he forthwith demanded of me, whether I were reſolved, as he had heard ſay. To whom I anſwered, That even as always I had ſaid before, even ſo I was now. Unto whom, by low bowing my knee, I gave my due reverence, and the rather for that the honourable earl of Suſſex was there. Wherewith ſome who would be counted great goſpellers, were (contrary to all chriſtianity) ſore offended. Then I ſaid, That whatſoever laws were ſet forth for the eſtabliſhment of Chriſt's true religion, and that according to the doctrine of Chriſt's holy apoſtles and the faithful fathers of the primitive church, I did not only obey them, but moſt earneſtly embrace and believe them: yea, and yet to the further blinding of their eyes, I ſaid, that if any thing could juſtly be proved by God's holy word, by me heretofore preached, or taught untruly, either for lack of learning, unwarily or ignorance; yet by better knowledge when it ſhall juſtly be tried and examined by the ſame, I ſhall not refuſe (the thing perfectly proved) to revoke the ſame: provided always, the word of God herein be my judge.

All this ſpake I, as God knoweth, to keep them from ſuſpecting that which I went about, and that they ſhould have none occaſion to judge me of obſtinacy. Then ſaid I moreover, All you muſt of force confeſs, that the doctrine by me heretofore preached, had, beſides that the authority of God's eternal verity, the authority of two moſt noble and mighty princes, with the advice and counſel of all the nobility and clergy of the land, and that with great deliberation from time to time, with open diſputations in both the univerſities, enacted alſo by parliament with the conſent of the whole body and commons of the ſame, and without any reſiſtance or gainſaying eſtabliſhed, as a religion moſt pure and perfect, moſt earneſtly and ſincerely preached by the principal biſhops and doctors, and that before the kings majeſties perſons; and I, as one being called to that office, did the like with all the reſt, and in the zeal of God, and with a pure conſcience did ſet forth the ſame as the only and abſolute truth of God, and the juſt and moſt true proceedings of my ſovereign lord and king: and I had then my head at that preſent even where it now ſtandeth, betwixt mine ears, altogether applying the ſame, to apprehend with all diligence that which then was eſtabliſhed and taught, as the only and abſolute truth, and a thing unto me moſt deſirable, and well willing, without any deſire to hear the contrary, till now through this my captivity I am compelled to hear the contrary part ſpeak, who are even here preſent, and which my lord ſent unto me.

Of whom, after long diſputations privately to and fro before this time had betwixt us, at length I have heard of them a contrary doctrine, which I never before had heard; and therefore muſt confeſs mine own ignorance in the ſame. For, quoth I, after I had inforced theſe men here preſent (meaning the biſhop's two chaplains) to confeſs Jeſus Chriſt's natural body with his full complete members in due order and proportion of a perfect man's body to be preſent at the right hand of God the Father, and that without return from thence, until the laſt judgment; and alſo that after the words pronounced by the prieſt, there remaineth no ſuch groſs preſence of fleſh, blood, bones, hair, and nails, as was wont to be preached; preached; but that after I had demanded of them what manner of body they affirmed to be preſent, they ſaid, a body inviſible by the omnipotency of God's word, which neither can be felt or ſeen, nor that hath any diſtinction of members, but ſuch a body as occupieth no place, but is there they know not how; neceſſity compelleth me to confeſs mine ignorance in that behalf, although in very deed they perceived not my meaning therein, neither was it in my thought they ſhould do ſo. For by this their confeſſion, and my ſilence, afterward I perceived their horrid blaſphemies.

And methought in this I had well diſcharged at that time my conſcience, in cauſing them in open audience to confeſs the ſame, and ſo I granted a preſence, but not as they ſuppoſed.

For I only ſaid, that Chriſt, after the words pronounced, is preſent in the lawful uſe and right diſtribution of his holy ſupper; which thing I never denied, or any godly man that ever I heard of. For, ſaid I, Euſebius Emiſſenus, a man of ſingular fame and learning, about 300 years after Chriſt's aſcenſion, ſaith, That the converſion of the viſible creatures of bread and wine into the body and blood of Chriſt, is like unto our converſion in baptiſm. Where nothing is outwardly changed, but all the change is inwardly by the mighty working of the Holy Ghoſt, which faſhioneth and frameth Chriſt in the heart and mind of man, as by the example of Peter preaching to the people, Acts 2. by which he ſo pierced their conſcience, that they openly with moſt earneſt repentance confeſſed their ſins, ſaying, "Men and brethren, what ſhall we do? Repent, and be baptized every one of you, ſaid Peter, in the name of Jeſus Chriſt:" ſo that at this ſermon there were turned unto Chriſt three thouſand perſons: in whom Chriſt was ſo faſhioned and framed, as that he did dwell in every one of them, and they in him; and after the like manner, ſaid I, is Chriſt preſent in the lawful uſe and right diſtribution of his holy ſupper, and not otherwiſe. For although I ſaid according to the truth, that Chriſt dwelt in every one of theſe perſons rehearſed, yet meant I nothing leſs than that he in them ſhould have a groſs, carnal, or fleſhly dwelling.

And no more meant I, as God knoweth, him carnally or ſpiritually to be in the ſacrament, but according to the ſcriptures, and my former proteſtation, that is, to the ſpiritual nouriſhment of all ſuch as worthily come unto that holy ſupper, receiving it according to his holy inſtitution.

And thus I ended; which the papiſts moſt maliciouſly and ſlanderouſly named a recantation; which I never meant, nor thought, as God knoweth.

Now after I had thus concluded my ſpeech, the biſhop taking me by the hand, ſaid, Father Roſe, you may be a worthy inſtrument in God's church, and we will ſee to you at our coming home (for he was about to take his journey in viſitation of his dioceſe), and they feared much at this very time, leſt queen Mary ſhould have miſcarried in her child-travel, which was looked for, being then accounted very great with child, ſo they were not ſo fierce as they had been, and doubted very much of ſome ſtir, if I ſhould have ſuffered: and therefore were glad to be rid of me, ſo that by any colourable means for their own diſcharge it might be; ſo the night following was I only committed to mine own lodging.

On the morrow, when the biſhop was ready to ride forth in viſitation, he called me before him, and perceiving that Sir W. Woodhouſe did bear me great favour, ſaid, He was ſorry for me and my expences; and therefore wiſhed that I were ſomewhere, where I might ſpend no more money till his return. Why, my lord, ſaid Sir W. Woodhouſe, he ſhall have meat and drink, and lodging with me, till you return again, ſeeing you break up houſe: and hereupon I went home with Sir William, that good knight, who moſt genteely entertained me, and I had great liberty. Upon this the popiſh prieſts of the college of Chriſt's-church in Norwich, for that they ſaw me at liberty in Sir William's abſence (who had been from home a fortnight) blazed it abroad, that Sir William was bounden for me in body and lands. At his coming home therefore I aſked Sir William if he were ſo bounden for me? and he denied it. Then ſaid I, Sir, but for reverence I bear to you, I might have been an hundred miles from you ere this. But I truſt now, Sir, ſeeing you be not bound for me, I may go viſit my friends. Go where you will, ſaid Sir William; for, ſaid he, I told the biſhop I would not be his jailor, but promiſed only meat, drink, and lodging for you. Shortly after, upon the device of ſome friends, I was cloſely conveyed to a friend's houſe, where almoſt a month I was ſecretly kept, till rumours were over. For at the biſhop's return ſearch was made for me, inſomuch as all houſes, where it was known I had been acquainted, were ſearched, and the ſhips at Yarmouth.

At length the biſhop ſent to a conjurer, to know of him which way I was gone, and he anſwered, that I was gone over a water, and in the keeping of a woman. And in very deed I paſſed over a ſmall water, and was hid by a bleſſed woman, who lived in a ſmall cottage, the ſpace of three weeks, till all the great heat was over.

Then was I conveyed to London, and from thence paſſed over the ſeas, where I lived till the death of queen Mary, and till that it pleaſed God for the comfort of his church, and reſtoring of all poor exiles and priſoners for his name's-ſake, to bleſs this realm with the government of our noble queen, whom God to the glory of his own name, and the defence of his church, according to his own good will and pleaſure, long preſerve and continue over us.

A brief Diſcourſe concerning the Troubles and happy Deliverance of Dr. Sands, firſt Biſhop of Worceſter, next of London, afterwards Archbiſhop of York.

AT king Edward's death, the duke of Northumberland came down to Cambridge with an army of men, having commiſſion to proclaim lady Jane queen, and by power to ſuppreſs lady Mary, who took upon her that dignity, and was proclaimed queen in Norfolk. The duke ſent for Dr. Sands, being vice-chancellor, Dr. Parker, Dr. Bill, and Mr. Leaver, to ſup with him. Amongſt other ſpeeches, he ſaid, Maſters, pray for us, that we ſpeed well: if not, you ſhall be made biſhops, and we deacons. And even ſo it came to paſs: Dr. Parker and Dr. Sands were made biſhops, and he and Sir John Gates, who was then at the table, were made deacons, ere it was long after on Tower-hill. Dr. Sands being vice-chancellor, was required to preach on the morrow. The warning was ſhort for ſuch an auditory, and to ſpeak of ſuch a matter; yet he refuſed not the thing, but went into his chamber, and ſo to-bed. He roſe at three o'clock in the morning, took his bible in his hand, and after he had prayed a conſiderable time, he ſhut his eyes, and holding his bible before him, earneſtly prayed to God, that it might fall open, where a moſt fit text ſhould be for him to treat of. The bible, as God would have it, fell open upon the firſt chapter of Joſhua, the three laſt verſes, where he found ſo convenient a place of ſcripture for that time, that the like he could not find in the whole bible. His text was thus, "And they anſwered Joſhua, ſaying, All that thou commandeſt us, we will do, and whither ſoever thou ſendeſt us, we will go. According as we hearkened unto Moſes in all things, ſo will we hearken unto thee: only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moſes. Whoſoever he be that doth rebel againſt thy commandment, and will not hearken unto thy words, in all that thou commandeſt him, he ſhall be put to death: only be ſtrong and of good courage."

Whoever ſhall conſider what was concluded by ſuch as call'd themſelves the ſtate, and withal the auditory, the time, and other circumſtances, he may eaſily ſee that the text moſt fitly ſerved for the purpoſe. And as God gave the text, ſo gave he ſuch order and utterance, as drew many tears out of the eyes of the biggeſt of them.

In the time of his ſermon one of the guard lifted up to him into the pulpit a maſs book and a grail, which Sir George Haward with certain of the guard had taken that night in Mr. Hurleſtone's houſe, where lady Mary had been a little before, and there had maſs. The duke, with the reſt of the nobility, required Dr. Sands to put his ſermon in writing, and appointed Mr. Leaver to go to London with it, and to put it in print. Dr. Sands required one day and a half for writing of it. At the time appointed he made it ready, and Mr. Leaver was ready booted to receive it at his hands, and carry it to London. As he was delivering of it, one of the beadles, named Adams, came weeping, and praying him to ſhift for himſelf, for the Duke was retired, and queen Mary proclaimed.

Dr. Sands was not troubled thereat. But gave the ſermon written to Mr. Layfield. Mr. Leaver departed home, and he went to dinner to one Mr. More's, a beadle, his great friend. At the dinner Mrs. More ſeeing him merry and pleaſant (for he had ever a man's courage, and could not be terrified) drank unto him, ſaying, Maſter vice-chancellor, I drink unto you, for this is the laſt time that I ſhall ſee you. And ſo it was; for ſhe was dead before Dr. Sands returned out of Germany. The duke that night retired to Cambridge, and ſent for Dr. Sands to go with him to the market-place to proclaim queen Mary. The duke caſt up his cap with others, and ſo laughed, that the tears ran down his cheeks for grief. He told Dr. Sands that queen Mary was a merciful woman, and that he doubted not thereof; declaring that he had ſent unto her to know her pleaſure, and looked for a general pardon. Dr. Sands anſwered, My life is not dear unto me, neither have I done or ſaid any thing that urgeth my conſcience. For that which I ſpake of the ſtate. I have inſtructions warranted by the ſubſcriptions of ſixteen councellors, neither can ſpeech be treaſon, neither yet have I ſpoken further than the word of God, and the laws of the realm do warrant me, come of me what God will. But be aſſured you ſhall never eſcape death, for if ſhe would ſave you, thoſe that now ſhall rule will kill you.

That night the guard apprehended the duke, and certain grooms of the ſtable were as buſy with Dr. Sands, as if they would take a priſoner. But Sir John Gates, who lay then in Dr. Sands's houſe, ſharply rebuked them, and drave them away. Dr. Sands, by the advice of Sir John Gates, walked in the fields. In the mean time the univerſity, contrary to all order, had met together in conſultation, and ordered that Dr. Mouſe and Dr. Hatcher ſhould repair to Dr. Sands's lodging, and bring away the ſtatute book of the univerſity, the keys, and ſuch other things as were in his keeping, and ſo they did: for Dr. Mouſe being an earneſt proteſtant the day before, and whom Dr. Sands had done much for, was now become a papiſt, and his great enemy. Certain of the univerſity had appointed a congregation at afternoon. As the bell rang to it, Dr. Sands came out of the fields, and ſending for the beadles, aſked what the matter meant, and required them to wait upon him to the ſchools, according to their duty. So they did. And ſo ſoon as Dr. Sands, the beadles going before him, came into the regent-houſe, and took his chair, one Mr. Mitch, with a rabble of unlearned papiſts, went into a by-ſchool, and conſpired together to pull him out of his chair, and to uſe violence unto him. Dr. Sands began his oration, expoſtulating with the univerſity, charging them with great ingratitude, declaring that he had ſaid nothing in his ſermon, but that he was ready to juſtify, and their caſe was all one with his: for they had not only concealed, but conſented to that which he had ſpoken.

And thus while he remembered them how beneficial he had been to the univerſity, and their unthankfulneſs to him again, in came Mr. Mitch with his conſpirators, about 20 in number. One laid hands on the chair to pull it from him; another told him, that that was not his place, and another called him traitor. Whereat he perceiving how they uſed violence, and being of great courage, groped to his dagger, and had diſpatched ſome of them as God's enemies, if Dr. Bill and Dr. Blith had not fallen upon him, and praying him for God's ſake to hold his hands and be quiet, and patiently to bear that great offer'd wrong. He was perſuaded by them, and after that tumult was ceaſed, he ended his oration, and having ſome money of the univerſity's in his hands, he there delivered the ſame every farthing. He gave up the books, reckonings, and keys pertaining to the univerſity, and withal yielded up his office, praying God to give the univerſity a better officer, and to give them better and more thankful hearts, and ſo repaired home to his own college.

On the morrow after there came unto him one Mr. Gerningham, and Mr. Thomas Mildmay. Gerningham told him, that it was the queen's pleaſure, that two of the guard ſhould attend upon him, and that he muſt be carried priſoner to the tower of London with the duke. Mr. Mildmay ſaid, he marvelled that a learned man ſhould ſpeak ſo unadviſedly againſt ſo good a prince, and wilfully run into ſuch danger. Dr. Sands anſwered, I ſhall not be aſhamed of bonds, but if I could do as Mr. Mildmay can, I needed not to fear bonds: for he came down in payment againſt queen Mary, and armed in the field, and now he returneth in payment for queen Mary; before a traitor, and now a great friend, I cannot with one mouth blow hot and cold after this manner.

Upon this his ſtable was robbed of four very good geldings, the beſt of them Mr. Huddleſtone took for his own ſaddle, and rode on him to London in his ſight. An inventory was taken of all his goods by Mr. More, beadle for the univerſity. He was ſent upon a lame horſe that halted to the ground; which thing a friend of his perceiving, prayed that he might lend him a nag. The yeoman of the guard were contented. As he departed forth at the town's end, ſome papiſts reſorted thither to jeer at him; ſome of his friends to mourn for him. He came in the rank to London, the people being full of out-cries. As he came in at Biſhopſgate, one like a milk-woman hurled a ſtone at him, and hit him on the breaſt, with ſuch a blow, that he was like to fall off his horſe. To whom he mildly ſaid, Woman, God forgive it thee. Truth is, that journey and evil intreating ſo mortified him, that he was more ready to die than to live.

As he came thro' Tower-hill-ſtreet, one woman ſtanding in her door, cried, Fie on thee thou knave, thou traitor, thou heretic. Whereat he ſmiled. Look, the deſperate heretic, ſaid ſhe, laughed at this jeer. A woman on the other ſide of the ſtreet anſwered, ſaying, Fie on thee neighbour, thou art not worthy to be called a woman, railing upon this gentleman whom thou knoweſt not, nor the cauſe why he is thus treated. Then ſhe ſaid, Good gentleman, God be thy comfort, and give thee ſtrength to ſtand in God's cauſe, even to the end. And thus he paſſed thro' rough and ſmooth to the Tower, the firſt priſoner that entered in that day, which was St. James's day. The yeoman of the guard took from him his borrowed nag, and what elſe ſoever he had. His man, one Quinting Suainton, brought after him a bible, and ſome ſhirts, and ſuch like things. The bible was ſent unto him, but the ſhirts and ſuch like ſerved the yeoman of the guard.

After

After he had been in the Tower three weeks in a bad priſon: he was brought up into nuns-bower, a better priſon, where was put to him Mr. John Bradford.

At the day of queen Mary's coronation their priſon door was ſet open, ever ſhut before. One Mr. Mitchel, his old acquaintance, who had been priſoner before in the ſame place, came into him, and ſaid, Maſter Sands, there is ſuch a ſtir in the Tower, that neither gates, doors, nor priſoners are looked to this day. Take my cloak, my hat, and my rapier, and get you gone, you may go out of the gates without queſtioning, ſave yourſelf, and let me do as well as I can. A rare friendſhip; but he refuſed the offer, ſaying, I know no juſt cauſe why I ſhould be in priſon. And thus to do were to make myſelf guilty. I will expect God's good will, yet muſt I think myſelf much obliged to you: and ſo Mr. Mitchell departed.

While Dr. Sands and Mr. Bradford were thus in cloſe priſon twenty nine weeks, one John Bowler was their keeper, a very perverſe papiſt, yet by often perſuading of him, for he would give ear, and by gentle uſing of him, at length he began to miſlike popery, and to favour the goſpel, and was ſo perſuaded in true religion, that on a Sunday when they had maſs in the chapel, he brought up a ſervice book, a manchet, and a glaſs of wine, and there Dr. Sands miniſtered the communion to Bradfold and to Bowler. Thus Bowler was their ſon begotten in bonds. When Wyat was in arms, and the old duke of Norfolk ſent forth with a power of men to apprehend him; that room might be made in the Tower for him and other his accomplices, Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Bradford were caſt into one priſon, and Dr. Sands with nine other preachers were ſent unto the Marſhalſea.

The keeper of the Marſhalſea appointed to every preacher a man to lead him in the ſtreet, he cauſed them to go far before, and he and Dr. Sands came behind, whom he would not lead, but walked familiarly with him. Yet Dr. Sands was known, and the people every where prayed to God to comfort him, and to ſtrengthen him in the truth. By that time the people's minds were altered, popery began to be unſavory. After they paſſed the bridge, the keeper ſaid to Dr. Sands, I perceive the vain people would ſet you forward to the fire. Ye are as vain as they, if you being a young man will ſtand in your own conceit, and prefer your own judgment before that of ſo many worthy prelates, ancient, learned, and grave men as be in this realm. If you ſo do, you ſhall find me a ſevere keeper, as one that utterly diſliketh your religion. Dr. Sands anſwered, I know my years to be young, and my learning but ſmall, it is enough to know Chriſt crucified, and he hath learned nothing who ſeeth not the great blaſphemy that is in popery. I will yield unto God, and not unto man: I have read in the ſcriptures of many godly and courteous keepers: God may make you one; if not, I truſt he will give me ſtrength and patience to bear your hard uſage. Then ſaid the keeper, Are you reſolv'd to ſtand to your religion? Yes, quoth the doctor, by God's grace. Truly, ſaid the keeper, I love you the better for it; I did but tempt you: what favour I can ſhew you ye ſhall be ſure of, and I ſhall think myſelf happy if I might die at the ſtake with you. He was as good as his word, for he truſted the doctor to walk in the fields alone, where he met with Mr. Bradford, who was alſo a priſoner in the King's-bench, and had found the ſame favour from his keeper: he laid him in the beſt chamber in the houſe; he would not ſuffer the knight-marſhal's man to lay fetters on him, as others had. And, at his requeſt, he put Mr. Saunders in to him, to be his bed-fellow, and ſundry times after he ſuffered his wife, who was Mr. Sands's daughter of Eſſex, a gentlewoman beautiful both in body and ſoul, to reſort to him. There was great reſort to Dr. Sands and Mr. Saunders; they had much money offered them, but they would receive none. They had the communion there three or four times, and a great number of communicants. Dr. Sands gave ſuch exhortation to the people (for at that time being young, he was thought very eloquent) that he moved many tears, and made the people abhor the maſs, and defy all popery.

When Wyat with his army came into Southwark, he ſent two gentlemen into the Marſhalſea to Dr. Sands, ſaying, that Mr. Wyat would be glad of his company and advice, and that the gates ſhould be ſet open for all the priſoners. He anſwered, Tell Mr. Wyat, if this his riſing be of God, it will take place; if not, it will fall. For my part, I was committed hither by order, I will be diſcharged by like order, or I will never depart hence. So anſwered Mr. Saunders, and the reſt of the preachers, being there priſoners.

After that Dr. Sands had been nine weeks priſoner in the Marſhalſea, by the mediation of Sir Thomas Holcroft, knight marſhal, he was ſet at liberty; Sir Thomas ſued earneſty to the biſhop of Wincheſter, Dr. Gardiner, for his deliverance; after many repulſes: but he could not prevail, except Dr. Sands would be one of their ſect, and then he could want nothing. He wrung out of him at laſt, that if the queen could like of his deliverance, he would not be againſt it; for that was Sir Thomas's laſt requeſt. In the mean time he had procured two ladies of the privy chamber to move the queen in it; who was contented if the biſhop of Wincheſter would like of it. The next time that the biſhop went into the privy chamber to ſpeak with the queen, Mr. Holcroft followed, and had his warrant for Dr. Sands's remiſſion ready, and prayed the two ladies, when the biſhop ſhould take his leave, to put the queen in mind of Dr. Sands. So they did, and the queen ſaid; Wincheſter, what think you by Dr. Sands, is he not ſufficiently puniſhed? As it pleaſe your majeſty, ſaid Wincheſter, That he ſpake, remembering his former promiſe to Mr. Holcroft, that he would not be againſt Dr. Sands, if the queen ſhould like to diſcharge him. Saith the queen; Then truly, We would that he were ſet at liberty. Immediately Mr. Holcroft offered the queen the warrant. Who ſubſcribed the ſame, and called Wincheſter to put to his hand, and ſo he did. The warrant was given to the knight marſhal again, Sir Thomas Holcroft. As the biſhop went forth of the privy chamber door, he called Mr. Holcroft to him, commanding him not to ſet Dr. Sands at liberty, until he had taken ſureties of two gentlemen of this country with him, every one bound in 500 pounds, that Dr. Sands ſhould not depart out of the realm without licence. Mr. Holcroft immediately after met with the two gentlemen of the North, friends and couſins to Dr. Sands, who offered to be bound in body, goods, and lands for him. After dinner, the ſame day, Mr. Holcroft ſent for Dr. Sands to his lodging at Weſtminſter, requiring the keeper to accompany him. He came accordingly, finding Mr. Holcroft alone walking in his garden. Mr. Holcroft imparted his long ſuit, with the whole proceeding, and what effect it had taken to Dr. Sands: much rejoicing that it was his good hap to do him good, and to procure his liberty; and that nothing remained, but that he would enter into bonds with his two ſureties, for not departing out of the realm. Dr. Sands anſwered, I give God thanks, who hath moved your heart to mind me ſo well, and I think myſelf moſt bound unto you. God ſhall requite, and I ſhall never be found unthankful. But as you have dealt friendly with me, I will alſo deal plainly with you I came a free-man into priſon; I will not go forth a bondman. As I cannot benefit my friends, ſo will I not hurt them. And if I be ſet at liberty, I will not tarry ſix days in this realm, if I may get out. If therefore I may not get free forth, ſend me to the Marſhalſea again, and there ye ſhall be ſure of me.

This

This anſwer Mr. Holcroft much miſliked: he told Dr. Sands that the time would not long continue, a change would ſhortly come, the ſtate was but a cloud, and would ſoon ſhake away; and that his couſin Sir Edward Bray would gladly receive him and his wife into his houſe, where he ſhould never need to come at church, and the lady Bray was a zealous gentlewoman, who hated popery; adding, that he would not ſo deal with him to loſe all his labour. When Dr. Sands could not be removed from his former ſaying, Mr. Holcroft ſaid; Seeing you cannot be altered, I will change my purpoſe and yield unto you. Come of it what will, I will ſet you at liberty: and ſeeing you mind to go over ſea, get you gone as quick as you can. One thing I require of you, that while you are there, you write nothing to come hither, for ſo you may undo me. He friendly kiſſed Dr. Sands, bade him farewell, and commanded the keeper to take no fees of him, ſaying, Let me anſwer Wincheſter as I may. Dr. Sands returning with the keeper to the Marſhalſea, tarried all night, and on the morrow he gave a dinner to all the priſoners, to which he invited his bed-fellow, and ſworn ſtake-fellow, if it had ſo pleaſed God. When he took his leave, he ſaid, Mr. Saunders farewell; with many tears and kiſſings, the one falling on the other's neck, and ſo departed, clearly delivered without examination or bond. From thence he went to the King's-bench, and there talked with Mr. Bradford and Dr. Farrar biſhop of St. David's, then priſoners. Then he comforted them, and they praiſed God for his happy deliverance. He went by Wincheſter's houſe, and there took boat, and came to a friends houſe in London, called William Banks, and tarried there one night. On the morrow at night he ſhifted to another friend's houſe, and there he heard that ſearch was made for him.

Dr. Watſon and Mr. Chriſtopherſon coming to the biſhop of Wincheſter, told him, that he had ſet the greateſt heretic in England at liberty, and one that had of all others, moſt corrupted the univerſity of Cambridge, namely, Dr. Sands. Whereupon the biſhop being chancellor of England, ſent for all the conſtables of London, commanding them to watch for Dr. Sands, who was then within the city, and to apprehend him, and whoſoever of them ſhould take him and bring him to him, he ſhould have five pounds for his labour. Dr. Sands ſuſpecting the matter, conveyed himſelf by night to one Mr. Berty's houſe a ſtranger, who was in the Marſhalſea priſoner with him awhile; he was a good proteſtant, and dwelt in Mark-lane. There he was ſix days, and had one or two of his friends that repaired to him. Then he removed to one of his acquaintance in Cornhill; he cauſed his man Quinting to provide two geldings for him, minding on the morrow to ride into Eſſex, to Mr. Sands his father-in-law, where his wife was.

At going to-bed he found that a pair of hoſe which he had newly bought were too long for him: he deſired the good woman of the houſe to ſend for ſomebody that could cut them two inches ſhorter. The wife required the boy of the houſe to carry them to the next taylor; which he accordingly did: and he chanced (or rather God ſo provided) to go to the very perſon that firſt made them (whoſe name was Benjamin, a good proteſtant in Birchin-lane) and the boy deſired him to cut the hoſe. Said he, I am not thy maſter's taylor. Said the boy, Becauſe you are our next neighbour, and my maſter's taylor dwelleth afar off, I came to you, being late in the night, for he muſt put them on betimes in the morning. Benjamin took the hoſe, and looking upon them, knew his handy-work, and ſaid, Theſe are not thy maſter's hoſe, they belong to Dr. Sands, I made them for him in the Tower. The boy confeſſed it to be ſo. Said he, Go to thy miſtreſs, pray her to ſit up till twelve of the clock, and then I will bring the hoſe and ſpeak with the doctor for his good.

At midnight the good wife of the houſe, and Benjamin came to Dr. Sands's chamber: The good woman deſired him not to be ſurpriſed at their coming. He anſwered, Nothing can be amiſs: what God will, that ſhall be done. Then Benjamin told him that he was the man that made his hoſe, and by good chance they now came to his hands. God uſed the means, that he might admoniſh him of his danger, and adviſe him how to eſcape it, telling him, that all the conſtables in London, whereof he was one, watched for him, and ſome were ſo greedily ſet, that they prayed him, if he took him, to let them have the carriage of him to the biſhop of Wincheſter, and he ſhould have the five pounds. It is well known (quoth Benjamin) that your man hath provided two geldings, and that you intend to ride out at Aldgate to-morrow morning, and there then you are ſure to be taken. Follow mine advice, and by God's grace ye ſhall eſcape their hands. Let your man walk all the day to-morrow in the ſtreet where your horſes ſtand, booted and ready to ride. The good man's ſervant of the houſe ſhall take the horſes, and carry them to Bethnal-green. The good man ſhall be booted, and follow after, as if he would ride. I will be here with you to-morrow about eight of the clock, it is both term and parliament time, here we will break our faſt, and when the ſtreets are full, we will go forth. Look wildly, and if you meet your brother in the ſtreets, ſhun him not, but outface him, and know him not. Accordingly Dr. Sands did, cloathed like a gentleman in all reſpects, and looked wildly, as one that had been long kept in priſon out of the light. Benjamin carried him through Birchin-lane, and from one lane to another, till he came to Moregate. There they went forth until they came to Bethnal-green, where the horſes were ready, and Mr. Hurleſtone to ride as his man. Dr. Sands pulled on his boots, and taking leave of his friend Benjamin, with tears they kiſſed each other: he put his hand in his purſe, and would have given Benjamin a great part of that little he had, but Benjamin would take none. Yet ſince Dr. Sands hath remembered him thankfully. He rode that night to his father-in-law, Mr. Sands, where his wife was: he had not been there two hours, but it was told Mr. Sands, that there were two of the guard which would that night apprehend Dr. Sands, and ſo they were appointed.

That night Dr. Sands was guided to an honeſt farmer near the ſea, where he tarried two days and two nights in a chamber without company. After that he had ſhifted to one James Mower, a ſhipmaſter, who dwelt at Milton-ſhore, where he expected wind for the Engliſh fleet ready to ſail to Flanders. While he was there, James Mower brought to him forty or fifty mariners, to whom he gave an exhortation; they liked him ſo well, that they promiſed to die for it, ere that he ſhould be apprehended.

The ſixth of May, being Sunday, the wind ſerved. He took his leave of his hoſt and hoſteſs, and went towards the ſhip. In taking his leave of his hoſteſs, who was barren, and had been married eight years, he gave her a fine handkerchief and an old royal of gold in it, thanking her much, and ſaid, Be of good comfort, ere that one whole year be paſt, God ſhall give you a child, a boy. And it came to paſs, for that day twelvemonth lacking one day, God gave her a fair ſon.

At the ſhore Dr. Sands met with Mr. Iſaac of Kent, who had his eldeſt ſon there, who, upon the liking he had to Dr. Sands, ſent his ſon with him, who afterward died in his father's houſe in Frankfort. Dr. Sands and Dr. Coxe were both in one ſhip, being one Cockrel's ſhip, they were within the kenning, when two of the guard came thither to apprehend Dr. Sands. They arrived at Antwerp, being bid to dinner to Mr. Locke. And at dinner-time one George Gilpin being ſecretary to the Engliſh houſe, and kinſman to Dr. Sands, came to him, and rounded him in his ear, and ſaid, King Philip hath ſent to make ſearch for you, and to apprehend you. Hereupon they roſe from their dinner in a marvellous great ſhower, and went out at the gate toward the land of Cleve. They found a waggon, and haſted away, and came ſafe to Ausburge in Cleveland, where Doctor Sands tarried fourteen days, and then travelled towards Strasbourgh, where after he had lived one year, his wife came to him. He fell ſore ſick of a flux, which kept him nine months, and brought him to death's door. He had a child which fell ſick of the plague, and died. His wife at length fell ſick of a conſumption, and died in his arms; no man had a more godly woman to his wife.

After this, Mr. Sampſon went away to Emanuel, a man ſkilful in Hebrew. Mr. Grindall went into the country to learn the Dutch tongue. Dr. Sands ſtill remained in Strasbourgh, whoſe ſuſtentation was chiefly from one Mr. Iſaac, who loved him moſt dearly, and was ever more ready to give than to receive. He gave him in that ſpace above an hundred marks, which ſum the ſaid Dr. Sands paid him again, and by his other gifts and friendlineſs ſhewed himſelf to be a thankful man. When his wife was dead, he went to Zurich, and there was in Peter Martyr's houſe for the ſpace of five weeks. Being there, as they ſate at dinner, word ſuddenly came, that queen Mary was dead, and Dr. Sands was ſent for by his friends at Strasbourgh. That news made Mr. Martyr, and Mr. Jarret then there, very joyful; but Dr. Sands could not rejoice, it ſmote into his heart, that he ſhould be called to miſery.

Mr. Bullinger and the miniſters feaſted him, and he took his leave and returned to Strasbourgh, where he preached; and ſo Mr. Grindall and he came towards England; and came to London the ſame day that queen Elizabeth was crowned.

The miraculous Preſervation of the Lady Elizabeth, afterwards Queen of England, from extreme Calamity and Danger of Life, in the Time of Queen Mary, her Siſter.

BUT when all hath been ſaid and told, whatſoever can be recited touching the admirable working of God's preſent hand in defending and delivering any one perſon out of thraldom, never was there, ſince the memory of our fathers, any example to be ſhewed, wherein the Lord's mighty power hath more admirably ſhewed itſelf, to the glory of his own name, to the comfort of all good hearts, and to the public felicity of this whole realm, than in the miraculous ſcape of the lady Elizabeth, in the time of queen Mary her ſiſter.

In which ſtory we firſt have to conſider, in what extreme miſery, ſickneſs, fear, and peril her highneſs was; into what care, what trouble of mind, and what danger of death ſhe was brought: firſt, with great bands of armed men (and happy was he that might have the carrying of her) being fetched up as the greateſt traitor in the world, clapped in the Tower, and again toſſed from thence, and from houſe to houſe, from priſon to priſon, from poſt to pillar, at length alſo priſoner in her own houſe, and guarded with a ſort of cut-throats, who ever gaped for the ſpoil, whereby they might be fingering of ſomewhat.

Secondly, we have to conſider again, all this notwithſtanding, how ſtrangely, or rather miraculouſly, ſhe was delivered from danger, what favour and grace ſhe found with the Almighty; who, when all the help of man and hope of recovery was paſt, ſtretched out his mighty protection, and preſerved her highneſs, and placed her in her princely ſeat of reſt and quietneſs.

In which ſtory, if I ſhould ſet forth at large all the particulars and circumſtances thereunto belonging, and as juſt occaſion of the hiſtory requireth; beſide the importunate length of the ſtory diſcourſed, peradventure it might move offence to ſome, and truth might get me hatred. Yet notwithſtanding I intend (by the grace of Chriſt) therein to uſe ſuch brevity and moderation, as both may be to the glory of God, the diſcharge of the ſtory, the profit of the reader, and hurt to none, ſuppreſſing the names of ſome, whom here although I could recite, yet I thought not to be more cruel in hurting their names, than the queen hath been merciful in pardoning their lives.

Therefore now to enter into the diſcourſe of this tragical matter, firſt here is to be noted, that queen Mary, when ſhe was firſt queen, before ſhe was crowned, would go no whither, but would have her by the hand, and ſend for her to dinner and ſupper; but after ſhe was crowned, ſhe never dined nor ſupped with her, but kept her apart from her, &c. After this it happened immediately upon the riſing of Sir Thomas Wyat (as before mentioned) that the lady Elizabeth and lord Courtney were charged with falſe ſuſpicion of Sir Thomas Wyat's riſing. Whereupon queen Mary, whether for that ſurmiſe, or for what other cauſe I know not, being offended with the ſaid lady Elizabeth her ſiſter, at that time lying in her houſe at Aſhbridge, the next day after the riſing of Wyat, ſent to her three of her counſellors, to wit, Sir Richard Southwell, Sir Edward Haſtings, then maſter of the horſe, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, with their retinue and troop of horſemen, to the number of two hundred and fifty, who at their ſudden and unprovided coming, found her at the ſame time ſick in her bed, and very feeble and weak of body. Whither when they came, aſcending up to her Grace's chamber, they deſired one of her ladies, whom they met, to declare to her grace, that there were divers come from the court, who had a meſſage from the queen.

Her grace having knowledge thereof, was right glad of their coming; howbeit then being very ſick, and the night far ſpent (which was at ten of the clock) ſhe requeſted them by the meſſenger, that they would reſort thither in the morning. To this they anſwered, that they muſt needs ſee her, and would ſo do, in what caſe ſoever ſhe were. Whereat the lady being ſurprized, went to ſhew her grace their words: but they haſtily following her, came ruſhing as ſoon as ſhe into her grace's chamber unbidden.

At whoſe ſudden coming into her bed-chamber, her grace, being greatly amazed, ſaid unto them, Is the haſte ſuch that it might not have pleaſed you to come to-morrow in the morning?

They made anſwer, that they were right ſorry to ſee her in that caſe. And I (ſaid ſhe) am not glad to ſee you here at this time of the night. Whereunto they anſwered, that they came from the queen to do their meſſage and duty, which was to this effect, that the queen's pleaſure was, that ſhe ſhould be at London the ſeventh day of that preſent month. Whereunto ſhe ſaid, Certainly, no creature more glad than I to come to her majeſty, being right ſorry that I am not in caſe at this time to wait on her, as you yourſelves do ſee, and can well teſtify.

Indeed we ſee it true, ſaid they, that you do ſay; for which we are very ſorry. Albeit, we let you to underſtand, that our commiſſion is ſuch, and ſo ſtraineth us, that we muſt needs bring you with us, either alive or dead. Whereas ſhe being amazed, ſorrowfully ſaid, that their commiſſion was very ſore; but yet notwithſtanding ſhe hoped it to be otherwiſe, and not ſo ſtrait. Yes verily, ſaid they. Whereupon they calling for two phyſicians, Dr. Owen and Dr. Wendy, demanded of them, whether ſhe might be removed from thence with life, or no. Whoſe anſwer and judgment was, that there was no impediment in their judgment to the contrary, but that ſhe might travel without danger of life.

In concluſion, they deſired her to prepare againſt the next morning at nine of the clock to go with them, declaring that they had brought with them the queen's litter for her. After much talk, the meſſengers declaring how there was no prolonging of times and days, ſo departed to their chamber, being entertained and cheared, as appertained to their worſhips.

On the next morrow, at the time preſcribed, they had her forth as ſhe was, very faint and feeble, and in ſuch caſe that ſhe was ready to ſwoon three or four times between them. What ſhould I ſpeak here, that cannot well be expreſſed, what an heavy houſe was there to behold the unreverend and doleful dealing of theſe men, but eſpecially the fear and captivity of their innocent lady and miſtreſs.

Now to proceed in her journey from Aſhbridge, ſick in the litter, ſhe came to Redborne, where ſhe was guarded all night, From thence to St. Alban's, to Sir Ralph Rowlet's houſe, where ſhe tarried that night, both feeble in body, and comfortleſs in mind. From that place ſhe paſſed to Mr. Dod's houſe at Mims, where alſo they remained that night; and ſo from thence ſhe came to Highgate, where ſhe being very ſick, tarried that night and the next day. During which time of her abode, there came many purſuivants and meſſengers from the court, but for what purpoſe I cannot tell.

From that place ſhe was conveyed to the court, where by the way came to meet her many gentlemen to accompany her highneſs, who were very ſorry to ſee her in that caſe. But eſpecially a great multitude of people were ſtanding by the way, who then flocking about her litter, lamented and bewailed greatly her eſtate. Now when ſhe came to the court, her grace was there ſtraitways ſhut up, and kept a cloſe priſoner a fortnight, which was till Palm-Sunday, ſeeing neither king nor queen, nor lord, nor friend, all that time, but only the then lord-chamberlain, Sir John Gage, and the vice-chamberlain, which were attendant unto the doors. About which time Sir William Sentlowe was called before the council. To whoſe charge was laid, that he knew of Wyat's rebellion, which he ſtoutly denied, proteſting that he was a true man both to God and his prince, defying all traitors and rebels, but being ſtraitly examined, he was in concluſion committed to the Tower.

The Friday before Palm-Sunday the biſhop of Wincheſter, w[illegible] nineteen others of the council, (who ſhall be here nam[illegible]leſs) came unto her grace from the queen's majeſty, and burdened her with Wyat's conſpiracy; which ſhe utterly denied, affirming that ſhe was altogether guiltleſs therein. They being not contented with this, charged her grace with buſineſs made by Sir Peter Carew, and the reſt of the gentlemen of the Weſt country: which alſo ſhe utterly denying, cleared her innocency therein.

In concluſion, after long debating of matters, they declared unto her, that it was the queen's will and pleaſure, that ſhe ſhould go unto the Tower, while the matter were further tried and examined.

Whereat ſhe being amazed, ſaid, that ſhe truſted the queen's majeſty would be a more gracious lady unto her, and that her highneſs would not otherwiſe conceive of her but that ſhe was a true woman; declaring furthermore to the lords, that ſhe was innocent in all thoſe matters wherein they had burdened her, and deſired them therefore to be a further mean to the queen her ſiſter, that ſhe being a true woman in thought, word and deed, towards her majeſty, might not be committed to ſo notorious and doleful a place; proteſting that ſhe would requeſt no favour at her hand, if ſhe ſhould be proved to have conſented unto any ſuch kind of matter as they laid unto her charge; and therefore in fine ſhe deſired their lordſhips to think of her what ſhe was, and that ſhe might not ſo extremely be dealt withal for her truth.

Whereunto the lords anſwered again, that there was no remedy, for that the queen's majeſty was fully determined that ſhe ſhould go unto the Tower. Wherewith the lords departed, with their caps hanging over their eyes. But not long after, within the ſpace of an hour or little more, came four of the foreſaid lords of the council, which were the lord treaſurer, the biſhop of Wincheſter, the lord ſteward, the earl of Suſſex, with the guard: who warding the next chamber to her, ſecluded all her gentlemen and yeomen, ladies and gentlewomen; except that for one gentleman uſher, three gentlewomen, and two grooms of her chamber, were appointed in their rooms, three other men of the queen's, and three waiting women to give attendance upon her, that none ſhould have acceſs to her grace.

At which time there was an hundred of Northern ſoldiers in white coats, watching and warding about the gardens all that night, and a great fire being made in the midſt of the hall, and two certain lords watching there alſo with their band and company.

Upon Saturday following, two lords of the council, (the one was the earl of Suſſex, the other ſhall be nameleſs) came and certified her grace, that ſhe muſt go forthwith unto the Tower, the barge being prepared for her, and the tide now ready, which tarrieth for no body. In heavy mood her grace requeſted the lords that ſhe might tarry another tide, truſting that the next would be better and more comfortable. But one of the lords replied, that neither time nor tide was to be delayed.

And when her grace requeſted him, that ſhe might be ſuffered to write to the queen's majeſty, he anſwered, that he durſt not permit that: adding, that in his judgment it would rather hurt, than profit her grace in ſo doing.

But the other lord, more courteous and favourable, (who was the earl of Suſſex) kneeling down, told her grace, that ſhe ſhould have liberty to write, and as he was a true man, he would deliver it to the queen's highneſs, and bring an anſwer of the ſame, whatſoever came thereof. Whereupon ſhe wrote, albeit ſhe could in no caſe be ſuffered to ſpeak with the queen, to her great diſcomfort, being no offender againſt the queen's majeſty.

And thus the time and tide paſſed away for that ſeaſon, they privily appointing all things ready that ſhe ſhould go the next tide, which fell about midnight; but for fear ſhe ſhould be taken by the way, they durſt not. So they ſtaid till the next day, being Palm-Sunday, when about nine of the clock theſe two returned again, declaring that it was time for her grace to depart. She anſwered, if there be no remedy, I muſt be contented, willing the lords to go on before. Being come forth into the garden, ſhe did caſt her eyes towards the window, thinking to ſee the queen, which ſhe could not. Whereat ſhe ſaid, ſhe marvelled much what the nobility of the realm meant, which in that ſort would ſuffer her to be led into captivity, the Lord knew whither, for ſhe did not. In the mean time commandment was given in all London, that every one ſhould keep the church, and carry their Palms, while in the mean ſeaſon ſhe might be conveyed without all recourſe of people in the Tower.

After this, ſhe took her barge with the two foreſaid lords, three of the queen's gentlewomen, and three of her own, her gentleman uſher, and two of her grooms, lying and hovering upon the water a certain ſpace, for that they could not ſhoot the bridge, the bargemen being very unwilling to ſhoot the ſame, ſo ſoon as they did, becauſe of the danger thereof: for the ſtern of the boat ſtruck upon the ground, the fall was ſo big, and the water was ſo ſhallow, that the boat being under the bridge, there ſtaid again awhile. At landing, ſhe firſt ſtaid and denied to land at thoſe ſtairs where all traitors and offenders cuſtomably uſed to land, neither could ſhe well, unleſs ſhe ſhould go over her ſhoes. The lords were gone out of the boat before, and aſked why ſhe came not. One of the lords went back again to her, and brought word ſhe would not come.

Then ſaid one of the lords, who ſhall be nameleſs, that ſhe ſhould not chuſe; and becauſe it did then rain, he offered to her his cloak, which ſhe, putting it back with her her hand with a good dash, refused. So she coming out, having one foot upon the stairs, said, here landeth as true a subject, being prisoner, as ever landed at these stairs: and before thee, O God, I speak it, having no other friends but thee alone.

To whom the same lord answered again, that if it were so, it was the better for her. At her landing there was a great multitude of their servants and warders standing in their order. What needed all this, said she? It is the use, said some, so to be when any prisoner came thither. And if it be, quoth she, for my cause, I beseech you that they may be dismissed. Whereat the poor men kneeled down, and with one voice desired God to preserve her grace, who the next day were released of their cold coats.

After this, passing a little further, she sate down upon a cold stone, and there rested herself. To whom the lieutenant then being, said, Madam, you were best to come out of the rain, for you sit unwholesomely. She then replying, answered again, It is better sitting here, than in a worse place; for God knoweth, I know not whither you will bring me. With that her gentleman usher wept; she demanding of him what he meant so uncomfortably to use her, seeing she took him to be her comfort, and not to dismay her, especially for that she knew her truth to be such, that no man should have cause to weep for her. But forth she went into prison.

The doors were locked and bolted upon her, which greatly discomforted and dismayed her grace. At which time she called to her gentlewoman for her book, desiring God not to suffer her to build her foundation upon the sands, but upon the rock, whereby all blasts of blustering weather should have no power against her. The doors being thus locked, and she close shut up, the lords had great conference how to keep ward and watch, every man declaring his own opinion in that behalf, agreeing straitly and circumspectly to keep her.

Then one of them, which was the lord of Sussex, swearing, said: My lords, let us take heed, and do no more than our commission will bear us out in, whatsoever shall happen hereafter. And further let us consider that she was the king our master's daughter; and therefore let us use such dealing, that we may answer it hereafter, if it shall so happen: for just dealing, quoth he, is always answerable. Whereunto the other lords agreed that it was well said of him, and thereupon departed. Being in the Tower, within two days commandment was, that she should have mass within her house One Mr. Young was then her chaplain, and because there were none of her men so well learned to help the priest to say mass, the mass staid for that day.

The next day two of her yeomen, who had gone long to school before, and were learned, had two abcies provided, and delivered them, so that upon the abcies they should help the priest. One of the said yeomen, holding the abcie in his hand, pretending ignorance at Kyrie Eleyson, set the priest, making as tho' he could answer no farther.

It would make a pitiful and a strange story, here by the way to touch and recite what examination and rackings of poor men there were to find out that knife that should cut her throat; what gaping among my lords of of the clergy, to see the day wherein they might wash their goodly white rochets in her innocent blood; but especially the bishop of Winchester, Stephen Gardiner, then lord chancellor, who then within five days after came unto her, with divers others of the council, and examined her of the talk that was at Ashbridge, betwixt her and Sir James Acroft, concerning her removing from thence to Dunnington castle, requiring her to declare what she meant thereby.

At the first she being so suddenly asked, did not well remember any such house; but within a while, well advising herself, she said; Indeed I do now remember that I have such a place, but I never lay in it in all my life. And as for any that hath moved me thereunto, I do not remember.

Then to enforce the matter, they brought forth Sir James Acroft. The bishop of Winchester demanded of her what she said to that man. She answered, that she had little to say to him, or to the rest that were then prisoners in the Tower. But my lords, said she, you do examine every mean prisoner of me, wherein methinks you do me great injury. If they have done evil, and offended the queen's majesty, let them answer to it accordingly. I beseech you, my lords, join not me in this sort with any of these offenders. And as concerning my going unto Dunnington castle, I do remember, that Mr. Hobby and mine officers, and you Sir James Acroft had such talk; but what is that to the purpose, my lords, but that I may go to mine own houses at all times?

The lord of Arundel kneeling down, said, Your grace saith true, and certainly we are very sorry that we have so troubled you about so vain matters. She then said; My lords, you do sift me very narrowly. But well I am assured, you shall not do more to me than God hath appointed, and so God forgive you all.

At their departure, Sir John Acroft kneeled down, declaring that he was sorry to see the day in which he should be brought as a witness against her grace. But I assure your grace, said he, I have been marvellously tossed and examined touching your highness, which the Lord knoweth is very strange to me. For I take God to record before all your honours, I do not know any thing of that crime that you have laid to my charge, and will thereupon take my death, if I should be driven to so strict a trial.

That day, or thereabouts, divers of her own officers, who had made provision for her diet, brought the same to the outer gate of the Tower, the common rascal soldiers receiving it; which was no small grief unto the gentlemen, the bringers thereof. Wherefore they required to speak with the lord chamberlain, being then constable of the Tower. Who, coming before his presence, declared unto his lordship, that they were much afraid to bring her grace's diet, and to deliver it unto such common and desperate persons as they were which did receive it, beseeching his honour to consider her grace, and to give such order, that her viands might at all times be brought in by them which were appointed thereunto. Yes, Sirs, said he, who appointed you this office? They answered, Her grace's council. Council, quoth he? there is none of them which hath to do either in that case, or any thing else within this place; and I assure you, for that she is a prisoner, she shall be served with the lieutenant's men, as other prisoners are. Whereat the gentlemen said, That they trusted for more favour from his hands, considering her personage, saying, That they mistrusted not, but the queen and her council would be better to her grace than so; and therewith shewed themselves to be offended at the ungrateful words of the lord chamberlain towards their lady and mistress.

At this he sware by God, striking himself upon the breast, that if they did either frown or shrug at him, he would set them where they should neither see sun nor moon. Thus taking their leave, they desired God to bring him into a better mind toward her grace, and departed from him.

Upon the occasion whereof, her grace's officers made great suit unto the queen's council, that some might be appointed to bring her diet unto her, and that it might no more be delivered unto her by the common soldiers of the Tower. Which being reasonably considered, was by them granted. And thereupon were appointed one of her gentlemen, her clerk of her kitchen, and her two purveyors to bring in her provision once a day. All which was done, the warders ever waiting upon the bringers thereof.

The lord chamberlain himſelf being always with them, circumſpectly and narrowly watched and ſearched what they brought, and gave heed that they ſhould have no talk with any of her grace's waiting ſervants, and ſo warded them both in and out. At the ſaid ſuit of her officers were ſent by the commandment of the council, to wait upon her grace, two yeomen of her chamber, one of her robes, two of her pantry and ewry, one of her buttery, another of her cellar, two of her kitchen, and one of her larder; all which continued with her the time of her trouble.

Here the conſtable, being at the firſt not very well pleaſed with the coming in of ſuch a company againſt his will, would have had his men ſtill to have ſerved with her grace's men. Which her ſervants by no means would ſuffer, deſiring his lordſhip to be contented, for that order was taken that no ſtranger ſhould come within their offices. At which anſwer being ſore diſpleaſed, he brake out into theſe threatening words: Well, I will handle you well enough. Then went he into the kitchen, and there would needs have his meat roaſted with her grace's meat, and ſaid, That his cook ſhould come thither and dreſs it. To that her grace's cook anſwered; My lord, I will never ſuffer any ſtranger to come about her diet, but her own ſworn men, ſo long as I live. He ſaid they ſhould. But the cook ſaid, his lordſhip ſhould pardon him for that matter. Thus did he trouble her poor ſervants very ſtoutly; though afterward he were otherwiſe adviſed, and they more courteouſly uſed at his hands. And good cauſe why. For he had good cheer, and fared of the beſt, and her grace payed well for it. Wherefore he uſed himſelf afterward more reverently toward her grace.

Having been a whole month there in cloſe priſon, and being uneaſy thereat, ſhe ſent for the lord chamberlain, and the lord Chandois to come and ſpeak with her. Who coming, ſhe requeſted them that ſhe might have liberty to walk in ſome place, for that ſhe felt herſelf not well. To which they anſwered, That they were right ſorry that they could not ſatisfy her grace's requeſt; for that they had commandment to the contrary, which they durſt not in any wiſe break. Furthermore, ſhe deſired of them, if that could not be granted, that ſhe might walk but into the queen's lodging. No, nor yet that (they anſwered) could by any means be obtained without a further ſuit to the queen and her council. Well, ſaid ſhe, my lords, if the matter be ſo hard that they muſt be ſued unto for ſo ſmall a thing, and that friendſhip be ſo ſtrict, God comfort me: and ſo they departed, ſhe remaining in her old dungeon ſtill, without any kind of comfort but only God.

The next day after the Lord Chandois came again unto her grace, declaring unto her that he had ſued unto the council for further liberty. Some of them conſented thereunto, divers other diſſented, for that there were ſo many priſoners in the tower. But in concluſion they did all agree, that her grace might walk into thoſe lodgings, ſo that he and the lord camberlain, and three of the queen's gentlewomen did accompany her, the windows being ſhut, and ſhe not ſuffered to look out at any of them: wherewith ſhe contented herſelf, and gave him thanks for his good will in that behalf.

Afterwards there was liberty granted to her grace to walk in a little garden, the doors and gates being ſhut up, which notwithſtanding was as much diſcomfort unto her, as the walk in the garden was pleaſant and acceptable. At which times of her walking there, the priſoners on that ſide ſtraitly were commanded not to ſpeak or look out at the windows into the garden, till her grace were gone out again, having in conſideration thereof their keepers waiting upon them for that time. Thus her grace with this ſmall liberty contented herſelf in God, to whom be praiſe therefore.

During this time, there uſed a little boy, a man's child in the Tower, to reſort to their chambers, and many times to bring her grace flowers, which likewiſe he did to the other priſoners that were there. Whereupon naughty and ſuſpicious heads, thinking to make and wring out ſome matter thereof, called on a time the child unto them, promiſing him figs and apples, and aſked of him when he had been with the earl of Devonſhire, not ignorant of the child's wonted frequenting unto him. The boy anſwered, that he would go by and by thither. Further, they demanded of him, when he was with the lady Elizabeth's grace. He anſwered, Every day. Furthermore, they examined him, what the lord of Devonſhire ſent by him to her grace. The child ſaid, I will go know what he will give to carry to her. Such was the diſcretion of the child, being yet but four years of age. This ſame is a crafty boy, quoth the lord chamberlain. How ſay you, my lord Chandois? I pray you, my lord, quoth the boy, give me the figs you promiſed me. No marry, quoth he, thou ſhalt be whipped if thou come any more to the lady Elizabeth, or the lord Courtney. The boy anſwered, I will bring my lady my miſtreſs more flowers. Whereupon the child's father was commanded to permit the boy no more to come up into their chambers.

The next day, as her grace was walking in the garden, the child peeping in at a hole in the door, cried unto her, ſaying, Miſtreſs, I can bring you no more flowers. Whereat ſhe ſmiled, but ſaid nothing, underſtanding thereby what they had done. Wherefore afterwards the chamberlain rebuked highly his father, commanding him to put him out of the houſe. Alas, poor infant! quoth the father. It is a crafty knave, quoth the lord chamberlain; let me ſee him here no more.

The fifth day of May the conſtable of the Tower was diſcharged of his office, and one Sir Henry Benifield placed in his room, a man unknown to her grace, and therefore the more feared; which ſo ſudden mutation was unto her no little ſurprize. He brought with him an hundred ſoldiers in blue coats, wherewith ſhe was marvellouſly diſcomforted, and demanded of ſuch as were about her, whether the lady Jane's ſcaffold were taken away or no, fearing by reaſon of their coming, leſt ſhe ſhould have played her part. To whom anſwer was made, that the ſcaffold was taken away, and that her grace needed not to doubt of any ſuch tyranny; for God would not ſuffer any ſuch treaſon againſt her perſon. Wherewith being contented, but not altogether ſatisfied, ſhe aſked what Sir Henry Benifield was, and whether he was of that conſcience or no, that if her murdering were ſecretly committed to his charge, he would ſee the execution thereof.

She was anſwered, that they were ignorant what manner of man he was. Howbeit they perſuaded her, that God would not ſuffer ſuch wickedneſs to proceed. Well, quoth ſhe, God grant it be ſo. For thou, O God, canſt mollify all ſuch tyrannous hearts, and diſappoint all ſuch cruel purpoſes; and I beſeech thee to hear me, thy creature, who am thy ſervant, and at thy commandment, truſting by thy grace ever ſo to remain.

About which time it was ſpread abroad, that her grace ſhould be carried from thence by this new jolly captain and his ſoldiers; but whither it could not be learned. Which was unto her a great grief, eſpecially for that ſuch a company was appointed to her guard, requeſting rather to contiue there ſtill, than to be led thence with ſuch a ſort of raſcals. At laſt, plain anſwer was made by the lord Chandois, that there was no remedy, but from thence ſhe muſt needs depart to the manor of Woodſtock, as he thought. Being demanded of her, for what cauſe; For that, quoth he, the Tower is like further to be furniſhed. She being deſirous to know what he meant thereby, demanded wherewith. He anſwered, with ſuch matter as the queen and council were determined in that behalf, whereof he had no knowledge; and ſo departed.

In concluſion, on Trinity Sunday, being the 19th day of May, ſhe was removed from the Tower, the lord treaſurer being there for the lading of her carts, and diſcharging the place of the ſame, where Sir Henry Benifield (being appointed her goaler) received her with a company of rake-hells to guard her, beſides the lord of Darby's band, waiting in the country about for the moon-ſhine in the water. Unto whom at length came my lord of Tame, joined in commiſſion with the ſaid Sir Henry, for the ſafe guiding of her to priſon; and they together conveyed her grace to Woodſtock, as hereafter followeth.

The firſt day they conducted her to Richmond, where ſhe continued all night, being reſtrained of her own men, which were lodged in out-chambers, and Sir Henry Benifield's ſoldiers appointed in their rooms to give attendance on her perſon. Whereat ſhe being marvellouſly diſmayed, thinking verily ſome ſecret miſchief to be working towards her, called her gentleman-uſher, and deſired him with the reſt of his company to pray for her. For this night, quoth ſhe, I think to die. Wherewith he being ſtruck to the heart, ſaying, God forbid that any ſuch wickedneſs ſhould be pretended againſt your grace. So comforting her as well as he could, at laſt he burſt out into tears, and went from her down into the court, where were walking the lord of Tame, and Sir Henry Benifield.

Then he coming to the lord of Tame (who had proffered to him much friendſhip) deſired to ſpeak with him a word or two. Unto whom he familiarly ſaid, he would with all his heart. Which when Sir Henry, ſtanding by, heard, he aſked what the matter was. To whom the gentleman-uſher anſwered, No great matter, Sir, but to ſpeak with my lord a word or two.

Then when the lord of Tame came to him, he ſpake on this wiſe, My lord, quoth he, you have been always my good lord, and ſo I beſeech you to remain. The cauſe why I come to you at this time, is to deſire your honour unfeignedly to declare unto me whether any danger is meant towards my miſtreſs this night, or not, that I and my poor fellows may take ſuch part as ſhall pleaſe God to appoint: For certainly we will rather die, than ſhe ſhould ſecretly and innocently miſcarry. Marry, ſaid the lord of Tame, God forbid that any ſuch wicked purpoſe ſhould be wrought; and rather than it ſhould be ſo, I with my men are ready to die at her foot alſo: and ſo (praiſed be God) they paſſed that doleful night, with no little heavineſs of heart.

Afterwards paſſing over the water at Richmond, going towards Windſor, her grace eſpied certain of her poor ſervants ſtanding on the other ſide, which were very deſirous to ſee her. Whom when ſhe beheld, turning to one of her men ſtanding by, ſhe ſaid, Yonder I ſee certain of my men: go to them and ſay theſe words from me, Tanquam ovis, that is, Like a ſheep to the ſlaughter.

So ſhe paſſing forward to Windſor, was lodged there that night in the dean of Windſor's houſe, a place more meet indeed for a prieſt than a princeſs.

And from thence her grace was guarded and brought the next night to Mr. Dormer's houſe, where much people ſtanding by the way, ſome preſented to her one gift, and ſome another, ſo that Sir Henry was greatly moved therewith, and troubled the poor people very ſore, for ſhewing their loving hearts in ſuch a manner, calling them rebels and traitors, with ſuch like vile words.

Beſides, as ſhe paſſed through the villages, the townſmen rang the bells, as being joyful of her coming, thinking that it had been otherwiſe than it was indeed, as the ſequel proved after to the ſaid poor men. For immediately the ſaid Sir Henry hearing the ſame, ſent his ſoldiers thither, who apprehended ſome of the ringers, ſetting them in the ſtocks, and otherwiſe uncourteouſly miſuſing other ſome for their good wills.

On the morrow her grace paſſing from Mr. Dormer's (where was for the time of her abode there, a ſtrait watch kept) came to the lord of Tame's houſe, where ſhe lay all night, being very princely entertained both by knights and ladies, gentlemen and gentlewomen. Whereat Sir Henry Benifield grumbled, and was highly offended, ſaying unto them, That they could not tell what they did, and were not able to anſwer their doings in that behalf, letting them to underſtand, that ſhe was the queen's priſoner, and no otherwiſe; adviſing them therefore to take heed and beware of after-claps. Whereunto the lord of Tame anſwered in this wiſe; That he was well adviſed of his doings, being joined in commiſſion as well as he, adding with warrant, that her grace might and ſhould in his houſe be merry.

The next day, as ſhe ſhould take her journey from Richmond towards Woodſtock, the lord of Tame with another gentleman being at tables, playing, and dropping vie-crowns, the lady Elizabeth paſſing by, ſtaid, and ſaid ſhe would ſee the game played out, which Sir Henry Benifield would ſcarce permit. The game running long about, and they playing at drop vie-crowns, Come on, ſaith he; I will tarry, ſaith ſhe, and ſee this game out.

After this, Sir Henry Benifield went up into a chamber, where was appointed for her grace a chair, two cuſhions, and a foot-carpet very fair and prince-like, wherein preſumptuouſly he ſate, and called one Barwick his man to pull off his boots. Which as ſoon as it was known among the ladies and gentlemen, every one muſed thereat, and laughed him to ſcorn, obſerving his undiſcreet manners in that behalf, as they might very well.

When ſupper was done, he called my lord, and willed him that all the gentlemen and ladies ſhould withdraw themſelves every one to his lodging, marvelling much that he would permit there ſuch a company, conſidering ſo great a charge committed to him.

Sir Henry, quoth my lord, content yourſelf, all ſhall be voided, your men and all. Nay, my ſoldiers, quoth Sir Henry, ſhall watch all night. The lord of Tame anſwered, There is no need. Well, ſaid he, Need or need not, they ſhall ſo do, miſtruſting belike the company, which God knoweth was without cauſe.

The next day her grace took her journey from thence to Woodſtock, where ſhe was incloſed, as before in the Tower of London, the ſoldiers guarding both within and without the walls, every day to the number of ſixty; and in the night without the walls forty, during the time of her impriſonment there.

At length ſhe had gardens appointed for her to walk in which was very comfortable to her grace. But always when ſhe recreated herſelf therein, the doors were faſt locked up, in as ſtrict manner as they were in the Tower, being at leaſt five or ſix locks between her lodging and her walks; Sir Henry himſelf keeping the keys, and truſting no man therewith. Whereupon ſhe called him her gaoler; and he kneeling down, deſired her grace not to call him ſo, for he was appointed there to be one of her officers. From ſuch officers (quoth ſhe) good Lord, deliver me.

And now by the way, as digreſſing, or rather refreſhing the reader, if it be lawful in ſo ſerious a ſtory to recite a matter incident, and yet not impertinent to the ſame; occaſion here moveth, or rather inforceth me to touch briefly what happened in the ſame place and time by a certain merry conceited man, being then about her grace: who noting the ſtrict and ſtrange keeping of his lady and miſtreſs by the ſaid Sir Henry Benifield, with ſo many locks and doors, with ſuch watch and ward about her, as was ſtrange and wonderful, ſpied a goat in the ward where her grace was; and whether to refreſh her oppreſſed mind, or to mortify her ſtrait handling by Sir Henry, or elſe both, he took it upon his neck, and followed followed her grace therewith as ſhe was going into her lodging.

Which when ſhe ſaw, ſhe aſked him what he would do with it, deſiring him to let it alone. The man anſwered, No, by St. Mary (if pleaſe your grace) will I not; for I cannot tell, whether he be one of the queen's friends or not. I will carry him to Sir Henry Benifield (God willing) to know what he is: ſo leaving her grace, he went with the goat on his neck, and carried it to Sir Henry; who when he ſaw him coming with it, aſked him, half angerly, what he had there.

Unto whom the party anſwered, ſaying; Sir, I cannot tell what he is. I pray you examine him, for I found him in the place where my lady's grace was walking, and what talk they have had I cannot tell. For I underſtand him not, but he ſhould ſeem to me to be ſome ſtranger, and I think verily a Welchman, for he hath a white freeze coat on his back. And foraſmuch as I being the queen's ſubject, and perceiving the ſtrait charge committed to you, that no ſtranger ſhould have acceſs to her without ſufficient licenſe, I have here found a ſtranger (what he is I cannot tell) in the place where her grace was walking; and therefore for the neceſſary diſcharge of my duty, I thought it good to bring the ſaid ſtranger to you, to examine as you ſee cauſe; and ſo he ſet him down. At this Sir Henry ſeemed much diſpleaſed, and ſaid, Well, well, you will never leave this gear, I ſee: and ſo they departed.

Now to return to the matter from whence we have digreſſed, after her grace had been there a time, ſhe made ſuit to the council that ſhe might be ſuffered to write to the queen. Which at laſt was permitted: So Sir Henry Benifield brought her pen, ink, and paper: and ſtanding by her a while ſhe wrote (which he ſtrictly obſerved) always ſhe being weary, he would carry away her letters, and bring them again when ſhe called for them. In the finiſhing thereof, he would have been meſſenger to the queen of the ſame. Whoſe requeſt her grace denied, ſaying. One of her own men ſhould carry them, and that ſhe would neither truſt him, nor any of his therein.

Then he anſwered again, ſaying, None of them durſt be ſo bold (he thought) to carry her letters being in that caſe. Yes, quoth ſhe, I am aſſured I have none ſo diſhoneſt that would deny my requeſt in that behalf, but will be as willing to ſerve me now as before. Well, ſaid he, my commiſſion is to the contrary, and I may not ſo ſuffer it. Her grace replying again, ſaid, You charge me very often with your commiſſion. I pray God you may juſtly anſwer the cruel dealing you uſe towards me.

Then he kneeling down, deſired her grace to think and conſider how he was a ſervant, and put in truſt there by the queen to ſerve her majeſty; proteſting that if the caſe were hers, he would as willingly ſerve her grace, as now he did the queen's highneſs. For which anſwer her grace thanked him, deſiring God that ſhe might never have need of ſuch ſervants as he was; declaring further to him, that his doings towards her were not good nor anſwerable, but more than all the friends he had would ſtand by.

To whom Sir Henry replied, and ſaid, That there was no remedy but his doings muſt be anſwered, and ſo they ſhould, truſting to make good account thereof. The cauſe which moved her grace ſo to ſay, was, for that he would not permit her letters to be carried four or five days after the writing thereof. But in fine he was content to ſend for her gentleman from the town of Woodſtock, demanding of him whether he durſt enterpriſe the carriage of her grace's letters to the queen, or no: and he anſwered, Yea, Sir, that I dare, and will with all my heart. Whereupon Sir Henry, half againſt his ſtomach, took them unto him.

Then about the 8th of June came down Dr. Owen, and Dr. Wendy, ſent by the queen to her grace, for that ſhe was ſickly; who miniſtering to her, and letting her blood, tarried there and attended on her grace five or ſix days. Then ſhe being well amended, they returned again to the court, making their good report to the queen and the council of her grace's behaviour and humility towards the queen's highneſs. Which her majeſty hearing, took very thankfully; but the biſhops repined thereat, looked black in the mouth, and told the queen, they marvelled that ſhe ſubmitted not herſelf to her majeſty's mercy, conſidering that ſhe had offended her highneſs.

About this time, her grace was requeſted by a ſecret friend, to ſubmit herſelf to the queen's majeſty, which would be well taken, and to her great quiet and advantage. Unto whom ſhe anſwered, That ſhe would never ſubmit herſelf to them whom ſhe never offended. For (quoth ſhe) if I have offended and am guilty, I then crave no mercy, but the law, which I am certain (quoth ſhe) I ſhould have had ere this, if it could be proved by me. For I know myſelf (I thank God) to be out of the danger thereof, wiſhing that I were as clear out of the peril of my enemies, and then I am aſſured I ſhould not ſo be locked and bolted up within walls and doors as I am. God give them a better mind when it pleaſeth him.

About this time there was a great conſultation among the biſhops and gentlemen, touching a marriage for her grace, which ſome of the Spaniards wiſhed to be with ſome ſtranger, that ſhe might go out of the realm with her portion; ſome ſaying one thing, and ſome another.

A lord (who ſhall be here nameleſs) being there, at laſt ſaid, That the king ſhould never have any quiet commonwealth in England, unleſs her head was ſtricken from her ſhoulders. Whereunto the Spaniards anſwered, ſaying, God forbid that their king and maſter ſhould have that mind to conſent to ſuch a miſchief.

This was the courteous anſwer of the Spaniards to the Engliſhmen, ſpeaking after that ſort againſt their own country. From that day the Spaniards never left off their good perſuaſions to the king, that the like honour he ſhould never obtain, as he ſhould in delivering the lady Elizabeth's grace out of priſon: whereby at length ſhe was happily releaſed from the ſame. Here is a plain and evident example of the good clemency and nature of the king and his counſellors toward her grace (praiſed be God therefore) who moved their hearts therein. Then hereupon ſhe was ſent for ſhortly after to come to Hampton-court.

But before her removing away from Woodſtock, we will a little ſtay to declare in what danger her life was, during this time ſhe there remained: firſt through fire, which began to kindle between the boards and ceiling under the chamber where ſhe lay, whether by a ſpark of fire got into a cranny, or whether of purpoſe by ſome that meant her no good, the Lord doth know. Nevertheleſs a worſhipful knight of Oxfordſhire, which was there joined the ſame time with Sir Henry Benifield in keeping that lady (who then took up the boards and quenched the fire) verily ſuppoſed it to be done of purpoſe.

Furthermore it is thought, and alſo affirmed (if it be true) of one Paul Penny, a keeper of Woodſtock, a notorious ruffian and a butcherly wretch, that he was appointed to kill the ſaid lady Elizabeth: who both ſaw the man being often in her ſight, and alſo knew thereof.

Another time, one of the privy chamber, a great man about the queen, and chief darling of Stephen Gardiner, named James Baſſet, came to Blandenbridge a mile from Woodſtock with twenty or thirty privy coats, and ſent for Sir Henry Benifield to come and ſpeak with him. But as God would, who diſpoſeth all things according to his own will, ſo it happened, that a little before, the ſaid Sir Henry Benifield was ſent for by poſt to the council, leaving ſtrict word behind him with his brother, that no man, whatſoever he were, though coming with a note of the queen's hand, or any other warrant, ſhould have acceſs to her before his return again. By reaſon whereof it ſo fell out, that Mr. Benifield's brother, coming to him at the bridge, would ſuffer him in no caſe to approach in, who otherwiſe (as is ſuppoſed) was appointed violently to murder the innocent lady.

In the life of Stephen Gardiner we declared before, how that the lady Elizabeth being in the Tower, a writ came down, ſubſcribed with certain hands of the council for her execution: which if it were certain, as it is reported, Wincheſter (no doubt) was deviſer of that miſchievous drift: and doubtleſs the ſame Achitophel had brought his impious purpoſe that day to paſs, had not the fatherly purpoſe of Almighty God ſtirred up Mr. Bridges, lieutenant the ſame time of the Tower, to come in haſte to the queen to give certificate thereof, and to know further her conſent touching her ſiſter's death. Whereupon it followed, that all that device was diſappointed, and Wincheſter's deviliſh platform, which he ſaid he had caſt, through the Lord's great goodneſs came to no effect.

Where moreover is to be noted, that during the impriſonment of this lady and princeſs, one Mr. Edmund Tremaine was on the rack, and Mr. Smithwike, and divers others in the Tower were examined, and divers offers made to them to accuſe the guiltleſs lady, being in her captivity. Howbeit all that notwithſtanding, no matter could be proved by all examinations, as ſhe the ſame time lying at Woodſtock had certain intelligence by the means of one John Gayer; who, under a colourable pretence of a letter to Mrs. Cleve from her father, was let in, and ſo gave them ſecretly to underſtand of all this matter. Whereupon the lady Elizabeth, at her departing out from Woodſtock, wrote theſe verſes with her diamond in a glaſs window.

Much ſuſpected by me:
Nothing proved can be.
Quoth Elizabeth, Priſoner.

And thus much touching the troubles of lady Elizabeth, at Woodſtock. Whereupon this is more to be added, that during the ſame time, the lord of Tame had laboured to the queen, and became ſurety for her, to have her from Woodſtock to his houſe, and had obtained a grant thereof. Whereupon preparation was made accordingly, and all things ready in expectation of her coming. But through the procurement either of Mr. Benifield, or by the advice of Wincheſter her mortal enemy, letters came over-night to the contrary; whereby her journey was ſtopped.

Thus this worthy lady, oppreſſed with continual ſorrow, could not be permitted to have recourſe to any friends ſhe had, but ſtill in the hands of her enemies was left deſolate, and utterly deſtitute of all that might refreſh a doleful heart, fraught full of terror and thraldom. Whereupon no marvel if ſhe hearing upon a time, out of her garden at Woodſtock, a certain milkmaid ſinging pleaſantly, wiſhed herſelf to be a milkmaid as ſhe was, ſaying that her caſe was better, and life more merry than was hers, in that ſtate as ſhe was.

Now after theſe things thus declared, to proceed further there where we left before, Sir Henry Benifield and his ſoldiers, with the lord of Tame, and Sir Ralph Chamberline, guarding and waiting upon her, the firſt night from Woodſtock ſhe came to Ricot. In which journey ſuch a mighty wind did blow, that her ſervants were fain to hold down her clothes about her: inſomuch that her hood was twice or thrice blown from her head. Whereupon ſhe deſiring to return to a certain gentleman's houſe there near, could not be ſuffered by Sir Henry Benifield ſo to do, but was conſtrained under an hedge to trim her head as well as ſhe could.

After this, the next night they journeyed to Mr. Dormer's, and ſo to Colbroke, where ſhe lay all that night at the George, and by the way coming to Colbroke, certain of her grace's gentlemen and yeomen met her, to the number of threeſcore, much to all their comforts, who had not ſeen her grace of long ſeaſon before: notwithſtanding they were commanded in the queen's name immediately to depart the town, to both their and her grace's no little heavineſs, who could not be ſuffered once to ſpeak with them. So that night all her men were taken from her, ſaving her gentleman-uſher, three gentlewomen, two grooms, and one of her wardrobe, the ſoldiers watching and warding about the houſe, and ſhe cloſe ſhut up within her priſon.

The next day following, her grace enter'd Hampton-Court on the back-ſide into the prince's lodging, the doors being ſhut to her, and ſhe guarded with ſoldiers as before, lay there a fortnight at leaſt, ere any had recourſe unto her: at length came the lord William Haward, who marvellous honourably uſed her grace. Whereat ſhe took much comfort, and requeſted him to be a means that ſhe might ſpeak with ſome of the council. To whom (not long after) came the biſhop of Wincheſter, and the lord of Arundel, the lord of Shrewſbury, ſecretary Peter, who with great humility humbled themſelves to her grace. She again likewiſe ſaluting them, ſaid, My lords, I am glad to ſee you; for methinks I have been kept a great while from you deſolately alone. Wherefore I would deſire you to be a means to the king and queen, that I may be delivered from priſon, wherein I have been kept a long time, as to you my lords is well known.

When ſhe had ſpoken, Stephen Gardiner the biſhop of Wincheſter kneeled down, and requeſted that ſhe would ſubmit herſelf to the queen's grace, and in ſo doing he had no doubt, but that her majeſty would be good to her: She made anſwer, that rather than ſhe would ſo do, ſhe would lie in priſon all the days of her life; adding, that ſhe craved no mercy at her majeſty's hand, but rather deſired the law, if ever ſhe did offend her majeſty in thought, word, or deed: And beſides this, in yielding (quoth ſhe) I ſhould ſpeak againſt myſelf, and confeſs myſelf to be an offender, which I never was towards her majeſty, by occaſion whereof the king and queen might ever hereafter conceive of me an evil opinion: and therefore I ſay, my lords, it were better for me to lie in priſon for the truth, than to be abroad and ſuſpected of my prince. And ſo they departed, promiſing to declare her meſſage to the queen.

On the next day the biſhop of Wincheſter came again unto her grace, and kneeling down declared that the queen marvelled that ſhe would ſo ſtoutly uſe herſelf, not confeſſing that ſhe had offended: ſo that it ſhould ſeem that the queen's majeſty had wrongfully impriſoned her grace.

Nay, quoth the lady Elizabeth, it may pleaſe her to puniſh me as ſhe thinketh good.

Well, quoth Gardiner, her majeſty willeth me to tell you, that you muſt tell another tale ere that you be ſet at liberty.

Her grace anſwered, that ſhe had as lief be in priſon with honeſty and truth, as to be abroad, ſuſpected of her majeſty; and this that I have ſaid, I will (ſaid ſhe) ſtand unto, for I will never bely myſelf.

Wincheſter again kneeled down, and ſaid, Then your grace hath the advantage of me and other lords for your wrong and long impriſonment.

What advantage I have (quoth ſhe) you know, taking God to record, I ſeek no advantage at your hands for your ſo dealing with me, but God forgive you and me alſo. With that the reſt kneeled, deſiring her grace that all might be forgotten; and ſo departed, ſhe being faſt locked up again.

A ſeven-night after the queen ſent for her grace at ten of the clock in the night to ſpeak with her: for ſhe had not ſeen her in two years before. Yet for all that, ſhe amazed at the ſuddenneſs of the meſſage, thinking it had had been worſe than afterwards it proved, deſired her gentlemen and gentlewomen to pray for her, for that ſhe could not tell whether ſhe ſhould ever ſee them again or no.

At which time Sir Henry Benifield with Mrs. Clarencius coming in, her grace was brought into the garden unto a ſtairs foot that went into the queen's lodging, her grace's gentlewoman waiting upon her, her gentleman-uſher and her grooms going before with torches; where her gentlemen and gentlewomen being commanded to ſtay, all ſaving one woman, Mrs. Clarencius conducted her to the queen's bed-chamber where her majeſty was.

At the ſight of whom her grace kneeled down, and deſired God to preſerve her majeſty, not miſtrusting but that ſhe ſhould try herſelf as a true ſubject towards her majeſty as ever did any, and deſired her majeſty even ſo to judge of her; and ſaid, that ſhe ſhould not find her to the contrary, whatſoever report otherwiſe had gone of her.

To whom the queen anſwered, You will not confeſs your offence, but ſtand ſtoutly to your truth; I pray God it may ſo fall out.

If it doth not, (quoth the lady Elizabeth) I requeſt neither favour nor pardon at your majeſty's hands. Well (ſaid the queen) you ſtiffly ſtill perſevere in your truth. Belike you will not confeſs but that you have been wrongfully puniſhed.

I muſt not lay ſo (if it pleaſe your majeſty) to you.

Why then (ſaid the queen) belike you will to others.

No, if it pleaſe your majeſty (quoth ſhe) I have borne the burden, and muſt bear it. I humbly beſeech your majeſty to have a good opinion of me, and to think me to be your true ſubject, not only from the beginning hitherto, but for ever, as long as life laſteth: and ſo they departed with very few comfortable words of the queen, in Engliſh: but what ſhe ſaid in Spaniſh, God knoweth. It is thought that king Phillip was there behind a cloth, and not ſeen, and that he ſhewed himſelf a very friend in that matter, &c.

Thus her grace departing, went to her lodging again, and that day ſeven-night was releaſed of Sir Henry Benifield her gaoler (as ſhe termed him) and his ſoldiers; and ſo her grace being ſet at liberty from impriſonment went into the country, and had appointed to go with her Sir Thomas Pope, one of queen Mary's counſellors, and one of her gentlemen-uſhers, Mr. Gage, and thus ſtrictly was ſhe looked to all queen Mary's time. And this is the diſcourſe of her highneſs's impriſonment.

Then there came to Lambeyre, Mr. Jerningham, and Mr. Norris gentleman-uſher, queen Mary's men, who took away from her grace, Mrs. Aſhly to the Fleet, and three other of her gentlewomen to the Tower; which thing was no little trouble to her grace, ſaying, that ſhe thought they would fetch all away at the end. But God be praiſed, ſhortly after was fetched away Gardiner through the merciful providence of the Lord's goodneſs, by occaſion of whoſe opportune deceaſe (as is partly touched in this ſtory before) the life of this excellent princeſs, the wealth of all England, was preſerved. For this is credibly to be ſuppoſed, that the ſaid wicked Gardiner of Wincheſter had long laboured his wits, and to this only moſt principal mark bent all his devices, to take this our happy and dear ſovereign out of the way; as both by his words and doings before notified, may ſufficiently appear.

But ſuch was the gracious and favourable providence of the Lord, to the preſervation not only of her royal majeſty, but alſo of the miſerable and woful ſtate of this whole iſland, and poor ſubjects of the ſame, whereby the proud platforms and peeviſh practices of this wicked Achitophel prevailed not: but contrariwiſe, both he, and all the ſnares and traps of his pernicious counſel laid againſt another, were turned to a net to catch himſelf, according to the proverb, Malum conſilium conſultori peſſimum.

After the death of this Gardiner, followed the death alſo and drooping away of other her enemies, where by little and little her jeopardy decreaſed, fear diminiſhed, hope of comfort began to appear as out of a dark cloud: and albeit as yet her grace had no full aſſurance of perfect ſafety, yet more gentle entertainment daily did grow unto her, till at length in the month of November, and ſeventeenth day of the ſame, three years after the death of Stephen Gardiner, followed the death of queen Mary.

Although this hiſtory following be not directly appertaining to the former matter, yet the ſame may here not unaptly be inſerted, for that it doth diſcover and ſhew forth the malicious hearts of the papiſts to the lady Elizabeth in the time of queen Mary her ſiſter, which is reported, by ſundry honeſt perſons of unqueſtionable credit. The matter whereof is this,

Soon after the ſtir of Wyat, and the troubles that happened to the lady Elizabeth for that cauſe, it happened that one Robert Farrer a haberdaſher of London, dwelling near Newgate-market, in a certain morning to be at the Roſe tavern, where chanced to meet him one Laurence Shiriff, grocer, dwelling alſo not far from thence, they drinking together as good friends (as they had been for a long time before) Farrer being a little elevated, and not conſidering who were preſent, began to talk at large againſt the lady Elizabeth, and ſaid; That jilt hath been one of the chief doers in this rebellion of Wyat, and before all be done, ſhe and all the heretics ſhall well underſtand it. Some of them hope that ſhe ſhall have the crown, but ſhe and they (I truſt) that ſo hope, ſhall hop headleſs, or be fry'd with faggots before ſhe come to it.

Laurence the grocer being ſworn ſervant to the lady Elizabeth, could no longer bear theſe ſcandalous expreſſions of his old acquaintance concerning his miſtreſs, but ſaid to him, Farrer, I have loved thee as a neighbour, and have had a good opinion of thee, but in this I defy thee; and I tell thee I am her grace's ſworn ſervant, and ſhe is a princeſs, and the daughter of a noble king, and it doth not become thee to call her a jilt; and for thy ſaying, I ſay thou art a knave, and I will complain of thee. Do thy worſt, ſaid Farrer, for what I ſaid I will ſay again? and ſo Shiriff went out of his company.

Shortly after the ſaid Shiriff, taking an honeſt neighbour with him, went before the commiſſioners to complain, who ſat then at biſhop Bonner's houſe near St. Pauls, Bonner being then chief commiſſioner, the lord Mordant, Sir John Baker, Dr. Darbiſhire chancellor to the biſhop, Dr. Story, Dr. Harpsfield, and others, being preſent.

Mr. Shiriff coming before them, declared the manner of Farrer's talk againſt the lady Elizabeth. Bonner anſwered, Peradventure you took him worſe than he meant.

Yea, my lord, ſaid Dr. Story, if you knew the man as I do, you would ſay there is not a better catholic, nor an honeſter man in the city of London.

Well, ſaid Mr. Shiriff, my lord, ſhe is my gracious lady and miſtreſs, and it is not to be ſuffered that ſuch a varlet as he ſhould call ſo honourable a princeſs by the name of jilt: and I ſaw yeſterday at court that my lord cardinal Pool, meeting her in the chamber of preſence, kneeled down on his knees and kiſſ'd her hand; and I ſaw alſo that king Phillip meeting her, made her ſuch obeiſance, that his knee touched the ground; and then me-thinketh it were too much to ſuffer ſuch a varlet as this is, to call her jilt, and to wiſh them to hop headleſs that ſhall wiſh her grace to enjoy the poſſeſſion of the crown, when God ſhall ſend it unto her, as in the right of her inheritance.

Yea? ſtay there, quoth Bonner. When God ſendeth it unto her, let her enjoy it. But truly (ſaid he) the man that ſpake the words that you have reported, meant nothing againſt the lady Elizabeth your miſtreſs, and no more do we: but he like an honeſt and zealous man feared the alteration of religion, which every good man ought to fear: and therefore (ſaid Bonner) good man go your way home, and report well of us to your miſtreſs, and we will ſend for Farrer and rebuke him for his raſh and undiſcreet words, and we truſt he will not do the like again. And thus Shiriff came away, and Farrer had a ſlap with a fox tail.

Queen Mary being long ſick before, upon the 17th day of November, in the year aboveſaid, about three or four o'clock in the morning, yielded her life to nature, and her kingdom to queen Elizabeth her ſiſter. Concerning whoſe death, ſome ſay that ſhe died of a tympany, ſome (by her much ſighing before her death) ſuppoſed ſhe died of thought and ſorrow. Whereupon her council ſeeing her ſighing, and deſirous of knowing the cauſe, to the end they might the more ready miniſter conſolation to her, feared, as they ſaid, that ſhe took that thought for the king her huſband, who was gone from her. To whom ſhe anſwering, ſaid, Indeed that may be one cauſe, but that is not the greateſt wound that pierceth my oppreſſed mind: but what that was ſhe would not expreſs to them.

Albeit afterward ſhe opened the matter more plainly to Mr. Rice and Mrs. Clarencius (if it be true that they told me, who heard it of Mr. Rice himſelf,) who then being moſt familiar with her, told her, that they feared ſhe took thought for king Phillip's departing from her. Not that only, ſaid ſhe, but when I am dead and opened, you ſhall find Calice lying in my heart, &c. And here an end of queen Mary and of her perſecution.

Of which queen this truly may be affirmed, and left in ſtory for a perpetual memorial or epitaph for all kings and queens that ſhall ſucceed her, to be noted, That before her never was read in ſtory of any king or queen of England ſince the time of king Lucius, under whom in time of peace, by hanging, heading, burning, and impriſoning, ſo much chriſtian blood, ſo many Engliſhmen's lives were ſpilled within this realm, as under the ſaid queen Mary for the ſpace of four years was to be ſeen, and I beſeech the Lord never may be ſeen hereafter.

A brief Declaration, ſhewing the unproſperous Succeſs of Queen Mary in proſecuting God's People, and how mightily God wrought againſt her in all her Affairs.

AS queen Mary during all her reign was ſuch a vehement adverſary againſt the ſincere profeſſors of Chriſt and his goſpel; for which there be many who do highly magnify and approve her doings therein: to the intent therefore that all men may underſtand, how the bleſſing of God did not only not proceed with her proceedings, but contrariwiſe rather, how his manifeſt diſpleaſure ever wrought againſt her, in plaguing both her and her realm, and in ſubverting all her counſels and attempts, whatſoever ſhe took in hand, we will beſtow a little time therein, to ſurvey the whole courſe of her actions, and conſider what ſucceſs ſhe had in the ſame. Which being well conſidered, we ſhall never find any reign of any prince in this land, or any other, which did ever ſhew in it (for the proportion of time) ſo many arguments of God's wrath and diſpleaſure, as was to be ſeen in the reign of this queen, whether we behold the ſhortneſs of her time, or the unfortunate event of all her purpoſes, who ſeemed never to purpoſe any thing that came luckily to paſs, neither did any thing frame to her purpoſe, whatſoever thing ſhe took in hand touching her own private affairs.

Of good kings we read in ſcripture, in ſhewing mercy and pity, in ſeeking God's will in his word, and ſubverting the monuments of idolatry, how God bleſſed their ways, increaſed their honours, and mightily proſpered all their proceedings, as we ſee in king David, Solomon, Joſias, Joſaphat, Ezechias, with ſuch others; Manaſſes made the ſtreets of Jeruſalem to ſwim with the blood of his ſubjects, but what came of it, the text doth teſtify.

Of queen Elizabeth, who now reigneth among us, this we muſt needs ſay which we ſee, that ſhe in ſparing the blood, not only of God's ſervants, but alſo of God's enemies, hath doubled now the reign of queen Mary her ſiſter, with ſuch abundance of peace and proſperity, that it is hard to ſay, whether the realm of England felt more of God's wrath in queen Mary's time, or of God's favour and mercy in theſe bleſſed days of queen Elizabeth.

Gamaliel ſpeaking his mind in the council of the Phariſees concerning Chriſt's religion, gave this reaſon, that if it were not of God, it could not ſtand. So may it be ſaid of queen Mary and her Romiſh religion, that if it were ſo perfect and catholic as they pretend, and the contrary faith of the goſpellers were ſo deteſtable and heretical as they make it; how cometh it then, that this ſo catholic a queen, ſuch a neceſſary pillar of his ſpouſe the church, continued no longer, till ſhe had utterly rooted out of the land this heretical generation? yea how chanced it rather, that almighty God to ſpare theſe poor heretics, rooted out queen Mary ſo ſoon from her throne, after ſhe had reigned but only five years and five months?

Further, how God bleſſed her ways and endeavours in the mean time, while ſhe thus perſecuted the true ſervants of God, remaineth to be diſcuſſed. Where this is firſt to be noted, that when ſhe firſt began to ſtand for the title of the crown, and yet had wrought no reſiſtance againſt Chriſt and his goſpel, but had promiſed her faith to the Suffolk men, to maintain the religion left by king Edward her brother, ſo long God went with her, advanced her, and by the means of the goſpellers brought her to the poſſeſſion of the realm. But after that ſhe breaking her promiſe with God and man, began to take part with Stephen Gardiner, and had given over her ſupremacy to the pope, by-and-by God's bleſſing left her, neither did any thing well thrive with her afterward during the time of her government.

For firſt, the fineſt and greateſt ſhip ſhe had, called Great Harry, was burnt; ſuch a veſſel as was not to be matched in theſe parts of Europe.

Then would ſhe needs bring in K. Phillip, and by her ſtrange marriage with him, to make the whole realm of England ſubject to a ſtranger. And all that notwithſtanding, that ſhe either did, or was able to do, ſhe could not bring to paſs to ſet the crown of England on his head. With king Phillip came in the pope and his popiſh maſs; with whom alſo her purpoſe was to reſtore again the monks and nuns to their places, neither lacked there any attempts to the utmoſt of her power; and yet therein God ſtopt her of her will, that it came not forward. After this, what a famine happened in her time here in her land? the like whereof hath not been in England, inſomuch that in ſundry places her poor ſubjects were forced to live upon acorns for want of corn.

Furthermore where other kings are wont to be renowned by ſome worthy victory and valour by them atchieved, let us now ſee what valiant victory was gotten in this queen Mary's day. King Edward the ſixth her bleſſed brother, how many rebellions did he ſuppreſs in Devonſhire, in Norfolk, in Oxfordſhire, and elſewhere?

elſewhere? what a famous victory was got in his time in Scotland, by the ſingular working (no doubt) of God's bleſſed hand, rather than by any expectation of man? King Edward the third (which was the eleventh king from the conqueſt) by princely puiſſance purchaſed Calice unto England, which hath been kept Engliſh ever ſince, till at length came queen Mary, the eleventh likewiſe from the ſaid king Edward, who loſt Calice from England again: ſo that the winnings of this queen were very ſmall, what the loſſes were let other men judge.

Hitherto the affairs of queen Mary have had no great ſucceſs, as you have heard: but never worſe ſucceſs had any woman than ſhe had in her childbirth. For ſeeing one of theſe two muſt needs be granted, that either ſhe was with child or not with child: if ſhe were with child, why was it not ſeen? if ſhe were not, how was all the realm deluded? and in the mean while, where were all the prayers, the ſolemn proceſſions, the devout maſſes of the catholic clergy? why did they not prevail with God, if their religion were ſo godly as they pretend? if their maſſes Ex opere operato be able to fetch Chriſt from heaven, and to reach down to purgatory: how chanced then they could not reach to the queen's chamber, to help her in her travail, if ſhe had been with child indeed? if not, how then came it to paſs, that all the catholic church of England did ſo err, and was ſo deeply deceived? Queen Mary after theſe manifold plagues and corrections, which might ſufficiently admoniſh her of God's diſfavour provoked againſt her, would not yet ceaſe her perſecution, but ſtill continued more and more to revenge her catholic zeal upon the Lord's faithful people, ſetting fire to their poor bodies by dozens and half dozens. Whereupon God's wrathful indignation, increaſing more and more againſt her, ceaſed not to touch her more near with private misfortunes and calamities. For after that he had taken from her the fruit of children (which chiefly and above all things ſhe deſired) then he bereft her of that, which of all earthly things ſhould have been her chief ſtay of honour, and ſtaff of comfort, that is, withdrew from her the affection and company even of her own huſband, by whoſe marriage ſhe had promiſed before to herſelf whole heaps of ſuch joy and felicity: but the omnipotent governor of all things ſo turned the wheel of her own ſpinning againſt her, that her high buildings of ſuch joys and felicities came all to nothing; her hopes being confounded, her purpoſes diſappointed, and ſhe alſo brought to deſolation; who ſeemed neither to have the favour of God, nor the heart of her ſubjects, nor even the love of her huſband; who neither had fruit by him while ſhe had him, neither could enjoy him whom ſhe married, nor yet at liberty to marry any other whom ſhe might. Now obſerve the woful adverſity of this queen, and learn hencè what the Lord can do when man's wilfulneſs will needs reſiſt him, and will not be ruled.

At laſt, when all theſe fair admonitions would take no place with the queen, nor move her to revoke her bloody laws, nor to ſtay the tyranny of her prieſts, nor yet to ſpare her own ſubjects, but that the ſervants of God were drawn daily by heaps moſt pitifully as ſheep to the ſlaughter, it ſo pleaſed the heavenly Majeſty of Almighty God, when no other remedy would ſerve, ſeaſonably to cut her off by death, who in her life ſo little regarded the life of others, giving her throne, which ſhe abuſed to the deſtruction of Chriſt's church and people, to another who more temperately and quietly could guide the ſame, after ſhe had reigned here the ſpace of five years and five months. The ſhortneſs of whoſe reign, ſcarce we find in any other ſtory of king or queen ſince the conqueſt or before (being come to their own government) ſave only in king Richard III.

And thus much here, as in the cloſing up of this ſtory, I thought to inſinuate, touching the unlucky and deplorable reign of queen Mary: not for any detraction to her place and ſtate-royal, whereunto ſhe was called of the Lord, but to this only intent and effect, that foraſmuch as ſhe would needs ſet herſelf ſo confidently to work and ſtrive againſt the Lord and his proceedings, all readers and rulers may not only ſee how the Lord did work againſt her therefore, but alſo by her may be advertiſed and learn what a dangerous thing it is for men and women in authority, upon blind zeal and opinion, to ſtir up perſecution in the chriſtian church, to the effuſion of chriſtian blood, leſt it prove in the end with them (as it did here) that while they think to perſecute heretics, they ſtumble at the ſame ſtone as did the Jews in perſecuting Chriſt and his true members to death, to their own confuſion and deſtruction.

A lamentable Hiſtory of John Whitman, ſhoemaker, who ſuffered moſt cruel Torments at Oſtend in Flanders, Anno 1572.

JOHN Whitman, ſhoemaker, about the age of forty-nine years, born in Tinen, a town in Brabant, after his coming over into England, dwelt in Rye, in the county of Suſſex, being married twenty-three years; always a profeſſor of the goſpel, as well in the time of freedom, as in time of perſecution. About Candlemas in the year 1572, unknown to his friends in Rye, underſtanding of ſhipping in Rye, which was ready bound for Oſtend in Flanders, he went aboard the Saturday morning, and arrived at Oſtend that night, where he lodged with one of his kinſmen dwelling there. The next day being Sunday, in the morning, he, accompanied with his ſaid kinſman, took his journey, as it were to have paſſed higher into the country.

When they were about three miles on their way out of the town, Whitman immediately returned back again to Oſtend, whither ſo ſoon as he was come, he immediately went to church, and at the time of the heave-offering ſtept to the ſacrificer, and took from his head his idol, ſaying theſe words in the Dutch tongue, Is this your God? And ſo breaking it, caſt it under his feet. The people laid hold on him, and he was carried to priſon. The next day the judges and other counſellors being aſſembled, he was brought forth into the common hall, and examined of his fact, the intent, the counſel, and abettors thereof, and alſo of his faith; where he very conſtantly in defence of his chriſtian faith, and great deteſtation of idolatry, demeaned himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he wrung tears from the eyes of divers, both of the chief, and others preſent. So was he committed again to priſon. The next day being Tueſday, he was brought out again before the judges into the ſame place, and being examined as before, he no whit abated, but increaſed in his conſtancy. Whereupon ſentence was given upon him to have his hand cut off, and his body ſcorched to death, and after to be hanged up. So the day following, being Wedneſday, he was brought out of priſon to the town-hall, ſtanding in the market-place, all things belonging to execution being made ready there. The hangman went into the hall, and with a cord tied his hands, and came out leading him thereby. So ſoon as Whittle was out of the houſe, he made ſuch haſte, and as it were ran ſo to the place of execution, that he drew the hangman after him. There was a poſt ſet up with ſparrs from the top thereof, aſlope, down to the ground, in manner of a tent, to the intent that he ſhould be only ſcorched to death, and not burned. When he was come to the place, the hangman commanded him to lay down his right hand upon a block, which he immediately with a hatchet ſmote off: the good man ſtill continuing conſtant, the hangman ſtept behind him, and bid him put out his tongue, through which he thruſt a a long inſtrument like a pack-needle, and ſo let it ſtick. Then the judges, ſtanding by in the common hall, read again his fact and ſentence. Whereunto he could make no anſwer, his tongue hanging out of his head: then he was ſtripped out of his waiſtcoat, and put within his tent, and made faſt with two chains, and fire was put round about, which broiled and ſcorched his body moſt miſerably, all black, he not being ſeen, but heard to make a noiſe within the tent. When he was dead, he was carried out to be hanged upon a gibbet near the town.

The Conference or Diſceptation had and begun at Weſtminſter the laſt of March, upon certain Queſtions or Articles of Religion propoſed, and alſo of the breaking up of the ſame, by the Papiſts default, at the firſt beginning of Queen Elizabeth.

SO it pleaſed the queen's moſt excellent majeſty, having heard of the diverſity of opinions in certain matters of religion amongſt ſundry of her loving ſubjects, and being very deſirous to have the ſame reduced to ſome godly and chriſtian concord (by the advice of the lords and others of the privy council, as well for the ſatisfaction of perſons doubtful, as alſo for the knowledge of the very truth in certain matters of difference) to have a convenient choſen number of the beſt learned of either part, and to confer together their opinions and reaſons, and thereby to come to ſome good and charitable agreement. And hereupon by her majeſty's commandment, certain of her privy council declared this purpoſe to the archbiſhop of York (being alſo one of the ſame privy council) and required him that he would impart the ſame to ſome of the biſhops, and to make choice of eight, nine, or ten of them, and that there ſhould be the like number named of the other part. And further alſo they declared to him (as then was ſuppoſed) what the matter ſhould be. And as for the time, it was thought meet to be as ſoon as poſſible might be agreed upon. And then after certain days paſt, it was ſignified by the ſaid archbiſhop, that there were appointed, by ſuch of the biſhops to whom he had imparted this matter, nine perſons, that is to ſay, five biſhops and four doctors. The names of whom here follow under written.

The Papiſts.

The biſhop of Wincheſter. The biſhop of Litchfield. The biſhop of Cheſter. The biſhop of Carliſle. The biſhop of Lincoln. Dr. Cole. Dr. Harpsfield. Dr. Langdale. Dr. Chedſey.

The Proteſtants.

Dr. Scory biſhop of Chicheſter. Dr. Coxe. Mr. Whitehead. Mr. Grindall. Mr. Horne. Mr. Sands. Mr. Geſt. Mr. Aelmer. Mr. Juell.

Who were content at the queen's command, to ſhew their opinions, and, as the ſaid archbiſhop termed it, render account of their faith in thoſe matters which were mentioned, and that eſpecially in writing, altho' he ſaid, he thought the ſame ſo determined, as there was no cauſe to diſpute upon them. The matter they were to talk upon, was comprehended in theſe three propoſitions hereunder ſpecified.

1. It is againſt the word of God, and the cuſtom of the ancient church, to uſe a tongue unknown to the people, in common prayer, and the adminiſtration of the ſacraments.
2. Every church hath authority to appoint, take away, and change ceremonies and eccleſiaſtical rites, ſo the ſame be to edification.
3. It cannot be proved by the word of God, that there is in the maſs offered up a ſacrifice propitiatory for the quick and the dead.

It was hereupon fully reſolved by the queen's majeſty, with the advice aforeſaid, that according to their deſire, it ſhould be in writing on both parts, for avoiding of much altercation in words; and that the ſaid biſhops would, becauſe they were in authority of degree ſuperior, firſt declare their opinions in the matter, with their reaſons in writing. And the other number, being alſo nine men of good degree in ſchools, and ſome having been in dignity in the church of England, if they had any thing to ſay to the contrary, ſhould the ſame day declare their opinions in like manner, and ſo each of them ſhould deliver their writings to the other, to be conſidered what were to be improved therein, and the ſame to declare again in writing at ſome other convenient day, and the like order to be kept in all the reſt of the matters. All this was fully agreed upon with the archbiſhop of York, and ſo alſo ſignified to both parties.

And immediately hereupon divers of the nobility and ſtates of the realm underſtanding that ſuch a meeting and conference was intended, concerning ſuch matters, as were to be confirmed by parliament according to the deciſion of theſe learned doctors; they petitioned her majeſty that the parties of this conference might be put to read their aſſertions in the Engliſh tongue, and that in the preſence of them of the nobility and others of her parliament houſe, for the better ſatisfaction and enabling of their own judgments, to treat and conclude of ſuch laws as might depend hereupon.

This alſo, being thought very reaſonable, was ſignified to both parties, and ſo fully agreed upon, and the day appointed for the firſt meeting to be on Friday in the forenoon, being the laſt day of March, at Weſtminſter church. Where were preſent by the queen's command, the lords and others of the privy council, and a great part of the nobility, both to honour and ſee good order in the conference. And notwithſtanding this former order appointed, and conſented unto by both parties, yet the biſhop of Wincheſter and his colleagues alledged they had miſtaken that their aſſertions and reaſons ſhould be written, and ſo only recited out of the book, ſaying, their book was not then ready written, but they were ready to argue and diſpute, and therefore they would for that time repeat in ſpeech, that which they had to ſay to the firſt probation.

This variation from the former order, and eſpecially from that which themſelves had by the ſaid archbiſhop in writing before required, adding thereto the reaſon of the apoſtle, that to contend with words is profitable to nothing, but to the ſubverſion of the hearer, ſeemed to the queen's council ſomewhat ſtrange, and yet was it permitted without any great reprehenſion, becauſe they excuſed themſelves with miſtaking the order, and agreed that they would not fail but put it in writing, and, according to the former order, delivered it to the other part; and ſo the ſaid biſhop of Wincheſter and his colleagues, appointed Dr. Cole dean of Paul's, to be the utterer of their minds; who partly by ſpeech only, and partly by reading of authorities written, and at certain times being informed of his colleagues what to ſay, made a declaration of their meanings and their reaſons to their firſt propoſition: which being ended, they were aſked by the privy council if any of them had any more to be ſaid, and they ſaid, no. So as the other part was licenſed to ſhew their minds, which they did according to the firſt order, exhibiting all that which they meant to be propounded, in a book written, which, after a prayer and invocation, made moſt humbly to Almighty God for the enduing of them with his Holy Spirit, and a proteſtation alſo to ſtand to the doctrine of the catholic church built upon the ſcriptures, and the doctrine of the prophets and the apoſtles, was diſtinctly read by one Robert Horne, batchelor in divinity, late dean of Durham, and after biſhop of Wincheſter. The copy of which their proteſtation here followeth according as it was by him penned and exhibited, with there preface alſo before the ſame.

Foraſmuch

FOraſmuch as it is thought good unto the queen's moſt excellent majeſty (unto whom in the Lord all obedience is due) that we ſhould declare our judgment in writing upon certain propoſitions; we, as becometh us to do therein, moſt gladly obey.

Seeing that Chriſt is our only Maſter, whom the Father hath commanded us to hear; and ſeeing alſo his word is the truth, from which it is not lawful for us to depart, no not one hair's breadth, and againſt ſuch (as the apoſtle ſaith) we can do nothing; we do in all things ſubmit ourſelves unto this truth, and do proteſt that we will affirm nothing againſt the ſame.

And foraſmuch as we have for our mother the true and catholic church of Chriſt, which is grounded upon the doctrine of the apoſtles and prophets, and is of Chriſt, the head in all things, governed; we do reverence her judgment, we obey her authority as becometh children: and we do devoutly profeſs, and in all points follow the faith which is contained in the three creeds; that is to ſay, of the apoſtles, of the council of Nice, and of Athanaſius.

And ſeeing that we never departed, neither from the doctrine of God, which is contained in the holy canonical ſcriptures, nor yet from the faith of the true and catholic church of Chriſt; but have preached truly the word of God, and have ſincerely miniſtered the ſacraments according to the inſtitution of Chriſt, unto which our doctrine and faith the moſt part alſo of our adverſaries did ſubſcribe not many years paſt (although now as unnatural they are revolted from the ſame) we deſire that they render account of their backſliding, and ſhew ſome cauſe wherefore they do not only reſiſt that doctrine which they have before profeſſed, but alſo perſecute the ſame by all means they can. We do not doubt, but through the equity of the queen's moſt excellent majeſty, we ſhall in theſe diſputations be treated more gently than in years late paſt, when we were handled moſt unjuſtly and ſcantly after the common manner of men. As for the judgment of the whole controverſy, we refer unto the moſt holy ſcriptures, and the catholic church of Chriſt (whoſe judgment unto us ought to be moſt ſacred:) notwithſtanding by the catholic church we underſtand not the Romiſh church, whereunto our adverſaries attribute ſuch reverence, but that which Saint Auguſtine and other fathers affirm, ought to be ſought in the holy ſcriptures, and which is governed and led by the Spirit of Chriſt.

It is againſt the word of God, and the cuſtom of the primitive church, to uſe a tongue unknown to the people in common prayers, and adminiſtration of the ſacraments.

By theſe words (the word of God) we mean only the written word of God, or canonical ſcriptures.

And by the cuſtom of the primitive church we mean the order moſt generally uſed in the church for the ſpace of five hundred years after Chriſt, in which times lived the moſt notable fathers, as Juſtine, Ireneus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Baſil, Chryſoſtom, Hierom, Ambroſe, Auguſtine, &c.

This aſſertion above written hath two parts, Firſt, That the uſe of the tongne not underſtood of the people, in common prayers of the church, or in the adminiſtrations of the ſacraments, is againſt God's word.

The ſecond, That the ſame is againſt the uſe of the primitive church.

The firſt part is moſt manifeſtly proved by the fourteenth chapter of the Epiſtle to the Corinthians, almoſt throughout the whole chapter. In the which chapter St. Paul intreateth of this matter, Ex profeſſo, purpoſely. And although ſome do cavil that St. Paul ſpeaketh notin that chapter of praying, but of preaching, yet it is moſt evident to any indifferent reader of underſtanding, and appeareth alſo by the expoſition of the beſt writers, that he plainly there ſpeaketh not only of preaching and propheſying, but alſo of prayer and thankſgiving, and generally of all other public actions, which require any ſpeech in the church or congregation. For of praying he ſaith; I will pray with my ſpirit, and I will pray with my mind. And of thankſgiving, which is a kind of prayer, Thou giveſt thanks well, but the other is not edified. And how ſhall he which occupieth the room of the unlearned ſay, Amen, to thy giving of thanks, when he underſtandeth not what thou ſayeſt? And in the end, deſcending from particulars to a general propoſition, concludeth, that all things ought to be done to edification. Thus much is clear by the very words of St. Paul, and the ancient doctors Ambroſe, Auguſtine, Hierom, and others, do ſo underſtand this chapter, as it ſhall appear by their teſtimonies, which ſhall follow afterward.

Upon this chapter of St. Paul we gather theſe reaſons following.

1. All things done in the church or congregation, ought ſo to be done as they may edify the ſame.

But the uſe of an unknown tongue, in public prayer or adminiſtration of ſacraments, doth not edify the congregation.

Therefore the uſe of an unknown tongue, in public prayer or adminiſtration of the ſacraments, is not to be had in the church.

The firſt part of this reaſon is grounded upon Saint Paul's words, commanding all things to be done to edification.

The ſecond part is alſo proved by St. Paul's plain words. Firſt by this ſimilitude. If the trumpet give an uncertain ſound, who ſhall be prepared to battle? even ſo likewiſe when ye ſpeak with tongues, except ye ſpeak words that have ſignification, how ſhall it be underſtood what is ſpoken? for ye ſhall but ſpeak in the air, that is to ſay, in vain, and conſequently without edifying.

And afterward in the ſame chapter he ſaith, How can he that occupieth the place of the unlearned ſay, Amen, at thy giving of thanks, ſeeing he underſtandeth not what thou ſayeſt? for thou verily giveſt thanks well, but the other is not edified.

Theſe be St. Paul's words, plainly proving, that a tongue not underſtood doth not edify. And therefore both the parts of the reaſon thus proved by Saint Paul, the concluſion followeth neceſſarily.

2. Secondly, nothing is to be ſpoken in the congregation in an unknown tongue, except it be interpreted to the people, that it may be underſtood. For ſaith St. Paul, If there be no interpreter to him that ſpeaketh in an unknown tongue, Taceat in eccleſia, let him hold his peace in the church. And therefore the common prayers and adminiſtration of ſacraments, neither done in a known tongue, neither interpreted, are againſt the commandment of Paul, and not to be uſed.

The miniſter in prayer or adminiſtration of ſacraments uſing language not underſtood of the hearers, is to them barbarous, and alien, which of St. Paul is accounted a great abſurdity.

It is not to be counted a chriſtian common prayer, where the people preſent declare not their aſſent unto it, by ſaying, Amen, wherein is implied all other words of aſſent.

But St. Paul affirmeth, that the people cannot declare their aſſent in ſaying Amen, except they underſtand what is ſaid, as afore.

Therefore it is no chriſtian common prayer where the people underſtand not what is ſaid.

Paul would not ſuffer in his time a ſtrange tongue to be heard in the common prayer of the church, notwithſtanding that ſuch a kind of ſpeech was then a miracle, and a ſingular gift of the Holy Ghoſt, whereby infidels might be perſuaded and brought to the faith; much leſs is it to be ſuffered now amongſt chriſtian and faithful men, eſpecially being no miracle nor eſpecial gift of the Holy Ghoſt.

Some will peradventure anſwer, that to uſe any kind of tongue, in common prayer or adminiſtration of ſacraments, is a thing indifferent.

But St. Paul is to the contrary. For he commandeth all things to be done to edification, he commandeth to keep ſilence if there be no interpreter, and in the end of the chapter he concludeth thus; If any man be ſpiritual, or a prophet, let him know that the things which I write, are the commandments of the Lord. And ſo ſhortly to conclude, the uſe of a ſtrange tongue, in prayer and adminiſtration, is againſt the word and commandment of God.

To theſe reaſons, grounded upon Saint Paul's words, which are the moſt firm foundation of this aſſertion, divers other reaſons may be joined, gathered out of the ſcriptures, and otherwiſe.

In the Old Teſtament, all things pertaining to the public prayer, benedictions, thankſgivings, or ſacrifices, were always in their vulgar and natural tongue. In the ſecond book of Paralipom. chap. 29. it is written, that Ezechias commanded the Levites to praiſe God with the Pſalms of David, and Aſaph the prophet, which doubtleſs were written in Hebrew, their vulgar tongue. If they did ſo in the ſhadows of the law, much more ought we to do the like, who (as Chriſt ſaith) muſt pray, in ſpirit and truth.

The final end of our prayer (as David ſaith) is, "That the people aſſembled together may declare the name of the Lord in Sion, and his praiſe in Jeruſalem."

But the name and praiſes of God cannot be ſet forth to the people, unleſs it be done in ſuch a tongue as they may underſtand, therefore common prayer muſt be had in the vulgar tougue.

The definition of public prayer out of the words of St. Paul is, That common prayer is to lift up our common deſires to God with our minds, and to teſtify the ſame outwardly with our tongues, which definition is approved by St. Auguſtine, De magiſtro, cap. 1.

The miniſtration of the Lord's ſupper and baptiſm are as it were ſermons of the death and reſurrection of Chriſt.

But ſermons to the people muſt be had in ſuch language as the people may perceive, otherwiſe they ſhould be had in vain.

It is not lawful for a chriſtian man to abuſe the gifts of God: but he that prayeth in the church in a ſtrange tongue, abuſeth the gifts of God. For the tongue ſerveth only to expreſs the mind of the ſpeaker to the hearer. And Auguſtine ſaith, De doctrina chriſtiana, lib. 4. cap. 10. There is no cauſe why we ſhould ſpeak, if they for whoſe cauſe we ſpeak, underſtand not our ſpeaking.

The heathen and barbarous nations of all countries and ſorts of men, were they never ſo wild, evermore made their prayers and ſacrifices to their gods in their own mother tongue. Which is a manifeſt declaration that it is the very light and voice of nature.

Thus much upon the ground of Saint Paul, and other reaſons out of the ſcriptures, joining therewith the common uſage of all nations, as a teſtimony of the law of nature.

Now for the ſecond part of the aſſertion, which is, that the uſe of a ſtrange tongue in public prayer and adminiſtration of ſacraments, is againſt the cuſtom of the primitive church; it is a matter ſo clear, that the denial of it muſt needs proceed either of great ignorance, or elſe of wilful malice.

For firſt of all, Juſtine Martyr deſcribing the order of the communion in his time, ſaith thus. Upon the Sunday aſſemblies are made both of the citizens and countrymen, whereat the writings of the apoſtles and of the prophets are read, as much as may be. Afterwards when the reader doth ceaſe, the bead miniſter maketh an exhortation, exhorting them to follow ſo honeſt things. After this we riſe all together, and offer prayers, which being ended (as we have ſaid) bread and water are brought forth. Then the head miniſter offereth prayers and thankſgiving, as much as he can, and the people anſwer Amen.

Theſe words of Juſtine, who lived about 160 years after Chriſt, conſidered with their circumſtance, declare plainly, that not only the ſcriptures were read, but alſo that the prayers and adminiſtration of the Lord's ſupper were done in a tongue underſtood.

The liturgies both of Baſil and Chryſoſtom declare, that in the celebration of the communion the people were appointed to anſwer to the prayer of the miniſter, ſometimes, Amen, ſometimes, Lord have mercy upon us, ſometimes, And with thy Spirit, and, We have our hearts lifted up unto the Lord, &c. Which anſwers they could not have made in due time, if the prayer had not been made in a tongue underſtood.

And for further proof, let us hear what Baſil writeth in this matter to the clerks of Neocæſarea. As touching that is laid to our charge in pſalmodies and ſongs, wherewith our ſlanderers do fray the ſimple, I have thus to ſay, that our cuſtoms and uſages in all churches be uniform and agreeable.

For in the night the people with us riſeth, goeth to the houſe of prayer, and in travail, tribulation, and continual tears, they confeſs themſelves to God, and at the laſt riſing again, go to their ſongs or pſalmody, where being divided into two parts, they ſing by courſe together, both deeply weighing and confirming the matter of the heavenly ſayings, and alſo ſtirring up their attention and devotion of heart, which by other means be alienated and plucked away. Then appointing one to begin the ſong, the reſt follow, and ſo with divers ſongs and prayers paſſing the night, at the dawning of the day, all together, even as it were with one mouth and one heart, they ſing unto the Lord a ſong of confeſſion, every man framing to himſelf meet words of repentance.

If you will fly us from henceforth for theſe things, ye muſt fly alſo the Egyptians, and both Libians, ye muſt eſchew the Thebanes, Paleſtines, Arabians, the Phænices, the Syrians, and all thoſe with whom watchings, prayers, and common ſinging of pſalms, are had in honour.

Teſtimonies of St. Ambroſe, written upon the fourteenth Chapter of the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians.

THIS is it that he ſaith; Becauſe he that ſpeaketh in an unknown tongue, ſpeaketh to God. For he knoweth all things, but men know not, and therefore there is no profit of this thing.

The ſame author afterwards upon theſe words, If thou bleſs or give thanks with the ſpirit, how ſhall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned ſay Amen, at thy giving of thanks, ſeeing he underſtandeth not what thou ſayeſt? That is (ſaith Ambroſe) if thou ſpeak the praiſe of God in a tongue unknown to the hearers. For the unlearned, hearing that which he underſtandeth not, knoweth not the end of the prayer, and he anſwereth not Amen. That is as much as to ſay (true) that the bleſſing or thankſgiving may be confirmed. For the confirmation of the prayer is fulfilled by them which do anſwer Amen. That all things ſpoken might be confirmed in the minds of the hearers, through the teſtimony of the truth.

Afterward in the ſame place upon theſe words, If any infidel or unlearned come in.

For when he underſtandeth, and is underſtood, hearing God to be praiſed, and Chriſt to be worſhipped, he ſeeth perfectly that the religion is true, and to be reverenced, wherein he ſeeth nothing to be done colourably, nothing nothing in darkneſs, as among the heathen, whoſe eyes are covered, that they ſeeing not the things which they call holy, might perceive themſelves to be deluded with divers vanities. For all falſhood ſeeketh darkneſs, and ſheweth falſe things for true. Therefore with us nothing is done privily, nothing covertly, but one God is ſimply praiſed, of whom are all things, and one Lord Jeſus, by whom are all things. For if there be none which can underſtand, or of whom he may be tried, he may ſay, there is ſome deceit and vanity, which is therefore ſung in tongues (not underſtood, he meaneth) becauſe it is ſhame to open it.

Upon this place, Let all things be done to edify.

This is the concluſion; that nothing ſhould be done in the church in vain; and that this thing ought chiefly to be laboured for, that the unlearned alſo might profit, leſt any part of the body ſhould be dark through ignorance.

Again, If there be no interpreter, let him keep ſilence in the church.

That is, let him pray ſecretly, or ſpeak to God within himſelf, who heareth all dumb things; for in the church he ought to ſpeak which may profit all men.

Teſtimonies out of Saint Hierom, upon the aforeſaid Place of Saint Paul.

IT is the layman, ſaith he, whom Paul here underſtandeth to be in the place of the ignorant man, which hath no eccleſiaſtical office. How ſhall he anſwer Amen to the prayer that he underſtandeth not?

And a little after upon theſe words, For if I pray in an unknown tongue, &c.

This is Paul's meaning; ſaith Hierom, if any man ſpeaketh in ſtrange and unknown tongues, his mind is not to himſelf without fruit and profit, but he is not profited that heareth him.

And in the end of his commentary upon the epiſtle to the Galatians, he ſaith thus:

That (Amen) ſignifieth the conſent of the hearer, and is the ſealing of the truth, Paul in the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians teacheth, ſaying, But if thou ſhalt bleſs in ſpirit, who ſupplieth the place of the ignorant? how ſhall he at thy prayer anſwer (Amen) ſeeing he knoweth not what thou ſayeſt? whereby he declareth, that the unlearned man cannot anſwer, that that which is ſpoken is true, unleſs he underſtand what is ſaid.

The ſaid Hierom ſaith in the preface of Saint Paul's epiſtle to the Galatians, that the noiſe of (Amen) ſoundeth in the Roman church like an heavenly thunder.

As Hierom compareth this ſound of common prayer to thunder, ſo compareth Baſil it to the ſound of the ſea, in theſe words, If the ſea be fair, how is not the aſſembly of the congregation much fairer? in the which a joined ſound of men, women, and children, as it were of the waves beating on the ſhore, is ſent forth in our prayers unto our God.

When the people once hear theſe words [World without end] they will all forthwith anſwer, Amen.

And the ſame writer upon the ſame chapter, upon theſe words, How ſhall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned ſay Amen? Behold again, he applieth the ſtone upon the ſquare (as the proverb is) requiring the edifying of the congregation in all places. The unlearned he calleth the common people, and ſheweth that it is no ſmall diſcommodity, if they cannot ſay, Amen.

And again the ſame Chryſoſtom ſaith, Yea in prayers you may ſee the people offer largely, both for the poſſeſſed and the penitents. For the prieſts and the people pray all together commonly, and all one prayer, a prayer full of mercy and pity. And excluding out of the prieſts limits all ſuch as cannot be partakers of the holy table, another prayer muſt be made, and all in one manner lie down upon the earth, and all again after one manner riſe up together. Now when the peace is giving, we all in like manner ſalute one another, and the prieſt in the reverend myſteries wiſhes well to the people, and the people unto him: for [And with thy ſpirit] is nothing elſe but this. All things that belong to the ſacrament of thankſgiving are common to all. But he giveth not thanks alone, but all the people with him.

Hereby it may appear, that not the prieſt alone communicated nor prayed alone, nor had any peculiar prayer, but ſuch as was common to them all, ſuch as they all underſtood, and all were able to ſay with the prieſt, which could not have been, if he had uſed a ſtrange tongue in the miniſtration of the ſacraments.

Dionyſius deſcribing the manner of the miniſtration of the Lord's ſupper, ſaith, That hymns were ſaid of the whole multitude of the people.

Cyprian ſaith, The prieſt doth prepare the minds of the brethren, with a preface before the prayer, ſaying [Lift up your hearts:] that whiles the people doth anſwer, [We have our hearts lifted up to the Lord,] they may be admoniſhed that they ought to think of none other thing than of the Lord.

St. Auguſtine: What this ſhould be we ought to underſtand, that we may ſing with reaſon of man, not with chatting of birds, for Owſels and Popinjaies, and Ravens, and Pies, and other ſuch like birds are taught by men to prate they know not what. But to ſing with underſtanding, is given by God's holy will to the nature of man.

The ſame Auguſtine: There needeth no ſpeech, when we pray, ſaving perhaps as the prieſts do, to declare their meaning; not that God, but that men may hear them, and ſo, being put in remembrance, by conſenting with the prieſts, may hang upon God.

To theſe teſtimonies of the ancient writers, we will join one conſtitution of Juſtinian the emperor, who lived 527 years after Chriſt, which ſaith, We command that all biſhops and prieſts do celebrate the holy oblation, and the prayers uſed in holy baptiſm, not ſpeaking low, but with a clear and loud voice, which may be heard of the people, that thereby the minds of the hearers may be ſtirred up with greater devotion, in uttering the praiſes of the Lord God. For ſo the holy apoſtle teacheth in his firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians, ſaying, Truly, if thou only bleſs, or give thanks in ſpirit, how doth he which occupieth the place or the unlearned ſay, Amen, at the giving of thanks unto God? for he underſtandeth not what thou ſayeſt. Thou verily giveſt thanks well, but another is not edified. And again, in the epiſtle to the Romans he ſaith, With the heart a man believeth unto righteouſneſs, and with the mouth confeſſion is made unto ſalvation.

Therefore for theſe cauſes it is convenient, that amongſt other prayers thoſe things alſo which are ſpoken in the holy oblation, be uttered and ſpoken of the moſt religious biſhops and prieſts unto our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, our God with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt, with a loud voice. And let the moſt religious prieſts know this, that if they neglect any of theſe things, neither the dreadful judgment of the great God and our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, neither will we, when we know it, reſt, and leave it unrevenged.

Out of this conſtitution of Juſtinian the emperor three things are worthy to be noted.

Firſt, That the common prayer and miniſtration done with a loud voice, ſo as may be heard and underſtood of the people, is a means to ſtir up devotion in the people, contrary to the common aſſertion of Eckius, and other adverſaries, who affirm, that ignorance maketh a great admiration and devotion.

Secondly, That Juſtinian maketh this matter of not ordering common miniſtration and prayers, ſo as it may be underſtood of the people, not a matter of indifferency, but ſuch a thing as muſt be anſwered for at the day of judgment.

Thirdly, That this emperor, being a chriſtian emperor, doth not only make conſtitution of eccleſiaſtical matters, but alſo threateneth revenge and ſharp puniſhment to the violaters of the ſame.

Theſe are ſufficient to prove, that it is againſt God's word, and the uſe of the primitive church, to uſe a language not underſtood of the people, in common prayer and miniſtration of the ſacraments. Wherefore it is to be marvelled at, not only how ſuch an untruth and abuſe crept at the firſt into the church, but alſo how it is maintained ſo ſtifly at this day, and upon what ground theſe, that will be thought guides and paſtors of Chriſt's church, are ſo loth to return to the firſt original of Saint Paul's doctrine, and the practice of the primitive catholic church of Chriſt.

The God of patience and conſolation, give us grace to be like minded one towards another in Chriſt Jeſus, that we all agreeing together, may with one mouth praiſe God the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, Amen.

And the ſame being ended with ſome likelihood, as it ſeemed, that the ſame was much allowable to the audience; certain of the biſhops began to ſay contrary to their former anſwer, that they had not much more to ſay to this matter, wherein although they might have been well reprehended for ſuch manner of cavillation; yet for avoiding of any more miſtaking of orders in this colloquy or conference, and for that they ſhould utter all that which they had to ſay, it was ordered and openly agreed upon of both parts in the full audience, that upon the Monday following, the biſhops ſhould bring their minds and reaſons in writing to the ſecond aſſertion, and the laſt alſo, if they could, and firſt read the ſame: and that done, the other part ſhould bring likewiſe theirs to the ſame. And being read, each of them ſhould deliver to other the ſame writings. And in the mean time, the biſhops ſhould put in writing, not only all that which doctor Cole had that day uttered, but all ſuch other matters as they any otherwiſe could think of for the ſame: and as ſoon as they might poſſible, to ſend the ſame book touching the firſt aſſertion to the other part, and they ſhould receive of them that writing which Mr. Horne had there read that day, and upon Monday it ſhall be agreed what day they ſhould exhibit their anſwers touching the firſt propoſition. Thus both parts aſſented thereto, and the aſſembly was quietly diſmiſſed.

The Order of the ſecond Day's Talk.

The Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, the Archbiſhop of York, the Duke of Norfolk, and all the Council being ſet, the Biſhops on the one Side, and the Proteſtants, that is, the late baniſhed Preachers on the other Side, thus began the Lord Keeper.

MY lords and maſters, I am ſure you remember well, what order of talk and writing was appointed to be had this day in this aſſembly, at our laſt meeting, which I will not refuſe now to repeat again for the ſhortneſs of it, which was, that ye appointed, that on both ſides ye ſhould bring in Engliſh writing, what ye had to ſay in the ſecond queſtion, and in this place appointed to read the ſame. Therefore, begin, my lords.

Wincheſter. I am determined for my part, that there ſhall be now read, that which we have to ſay for the firſt queſtion.

Lord Keeper. Will ye not then proceed in the order appointed?

Wincheſter. I am, as I ſaid, provided for the firſt queſtion or propoſition: and we ſhould ſuffer prejudice if ye permit us not to intreat of that firſt, and ſo we would come to the ſecond queſtion, and that is the order we would uſe. I judge all my brethren are ſo minded.

Biſhops. We are ſo determined.

Lord Keeper. I know not what you would do for your determined order: but ye ought to look what order is appointed you to keep, which ye by this means do break and little regard.

Wincheſter. Since our adverſaries part, if it pleaſe your grace and honours, have ſo confirmed their aſſertion and purpoſe, we ſuffer a prejudice or damage, if ye permit us not the like. Hereat Dr. Watſon, biſhop of Lincoln, being at this talk very deſirous to have ſpoken, ſaid now to the biſhop of Wincheſter, I pray you let me ſpeak; which was permitted him: we are not uſed indifferently, ſince that you allow us not to open in preſent writing what we have to ſay for the declaration of the firſt queſtion, inſomuch, as that which ye take for the information of the ſame, was meant nothing to that purpoſe, for that which Mr. Cole ſpake in this laſt aſſembly, was not prepared to ſtrengthen our cauſe, but he made his oration of himſelf, and ex tempore, that is, with no fore-ſtudied talk.

At ſuch the biſhop's words the nobility and other of the audience much frowned and grudged, ſince that they all well knew, that Mr. Cole ſpake out of a writing which he held in his hand, and often read out of the ſame; and in that the ſame places which the biſhops informed him, and appointed him unto with their fingers; all which things do well declare the matter to be premeditate, and not done ex tempore, for that Mr. Cole was appointed by them to be their ſpeaker. Whereupon this of the biſhop of Lincoln was the worſe taken, notwithſtanding he went onward complaining, and ſaid; We are alſo evil ordered as touching the time, our adverſaries part having warning long before, and we were warned only two days before the laſt aſſembly in this place. What with this buſineſs, and other trouble we have been driven to, have been occupied the whole laſt night. For we may in no wiſe betray the cauſe of God, nor will do, but ſuſtain it to the utmoſt of our power, as we ought ſo to endeavour by all manner of means. But now we have no impartial hearing.

Lord Keeper. Take ye heed that ye deceive not yourſelves when it ſhall come to juſt trial of the matter, and that then it be not proved againſt you, that ye complain without cauſe, when the order and your manner towards it ſhall be duly weighed. I am willing and ready to hear you after the order taken and appointed for you to reaſon therein, and further or contrary to that I cannot deal with you.

Lichfield and Coventry. Let us ſuffer no miſorder or injury herein, but be heard impartially, that is convenient and meet we ſhould have here.

Lord Keeper. I pray you, Sirs, hear me, and mark it you well. It was concluded on by my lords of the council, who you well know of, that their writing, which ye are now ſo willing to have heard, ſhould have been read the firſt day, and then we underſtood that Mr. Cole had ſaid what you would have him, and as much as you willed him to ſay. I judge you were aſked in the end of Mr. Cole's rehearſal, whether that which he ſpake, was what ye would have him ſay, and ye granted it. Then whether ye would that he ſhould ſay any more in the matter, ye anſwered no; whereupon the other part was heard, which you hearing, then indeed without all good indifferency or plain dealing, ye pretended that ye had no more to ſay. So mark you with how ſmall equity you uſed yourſelves.

The Biſhop. We have indeed more to ſay, if we might have been indifferently heard.

Lord Keeper. Give me leave, I ſay, and look what gains you ſhould have if your preſent requeſt ſhould be granted you, that call ſo much of indifferent uſing, how you ſhould uſe thoſe other men? for many who are here preſent, were then away, ſo would you have your writing now read to them, which heard not this. Mark ye whether it had not been more fit that ye had provided it againſt the firſt day, when they orderly read theirs; ſince to my knowledge, and as far as I have to do in the matter, you were of both ſides (I am ſure) warned at one time. Howbeit to ſatisfy your importunity and earneſtneſs of this crying out to have your firſt writing heard, I might well allow if it ſo pleaſed the reſt of the queen's moſt honourable council, that you diſpatch the work of the ſecond queſtion, appointed for this day, and give us up your writing for the firſt, ſo that when the day cometh that each of you ſhall anſwer the other in confirmation of the firſt queſtion, then the ſame day ye ſhall have time to read this your firſt writing, which ye now would ſo fain read. To this order all the council willingly condeſcended.

Lichfield and Coventry. Nay my lords, they reading one, and we two books in one day, we ſhould not have time enough to read them both. It would occupy too much time.

Lord Keeper. For my part I might well ſtay at the hearing of them both, and ſo I judge would the reſt of the council, and likewiſe the whole audience. At which words there was a general ſhout, ſaying, Yea, yea, we would hear it gladly.

Lincoln. We cannot read them both at one time: for their writing (I am ſure) would require an hour and a half, if ſo be it be ſo long as their laſt was, and then our anſwer would require no leſs time after the firſt queſtion.

Lord Keeper. I have ſhewed ye we could be well contented to tarry out the time when it cometh thereunto. Therefore ye need not to be therein ſo curious, and we granting you thus much, and yet ye will obey no orders; I cannot tell what I ſhall ſay unto you.

Lincoln. We have been wonderfully troubled in the order of this diſputation. For firſt it was appointed us by my lord the archbiſhop, that we ſhould diſpute in Latin, and then we were commanded to bring a Latin writing, and now at laſt we are ordered to bring our writing in Engliſh.

At theſe words the lord keeper of the great ſeal, the archbiſhop, with all the council, much muſed, and many murmured at ſuch a baſe and falſe report of the order well taken. Whereupon with an admiration the lord keeper anſwered, I marvel much at the uſing of yourſelf in this point, ſince I am aſſured the order was never otherwiſe taken, and that you ſhould bring forth in Engliſh writing what you had to ſay for your purpoſe.

Hereupon the biſhops of Lichfield and Chicheſter, to excuſe my lord of Lincoln, ſaid, We ſo underſtood the order, my lords.

Lord Keeper. How likely is that, ſince it was ſo plainly told you? But to end theſe delays, I pray you follow the order appointed, and begin to treat of the ſecond queſtion, Lichfield and Coventry. We are appointed this day by your honours to bring in what we had to ſay in the firſt queſtion.

At which words the audience murmured, who heard the former talk, contrary to ſuch his report.

Lord Keeper. The order was taken, for that your writings were not ready the laſt time that ye ſhould yield the ſame to theſe men (meaning the proteſtants) as ſoon as ye might, and upon the receipt of your writings, you ſhall have theirs; and this day you ſhall treat of the ſecond queſtion, and of the third, if that you had leiſure enough. This was the order, my lords, except my memory much fail me. The ſame all the council affirmed.

Lincoln. We are willed then to bring in this day our writings for the firſt queſtion alſo.

Lord Keeper. Ah Sirs, if ye be ſo hard to be ſatisfied, and to incline to the truth, let my lords here ſay what was then determined.

Biſhop of York. Ye are to blame to ſtand in this iſſue, for there was a plain decreed order taken for you to treat of the ſecond queſtion. Wherefore leave you your contention herein, and ſhew what ye have to ſay in the ſecond queſtion.

Lord Keeper. Go to now, begin, my lords.

Lichfield and Coventry. It is contrary to the order in diſputations, that we ſhould begin.

Cheſter. We have the negative, they the affirmative, therefore they muſt begin.

Lichfield and Coventry. They muſt firſt ſpeak what they can bring in againſt us, ſince we are the defending party.

Cheſter. So is the ſchool manner, and likewiſe the manner in Weſtminſter-hall is, that the plaintiff's part ſhould ſpeak firſt, and then the accuſed party to anſwer.

Lichfield and Coventry. I pray you let the propoſition be read, and then let us ſee who hath the negative part; and ſo let the other begin.

Lord Keeper. The order was taken that ye ſhould begin.

Lichfield and Coventry. But then we ſhould do againſt the ſchool order.

Lord Keeper. My maſters, ye inforce much the ſchool orders. I wonder much at it, ſince divers of thoſe orders are oftentimes taken for the exerciſe of youth, and ought to maintain a faſhion, and many preſcriptions, which we need not here to recite, much leſs obſerve. We are come hither to keep the order of God, and to ſet forth his truth, and hereunto we have taken as good order as we could, which lieth not in my power to change.

Carliſle. We are of the catholic church, and abide therein, and ſtand in the poſſeſſion of the truth; and therefore they muſt ſay what they have to alledge againſt us, and ſo we maintain and defend our cauſe.

Lichfield and Coventry. Yea, even ſo muſt the matter be ordered.

Cheſter. When they bring any thing againſt us, it is ſufficient for us to deny it: Therefore they muſt begin.

Lichfield and Coventry. And when they affirm any thing, and we ſay nay, the proof belongeth to them, and ſo it behoveth them to ſhew firſt what they affirm, and for what cauſe or purpoſe.

Lord Keeper. Here reſteth our purpoſe and whole matter, whether you will begin, if they do not, ſince it was determined ye ſhould begin.

Lichfield and Coventry. We heard of no ſuch order.

Lord Keeper. No? Yes, and in the firſt queſtion ye began willingly. How cometh it to paſs that ye will not do ſo now?

Cheſter. Then had we the affirmation, which ſince that our adverſaries have none, they ſhould now begin.

This the proteſtants denied, ſaying, that they in the firſt day had the negative, wherein they did not yet refuſe to begin.

Lord Keeper. If you have any thing to ſay, my lords, to the purpoſe, ſay on.

Lichfield. A particular ſort of men can never break an univerſal church, which we now maintain: and as for theſe men, our adverſary part, I never thought that they would have done ſo much as have named themſelves to be of the catholic church, challenging the name as well as we.

Proteſtants. We do ſo, and we are of the true catholic church, and maintain the verity thereof.

Lincoln. Yet would ye overthrow all catholic order.

Horne. I wonder that ye ſo much ſtand who ſhould begin.

Lincoln. You count it requiſite that we ſhould follow your orders, as we have taken the queſtions at your hands, in that manner as you have aſſigned them.

Lichfield and Coventry. Yea, even ſo we were driven to do now.

Lord Keeper. Nay, I judge if ye mark the matter well, the queſtions are neither of their propounding them to you, nor of your device to them, but equally offered to you both.

Horne. Indeed, my lords of the queen's moſt honourable privy council, theſe queſtions or propoſitions were propoſed unto us by your honours, and they then having the pre-eminency, choſe to themſelves the negative, and yet freely began firſt; now again why do they not the like?

Lichfield being very angry that he ſhould ſo ſpeak againſt them, went from the matter, ſaying, My lord keeper of the great ſeal, and you the reſt of the queen's moſt honourable council, I hope that you all, and the queen's majeſty herſelf, are inclined to favour the verity in all things, and the truth of the catholic church, which we muſt and will do to the utmoſt of our power, and to this purpoſe let us now well weigh, who are of the true catholic church, they, or we.

Lord Keeper. Tarry, now you go from the matter, and make queſtions of your own.

Lichfield going on with his digreſſion, ſaid thus. We muſt needs go to work, and try that firſt, what church they be of; for there are many churches in Germany. Maſter Horne, maſter Horne, I pray you which of theſe churches are you of?

Horne. I am of Chriſt's catholic church.

Lord Keeper. Ye ought not thus to run into voluntary talk of your own inventing, nor to deviſe new queſtions of your own appointment, and thereby enter into that talk; ye ought not ſo to do. But ſay on, if you have any thing to ſay in this matter.

Lichfield and Coventry. Nay, we muſt firſt thus go to work with them, as I have ſaid, if that we will ſearch a truth: howbeit of the truth we have no doubt, for that we aſſuredly ſtand in it. Theſe men come in, and they pretended to be doubtful. Therefore they ſhould begin what they have to impugn or withſtand us withal.

Wincheſter. Let them begin; ſo will we go onward with our matter.

Cheſter. Otherwiſe, my lords, if they ſhould not begin, but end the talk, then would the verity on our ſides be not ſo well marked; for they would depart, ſpeaking laſt, with the rejoicing triumph of the people.

Wincheſter. Therefore I am reſolved that they ſhall begin ere that we ſay any thing.

Cheſter. I am ſorry, my lords, that we ſhould ſo long ſtand in the matter with your honours, and make ſo many words, and ſo much ado with you, whom we ought to obey: howbeit there is no indifferency if they begin not; and ſurely we think it meet, that they ſhould, for their parts, give us place.

Lichfield. Yea, that they ſhould, and ought to do, where any indifferency is uſed.

Aelmer. We give you the place, do we not? and deprive you not of the pre-eminence, becauſe you are biſhops; therefore I pray you begin.

The Biſhop. A goodly giving of place, I aſſure you: yea marry, ye gave place: ſuch words they uſed, with more ſcoffs.

Lord Keeper. If ye make this aſſembly gathered in vain, and will not go to the matter, let us riſe and depart.

Wincheſter. Contented, let us be gone; for we will not in this point give over.

I pray you my lords, require not at our hands that we ſhould be any cauſe of hinderance to our religion, or give any ſuch evil example to our poſterity, which we ſhould do if we gave over to them, which in no wiſe we may, or will do.

Lord Keeper. Let us then break up, if you be thus minded. With theſe words the biſhops were riſing. But then ſaid the lord keeper, let us ſee whether every one of you be thus minded. How ſay you my lord of Wincheſter, will you not begin to read your writing?

Wincheſter. No ſurely, I am fully determined, and fully at a point therein, howſoever my brethren do.

Then the lord keeper aſked the biſhop of Exeter his mind herein: Who anſwered that he was none of them. Then the lord keeper aſked the others in order; and firſt Lincoln, who ſaid he was of the ſame mind that Wincheſter was of: and likewiſe anſwered Lichfield and Coventry, Dr. Cole, and Dr. Chedſey. Then Cheſter, being aſked his mind, ſaid, My lords, I ſay not that I will not read it, if ye command us; but we ought not to do it; yet I deſire your honours not ſo to take it, as though I would not have read it. I mean not ſo.

Lord Keeper. How ſay you to it, my lord of Carliſle?

Carliſle. If they ſhould not read theirs this day, ſo that our writing may be laſt read, ſo am I contented that ours ſhall be firſt read.

Lord Keeper. So would ye make orders yourſelves, and appoint that we ſhould ſpend one day in hearing you.

Abbot. Then the abbot of Weſtminſter was aſked his mind, who ſaid, If it pleaſe your honours, I judge that my lords here ſtay moſt on this point, that they fear when they ſhall begin firſt, and the other anſwer thereupon, there ſhall be no time given them to ſpeak, which my lord miſliketh.

Lord Keeper. How can it otherwiſe be in talk appointed in ſuch aſſembly and audience: think you that there can be continually anſwering one another? when ſhould it after that ſort have an end?

Lichfield, Coventry. It muſt be ſo in diſputation to ſeek out the truth.

Lord Keeper. But how ſay you my lord Abbot, are you of the mind it ſhall be read?

Abbot. Yea forſooth, my lord, I am very well pleaſed withal. Harpsfield being inquired his mind, thought as the other did.

Lord Keeper. My lords, ſince that ye are not willing, but refuſe to read your writing after the order taken, we will break up and depart: and for that ye will not that we ſhould hear you, you may perhaps ſhortly hear of us.

Thus have we declared the order and manner of this conference at Weſtminſter, between theſe two parties, wherein if any law or order were broken, judge (good reader) where the fault was, and conſider withal what theſe papiſts be, from whom if ye take away their ſword and authority, you ſee all their cunning, how ſoon it lieth in the duſt, or elſe why ſhould they not abide the trial of writing? why would they, or durſt they not ſtand to the order agreed upon? whether ſhould we ſay ignorance or ſtubbornneſs to be in them more, or both together? who firſt being gently (as is ſaid) and favourably required to keep the order appointed, they would not. Then being ſecondly (as appeared by the lord keeper's words) preſſed more earneſtly, they neither regarding the authority, &c. of that place, nor their own reputation, nor the credit of the cauſe, utterly refuſed that to do. And finally, being again particularly every of them apart diſtinctly by name required to underſtand their opinions therein, they all except one (which was the abbot of Weſtminſter, having ſome more conſideration of order and his duty of obedience than the reſt) utterly and plainly denied to have their book read, ſome of them as more earneſtly than others, ſo alſo ſome others more undiſcreetly and more unreverently than others. Whereupon giving ſuch example of diſorder, ſtubbornneſs, and ſelf-will, as hath not been ſeen and ſuffered in ſuch an honourable aſſembly, being of the two eſtates of this this realm, the nobility and commons, beſides the preſence of the queen's majeſty's moſt honourable privy council, the ſame aſſembly was diſmiſſed, and the godly and moſt chriſtian purpoſe of the queen's majeſty made fruſtrate. And afterward, for the contempt ſo notoriouſly made, the biſhops of Wincheſter and Lincoln, having obſtinately both diſobeyed common authority, and varied manifeſtly from their own order, and eſpecially Lincoln, who ſhewed more folly than the others, were condignly committed to the Tower of London, and the reſt (ſaving the abbot of Weſtminſter) ſtood bound to make their perſonal appearance daily before the council, and not to depart the city of London and Weſtminſter, until further order were taken with them for their diſobedience and contempt.

Beſides the former proteſtation or libel written and exhibited by the proteſtants concerning the firſt queſtion, there was alſo another writing of the proteſtants made of the ſecond queſtion, but not publiſhed.

As theſe biſhops above named were committed to the Tower, ſo Bonner biſhop of London about the ſame time was committed to the Marſhalſea, where he both in his blind bloody hereſy, and alſo in his deſerved captivity, long remained, even till his death.

About this time, at the beginning of the flouriſhing reign of queen Elizabeth, was a parliament ſummoned and held at Weſtminſter, wherein was much debating about matters of religion, and great ſtudy on both parts employed, the one to remain ſtill, the other to impugn the doctrine and faction which in queen Mary's time had been eſtabliſhed Yet notwithſtanding the great induſtry of the papiſts, by the providence of God their deſigns were fruſtrated, and the true catholic religion reſtored. Many of the pope's champions having been cut off by death, their power was much diminiſhed; Dr. Story was one of the chief that was left to ſtand up for his maſter's cauſe, as may be ſeen by his impudent expreſſions (I can term them no better) in the parliament houſe.

The ſum of which ſhameleſs talk was to this effect: Firſt, beginning with himſelf, he declared, that whereas he was noted commonly abroad, and much complained of, to have been a great doer, and a ſetter forth of ſuch religion, orders, and proceedings, as of his late ſovereign that dead is, queen Mary, were ſet forth in this realm, he denied nothing the ſame, proteſting moreover that he therein had done nothing, but that both his conſcience did lead him to, and alſo his commiſſion did as well then command him, as now alſo doth diſcharge him for the ſame, being no leſs ready alſo to do the like, and more, in caſe he by this queen were authoriſed likewiſe, and commanded thereunto. Wherefore, as I ſee (ſaith he) nothing to be aſhamed of, ſo leſs I ſee to be ſorry for, but rather ſaid that he was ſorry for this, becauſe he had done no more than he did, and that in executing thoſe laws they had not been more vehement and ſevere. Wherein he ſaid there was no default in him, but in them, whom he both oft and earneſtly had exhorted to the ſame, being therefore not a little grieved with them, for that they laboured only about the young and little ſprigs and twigs, while they ſhould have ſtricken at the root, and clean have rooted it out, &c. And concerning his perſecuting and burning them, he denied not, but that he was once at the burning of an earwig (for ſo he termed a proteſtant) at Uxbridge, where he toſt a faggot at his face as he was ſinging pſalms, and ſet a wineburſh of thorns under his feet, a little to prick him, with many other words of like effect. In which words he named moreover Sir Philip Hobby, and another knight of Kent, with ſuch other of the richer and higher degree, whom his counſel was to pluck at, and to bring them under coram, wherein, ſaid he, if they had followed my advice, then had they done well and wiſely. This, or much like was the effect of the ſhameleſs and tyrannical excuſe of himſelf, more meet to ſpeak with the voice of a beaſt, than a man.

Although in this parliament ſome diverſity there was of judgment and opinion between parties, yet notwithſtanding, through the merciful goodneſs of God, the true cauſe of the goſpel had the upper hand, the papiſts hope was fruſtrate, and their rage abated, the order and proceedings of king Edward's time concerning religion was revived again, the ſupremacy of the pope aboliſhed, the articles and bloody ſtatutes of queen Mary repealed; briefly, the furious fire-brands of cruel perſecution, which had conſumed ſo many poor men's bodies, were now extinct and quenched.

Finally, the old biſhops were depoſed, for that they refuſed the oath in renouncing the pope, and not ſubſcribing to the queen's juſt and lawful title. In whoſe rooms and places, firſt for cardinal Poole ſucceeded Dr. Matthew Parker, archbiſhop of Canterbury; in the place of Heath ſucceeded Dr. Young; inſtead of Bonner, Edmund Grindall was biſhop of London; for Hopton, Thurlby, Tonſtall, Pates, Chriſtopherſon, Peto, Coates, Morgan, Feaſie, White, Oglethorpe, &c. were placed Dr. John Parkhurſt in Norwich, Dr. Coxe in Ely, Jewell in Saliſbury, Pilkenton in Durham, Dr. Sands in Worceſter, Mr. Downam in Weſtcheſter, Bentam in Coventry and Litchfield, David in St. Davids, Ally in Exeter, Horne in Wincheſter, Scory in Hereford, Beſt in Carliſle, Bullingham in Lincoln, Scamler in Peterborough, Bartlet in Bath, Geſt in Rocheſter, Barlow in Chicheſter, &c.

The ſevere Puniſhment of God upon the Perſecutors of his People and Enemies to his Word, with ſuch alſo as have been Blaſphemers, Contemners, and Mockers of his Religion.

QUEEN Mary being dead and gone, we will now leave her, and treat of thoſe under her who were the chief inſtruments in this perſecution, the biſhops and clergy, to whom ſhe, as a true catholic, gave all the execution of her power, as did queen Alexandra to the Phariſees after the time of the Machabees; of whom Joſephus thus writeth, She only retained to herſelf the name and title of the kingdom, but all her power ſhe gave to the Phariſees to poſſeſs, &c. Touching which prelates and prieſts here is to be noted in like manner the wonderful and miraculous providence of Almighty God, which as he ſhortened the reign of their queen, ſo he ſuffered them not to eſcape unviſited: firſt beginning with Stephen Gardiner the arch-perſecutor of Chriſt's church, whom he took away about the midſt of the queen's reign; of whoſe poiſoned life and ſtinking end, forſomuch as ſufficient hath been touched before, I need not here make rehearſal thereof.

After him dropped others away alſo, ſome before the death of queen Mary and ſome after, as Morgan biſhop of St. Davids, who ſitting upon the condemnation of biſhop Farrar, and unjuſtly uſurping his room, not long after was ſtruck by God's hand in ſuch a ſtrange manner, that his meat would not go down, but riſe and pick up again, ſometimes at his mouth, ſometimes blown out at his noſe, moſt nauſeous to behold, and ſo he continued till his death.

Where note moreover that when Mr. Leyſon, being then ſheriff at biſhop Farrar's burning, had brought away the cattle of the ſaid biſhop from his ſervant's houſe named Matthew Harbottle, into his own cuſtody, the cattle coming into the ſheriff's ground, divers of them would never eat meat, but lay bellowing and roaring, and ſo died.

What a ſtroke of God's hand was brought upon the cruel perſecutor of the holy ſaints of God, biſhop Thornton, ſuffragan of Dover, who after he had exerciſed his cruel cruel tyranny upon ſo many pious men at Canterbury, at length coming upon a Saturday from the chapter-houſe at Canterbury to Borne, and there upon Sunday following looking upon his men playing at bows, fell ſuddenly in a palſy, and ſo had to-bed, was willed to remember God: Yea ſo I do, ſaid he, and my lord cardinal too, &c.

After him ſucceeded another biſhop or ſuffragan, ordained by the aforeſaid cardinal. It is reported that he had been ſuffragan before to Bonner, who not long after being made biſhop or ſuffragan of Dover, brake his neck falling down a pair of ſtairs in the cardinal's chamber at Greenwich, as he had received the cardinal's bleſſing.

John Cooper, of the age of forty-four years, dwelling at Watſam in the county of Suffolk, a carpenter by trade, a man of a very honeſt report and a good houſekeeper, a harbourer of ſtrangers that travelled for conſcience, and one that favoured religion, and thoſe that were religious.

This man being at home, there came unto him one William Fenning, a ſerving-man, dwelling in the ſaid town of Watſam, and underſtanding that the ſaid Cooper had a couple of fair bullocks, did deſire to buy them of him; Cooper told him that he was loth to ſell them, becauſe he had brought them up for his own uſe, and if he ſhould ſell them, he then muſt be compelled to buy others, and that he would not do.

When Fenning ſaw he could not get them (for he had often tried) he ſaid, he would ſit as much in his light, and ſo departed, and went and accuſed him of high-treaſon. The words he was charged with were theſe, How he ſhould pray, if God would not take away queen Mary, that then the devil would take her away. Of theſe words did this Fenning charge him before Sir Henry Doel knight (unto whom he was carried by Mr. Timperley of Hincleſam in Suffolk, and one Grimwood of Lowſhaw, conſtable) which words Cooper flatly denied; and ſaid he never ſpake them; but that did not avail.

Notwithſtanding that, he was arraigned at Bury before Sir Clement Higham, at a Lent aſſize, and there this Fenning brought two vile men that witneſſed to the ſpeaking of the foreſaid words, whoſe names were Richard White of Watſam, and Grimwood of Hitcham, in the ſaid county of Suffolk. Whoſe teſtimonies were received as truth, although this good man John Cooper had ſaid what he could to declare himſelf innocent therein, but to no purpoſe, God knows. For his life was determined, as in the end appeared by Sir Clement Higham's words, who ſaid he ſhould not eſcape, for an example to all heretics, as indeed he thoroughly performed: for immediately he was ſentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, which was accordingly performed ſoon after, to the great grief of many a good heart. Here good Cooper is bereft of his life, and leaves behind him a wife and nine children, with goods and cattle to the value of 300 marks, all which ſubſtance was taken away by the ſaid Sir Henry Doiel ſheriff, but his wife and poor children were left to the wide world in their cloaths, and ſuffered not to enjoy one penny of that they had ſore laboured for, unleſs they made friends to buy it with money of the ſaid ſheriff. So cruel and greedy was he and his officers upon ſuch things as were there left.

Now, this innocent man being dead, his goods ſpoiled, his wife and children left deſolate and comfortleſs, and all things huſhed, nothing feared of any part: yet the Lord, who ſurely doth revenge the guiltleſs blood, would not ſtill ſo ſuffer it, but at length began to puniſh it himſelf. For in the harveſt following, as the ſaid Grimwood of Hitcham, one of the witneſſes before mentioned, was in his labour ſtaking up a goff of corn, being in health, and fearing no danger, ſuddenly his bowels fell out of his body, and thus moſt miſerably he died: ſuch was the terrible judgment of God, to ſhew his diſpleaſure againſt his bloody act, and to warn the reſt by theſe his judgments to repentance. The Lord grant us to honour the ſame, for his mercies ſake. Amen.

Before in the ſtory of Mr. Bradford, mention was made of Mr. Woodroffe, who being the ſheriff, uſed much to rejoice at the death of the poor ſaints in Chriſt: and ſo hard was he in his office, that when Mr Rogers was in the cart, going towards Smithfield, and in the way his children were brought unto him, the people making a lane for them to come; Mr. Woodroffe had the carman's head broken, becauſe of his ſtopping his cart. But what happened? He was not come out of his office the ſpace of a week, but he was ſtricken ſuddenly by the hand of God, the one half of his body in ſuch ſort, that he lay benumbed and bed-rid, not able to move himſelf, but as he was lifted by others, and ſo he continued in that infirmity the ſpace of ſeven or eight years, till his dying day.

Likewiſe touching Ralph Larding, the betrayer of George Eagles, it is thought of ſome, that the ſaid Ralph was afterward attached himſelf, arraigned, and hanged.

Who being at the bar, before the judges, and a great number of people, ſpake theſe words, This is moſt juſtly fallen upon me, for that I have betrayed the innocent blood of a good and juſt man George Eagles, who was here condemned in the time of queen Mary's reign, through my procurement, who ſold his blood for a little money.

Among other perſecutors, there came alſo to our hands the cruelty of one Mr. Swingfield, an alderman's deputy about Thames-ſtreet, who hearing one Angel's wife, a midwife, that kept herſelf from their popiſh church, to be at the labour of one Mrs. Walter at Crooked-lane end, took with him three more, and beſet the houſe about, and took her and carried her to Bonner's office, big with child, twenty-eight weeks gone, who laid her in Lollards Tower: where, the ſame day ſhe came in, through fear and a fall at her taking, ſhe was delivered of a man child, and could have no women to aſſiſt her that needful time. Lying there five weeks, ſhe was delivered under ſureties by friendſhip; and Dr. Story hearing thereof charged her with felony, and ſo ſent her to Newgate. The cauſe was, for that ſhe had a women at her houſe that died in labour, and the child alſo, and ſo charged her with their deaths.

But when Sir Roger Cholmley heard her tell her tale, he delivered her; and not much more than ten weeks after, if it were ſo long, died the ſaid Mr. Swingfield, and the other three that came to take her.

Becauſe ſome there be, and not a few, who have ſuch great devotion in ſetting up the popiſh maſs, I would deſire them to mark well the following ſtory. There was a certain bailiff of Crowland in Lincolnſhire, named Burton, who pretending an earneſt friendſhip to the goſpel in king Edward's days, at leaſt in outward ſhew (although inwardly he was a papiſt or atheiſt, and well known to be a man of a wicked and adulterous life) ſet forth the king's proceedings luſtily, till the time that king Edward was dead, and queen Mary placed quietly in her eſtate.

Then perceiving by the firſt proclamation concerning religion, how the world was like to turn, the bailiff turned his religion likewiſe; and ſo he moved the pariſh to ſhew themſelves the queen's friends, and to ſet up the maſs ſpeedily. Nevertheleſs the moſt ſubſtantial of the pariſh marvelling much at the bailiff's inconſtancy, conſidering alſo his abominable life, and having no great devotion unto his requeſt, knowing moreover that their duty and friendſhip to the queen ſtood not in ſetting up the maſs, ſpared to provide for it, as long as they might: but the bailiff called on them ſtill in the queen's name.

At laſt, when he ſaw his words were not regarded, and purpoſing to win his ſpurs by playing the man in the maſs's behalf and the queen's, he got him to church upon upon a Sunday morning, and when the curate was beginning the Engliſh ſervice, according to the ſtatute ſet forth by king Edward the ſixth, the bailiff cometh in a great rage to the curate, and ſaith, Sirrah, will you not ſay maſs? buckle yourſelf to maſs you knave, or by God's blood I ſhall ſheath my dagger in your ſhoulder. The poor curate for fear ſettled himſelf to the maſs.

Not long after this, the bailiff rode from home upon certain buſineſs, accompanied with one of his neighbours, and as they came riding together upon the Fennebank homeward again, a crow ſitting in a willow-tree took her flight over his head, ſinging after her wonted note, knave, knave, and withal let fall upon his face, ſo that her excrements ran from the top of his noſe down to his beard.

The poiſoned ſcent and ſavour whereof ſo annoyed his ſtomach, that he never ceaſed vomiting until he came home, wherewith his heart was ſo ſore and his body ſo diſtempered, that for extreme ſickneſs he got him to bed, and ſo lying, he was not able for the ſtink in his ſtomach and painful vomiting to receive any relief of meat or drink, but cried out ſorrowfully complaining of that ſtink, and with no ſmall oaths curſed the crow that poiſoned him. To make ſhort, he continued but a few days, but with extreme pain of vomiting and crying, he deſperately died, without any token of repentance of his former life.

Reported and teſtified for a certainty by divers of his neighbours, both honeſt and credible perſons.

As James Abbes was led by the ſheriff toward his martyrdom, divers poor people ſtood in the way, and aſked their alms. He then having no money to give them, and deſirous yet to diſtribute ſomething amongſt them, did pull off his apparel ſaving his ſhirt, and gave the ſame unto them, to ſome one thing, to ſome another; in the giving whereof he exhorted them to be ſtrong in the Lord, and as faithful followers of Chriſt, to ſtand ſtedfaſt unto the truth of the goſpel, which he (thro' God's help) would then in their ſight ſeal and confirm with his blood. While he was thus charitably occupied, and zealouſly inſtructing the people, a ſervant of the ſheriff's going by and hearing him, cried out aloud unto them, and blaſphemouſly ſaid, Believe him not, good people, he is an heretic, and a mad-man, out of his wits, believe him not, for it is hereſy that he ſaith. And as the other continued in his godly admonitions, ſo did this wicked wretch ſtill blow forth his blaſphemous exclamations, until they came unto the ſtake where he ſhould ſuffer. Unto which this conſtant martyr was tied, and in the end cruelly burned, as in his ſtory more fully is already declared.

But immediately after the fire was put unto him (ſuch was the fearful ſtroke of God's juſtice upon this blaſphemous railer) that he was there preſently, in the ſight of all the people, ſtricken with a frenzy, wherewith he had before moſt railingly charged that good martyr of God, who in this furious rage and madneſs caſting off his ſhoes with all the reſt of his cloaths, cried out unto the people, and ſaid, Thus did James Abbes the true ſervant of God, who is ſaved, but I am damned. And thus ran he round about the town of Bury, ſtill crying out, that James Abbes was a good man and ſaved, but he was damned.

The ſheriff then being amazed, cauſed him to be taken and tied in a dark houſe, and by force compelled him again to put on his cloaths, thinking thereby within a while to bring him to ſome quietneſs. But he (all that notwithſtanding) as ſoon as they were gone, continued his former raging, and caſting off his cloaths, cried as he did before, James Abbes is the ſervant of God and is ſaved, but I am damned.

No. 57.

At length he was tied at a cart, and brought home unto his maſter's houſe, and within half a year, or thereabouts, he being at the point of death, the prieſt of the pariſh was ſent for; who coming unto him, brought with him the crucifix, and their houſeling hoſt of the alter. Which gear, when the poor wretch ſaw, he cried out of the prieſt, and defied all this baggage, ſaying, that the prieſt, with ſuch others as he was, was the cauſe of his damnation, and that James Abbes was a good man and ſaved. And ſo ſhortly after he died.

Clarke, an open enemy to the goſpel and all godly preachers, in king Edward's days hanged himſelf in the tower of London.

The great and notable papiſt, called Troling Smith, of late fell down ſuddenly in the ſtreet, and died.

Dale the promoter was eaten into his body with lice, and ſo died, as it is well known of many, and confeſſed alſo by his fellow John Anales, before credible witneſs.

Alexander the keeper of Newgate, a cruel enemy to thoſe that lay there for religion, died very meſerably, being ſo ſwollen, that he was more like a monſter than a man, and ſo rotten within, that no man could abide the ſmell of him. This cruel wretch, to haſten the poor lambs to the ſlaughter, would go to Bonner, Story, Cholmley, and others, crying out, Rid my priſon, Rid my priſon; I am too much peſtered with theſe heretics.

The ſon of the ſaid Alexander called James, having left unto him by his father great ſubſtance, within three years waſted all to nought: and when ſome marvelled how he ſpent theſe goods ſo faſt: O, ſaid he, evil gotten, evil ſpent; and ſhortly after as he went in Newgate-market, he fell down ſuddenly, and there wretchedly died.

John Peter, ſun-in-law to this Alexander, and an horrible blaſphemer of God, and no leſs cruel to the ſaid priſoners, rotted away, and ſo moſt miſerably died. Who commonly when he would affirm any thing, were it true or falſe, uſed to ſay, If it be not true, I pray God I rot ere I die. Witneſs the printer hereof, with divers others.

And what a notable ſpectacle of God's revenging judgment have we to conſider in Sir Ralph Ellerker, who as he was deſirous to ſee the heart taken out of Adam Damlip, whom they moſt wrongfully put to death: ſo ſhortly after the ſaid Sir Ralph Ellerker being ſlain of the Frenchmen, they fell to mangling him, and after they had cut off his privy members, would not ſo leave him, before they might ſee his heart cut out of his body.

Stephen Gardiner, hearing of the pitiful end of Judge Hales after he had drowned himſelf, taking occaſion thereby, called the profeſſion of the goſpel a doctrine of deſperation. But as judge Hales never fell into that inconvenience before he had conſented to papiſtry: ſo whoſo well conſidereth the end of doctor Pendleton (which at his death full ſore repented that ever he had yielded to the doctrine of the papiſts, as he did) and likewiſe the miſerable end of the moſt part of the papiſts beſides, and eſpecially of Stephen Gardiner himſelf (who after ſo long profeſſing the doctrine of papiſtry, when there came a biſhop to him on his death bed, and put him in remembrance of Peter denying his maſter: he anſwering again, ſaid, that he had denied with Peter, but never repented with Peter, and ſo both ſtinkingly and unrepentedly died) will ſay, as Stephen Gardiner alſo himſelf gave an evident example of the ſame to all men, to underſtand that popery rather is a doctrine of deſperation, procuring the vengeance of Almighty God to them that wilfully do cleave unto it.

And thus much concerning thoſe perſecutors.

The perſecuting clergy who died in the time of perſecution, we ſhall take no notice of, but thoſe who remained mained after the death of queen Mary were deprived, and committed to ſeveral priſons.

In the Tower.

Nicholas Heath, archbiſhop of York, and lord chancellor. Thomas Thirlby biſhop of Ely.
Thomas Watſon biſhop of Lincoln.
Gilbert Bourne biſhop of Bath and Wells.
Richard Pates biſhop of Worceſter. Troublefield biſhop of Exeter. John Fecknam abbot of Weſtminſter.
John Borall dean of Windſor and Peterborough.

Of David Pool biſhop of Peterborough, it is not known whether he was in the Tower, or in ſome other priſon.

Goldwel biſhop of St. Aſaph, and Maurice elect of Bangor, ran away.
Edmund Bonner biſhop of London, in the Marſhalſea.
Thomas Wood biſhop elect, in the Marſhalſea.
Cuthbert Scot biſhop of Cheſter, was in the Fleet, from whence he eſcaped to Lovane, and there died.

In the Fleet.

Henry Cole dean of Paul's. John Harpsfield archdeacon of London, and dean of Norwich. Nicholas Harpsfield archdeacon of Canterbury. Anthony Draycot archdeacon of Huntington. William Chedſey archdeacon of Middleſex.

Concerning which doctor Chedſey here is to be noted, that in the beginning of king Edward's reign he recanted, and ſubſcribed to thirty-four articles, wherein he then fully conſented and agreed with his own handwriting to the whole form of doctrine approved and allowed then in the church, as well concerning juſtification by faith only, as alſo the doctrine of the two ſacraments then received, denying as well the pope's ſupremacy, tranſubſtantiation, purgatory, invocation of ſaints, elevation and adoration of the ſacrament, the ſacrifice, and veneration of the maſs, as alſo all other like excrements of popiſh ſuperſtition, according to the king's book then ſet forth.

Wherefore the more marvel it is, that he, being counted ſuch a famous and learned clerk, would ſhew himſelf ſo fickle and unſtable in his aſſertions, ſo double in his doings, to alter his religion according to time, and to maintain for truth, not what he thought beſt, but what he might moſt ſafely defend. So long as the ſtate of the lord protector and of his brother ſtood upright, what was then the conformity of this doctor Chedſey, his own articles in Latin, written and ſubſcribed with his own hand, do declare, which I have to ſhew, if he will deny them. But after the decay of the king's uncles, the fortune of them turned not ſo faſt, but his religion turned withal, and he took upon him to diſpute againſt Peter Martyr, in upholding tranſubſtantiation at Oxford, which a little before with his own hand-writing he had overthrown.

After this enſued the time of queen Mary, wherein doctor Chedſey, to ſhew his double diligence, was ſo eagar in his commiſſion to ſit in judgment, and to bring poor men to their death, that in the laſt year of queen Mary, when the lord chancellor, Sir Thomas Cornwallis, lord Clinton, and divers others of the council had ſent for him by a ſpecial letter to repair to London out of Eſſex, he writing again to the biſhop of London, ſought means not to come at the council's deſire, but to continue ſtill in his perſecuting progreſs. The copy of whoſe letter I have alſo in my hands (if needs were) to bring forth.

It happened in the firſt year of queen Elizabeth, that one William Mauldon was bound ſervant to one Mr. Hugh Aparry then a wheat-taker for the queen, dwelling at Greenwich. Who being newly come to him, and having no book there to look upon, being deſirous to occupy himſelf virtuouſly, looked about the houſe, and found a primmer in Engliſh, wherein he read in a winter's evening. While he was reading, there ſate one John Apowel that had been a ſerving-man, about thirty years of age, born toward Wales, whom the ſaid Mr. Hugh gave meat and drink unto, till ſuch time as he could get a ſervice. And as William Mauldon read in the book, the ſaid John Apowel mocked him after every word, with contrary gauds and flouting words unreverently, inſomuch that he could no longer abide him for grief of heart, but turned to him and ſaid, John, take heed what thou doſt; thou doſt not mock me, but thou mockeſt God: For in mocking of his word, thou mockeſt him; and this is the word of God though I be ſimple that read it; and therefore beware what thou doſt.

Then Mauldon fell to reading again, and ſtill he proceeded on in his mocking; and when Mauldon had read certain Engliſh prayers, in the end he read, Lord have mercy us, Chriſt have mercy upon us, &c.

And as Mauldon was reciting theſe words, the other with a ſtart ſuddenly ſaid, Lord have mercy upon me.

With that Mauldon anſwered and ſaid, What aileſt thou John?

He ſaid, I was afraid.

Whereof waſt thou afraid, ſaid Mauldon?

Nothing now, ſaid the other: and ſo he would not tell him. After this, when Mauldon and he went to-bed, Mauldon aſked him what he was afraid of.

He ſaid, when you read, Lord have mercy upon us, &c. methought the hair of my head ſtood upright, with a great fear which came upon me.

Then ſaid Mauldon, John, thou may'ſt ſee, the evil ſpirit could not abide that Chriſt ſhould have mercy upon us. Well John, ſaid Mauldon, repent and amend thy life, for God will not be mocked. If we mock and jeſt at his word, he will puniſh us.

Alſo you uſe ribaldry words, and ſwearing very much: therefore for God's ſake, John, amend thy life. So I will, ſaid he, by the grace of God; I pray God I may. Amen, ſaid the other, with other words, and ſo went to-bed.

On the morrow, about eight of the clock in the morning, John came running down out of his chamber in his ſhirt into the hall, and wreſtled with his miſtreſs as if he would have thrown her down. Whereat ſhe ſhrieked out, and her ſervants holp her, and took him by ſtrength and carried him up into his bed, and there bound him; for they perceived plainly that he was out of his right mind.

After that, as he lay, almoſt a day and a night his tongue never ceaſed, but he cried out of the devil of hell, and his words were ever ſtill, O the devil of hell; now the devil of hell; I would ſee the devil of hell; there he is, there he goeth, &c.

Thus he lay without amendment about ſix days, that his maſter and all the family being weary of the noiſe, agreed with the keepers of Bedlam, and gave a piece of money, and ſent him thither.

This is a terrible example to you that be mockers of God: therefore repent and amend, leſt the vengeance of God fall upon you in like manner. Witneſs hereof William Mauldon of Newington.

The ſame William Mauldon chanced afterwards to dwell at a town ſix miles from London called Walthamſtow, where his wife taught young children to read, which was about the year of our Lord 1563, and the fourth year of queen Elizabeth's reign. Unto this ſchool, amongſt other children, came one Benfield's daughter, named Dennis, about the age of twelve years.

As theſe children were talking together, there happened among other talk (as the nature of children is to be buſy with many things) to fall into communication of God, and to reaſon among themſelves, after their childiſh diſcretion, what he ſhould be. Some anſwered one thing thing, ſome another. Among whom, when one of the children had ſaid, He was a good old Father; but Dennis Benfield ſaid, He is an old doting fool.

What wretched and blaſphemous words were theſe ye hear! Now mark what followed.

When Mauldon heard of theſe abominable words of the girl, he deſired his wife to correct her for the ſame; which was appointed to be done the next day; but when the morrow came, her mother would needs ſend her to the market to London; the girl greatly intreated her mother that ſhe might not go. However through her mother's compulſion ſhe was forced to go. And what happened? Her buſineſs being done at London, ſhe was returning again homeward, and being a little paſt Hackney, ſuddenly ſhe was ſtruck, that all the one ſide of her was black, and ſhe ſpeechleſs. Whereupon ſhe was carried back to Hackney, and there the ſame night died. Witneſs of the ſame ſtory William Mauldon and his wife, alſo Benfield her father, and mother, and yet be all alive.

A terrible example, no doubt, both to old and young, what it is for children to blaſpheme the Lord their God, and what it is for parents to ſuffer their young ones to grow up in ſuch blaſphemous blindneſs, and not to nurture them betimes in the rudiments of the chriſtian catechiſm, to know firſt their creation, and then their redemption in Chriſt our Saviour, to fear the name of God, and to reverence his Majeſty. For elſe what do they deſerve but to be taken away by death, who contemptuouſly deſpiſe him, of whom they take the benefit of life?

And therefore let all young maids, boys, and young men, take example by this wretched creature, not only not to blaſpheme the ſacred Majeſty of the omnipotent God, their Creator, but alſo not once to take his name in vain, according as they are taught in his commandments.

Secondly, let all fathers, godfathers, and godmothers, take this for a warning, to ſee to the inſtruction and catechiſing of their children, for whom they have bound themſelves in promiſe both to God and to his church. Which if the father and godfather, the mother and godmothers had done to this young girl, verily it may be thought this deſtruction had not fallen upon her.

Thirdly, let all blind atheiſts, epicures, mammoniſts, belly-gods of this world, and ſons of Belial, hypocrites, infidels, and mockers of religion, who ſay in their hearts, there is no God, learn alſo hereby not only what God is, and what he is able to do, but alſo in this miſerable creature here puniſhed in this world, behold what ſhall likewiſe fall on them in the world to come, unleſs they will be warned betimes by ſuch examples as the Lord God doth give them.

Fourthly and laſtly, Here may alſo be a ſpectacle for all them who be blaſphemers and abominable ſwearers, or rather tearers of God, abuſing his glorious name in ſuch a contemptuous and deſpiteful manner as they uſed to do: whom if neither the command of God, nor the calling of the preacher, nor remorſe of conſcience, nor rule of reaſon, nor their withering age, nor hoary hairs will admoniſh, yet let theſe terrible examples of God's ſtrict judgment ſomewhat move them to take heed to themſelves. For if this young maiden, who was not full twelve years old, for her unreverent ſpeaking of God (and that but at one time) did not eſcape the ſtroke of God's terrible hand, what then have they to look for, who being men grown in years, and often warned by the preacher, yet ceaſe not continually with their blaſphemous oaths, not only to abuſe his name, but alſo moſt contumiouſly to tear him, as it were, and all his parts to pieces?

Did not Thomas Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury, give ſentence againſt the lord Cobham, and died himſelf before him, being ſo mortified in his tongue, that he could neither ſwallow nor ſpeak for ſome time before his death?

William Swallow, the cruel tormentor of George Eagles, was ſhortly after ſo plagued of God, that all the hair of his head, and nails of his fingers and toes, went off, his eyes almoſt cloſed up, that he could ſcarce ſee.

Albeit, I truſt, the goſpel of Chriſt, being now received in the queen's court amongſt the courtiers and ſervants of her guard, hath framed their lives and manners ſo to live in the due fear of God, and temperance of life, with all ſobriety, and merciful compaſſion toward their own chriſtians, that they need not greatly any other inſtructions to be given them in this ſtory: yet forſomuch as examples many times do work more effectually in the minds and memories of men; and alſo partly conſidering with myſelf, how theſe, above all other ſorts of men in the whole realm, in time paſt ever had moſt need of ſuch wholeſome leſſons and admonitions, to leave their inordinate riot of drunkenneſs, and their heatheniſh prophanity of life; I thought here to ſet before their eyes a terrible example, not of a ſtrange and foreign perſon, but of one of their own coat, a yeoman of the guard, not feigned by me, but brought to me by God's providence, for a warning to all courtiers, and of very truth, no longer ago than in the year of our Lord 1568. And as the ſtory is true, ſo is the name of the party not unknown, being called Chriſtopher Landeſdale, dwelling in Hackney, in Middleſex. The order of whoſe life, and manner of his death, being worthy to be noted, is this, as in ſtory here under followeth.

This Landeſdale being married to an ancient woman, yet living, having by her both goods and lands, notwithſtanding lived long in filthy whoredom with a younger woman, by whom he had two children, a ſon and a daughter, and kept them in his houſe unto the day of his death. Alſo when he ſhould have been in ſerving of God on the ſabbath-day, he uſed to walk or ride about his fields, and ſeldom he or any of his houſe came to church after the Engliſh ſervice was again received. Beſides this, he was a great ſwearer, and a great drunkard, and had great delight alſo in making other men drunk, and would have them whom he had made drunkards, to call him father, and he would call them his ſons; and of theſe ſons, by report, he had above forty. And if he had ſeen one that would drink freely, he would mark him, and ſpend his money with liberally in ale or wine, but moſt in wine, to make him the ſooner drunk. Theſe bleſſed ſons of his ſhould have great cheer oftentimes, both at his own houſe, and at taverns: and not long before his death he was ſo beaſtly drunk in a tavern over-againſt his door, that he fell down in the tavern yard, and could not riſe alone, but lay groveling, till he was holpen up, and ſo carried home.

This father of drunkards, as he was a great feaſter of the rich and wealthy of Hackney, and others, ſo his poor neighbours and poor tenants fared little the better for him, except it were with ſome broken meat which after his feaſts his wife would carry and ſend unto them, or ſome alms given at his door.

Beſides all this, he did much injury to his poor neighbours, in oppreſſing the commons near about him, which was a ſpecial relief unto them, ſo that his cattle did eat up all without pity or mercy.

There chanced after this, about two years before he died, a poor man being ſick of the bloody flux, for weakneſs to lie down in a ditch of the ſaid Landeſdale's not a ſtone's caſt from his houſe, where he had a little ſtraw brought him. Notwithſtanding the ſaid Landeſdale had back houſes and barns enow to have laid him in; but he would not ſhew him ſo much pity. And thus poor Lazarus there lay night and day, about ſix weeks ere he died.

Certain good neighbours hearing of this, procured things neceſſary for his relief, but he was ſo far ſpent, that he could not be recovered; who lay broiling in the hot ſun, with a horrible ſmell, moſt pitiful to behold.

that

This poor man, a little before he died, deſired to be moved to another ditch more ſhady. Whereupon one of the neighbours coming to Landeſdale's wife for a bundle of ſtraw for him to ſit upon, ſhe required to have him removed to Newington ſide, becauſe, ſhe ſaid, if he ſhould die, it would be very far to carry him to the church.

Beſides this, there was a marriage in this Landeſdale's houſe, and the gueſts that came to the marriage, gave the poor man money as they came and went by him, but Landeſdale diſdained to contribute any relief unto him, notwithſtanding that he had promiſed to Mr. Searles, one of the queen's guard (who had more pity of him) to miniſter to him things neceſſary.

To be ſhort, the next day poor Lazarus departed this life, and was buried in Hackney church-yard; upon whom Landeſdale did not ſo much as beſtow a winding-ſheet towards his burial. And thus much concerning the end of poor Lazarus. Now let us hear what became of the rich glutton.

About two years after, the ſaid Landeſdale being full of drink, as his cuſtom was, came riding in great haſte from London on St. Andrew's day, anno 1568, and as is reported by thoſe that ſaw him, reeling to and fro like a drunkard with his hat in his hand, and coming by a ditch, tumbled headlong into it. Some ſay, that the horſe fell upon him, but that is not like. This is true, the horſe, more ſober than the maſter, came home, leaving his maſter behind him. Whether he brake his neck with the fall, or was drowned (for the water was ſcarce a foot deep) it is uncertain; but certain it is, that he was there found dead. Thus he being found dead in the ditch, the coroner, as the manner is, ſate upon him: and how the matter was handled for ſaving his goods, the Lord knoweth; but in the end ſo it fell out, that the goods were ſaved, and the poor horſe indicted for his maſter's death.

The neighbours hearing of the death of this man, and conſidering the manner thereof, ſaid it was juſtly fallen upon him, that as he ſuffered the poor man to lie and die in the ditch near unto him, ſo his end was to die in a ditch likewiſe. And thus haſt thou in this ſtory (chriſtian brother and reader) the true image of a rich glutton and poor Lazarus ſet out before thine eyes: whereby we have all to learn, what happeneth in the end to ſuch voluptuous epicures and atheiſts, who being void of all ſenſe of religion, and fear of God, yield themſelves over to all prophanity of life, neither regarding any honeſty at home, nor ſhewing any mercy to their needy neighbours abroad.

Chriſt our Saviour ſaith, Matt. 5. Bleſſed be the merciful, for they ſhall obtain mercy: but judgment without mercy ſhall be executed on them which have ſhewed no mercy, &c. and Saint John ſaith, 1 John 4. He that ſeeth his brother have need. and ſhutteth up his compaſſion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him, &c. Again, Eſay againſt ſuch profane drunkards and quaffers, thus crieth out, Woe be unto them that riſe up early to follow drunkenneſs, and to them that ſo continue until night, till they be ſet on fire with wine. In thoſe companies are harps and lutes, tabrets and pipes, and wine: but they regard not the works of the Lord, and conſider not the operations of his hands, &c. Woe be unto them that are ſtrong to ſpue out wine, and expert to ſet up drunkenneſs.

The puniſhments of them that be dead be wholeſome documents to them that be alive. And therefore as the ſtory above exemplified may ſerve to warn all courtiers and yeomen of the guard; ſo by this that followeth, I would wiſh all gentlemen to take good heed and admonition betime, to leave their outrageous ſwearing and blaſpheming of the Lord their God.

In the time and reign of king Edward, there was in Cornwall a certain luſty young gentleman, who rode in company with other gentlemen, together with their ſervants, being about the number of twenty horſemen. Among whom this luſty yonker entering into talk, began to ſwear moſt horribly, blaſpheming the name of God, with other ribaldry words beſides. Upon whom one of the company, who is yet alive, and witneſs hereof, not able to abide the hearing of ſuch blaſphemous abomination, in gentle words ſpeaking to him, ſaid, he ſhould give anſwer and account for every idle word.

The gentleman offended thereat, ſaid, Why takeſt thou thought for me? take thought for thy winding-ſheet. Well, quoth the other, amend, for death giveth no warning: for as ſoon cometh a lamb's ſkin to the market, as an old ſheep's. God's wounds, ſaith he, care not thou for me; raging ſtill after this manner worſe and worſe in words, till at length paſſing on their journey, they came riding over a great bridge, ſtanding over a piece of an arm of the ſea. Upon which bridge this gentleman ſwearer ſpurred his horſe in ſuch ſort, as he ſprang clean over with the man on his back. Who as he was going, cried ſaying, Horſe and man, and all to the devil. This terrible ſtory happening in a town in Cornwall, I would have been afraid amongſt theſe ſtories here to recite, were it not that he, who was then both reprehender of his ſwearing, and witneſs of his death, is yet alive, and now a miniſter, named Heynes. Beſides this, biſhop Ridley, then biſhop of London, preached and uttered even the ſame fact and example at Paul's Croſs. The name of the gentleman I could by no means obtain of the party and witneſs aforeſaid, for dread of thoſe, as he ſaid, which yet remain of his kindred in the ſaid country.

Having now ſufficiently admoniſhed, firſt the courtiers, then the gentlemen; now thirdly for a brief admonition to the lawyers we will here inſert the ſtrange end and death of one Henry Smith, ſtudent of the law.

Henry Smith having a godly gentleman to his father, and an ancient proteſtant, dwelling in Camden in Glouceſterſhire, was by him virtuouſly brought up in the knowledge of God's word, and ſincere religion; wherein he ſhewed himſelf in the beginning ſuch an earneſt profeſſor, that he was called by the papiſts prattling Smith. After theſe good beginnings it followed, that he coming to be a ſtudent of the law in the Middle Temple at London, there by ill company began to be perverted to popery, and afterwards going to Lovane, was more deeply grounded in the ſame. Inſomuch, that returning from thence, he brought with him pardons, a crucifix, with an Agnus Dei, which he uſed commonly to wear about his neck, and had in his chamber images, before which he was wont to pray; beſides divers other popiſh traſh, which he brought with him from Lovane. Now what end followed this I ſhould be loth to declare, but that the fact ſo lately done remaineth yet freſh in memory, to the amazement of almoſt all the city of London. The end was this.

Not long after, this Henry Smith became a foul jeerer, and a ſcornful ſcoffer of that religion which before he profeſſed; in his chamber where he lay in St. Clement's pariſh, without Temple-bar, in the evening he was going to bed, and his cloaths put off (for he was found naked) he had tied his ſhirt (which he had torn for that purpoſe) about his privy places, and ſo with his own girdle or garter, faſtened to the bed poſt, there ſtrangled himſelf: having his Agnus Dei on a ſilver table, with his other idolatrous traſh in a window by him. And thus being dead, and not thought worthy to be interred in the church-yard, he was buried in a lane, called Foſkew-lane.

The Story and End of the French King Henry II.

THE prince was ſo outrageous againſt the proteſtants, that he threatened Anne du Bourg, one of the high court of parliament in Paris, that he would ſee him burn with his own eyes. But how he came ſhort of his purpoſe, the ſequel of the ſtory will make appear, in the following manner.

King Henry being in the parliament houſe which was kept at the Friar Auguſtines at Paris, becauſe the palace was in preparing againſt the marriage of his daughter, and his ſiſter, and having heard the opinion in religion of Anne du Bourg counſellor in the law, a man eloquent and learned, he cauſed the ſaid Anne du Bourg, and Loys du Faux, counſellors, to be taken priſoners by the conſtable of France, who apprehended them, and delivered them into the hands of count Montgommery, who carried them to priſon. Againſt whom the king being wrathful and angry, among other talk, ſaid to the ſaid Anne du Bourg, Theſe eyes of mine ſhall ſee thee burnt: and ſo on the 19th of June, commiſſion was given to judges to make his proceſs.

In the mean while, great feaſts and banquets were preparing at court, for joy and gladneſs of the marriage that ſhould be of the king's daughter and ſiſter, againſt the laſt day of June ſave one. When the time was come, the king employed all the morning in examining the preſidents and counſellors of the ſaid parliament againſt theſe priſoners, and other their companions that were charged with the ſame doctrine; which being done, they went to dinner.

The king, after he had dined, for that he was one of the defendants at the tourney, which was ſolemnly made in St. Anthony's-ſtreet, near to the priſon where the foreſaid priſoners were committed, entered into the liſts; and therein juſting, as the manner is, had broken many ſtaves very valiantly, running as well againſt the count of Montgommery, as divers others. Whereupon he was highly commended by the ſpectators. And becauſe he was thought to have done enough, they deſired him to leave off with praiſe: but he being the more inflamed with the hearing of his praiſe, would needs run another courſe with Montgommery: who then refuſing to run againſt the king, and kneeling on his knees for pardon not to run; the king being eagerly ſet, commanded him upon his allegiance to run, and, as ſome affirm, he alſo put the ſtaff in his hand, unto whoſe hand he had committed the foreſaid priſoners a little before. Montgommery thus being enforced whether he would or no, to run againſt the king, addreſſed himſelf after the beſt manner to obey the king's commandment. Whereupon he and the king met together ſo ſtoutly, that in breaking their ſpears the king was ſtruck with the counter-blow, ſo right in one of his eyes, by reaſon that the vizor of his helmet ſuddenly fell down at the ſame inſtant, that the ſhivers entered into his head; ſo that the brains were periſhed, and thereupon ſo feſtered, that no remedy could be found, although phyſicians and ſurgeons were ſent from all places in the realm, as alſo from Brabant from king Philip, but nothing availed, ſo that the 11th day after, that is, the 10th of July, 1559, he miſerably ended his life, having reigned twelve years, three months, and ten days.

This was laid upon a Deſk in Queen Mary's Cloſet, againſt her coming to Prayers.

O Lovely Roſe moſt redolent,
Of fading flowers moſt freſh:
In England pleaſant is thy ſcent,
For now thou art peerleſs.
This Roſe which beareth ſuch a ſmell,
Doth repreſent our queen:
O liſten, that I may you tell
Her Colours freſh and green.
The love of God within her heart
Shall beautify her grace:
The fear of God on th' other part,
Shall ſtabliſh her in place.
This love and fear her colours are,
Whereby if ſhe be known;
She may compare both nigh and far,
And ne'er be overthrown.
The love of God it will her cauſe,
Unfeigned if it be,
To have reſpect unto his laws,
And hate idolatry.
If that ſhe have the fear of God,
And be thereto right bent,
She will do that which be her bode,
And not her own intent.
O noble qeeen, take heed, take heed,
Beware of your intent;
Look ere you leap, then ſhall you ſpeed;
Haſte maketh many ſhent.
Remember Saul that noble king,
What ſhame did him befal,
Becauſe unto the Lord's bidding
He had no luſt at all.
The Lord commands you ſhall love him,
And other gods defy:
Alas, take heed, do not begin
To place idolatry.
What greater diſobedience
Againſt God may be wrought,
Than this; to move men's conſcience
To worſhip things of nought?
What greater folly can you invent,
Than ſuch men to obey?
How can you ſerve your own intent,
Not knowing your decay?
And whereas firſt ye ſhould maintain
Your realm in unity;
To rent the people's hearts in twain
Through falſe idolatry.
Is this the way to get you fame?
Is this to get you love?
Is this to purchaſe you a name,
To fight with God above?
Is this your care to ſet up maſs,
Your ſubjects ſouls to 'ſtroy?
Is this your ſtudy no more to paſs,
God's people to annoy?
Is this to reign, to ſerve your will,
Good men in bonds to keep;
And to exalt ſuch as be ill,
And for your grace unmeet?
Such as made that fond divorce,
Your mother to deface,
Are higheſt you in power and force,
And bound moſt to your grace.
Well, yet take heed of had-I-wiſt,
Let God's word bear the bell:
If you will reign, learn to know Chriſt,
As David doth you tell.
What great preſumption doth appear,
Thus in a week or twain,
To work more ſhame than in ſeven years
Can be redreſt again?
And all is done without a law,
For will doth work in place:
And thus all men may ſee and know
The weakneſs of your caſe.
That miſerable maſking maſs,
Which all good men do hate;
Is now by you brought up again,
The root of all debate.

Your miniſters that love God's word,
They feel this bitter rod;
Who are robbed from houſe and goods,
As though there were no God.
And yet you would ſeem merciful
In midſt of tyranny;
And holy, whereas you maintain
Moſt vile idolatry.
For fear that you ſhould hear the truth,
True preachers may not ſpeak;
But on good prophets you make ruth,
And them unkindly treat.
Him have you made lord chancellor,
Who did your blood moſt ſtain;
That he may ſuck the righteous blood,
As he was wont, again.
Thoſe whom our late good king did love,
You do them moſt diſdain:
Theſe things do manifeſtly prove
Your colours be but vain.
God's word you cannot now abide.
But as your prophets tell.
In this you may be well compar'd
To wicked Jeſabel:
Who had four hundred prophets falſe;
And fifty on a rout;
Through whoſe falſe preaching poor Ely
Was chaſed in and out.
God's prophets you do ill intreat,
Baal's prieſts defend your grace:
Thus did the Jews put Chriſt to death,
And let go Barrabas.
Hath God thus high exalted you,
And ſet you on a throne,
That you ſhould 'priſon and deface
His flock that maketh moan?
The Lord who doth his flock defend,
As th' apple of an eye,
Of this full ſoon will make an end,
And baniſh cruelty.
Therefore my counſel pray you take,
And think thereof no ſcorn:
You ſhall find it the beſt counſel,
Ye had ſince you were born.
Put away blind affection,
Let God's word be umpire,
To try our true religion,
From this ill favour'd gear.

The Inſtruction of King Edward the Sixth, given to Sir Anthony Seyntleger, Knight of his Privy Chamber, being of a corrupt Judgment of the Euchariſt.

IN Euchariſt then there is bread,
Whereto I do conſent:
Then with bread are our bodies fed,
And further what is meant?
I ſay that Chriſt in fleſh and blood
Is there continually,
Unto our ſoul a ſpecial food,
Taking it ſpiritually.
And this tranſubſtantiation I Believe as I have read;
That Chriſt is ſacramentally
There in the form of bread.
St. Auſtin ſaith, the word doth come
Unto the element;
And there is made, he ſaith, in ſum,
A perfect ſacrament.
The element doth then remain,
Or elſe muſt needs enſue,
St. Auſtin's words be nothing plain,
Nor cannot be found true.
For if the word, as he doth ſay,
Come to the element,
Then's not the element away,
But bides there verament.
Yet whoſo eats that lively food,
And hath a perfect faith,
Receiveth Chriſt his fleſh and blood,
For Chriſt himſelf ſo ſaith.
Not with our teeth his fleſh to tear,
Nor take blood for our drink;
Too great abſurdity it were,
So groſly for to think.
For we muſt eat him ſpiritually,
If we be ſpiritual;
And whoſo eats him carnally,
Thereby ſhall have a fall.
For he is now a ſpiritual meat,
And ſpiritually we muſt
That ſpiritual meat ſpiritually eat,
And leave our carnal luſt.
Thus by the Spirit, I ſpiritually
Believe, ſay what men liſt,
None other tranſubſtantiation I Believe of the euchariſt.
But there is both bread and wine,
Which we ſee with our eye:
Yet Chriſt is there by power divine
To thoſe that ſpiritually
Do eat that bread and drink that cup,
Eſteeming it but light;
As Judas did, which eat that ſop,
Not judging it aright.
For I was taught not long agone,
I ſhould lean to the Spirit:
And let the carnal fleſh alone,
For it doth not profit.
God ſave him that teaching me taught
For I thereby did win,
To put from me that carnal thought
That I before was in.
For I believe Chriſt corporally
In heav'n doth keep his place:
And yet Chriſt ſacramentally
Is here with us by grace.
So that in this high myſtery
We muſt eat ſpiritual meat,
To keep his death in memory,
Leſt we ſhould it forget.
This do I ſay, this have I ſaid,
This ſaying ſay will I:
This ſaying though I once deny'd,
I will no more to die.

This young prince became a perfect ſchool-maſter unto old erroneous men, ſo as no divine could amend him, and therefore this piece is worthy of perpetual memory to his immortal fame and glory.

A true report of the Martyrdom of one Richard Atkins, an Engliſhman, at Rome.

ABOUT the month of July, Anno 1581, one Richard Atkins born in Hertfordſhire, an Engliſhman, came to Rome, and having found the Engliſh college, knocked at the door, to whom divers of the ſtudents there came out, to welcome him, underſtanding that he was an Engliſhman. They willed him to go to the hoſpital, and there to receive his meat and lodging, according as the order was appointed: whereunto he anſwered, I come not (my countrymen) to any ſuch intent, as you judge, but I come lovingly to rebuke the great miſorder of your lives, which I grieve to hear, and pity to behold: I come likewiſe to let your proud Antichriſt underſtand derſtand, that he doth offend the heavenly Majeſty, rob God of his honour, and poiſoneth the whole world with his abominable blaſphemies, making them do homage to ſtocks and ſtones and that filthy ſacrament, which is nothing elſe but a fooliſh idol. When they heard theſe words, one Hugh Griffin, a Welchman, and ſtudent in the college, cauſed him to be put in the inquiſition; where, how they examined him, and how he anſwered them I know not, but after certain days he was ſet at liberty again, and one day going in the ſtreet, he met a prieſt carrying the ſacrament; which offending his conſcience, to ſee the people ſo crouch and bow down to it, he caught at it to have thrown it down, but miſſing of his purpoſe, and it being judged by the people, that he did catch at the holineſs that (they ſay) cometh from the ſacrament, upon mere devotion, he was let paſs, and nothing ſaid to him: few days after he came to St. Peter's church, where divers gentlemen and others were hearing maſs, and the prieſt at the elevation; he uſing no reverence, ſtepped among the people to the altar, and threw down the chalice with the wine, ſtriving likewiſe to have pulled the cake out of the prieſt's hands; for which divers roſe up and beat him with their fiſts, and one drew his rapier, and would have ſlain him: ſo that in brief he was carried to priſon, where he was examined, wherefore he had committed ſuch an heinous offence; whereupon he anſwered, that he came purpoſely for that intent, to rebuke the pope's wickedneſs, and their idolatry. Upon this he was condemned to be burned; which ſentence, he ſaid, he was right willing to ſuffer, and the rather, becauſe the ſum of his offence pertained to the glory of God. During the time he remained in priſon, ſundry Engliſhmen came unto him, willing him to be ſorry for what he had done, and to recant from his damnable opinion; but all the means they uſed were in vain, he confuted their dealings by divers places of ſcripture, and willed them to be ſorry for their wickedneſs while God did permit them time, elſe they were in danger of everlaſting damnation; theſe words made the Engliſhmen depart; for they could not abide to hear them. Within a little while after, he was ſet upon an aſs, without a ſaddle, he being from the middle upward naked, having ſome Engliſh prieſts with him to talk with, but he regarded them not, but ſpake to the people in as good language as he could, and told them they were in a wrong way, and willed them for Chriſt's ſake, to have regard to their own ſouls. All the way as he went, there were four that did nothing elſe but thruſt at his body with burning torches, whereat he never moved, nor ſhrunk one jot, but with a chearful countenance laboured to perſuade the people, often bending his body to meet the torches, as they were thruſt at him, and would take them in his own hand, and hold them burning ſtill upon his body, whereat the people not a little wondered. Thus he continued almoſt the ſpace of half a mile, till he came before St. Peter's, where the place of execution was. When he was come to the place of execution, there they had made a device, not to make the fire about him, but to burn his legs firſt, which they did, he not diſmaying any whit, but ſuffered all marvellous chearfully; which moved the people to ſuch a quandary as was not in Rome many a-day. Then they offered him a croſs, and willed him to embrace it, in token that he died a chriſtian; but he put it away with his hand, telling them that they were evil men to trouble him with ſuch paltry, when he was preparing himſelf to God, whom he beheld in majeſty and mercy, ready to receive him into eternal reſt. They ſeeing him in this mind, departed, ſaying, let us go and leave him to the devil, whom he ſerves. Thus ended this faithful ſoldier and martyr of Chriſt, who is, no doubt, in glory with his maſter: whereunto God grant us all to come, Amen.

This is faithfully avouched by John Young, who was at that time, and a good while after in Rome, in ſervice with maſter doctor Morton; who ſeeing the martrydom of this man, when he came home to his houſe, in preſence of Mr. Smith his ſon, Mr. Creed, and the ſaid John Young, ſpake as followeth: Surely this fellow was marvellous obſtinate, he nothing regarded the good council which was uſed to him, nor ſhrunk all the way when the torches were thruſt at his naked body. Beſide, in the place of execution he did not faint nor cry one jot in the fire, albeit they tormented him very cruelly, and burned him by degrees, as his legs firſt, to put him to the greater pain; yet all this he did but ſmile at. Doubtleſs, but that the word of God cannot be but true, elſe we might judge this fellow to be of God; for who could have ſuffered ſo much pain as he did? but truly I believe the devil was in him.

The Life and Death of Dr. Story, a Perſecutor of Chriſt in his Members.

THIS Dr. Story being an Engliſhman by birth, and from his infancy not only nuſtled in papiſtry, but alſo even as it were by nature earneſtly affected to the ſame, and growing ſomewhat to riper years, in the days of queen Mary became a bloody tyrant, and cruel perſecutor of Chriſt in his members (as all the ſtories in this book almoſt do declare). Thus he raged all the reign of the aforeſaid queen Mary againſt the infallible truth of Chriſt's goſpel, and the true profeſſors thereof, never ceaſing till he had conſumed to aſhes two or three hundred bleſſed martyrs, who willingly gave their lives for the teſtimony of his truth; and thinking their puniſhment in the fire not cruel enough, he went about to invent new torments for the holy martyrs of Chriſt, ſuch was his hatred to the truth of Chriſt's goſpel: but in the end the Lord God looking upon the affliction and cruel blood-ſhedding of his ſervants, took away queen Mary, the greet pillar of papiſtry. After whom ſucceeded lady Elizabeth, now queen of England, who ſtaying the bloody ſword of perſecution from raging any further, cauſed the ſame Dr. Story to be apprehended, and committed to ward, with many other his accomplices, ſworn enemies to Chriſt's glorious goſpel. The ſaid Story having been a while detained in priſon, at laſt, by what means I know not, got out, and conveyed himſelf over the ſeas, where he continued a moſt bloody perſecutor, ſtill raging againſt God's ſaints with fire and ſword. Inſomuch as he growing to be familiar and right dear to duke d'Alva in Antwerp, received ſpecial commiſſion from him to ſearch the ſhips for goods forfeited, and for Engliſh books, and ſuch like.

And in this favour and authority he continued there for a ſpace, by which means he did much hurt, and brought many a good man and woman to trouble and extreme peril of life through his blood-thirſty cruelty: but at laſt the Lord (when the meaſure of his iniquity was full) proceeded in judgment againſt him, and cut him off from the face of the earth, according to the prayers of many a good man; which came to paſs in order as followeth: it being certainly known (for the report thereof was gone forth into all lands) that he not only intended the ſubverſion and overthrow of his native country of England, by bringing in foreign hoſtility, if by any means he might compaſs it; but alſo daily and hourly murdered God's people, there was this platform laid (by God's providence no doubt) that one Mr. Parker a merchant ſhould ſail unto Antwerp, and by ſome means convey Story into England.

This Parker arriving at Antwerp, ſuborned certain to repair to Dr. Story, and to ſignify unto him, that there was an Engliſh ſhip came, fraught with merchandize, and that if he would make ſearch thereof himſelf, he ſhould find ſtore of Engliſh books, and other things for his purpoſe. Story hearing this, and ſuſpecting nothing, made haſte towards the ſhip, thinking to make the ſame his his prey; and coming on board, ſearched for Engliſh heretical books, as he called them, and going down under the hatches, becauſe he would be ſure to have their blood, if he could, they clapped down the hatches, hoiſted up their ſails, having (as God would) a good gale, and ſailed away into England. Where they arriving, preſented this bloody butcher, and traiterous rebel Story, to the no little rejoicing of many an Engliſh heart. He being now committed to priſon, continued there a good ſpace: during all which time he was laboured and ſolicited daily by wiſe and learned fathers to recant his deviliſh and erroneous opinions, to conform himſelf to the truth, and to acknowledge the queen's ſepremacy. All which he utterly denied to his death, ſaying, that he was ſworn ſubject to the king of Spain, and was no ſubject to the queen of England, nor ſhe his ſoverign queen: and therefore, as he well deſerved, he was condemned, as a traitor to God, the queen's majeſty, and the realm, to be drawn, hanged, and quartered: which was performed accordingly, he being laid upon a hurdle, and drawn from the Tower along the ſtreets to Tyburn, where he being hanged till he was half dead, was cut down, and ſtripped; and which is not to be forgot, when the executioner had cut off his privy members, he ruſhing up on a ſudden, gave him a blow upon the ear, to the great wonder of all that ſtood by: and thus ended this bloody Nimrod his wretched life, whoſe judgment I leave to the Lord.

A brief Relation of the horrible Maſſacre in France, Anno 1572.

AND firſt for brevity ſake, to overpaſs the bloody butchery of the Roman catholics in Orange againſt the proteſtants, moſt fiercely and unawares breaking into their houſes, and there, without mercy, killing man, woman, and child; of whom ſome being ſpoiled and naked, they threw out of their lofts into the ſtreets, ſome they ſmothered in their houſes with ſmoak, with ſword and weapon ſparing none; the carcaſes of ſome they threw to the dogs, which was in the year 1570, in the reign of Charles IX. Likewiſe to paſs over the cruel ſlaughter at Roan, where the proteſtants being at a ſermon without the city walls, upon the king's edict, the papiſts in fury ran upon them coming home, and ſlew of them above forty at leaſt; many more they wounded. This example at Roan, ſtirred up the papiſts in Diepe, to practiſe the like rage alſo againſt the chriſtians there returning from the ſermon; whoſe ſlaughter had been the greater, had they not more wiſely before been provided of weapons for their own defence at need. All which happened about the ſame year aforeſaid, anno 1570. But theſe with ſuch like I briefly overſlip, to enter now into the matter above promiſed, that is, briefly to entreat of the horrible and moſt barbarous maſſacre wrought in Paris, ſuch as I ſuppoſe was never heard of before in any civil diſſenſion amongſt the very heathen. In few words to touch the ſubſtance of the matter.

After long troubles in France, the papiſts foreſeeing no good to be done againſt the proteſtants by open force, began to deviſe how by crafty means to entrap them, and that by two manner of ways: the one by pretending a power to be ſent into the lower country, whereof the admiral to be the captain; not that the king ſo meant indeed, but only to underſtand thereby what power and force the admiral had under him, who they were, and what were their names. The ſecond was by a certain marriage ſuborned between the prince of Navarre and the king's ſiſter. To this pretended marriage it was deviſed, that all the chief proteſtants of France ſhould be invited, and meet in Paris. Among whom firſt they began with the queen of Navarre, mother to the prince, that was to marry the king's ſiſter, attempting by all means poſſible to obtain her conſent thereunto. She being then at Rochel, and allured by many fair words to repair unto the king, conſented at length to come, and was received at Paris; where ſhe, after much ado, at length being won to the king's mind, and providing for the marriage, ſhortly upon the ſame fell ſick, and within five days departed, not without ſuſpicion, as ſome ſaid, of poiſon. But her body being opened, no ſign of poiſon could there be found, ſave only that a certain apothecary made his brag, that he had killed the queen by certain venomous odours and ſmells by him confected.

After this notwithſtanding the marriage ſtill going forward, the admiral, prince of Navarre, Conde, with divers other chief ſtates of the proteſtants, induced by the king's letters and many fair promiſes, at laſt were brought to Paris; where with great ſolemnity they were received, but eſpecially the admiral. To make the matter ſhort, the day of the marriage came, which was the 18th day of Auguſt, anno 1572. Which marriage being ſolemnized by the cardinal of Borbonne, upon an high ſtage ſet up of purpoſe without the church walls, the prince of Navarre and Conde came down, waiting for the king's ſiſter, being then at maſs. This done, they reſorted all together to the biſhop's palace to dinner. At evening they were had to a palace in the middle of Paris to ſupper. Not long after this, being the two and twentieth of Auguſt, the admiral coming from the council table, by the way was ſtruck with a piſtolet, charged with three pellets, in both his arms. He being thus wounded, and yet ſtill remaining in Paris, although the Vidam gave him counſel to flee away, it ſo fell out, that certain ſoldiers were appointed in divers places of the city to be ready at a watch-word at the command of the prince, upon which watch-word given, they burſt out to the ſlaughter of the proteſtants, firſt beginning with the admiral himſelf, who being wounded with ſo many ſore wounds, was caſt out of the window into the ſtreet, where his head being firſt ſtruck off, and embalmed with ſpices to be ſent to the pope, the ſavage people raging againſt him, cut off his arms and privy members, and ſo drawing him three days through the ſtreets of Paris, they dragged him unto the place of execution out of the city, and there hanged him up by his heels, to the greater ſhew and ſcorn of him.

After the martyrdom of this good man, the armed ſoldiers with rage and violence ran upon all the others of the ſame profeſſion, ſlaying and killing all the proteſtants they knew or could find within the city gates incloſed. This bloody ſlaughter continued the ſpace of many days, but eſpecially the greateſt ſlaughter was in the three firſt days, in which were numbered to be ſlain, as the ſtory writeth, above 10,000 men, women, old and young, of all ſorts and conditions. The bodies of the dead were carried in carts to be thrown in the river: ſo that not only the river was ſtained therewith, but alſo whole ſtreams in certain places of the city did run down gore blood of the ſlain bodies. So great was the outrage of that helliſh perſecution, that not only the proteſtants, but alſo certain, whom they thought indifferent papiſts, they put to the ſword inſtead of the proteſtants. In the number of them that were ſlain of the more learned ſort, was Petrus Ramus; alſo Lambinus, another notorious learned man; Plateanus, Lomenius, Chapeſius, with others.

And not only within the walls of Paris this uproar was contained, but it extended further into other cities and quarters of the realm, eſpecially Lyons, Orleans, Tholouſe, and Roan. In which cities it is almoſt incredible, nor ſcarce ever heard of in any nation, what cruelty was ſhewed, what numbers of good men were deſtroyed: inſomuch that within the ſpace of one month, thirty thouſand at leaſt of religious proteſtants are numbered bered to be ſlain, as is credibly reported in the commentaries of them which teſtify purpoſely of the matter.

Furthermore here is to be noted, that when the pope firſt heard of this bloody ſtir, he with his cardinals made ſuch joy at Rome, with their proceſſion, with their gunſhot, and ſinging of Te Deum, that in honour of that feſtival act, a jubilee was commanded by the pope with great indulgence, and much ſolemnity. Whereby thou haſt here to diſcern and judge, with what ſpirit and charity theſe papiſts are moved to maintain their religion, which otherwiſe would fall to the ground without hope of recovery. Likewiſe in France no leſs rejoicing there was upon the 28th day of the month, the king commanding public proceſſions through the whole city to be made, with bonfires, ringing, and ſinging; where the king himſelf, with the queen his mother, and his whole court reſorting together to the church, gave thanks and praiſe to God, for that ſo worthy a victory atchieved upon St. Bartholomew's day againſt the proteſtants, whom they thought to be utterly overthrown and vanquiſhed in all the realm for ever.

And indeed to man's thinking it might appear no leſs after ſuch a great deſtruction of the proteſtants, having loſt ſo many worthy and noble captains as then were cut off, whereupon many, for fear of revoking their religion, returned to the pope, divers fled out of the realm, ſuch as would not turn, keeping themſelves ſecret, durſt not be known nor ſeen, ſo that it was paſt all hope of man, that the goſpel ſhould ever have any more place in France: but ſuch is the admirable working of God, where man's help and hope moſt faileth, there he moſt ſheweth his ſtrength and helpeth, as here is to be ſeen. For whereas the very ſmall remnant of the goſpel ſide, being now brought to utter deſperation, were now ready to give over unto the king, and many were gone already againſt conſcience, yielding to time, yet the Lord of his goodneſs ſo wrought, that many were ſtaid and reclaimed again through the occaſion firſt of them in Rochel: who hearing of the cruel maſſacre in Paris, and ſlaughter at Tholouſe, moſt conſtantly with valiant hearts (the Lord ſo working) thought to ſtand to their defence againſt the king's power, by whoſe example certain other cities hearing thereof, took no little courage to do the like; as, namely, Montalbane, the city called Nemanſium, Sanſer in Occitamia, Millialdum, Mirebellum, Fuduzia, with other towns and cities more: who being confederate together, exhorted one another to be circumſpect, and take good heed of the falſe diſſembling practiſes not to be truſted of the mercileſs papiſts, intending nothing but blood and deſtruction.

Theſe things paſſing at Rochel, the king hearing hereof, giveth in commandment to captain Strozzius and Guardius to ſee to Rochel. After this he ſendeth a nobleman, one Bironius, requiring of the Rochel men to receive him for their governor under the king. Of this great conſultation being had, at length the Rochel men began to condeſcend upon certain conditions; which being not eaſily granted unto, and eſpecially they hearing in the mean time what was done to others of their fellows, who had ſubmitted themſelves, thought it ſo better to ſtand to the defence of their lives and conſciences, and to adventure the worſt. Whereupon began great ſiege and battery to be laid againſt Rochel both by land and ſea, which was anno 1572, about the fourth day of December. It would require another volume to deſcribe all things during the time of this ſiege, that paſſed on either ſide, between the king's part and the town of Rochel, briefly to run over ſome parts of the matter: in the beginning of the next year following, which was anno 1573, in the month of January, commandment was given out by the king to all and ſundry nobles and peers of France, upon great puniſhment, to addreſs themſelves in a moſt forcible manner to the aſſaulting of Rochel. Whereupon a great concourſe of all the nobility, with the whole power of France, was there aſſembled, amongſt whom was alſo the prince of Anjou, the king's brother (who there not long after was proclaimed king of Poland) accompanied with his other brother duke Alanſon, Navarre, Conde, and a great number of ſtates beſides. Thus the whole power of France being gathered againſt one poor town, had not the mighty hand of God ſtood on their ſide, it had been impoſſible for them to eſcape. During the time of this ſiege, which laſted ſeven months, what ſkirmiſhes and conflicts were on both ſides, it would require a long tractation. To make ſhort, ſeven principal aſſaults were given to the poor town of Rochel, with all the power that France could make. In all which aſſaults ever the pope's catholic ſide had the worſt. Concerning the firſt aſſault thus I find written, that within the ſpace of 26 days were charged againſt the walls and houſes of Rochel to the number of thirty thouſand ſhot of iron bullets and globes, whereby a great breach was made for the adverſary to invade the city: but ſuch was the courage of them within, not men only, but alſo of women, matrons, and maidens, with ſpits, fire, and ſuch other weapons as came to hand, that the adverſary was driven back, with no ſmall ſlaughter of their ſoldiers: only of the townſmen were ſlain and wounded to the number of ſixty perſons. Likewiſe in the ſecond aſſault 2000 great field pieces were laid againſt the town; whereupon the adverſary attempted the next day to invade the town, but through the induſtry of the ſoldiers and citizens, and alſo of the women and maids, the invaders were forced at length to fly away faſter than they came. No better ſucceſs had all the aſſaults that followed: whereby conſider, gentle reader, with thyſelf, in what great diſtreſs theſe good men were, not of Rochel only, but of other cities alſo, during theſe ſeven months above mentioned, had not the mighty hand of the Lord Almighty ſuſtained them. Concerning whoſe wonderous operation for his ſervants in theſe hard diſtreſſes, three memorable things I find in hiſtory to be noted.

The one concerning the ſiege of Sanſer; which city being terribly battered and razed with gunſhot of great cannons and field-pieces, having at one ſiege no leſs then three thouſand bullets and gunſtones flying upon them, wherewith the creſts of their helmets were pierced, their ſleeves, their hoſe, their hats, pierced, their weapons in their hands broken, their walls ſhaken, their houſes rent down; yet not one perſon ſlain nor wounded with all this, ſave only at the firſt a certain maiden, with the blaſt of the ſhot flying by her, was ſtruck down, and died.

The ſecond thing to be noted is this, that in the ſame city, during all the time of the ſiege, which laſted ſeven months and a half, for all the ordnance and battering-pieces diſcharged againſt them, which are numbered to ſix thouſand, not ſo much as twenty-five perſons in all were ſlain.

The third example, no leſs memorable, was at Rochel: whereas the poorer ſort began to lack corn and victuals, there was ſent to them every day in the river (by the hand of the Lord no doubt) a great multitude of fiſh, called Surdones, which the poorer people did uſe inſtead of bread. Which fiſh, the ſame day as the ſiege brake up, departed, and came no more. Teſtified by them which were preſent there in Rochel all the time.

What number was loſt on both ſides during all this ſeven months war, it is not certainly known. Of the king's camp what number was ſlain, by this it may be conjectured, that 132 of their captains were killed and ſlain, of whom the chief was duke Damoule.

To cloſe up this tragical ſtory, concerning the breaking up of this ſeven months ſiege: thus it fell out, that ſhortly after the ſeventh aſſault given againſt Rochel, which was anno 1573, about the month of June, word came to the camp, that duke Anjou, the king's brother, was proclaimed king of Poland; whereat great joy was in the camp. By occaſion whereof the new king, more willing to have peace, entered talk with them of Rochel: who, as he ſhewed himſelf to them not ungentle, ſo found he them again to him not uncomformable. Whereupon a certain agreement pacificatory was concluded between them upon conditions. Which agreement the new king of Poland ſoon preferred to the French king, his brother, not without ſome ſuit and interceſſion to have it ratified. The king alſo himſelf, partly being weary of theſe chargeable wars, was the more willing to aſſent thereunto. And thus at length, through the Lord's great work, the king's royal conſent under form of an edict was ſet down in writing, and confirmed by the king, containing 25 articles. In which alſo were included certain other cities of the proteſtants, granting to them benefit of peace, and liberty of religion. This edict or mandate ſent down from the king by his herald at arms, Bironius in the king's name cauſed to be ſolemnly proclaimed at Rochel, anno 1573, the tenth day of June.

The year next following, 1574, for two things ſeemeth fatal and famous; for the death firſt of Charles the ninth, the French king, alſo moſt of all, for the death of Charles, cardinal of Loraine, brother to Guiſe. Of the manner of the cardinal's death, I find little mention in ſtories. Touching the king's death, although Ric. Dinothus ſaith nothing, for fear belike, becauſe being a Frenchman, his name is expreſſed and known: but another ſtory, whom the ſaid Dinothus doth follow, bearing no name, ſaith thus: that he died the 25th day of May, upon Whitſun-eve, being of the age of twenty-five years: and addeth more, certain it is, that his ſickneſs came of bleeding. And ſaith further: The conſtant report ſo goeth, that the blood guſhing out by divers parts of his body, he toſſing in his bed, and caſting out many horrible blaſphemies, laid upon pillows with his heels upward, and head downward, voided ſo much blood at his mouth, that in few hours he died. Which ſtory, if it be true, as is recorded, and teſtified, may be a ſpectacle and example to all perſecuting kings and princes, polluted with the blood of chriſtian martyrs. And thus much briefly touching the late terrible perſecution in France.

Edward Bulkley to the Chriſtian Reader.

"WHereas that excellent man, both for learning and godlineſs, Mr. John Fox, of bleſſed memory, ended this worthy work with this ſhort declaration of that horrible maſſacre and murder of God's ſaints and ſervants in France; I have thought good to ſet down the ſame more particularly and largely, and afterward to add thereunto a declaration of other outrageous cruelties, committed in France by the favourers and followers of the church of Rome, upon faithful chriſtians, both before and after the ſaid maſſacre: and faithfully collected and taken out of the hiſtory of that honourable man, James Auguſt Thuanus, preſident of the parliament of Paris, and counſellor of ſtate to the late French king Henry the fourth. And thus I have done, that we may thereby be the more moved to hate and abhor that bloody Babylon of Rome, and to take the better heed, that by our ſins and contempt of God's holy word, by his great mercy committed unto us, we do not again fall into the cruel claws thereof, and into the bloody hands of their followers; as moſt certainly we had done, if God in great mercy had not prevented that ſavage, barbarous, and moſt monſtrous Powder-treaſon: of which great and merciful deliverance God make us mindful and truly thankful in glorifying his name, and ſerving him in true holineſs and righteouſneſs all the days of our life, Amen."

WHEN the admiral was wounded in both his arms, he immediately thereupon ſaid to Maure, preacher to the queen of Navarre, deceaſed; O my brother, I do now perceive that I am beloved of my God, ſeeing that for his moſt holy name's ſake I do ſuffer theſe wounds. Then he whiſpered in the ear of one of them that bare up his arm, that he ſhould deliver an hundred crowns to Marlin his preacher, to be given to the poor of the church of Paris.

The admiral was ſlain by Bemjus, of whom Alienus (one of them that came to kill him) did afterwards report, that he never ſaw man in ſo preſent peril, ſo conſtantly and confidently ſuffer death.

Many honourable men and great perſonages were then murdered; as count Rochfulcaud, Telinius, the admiral's ſon-in-law, Antonius Claromontus, marquis of Ravely, Lewes Buſſius, Bandineus, Pluvialius, Bernius, &c.

Francis Nompar Caumontius, being in bed with his two ſons, was ſlain with one of them; the other was ſtrangely preſerved, who after came to great honour and dignity.

Stephen Cavalerie Prime, chief treaſurer to the king in Poictiers, a very good man, and careful of the commonwealth, after he had paid for his life a good ſum of money, was cruelly murdered by ſome cut-throats, whom Stephen Fargon Patandery, that gaped for his office, had ſent for that purpoſe.

Magdalen Briſſonet, an excellent woman and learned, the widow of Ivermus, maſter of requeſts to the king, flying out of the city in poor apparel, was taken, cruelly murdered, and caſt into the river.

Two thouſand were murdered in one day; and the ſame liberty of killing and ſpoiling continued certain days after.

Peter Plaice was ſtabbed with daggers, and killed.

At Meldith two hundred were caſt into priſon, and being brought out as ſheep to the ſlaughter, were cruelly murdered. There alſo 25 women were ſlain.

At Orleance a thouſand of men, women, and children were murdered.

The citizens of Auguſtobona, when they heard of the maſſacre at Paris, ſhut the gates of their own town that no proteſtant might eſcape, and caſt all that they ſuſpected into priſon, which afterwards were brought forth, and murdered.

At Avaricum in like manner the ſuſpected for religion were caſt into priſon, and afterwards murdered.

At the town of Charite, a troop of Lewes Gonzaga's horſemen killed 18 perſons.

At Lyons there were eight hundred moſt miſerably and cruelly murdered; the children hanging at their fathers neck, and the fathers embracing their children, &c. Three hundred were ſlain in the archbiſhop's houſe. The monks would not ſuffer their bodies to be buried.

At Romanium ſeven were killed.

At Tholoſſa 200 were murdered.

At Roan 500 were put to death. At laſt Thuanus writeth thus; This example paſſed unto other cities, and from cities to towns and villages, ſo that it is by many publiſhed, that in all the kingdom above 30,000 were in theſe tumults divers ways deſtroyed; although I think the number was ſomewhat leſs.

A little before this maſſacre, a man, nurſe, and infant carried to be baptized, were all three murdered.

There was wonderful great joy in Rome for this maſſacre, and the pope with his cardinals went in ſolemn proceſſion to the church of St. Mark, to give thanks to God for this great benefit beſtowed upon the ſee of Rome and the chriſtian world. And the Monday following there was ſolemn ſervice in the church of Minerva,

Minerva, at which the pope and the cardinals were preſent. A jubilee alſo was publiſhed, and in the evening the great ordnance was ſhot off in the caſtle of St. Angelo. The cardinal of Loraine gave a thouſand crowns to him that brought news of it.

Bricamotius an old man of ſeventy years, and Cavagnius, were laid upon hurdles and drawn to execution: and being in the way reviled, and defiled with dirt caſt upon them, they were hanged. Bricamotius might have been pardoned, if he would publickly confeſs, that the admiral had conſpired againſt the king; which he refuſed to do.

Caſter a city in the county of the Albingens, held by the proteſtants, being upon the king's great promiſes of their ſafety, delivered up into the hands of Crucete a nobleman, was notwithſtanding with murders and ſpoil cruelly waſted.

At Bourdeaux, by the inſtigation of a monk, called Enimund Angerius, were 264 cruelly murdered, of whom ſome were Senators. This monk continually provoked them in his ſermons to this ſlaughter.

At Agendicum in Main, a cruel ſlaughter of the proteſtants was committed by the inſtigation of Æmarus, inquiſitor of criminal cauſes. A rumour being ſpread abroad, that the proteſtants had taken ſecret council to invade and ſpoil the churches, above an hundred of every eſtate and ſex were by the enraged people killed or drowned in the river Igonna, which runneth by the city, the houſes of many were ſpoiled; the church without the city where the proteſtants aſſembled, was pulled down and made equal to the ground, and their vines pulled up by the roots.

The duke of Guiſe entered into Bloeſe; which altho' he got without any fight, yet all furious liberty was permitted to the ſoldiers, houſes were ſpoiled, many proteſtants which had remained were ſlain, or drowned in the river; neither were women ſpared, of whom ſome were defiled, and more murdered. Among whom one matron of good birth, having eſcaped drowning in water, could not eſcape from the hands of the murderers. From thence he went to Mere, a town two leagues from Bloeſe, where proteſtants had frequent aſſembly at ſermons; which for many days together was ſpoiled, and many killed, and Caſſebonius the paſtor was drowned in the next river.

At Anjou, Albiacus the paſtor was murdered, certain women ſlain, and ſome defiled; amongſt which, two ſiſters were abuſed in the ſight of their father, who was bound to a well to behold that ſight.

John Burgeolus, preſident of Turin, an old man, being ſuſpected to be a proteſtant, having bought with a great ſum of money his life and ſafety, was notwithſtanding taken and beaten cruelly with clubs and ſtaves, and being ſtripped of his cloaths, was brought to the bank of the river Liger, and was hanged his feet upward, and head downward in the water up to his breaſt; then (he yet alive) they opened his belly, plucked out his guts, and threw them into the river, and taking his heart, put it upon a ſpear, carrying it with contumelious words about the city.

The town of Barre being taken by the papiſts, all kinds of cruelty was there uſed, children were cut up, and the guts and hearts of ſome of them pulled out, which in rage they gnawed with their teeth. They that were in the caſtle, when they had yielded themſelves to the will of the conqueror, were almoſt all hanged. One Ralet ſpared not his own ſon, but ſuffered him in that tumult to be hanged.

When the city of Matiſcon was taken by corrupting the keeper of the keys, whom yet they killed, great cruelty was ſhewed, ſo that they counted it a ſport to cut off mens legs and arms.

Sanpontius inviting gentlewomen to ſupper, would walk with them, and having his ſoldiers about him, uſed to caſt ſome of his priſoners (of which he had many) from the bridge into the river, and with that ſpectacle did ſatisfy the eyes of his gueſts; of whom he would often aſk, whether they did ever ſee men leap better.

At Albia of Cahors upon the Lord's day the 16th of December, the papiſts at the ringing of a bell broke open the doors, where the proteſtants were aſſembled, and killed without difference, ſome in the place, ſome as they were getting away were here and there ſlain, among whom was one Guacerius a rich merchant; who being drawn into his houſe, was with his wife and children murdered, and his houſe ſpoiled. About 45 were in that tumult murdered, and their bodies contumeliouſly uſed.

In a town called Penna, 300 (notwithſtanding the ſafety of their lives was promiſed them) were cruelly murdered by Spaniards, which were newly come to ſerve the French king; who alſo killed certain women there: ſcoffingly ſaying that they were Lutheran men, diſſembling their ſex by their apparel.

The town of Nonne being yielded to the papiſts, upon condition, that the foreign ſoldiers ſhould depart ſafe with horſe and armour, leaving their enſigns, and that the enemies' ſoldiers that were foot-men ſhould not enter into the town, and that no harm ſhould be done to the townſmen; but that they might, if they would, go into the caſtle: after the yielding of it, the gates were ſet open, and ſtraight they came to murdering and ſpoiling without any regard of the foreſaid conditions. Men and women without difference were killed; the ſtreets ſounded with miſerable mourning, blood flowing in the ways, and the laſcivious ſoldiers ſwords ſhining in the flames of fire, which they had caſt upon the houſes. Many were cruelly killed, being thrown down headlong from on high. Among others, this example of inordinate filthineſs and cruelty is reported; A certain woman being drawn out of a private place, into which to avoid the rage of the ſoldiers ſhe had fled with her huſband, was in his ſight ſhamefully defiled: and then being commanded to draw a ſword, not knowing to what end, was forced by others, who ordered her hand, to give her huſband a deadly wound, whereof he died; the ſoldiers not being content to defile her body, but alſo to make her to defile her hands with the ſlaughter of her huſband.

At Samarobridge in Picardy, in the time of peace, above an hundred proteſtants were murdered: and at Antiſſiodore, which the proteſtants having held in the laſt war, had now yielded up, 150 were cruelly killed, and their dead bodies were drawn, and caſt partly into jakes, and partly into the river.

Bordius a captain under the prince of Conde at Mirabellum, was contrary to promiſe cruelly killed, and his naked body caſt into the ſtreet, that being unburied the dogs might eat it.

The prince of Conde being taken priſoner, and his life promiſed him, was ſhot in the neck by Montiſquius, captain of the duke of Anjou's guard, of whom Thuanus writeth thus; This was the end of Lewis Bourbon prince of Conde, of the king's blood, a man above the honour of his birth moſt honourable in courage and virtue; who in valour, conſtancy, wit, wiſdom, experience, courteſy, eloquence, and liberality, all which virtues excelled in him, had few his equals, and none, even by the confeſſion of his enemies, ſuperior to him.

Robert Stuart, a valiant Scotiſh gentleman, being taken priſoner, was notwithſtanding ſtabbed with daggers, and killed.

At Orleance an hundred men and women being committed to priſon, were by the furious people that ruſhed in moſt cruelly murdered.

Hitherto out of the hiſtory of Jacobus Auguſtus Thuanus (who is reported to be a catholic) which endeth eth in the year 1578, wherein I have for ſhortneſs ſake omitted ſundry particular outrages and murders committed by that bloody Babylonical generation; from whoſe bloody hands God in mercy defend and preſerve us.

The Hiſtory of Robert Oguier and his Wife, Baudicon and Martin their two Sons, who were burnt at Liſle in Flanders.

UPON Saturday March 6, 1556, between nine and ten of the clock in the night, the provoſt of the city with his ſerjeants armed themſelves to make ſearch, if they could find any met together in houſes; but as then there was no aſſembly. Therefore they came to the houſe of Robert Oguier, which was a little church, for all both great and ſmall, men-ſervants and maids were familiarly inſtructed there in the knowledge of God.

Being entered into the ſaid houſe, and ſeeking here and there for their prey, they found certain books which they carried away. But to whom they principally aimed at was not then in the houſe; namely, Baudicon, the ſon of the ſaid Robert Oguier, who at that time was gone abroad to commune and talk of the word of God with ſome of the brethren, as he oft uſed to do. Returning home, he knocked at the door; Martin his younger brother, watching his coming, bade him be gone: but Baudicon, thinking his brother miſtook him for ſome other, ſaid, It is I, open the door: with that the ſerjeants opened the ſame, and let him in, ſaying, Ah, Sir, you are well met: to whom he anſwered, I thank you, my friends, you alſo are welcome hither. Then ſaid the provoſt, I arreſt you all in the emperor's name; and with that commanded each of them to be bound, to wit, the huſband and his wife with their two ſons, leaving their two daughters to look to the houſe, and confined them in ſeveral priſons. Within a few days after, the priſoners were preſented before the magiſtrates of the city, and examined concerning their courſe of life, who directed their ſpeech firſt to Robert Oguier in theſe words: It is told us that you never come to maſs, yea, and alſo diſſuade others from coming thereto; we are further informed that you maintain conventicles in your houſe, cauſing erroneous doctrines to be preached there contrary to the ordinance of our holy mother the church, whereby you have tranſgreſſed the laws of his imperial majeſty.

Robert Oguier anſwered, Whereas firſt of all you lay to my charge that I go not to maſs; I refuſe ſo to do, indeed, becauſe the death and precious blood of the Son of God, and his ſacrifice, is utterly aboliſhed there, and trodden under foot; "For Chriſt by one ſacrifice hath perfected for ever them that are ſanctified." The apoſtle ſaith, by one offering. For do we read in all the ſcriptures, that either the prophets, Chriſt, or any of his apoſtles ever ſaid maſs? for they knew not what it meant. Chriſt indeed inſtituted the holy ſupper, in which all chriſtian people do communicate together, but they ſacrificed not. If you pleaſe to read the Bible over, you ſhall never find the maſs once mentioned therein; and therefore it is the mere invention of men. You know then what Chriſt ſaith, "In vain do they worſhip me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." If either myſelf, or any of mine had been at maſs which is ordained by the commandment of men, Chriſt would have told us, "We had worſhipped him in vain."

As for the ſecond accuſation, I cannot nor will deny, but there have met together in my houſe honeſt people fearing God; I aſſure you not with an intent to wrong or harm any, but rather for the advancement of God's glory, and the good of many. I knew indeed that the emperor had forbidden it, but what then? I knew alſo that Chriſt in his goſpel had commanded it; "Where two or three, ſaith he, are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midſt of them." Thus you ſee I could not well obey the emperor, but I muſt diſobey Chriſt. In this caſe then, I choſe rather to obey my God, than man.

One of the magiſtrates demanded what they did when they met together. To which Baudicon the eldeſt ſon anſwered; If it pleaſe you my maſters to give me leave, I will open the buſineſs at large unto you.

The ſheriffs ſeeing his promptneſs, looking one upon another ſaid, Well, let us hear it then. Baudicon, lifting up his eyes to heaven, began thus: When we meet together in the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt to hear the word of God, we firſt of all proſtrate upon our knees before God, and in the humility of our ſpirits do make confeſſion of our ſins before his divine majeſty. Then we pray that the word of God may be rightly divided, and purely preached: we alſo pray for our ſovereign lord the emperor, and for all his honourable counſellors, that the common-wealth may be peaceably governed to the glory of God; yea we forgot not you whom we acknowledge our ſuperiors; intreating our God for you, and for this whole city, that you may maintain it in all tranquillity. Thus I have ſummarily related unto you what we do; think you now, whether we have offended ſo highly in this matter of our aſſemblies?

Whilſt they were thus examined, each of them made an open confeſſion of the faith which they held. After this, being returned again to priſon, they not long after were put to the torture, to make them confeſs who they were that frequented their houſe, but they would diſcover none, unleſs ſuch as were well known to the judges, or elſe were at that time abſent. About four or five days after, they were convented again before their judges, namely, the father and his two ſons; and after many words paſſed, they aſked them whether they would ſubmit themſelves to the will of the magiſtrates. Robert Oguier and Baudicon his ſon, with ſome deliberation, ſaid, Yea, we will.

Then demanding the ſame of Martin the younger brother, he anſwered, that he would not ſubmit himſelf thereto, but would accompany his mother; ſo he was ſent back again to priſon, whilſt the father and the ſon were burnt alive to aſhes. Now as they went to receive the ſentence, one of the judges ſitting in his place, after ſentence pronounced, ſaid, To-day you ſhall go to dwell with all the devils in hell fire; (which he ſpake as one tranſported with fury in beholding the great patience of theſe two ſervants of Chriſt) having received the ſentence of death, they were returned to the priſon whence they came, being joyful that the Lord did them that honour to be enrolled in the number of his martyrs. No ſooner entered they the priſon, but a band of friars came in thither: one amongſt the reſt told them, the hour was come in which they muſt finiſh their days. Robert Oguier and his ſon anſwered, We know it well; but bleſſed be the Lord our God, who now delivering our bodies out of this vile priſon, will receive our ſouls into his glorious and heavenly kingdom.

One of the friars whoſe name was Lazard, endeavoured to turn them from their faith, ſaying, Father Robert, thou art an old man, let me intreat thee in this thy laſt hour to think of ſaving thine own ſoul; and if thou wilt give ear unto me, I warrant thee thou ſhalt do well.

The old man anſwered, Poor man, how dareſt thou attribute that to thyſelf which belongs to the eternal God, and ſo rob him of his honour? for it ſeems by thy ſpeech, that if I will hearken to thee, thou wilt become my Saviour. No, no, I have only one Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, who by and by will deliver me from this miſerable world. I have one doctor, whom the heavenly venly Father hath commanded me to hear, and I purpose to hearken to none other.

A friar, called the father of Saint Clare, exhorting him to take pity of his soul which Christ hath redeemed: Thou willest me, said Robert, to pity mine own soul, dost thou not see what pity I have on it, when for the name of Christ I willingly abandon this body of mine to the fire, hoping to-day to be with him in paradise? I have put all my confidence in God, and my hope wholly is fixed upon the merits of Christ, his death and passion, he will direct me the right way to his kingdom. I believe whatsoever the holy prophets and apostles have written, and in that faith will I live and die.

The friar hearing this, said, Out dog, thou art not worthy the name of a christian; thou and thy son with thee are both resolved to damn your bodies and souls with all the devils in the bottom of hell.

As they were about to sever Baudicon from his father, he said, Let my father alone, and trouble him not thus, he is an old man, and hath an infirm body, hinder him not I pray you from receiving the crown of martyrdom.

Baudicon was then conveyed into a chamber apart, and there being stripped of his clothes was fitted to be sacrificed; now as one brought him gunpowder to put to his breast, an old fellow standing by said, Wert thou my brother, I would sell all that I am worth to buy faggots to burn thee; thou findest but too much favour. The young man answered, Well Sir, the Lord shew you more mercy. Some that were present, saying, Good God, is it not a pitiful sight to behold these poor men? a doctor being by answered, And what pity would you have shewed towards them? I would instead of allowing them this powder, have them fried on gridirons, as St. Laurence was.

Whilst they spake thus to Baudicon, some of the friars closed in with the old man, persuading him at least to take a crucifix into his hands, lest the people, said they, should murmur against you? adding further, that he might for all that lift up his heart to God, because you know, said they, it is but a piece of wood.

Thus they fastened it between his hands, but as soon as Baudicon was come down, and espied what they had done to his father; he said, Alas father, what do you now, will you play the idolater even at our last hour. And then pulling the idol out of his hands which they had fastened therein, he threw it away, saying, What cause hath the people to be offended at us, for not receiving a Jesus Christ, of wood? we bear upon our hearts the cross of Christ the Son of the ever living God, feeling his holy word written therein in letters of gold.

As they were led to execution, a band of soldiers were attendant upon them, no less than if a prince had been conducted into his kingdom. Being come to the place where they were to suffer, they ascended up the scaffold which was there prepared for them. Then Baudican asked leave of the sheriffs to make a confession of his faith before the people. Answer was made, that he was to look upon his ghostly father and confessor; Confess yourself, said they, to him. He was then haled rudely to the stake, where he began to sing the sixteenth psalm. The friar cried out, Do you not hear my master, what wicked errors these heretics sing, to beguile the people withal. Baudicon hearing what he said, replied thus; Now simple idiot, callest thou the psalms of the prophet David, errors? but no marvel, for thus you are wont to blaspheme against the Spirit of God.

Then turning his eyes towards his father, who was about to be chained to the stake, he said, Be of good courage father, the worst will be past by and by. As the executioner was fastening him to the post, he chanced to hit him with his hammer on the foot, to make him stand nearer to the same. The old man being sensible of the blow, said, Friend, thou hurtest my foot, why dost thou abuse me thus? the friar hearing this, said, Ah these heretics! they would be counted martyrs forsooth; but if they be but touched a little, they cry out as if they were killed. To which Baudicon thus replied: Think you then we fear the tormentors? no such matter; for had we feared the same, we had never exposed our bodies to this so shameful and painful a kind of death.

Then he often recited these short breathings, O God, Father everlasting, accept the sacrifice of our bodies, for thy well beloved Son Jesus Christ's sake. One of the friars cry'd, Heretic, heretic, thou lyest, he is none of thy Father, the devil is thy father. And thus, during these conflicts, he bent his eyes to heaven, and speaking to his Father, said, Behold! for I see the heavens open, and millions of angels ready prest to receive us, rejoicing to see us thus witnessing the truth in the view of the world. Father, let us be glad and rejoice, for the joys of heaven are set open to us.

Then said one of the friars, I see hell open, and millions of devils present to carry you thither. But the Lord, who never forsakes any that put their trust in him, stirred up the heart and opened the mouth of a poor man who stood among the multitude, beholding this spectacle, who being moved with compassion, cried aloud, Be of good comfort, Baudicon, stand thou to it, thou fightest in a good quarrel, I am on thy side; after which words he departed thence; and a way being made for him, saved himself from danger.

Fire was forthwith put to the straw and wood which burnt beneath, whilst they (not shrinking from the pains) spake one to another; Baudicon often repeating this in his father's ears, faint not Father, nor be afraid, "Yet a very little while and we shall enter into the heavenly mansions."

In the end, the fire growing hot upon them, the last words they were heard to pronounce, were, Jesus Christ, thou Son of God, into thy hands we commend our spirits. And thus these two slept sweetly in the Lord.

In eight days after, Jane the mother, and Martin her son, were executed in the same city.

But before we come to describe their happy ends, we will, as briefly as may be, note by the way the great conflicts of spirit which both of them sustained.

There were sent unto them many of the popish rabble, to turn them from their faith. Now that this their devilish enterprise might the rather be effected, they sundered one of them from the other, so as by the politic device of a monk the poor woman began to waver, and let go her first faith. At this their enemies rejoiced not a little, whilst the poor little flock of Christ, hearing such sad news, were in continual perplexity, but the Lord left them not in their mournful condition.

For on a day one of the monks resorted to her in the prison, counselling her to win her son Martin, and to draw him from his errors: which she promise to do. But when he was come to his mother, and perceived that she was not only fallen, but also quite turned out of the right way, he began with tears to bewail her miserable estate.

O mother, said he, what have you done? have you denied him who hath redeemed you? alas, what evil hath he done you, that you should requite him with this so great an injury and dishonour? Now I am plunged into that woe, which I have most feared. Ah, good God! that I should live to see this, which pierceth me to the very heart.

His mother hearing these his pitiful complaints, and seeing the tears which her son shed for her, began again to renew her strength in the Lord, and with tears cried out, O Father of mercies, be merciful unto me miserable sinner, and cover my transgression under the righteousness of thy blessed Son: Lord enable me with strength from above, to stand to my first confession, and make me to abide stedfast therein even unto my last breath.

It was not long after this her change, but the ſame inſtruments of Satan, who had ſeduced her, came in, ſuppoſing to find her in the ſame mind wherein they left her: whom ſhe no ſooner eſpied, but with deteſtation ſaid, Avoid Satan, get thee behind me: for henceforth thou haſt neither part nor portion in me. I will by the help of God ſtand to my firſt confeſſion; and if I may not ſign it with ink, I will ſeal it with my blood. And ſo from that time this frail veſſel, who for a while relented, after her recovery grew ſtronger and ſtronger.

The judges ſeeing their conſtancy, delayed not to diſpatch them out of the way, condemning them to be burned alive, and their bodies being reduced to aſhes, the ſame to be ſcattered and diſperſed in the air. The mother and the ſon having heard their ſentence read, in the way as they were going back again to priſon, ſaid, Now bleſſed be our God, who cauſeth us thus to triumph over our enemies: This is the wiſhed hour, our gladſome day is come; let us not then, ſaid Martin, forget to be thankful for the honour he doth us, in thus conforming us unto the image of his Son. Let us remember thoſe who have traced this path before us: for this is the high-way to the kingdom of heaven. Let us then, good mother, go on boldly out of the camp with the Son of God, bearing his reproach, with all his holy martyrs; for ſo we ſhall find paſſage into the glorious kingdom of the ever-living God.

Some of the company hearing, but not being able to brook theſe words, ſaid, We ſee now, thou heretic, that thou art wholly poſſeſſed, body and ſoul, with a devil, as was thy father and thy brother, who are both in hell. Martin ſaid, Sir, as for your railings and curſings, our God will this day turn them into bleſſings in the ſight of himſelf, and of all his angels.

A certain temporizer ſaid to Martin, Thou ſilly youth, thou ſayeſt thou knoweſt not what; thou art too well conceited of thyſelf and of thy cauſe. Seeſt thou not all this people here about thee? what thinkeſt thou of them? they believe not as thou doſt, and yet I doubt not but they ſhall be ſaved. But you imagine to do that which will never come to paſs, though you pretend never ſo much that you are in the faith, and have the ſcriptures for you.

The good woman hearing this, anſwered, Sir, Chriſt Jeſus our Lord ſaith, that it is the wide gate and broad way which leads to deſtruction, and therefore many go in thereat: but the gate, ſaith he, is narrow that leads to life, and few there be that find it. Do ye then doubt whether we are in the ſtraight way or no, when ye behold our ſufferings? would you have a better ſign than this, to know whether we are in the right way or no, compare our doctrine with that of your prieſts and monks: we for our parts are determined to have but one Chriſt and him crucified, we only embrace the ſcriptures of the old and new Teſtament. Are we deceived in believing that which the holy prophets and apoſtles have taught?

Soon after Martin and his mother were bound and brought to the place of their martyrdom, his mother having aſcended the ſcaffold, cry'd to Martin, come up, come up my ſon. And as he was ſpeaking to the people, ſhe ſaid, ſpeak out Martin, that it may appear to all that we die not heretics. Martin would have made a confeſſion of his faith, but could not be ſuffered. His mother being bound to the ſtake, ſpake in the hearing of the ſpectators, We are chriſtians, and that which we now ſuffer is not for murder nor theft, but becauſe we will believe no more than that which the word of God teacheth us. Both rejoicing that they were counted worthy to ſuffer for the ſame.

The fire being kindled, the vehemency thereof did nothing cool or abate the fervency of their zeal, but they continued conſtant in the faith, and with lifting up their hands to heaven, in an holy accord, ſaid, Lord Jeſus, into thy hands we commend our ſpirits. And thus they bleſſedly ſlept in the Lord.

A brief Relation of the Maſſacre at Vaſſy in the Country of Champaigne in France.

THE duke of Guiſe being arrived at Joinville, aſked ſome that he was familiar withal, whether thoſe of Vaſſy uſed to have ſermons preached conſtantly by their miniſter. It was anſwered they had, and that they increaſed daily more and more. At the hearing of which report, falling into a grievous paſſion, upon Saturday the laſt of February, 1562, that he might the more covertly execute his conceived wrath againſt the religious ſort in Vaſſy, he departed from Joinville, accompanied with the cardinal of Guiſe his brother, and thoſe of their train, and lodged in the village of Dammartin the free, which is diſtant from Joinville about two French miles and a half.

The next day, being Sunday, after he had heard maſs very early in the morning, being attended with about two hundred men armed with harquebuſſes, piſtols and coutelaxes, he left Dammartin, paſſing along to Vaſſy. As he went by the village of Bronzeval, which is diſtant from Vaſſy a ſmall quarter of a mile, the bell, after the uſual manner, rang to the ſermon. The duke hearing it, aſked thoſe he met, Why the bell rang ſo loud at Vaſſy; they told him, It was to give the people warning of the ſermon which was to be made there. Then one called La Montague ſaid, It is for the aſſembling of the Hugonots: adding moreover, that there were many in the ſaid Bronzeval, who frequented the ſermons preached at Vaſſy; and therefore that the duke ſhould do well to begin there, and offer them violence. But the duke anſwered, March on, march on, we ſhall take them among the reſt of the aſſembly. Many who followed the duke, namely, pages and footmen, rejoiced not a little concerning this bloody enterprize, not ſticking to ſay, that the booty and pillage would fall to their ſhares; ſwearing by blood and wounds, that there would be good ſtore of Hugonots there.

Now there were certain ſoldiers and archers accompanying the duke, who compaſſed about Vaſſy; for having been muſtered at Monthierender, inſtead of returning home, as they were wont to do after the muſter was ended, they took their way thence to Vaſſy, moſt of them being lodged in the houſes of papiſts. The Saturday before the ſlaughter, they were ſeen to make ready their weapons, harquebuſſes and piſtols; but the faithful not dreaming of ſuch a conſpiracy, thought the duke would offer them no hard meaſure, being the king's ſubjects; alſo, that not above two months before the duke and his brethren paſſing by nigh unto the ſaid Vaſſy, gave no ſign of their diſpleaſure.

The duke of Guiſe being arrived at Vaſſy with all his troops, a young man, a ſhoemaker, ſtepped out of his houſe not far from the door where the aſſembly was, Montague pointing to him with his finger, ſaid he was one of the miniſters. Whereupon the duke called this ſhoemaker to him, and aſked of him, whether he was a miniſter, and of what univerſity he was. He anſwered, that he was not of that calling, neither was he a ſcholar. Notwithſtanding he hardly eſcaped from this troop, which had invironed him round about: only one of the company told him, That if he had been a miniſter, he had taken upon him a very baſe calling.

From thence the duke La Broſſe and La Montague paſſed on in the ſaid city with their ſoldiers, as if they minded to take their way towards the village of Eſclairon, where it was given out he meant to dine. But paſſing by the market-houſe of Vaſſy, which is near the monaſtery, in the way leading to Eſclairon, he turned and went directly toward the common-hall, or market-houſe, houſe, and then entered into the monaſtery; where having called to him one Deſſales, the prior of Vaſſy, and another whoſe name was Claud le Sain, being provoſt of the ſaid Vaſſy, he talked a while with them, and iſſuing hoſtily out of the monaſtery, was attended by many of his followers. Then command was given to ſuch as were papiſts, to retire into the monaſtery, and not to be ſeen in the ſtreets, unleſs they would venture the loſs of their lives. The duke perceiving others of his retinue to be walking to and fro under the town-hall, and about the church-yard, commanded them to march on towards the place where the ſermon was, being in a barn, about an hundred paces diſtant from the monaſtery, quite oppoſite to that way which the duke ſhould take to Eſclairon. This command was by and by put in execution by ſuch of the company as went on foot, going directly thither. He that marched foremoſt of this rabble, was La Broſſe, and on the one ſide of theſe marched the horſemen, after whom followed the duke with another company, as of his own followers, ſo likewiſe of the cardinal of Guiſe his brother.

By this time Mr. Leonard Morel the miniſter, after the firſt prayer ended, and having begun his ſermon before his auditors, which might amount to about 1200 perſons, conſiſting of men, women, and children: the horſemen firſt approaching to the barn within about twenty-five paces, ſhot off two harquebuſſes right upon thoſe who were placed in the galleries joining to the windows. The people within perceiving that, endeavoured to ſhut the door, but were prevented by the ruffians ruſhing in upon them, who drawing their ſwords, furiouſly cried out, Death of God, kill, kill theſe Hugonots.

The firſt they ſeized on was a poor crier of wine, that ſtood next the door, aſking him, if he were not a Hugonot, and in whom he believed? Having anſwered, that he believed in Jeſus Chriſt, they ſmote him twice with a ſword, which felled him to the ground. Being got up again, thinking to recover himſelf, they ſtruck him the third time, whereby being overcharged with wounds, he fell down, and died inſtantly. Two other men at the ſame time were ſlain at the entry of the ſaid door, as they were preſſing out to eſcape.

Then did the duke of Guiſe with his company, violently enter in among them, ſtriking the poor people down with their ſwords, daggers and coutelaxes, not ſparing any age or ſex. Beſides, they within were ſo aſtoniſhed that they knew not which way to turn them, but running hither and thither fell one upon another, flying as poor ſheep before a company of ravening wolves entering in among the flock.

Some of the murderers ſhot off their pieces againſt them that were in the galleries; others cut in pieces ſuch as they lighted upon; others had their heads cleft in twain, their arms and hands cut off, and did what they could to hew them all to pieces; ſo as many of them gave up the ghoſt even in the place. The walls and galleries of the ſaid barn were dyed with the blood of thoſe who were every where murdered: yea ſo great was the fury of the murderers, that part of the people within were forced to break open the roof of the houſe, if peradventure that way they might ſave themſelves upon the top thereof.

Being got thither, and then fearing to fall again into the hands of the cruel tygers, ſome of them leaped over the walls of the city, which were very high, flying into the woods and amongſt the vines, which with moſt expedition they could ſooneſt attain unto: ſome hurt in their arms, others in their heads and other parts of their bodies. The duke preſented himſelf in the houſe with his ſword drawn in his hand, charging his men to kill, eſpecially the young men. Only in the end women with child were ſpared. But purſuing thoſe who preſſed to get upon the houſe-top, they cried, Come down ye dogs, come down, uſing many cruel threatening ſpeeches unto them.

The cauſe why women with child eſcaped, was, as the report went, for the ducheſs' ſake his wife, who paſſing along by the walls of the city, hearing ſo hideous outcries which were made amongſt theſe poor creatures, with the noiſe of the pieces and piſtols continually diſcharged, ſent in all haſte to the duke her huſband with much intreaties to ceaſe this perſecution, for frighting women with child.

During this ſlaughter the cardinal of Guiſe remained before the church of the ſaid city of Vaſſy, leaning upon the walls of the church-yard, looking towards the place where his followers were buſied in killing and ſlaying whom they could. Many of this aſſembly being thus hotly purſued, did in the firſt brunt ſave themſelves upon the roof of the houſe, not being diſcerned by thoſe who ſtood without: but at length ſome of this bloody crew eſpying where they lay hid, ſhot at them with long pieces, wherewith many of them were hurt and ſlain. The houſhold ſervants of Deſſalles Prior of Vaſſy ſhooting at the people on the roof, cauſed them to fall down like pigeons; one of that wretched company was not aſhamed to boaſt after the maſſacre was ended, that he for his part had cauſed ſix at the leaſt to tumble down in that pitiful plight, ſaying, that if others had done the like, not many of them could poſſibly have eſcaped.

The miniſter in the beginning of the maſſacre ceaſed not to preach, till one diſcharged his piece againſt the pulpit where he ſtood, after which falling down upon his knees, he intreated the Lord not only to have mercy upon himſelf, but alſo upon his poor perſecuted flock. Having ended his prayer, he left his gown behind him, thinking thereby to keep himſelf, as unknown: but whilſt he approached towards the door, in his fear he ſtumbled upon a dead body, where he received a blow with a ſword upon his right ſhoulder. Getting up again, and then thinking to get forth, he was immediately laid hold on, and grievouſly hurt on the head with a ſword, whereupon being felled to the ground, and feeling himſelf mortally wounded, he cried, Lord, into thy hand I commend my ſpirit, for thou haſt redeemed me, thou God of truth.

While he thus prayed, one of his bloody crew ran upon him to have ham-ſtringed him, but it pleaſed God his ſword brake in the hilt. Now to let you underſtand by what means he was delivered from ſo imminent a death, two gentlemen taking knowledge of him, as the reſt were about to kill him, ſaid, It is the miniſter, let him be conveyed to my lord duke. Theſe leading him away by both the arms, brought him before the gate of the monaſtery, from whence the duke and the cardinal his brother, coming forth, ſaid, come hither; and aſked him, ſaying, Art thou the miniſter of this place? who made thee ſo bold to ſeduce this people thus? Sir, ſaid the miniſter, I am no ſeducer, I have preached to them the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt. The duke perceiving, that this ſhort and pithy anſwer condemned his cruel fact, began to curſe and ſwear, ſaying, Death of God, doth the goſpel preach ſedition? Provoſt, go, and let a gibbet be ſet up, and hang this bougrer.

At which words the miniſter was delivered into the hands of two pages, who miſuſed him vilely. The women of the city, being ignorant papiſts, caught up dirt to throw in his face, and with extended outcries ſaid, Kill him, kill this varlet, who hath been the cauſe of the ſlaughter of ſo many. Much ado there was to hold off the women from being revenged upon the poor miniſter.

While the pages had him thus in their handling, the duke went into the barn, to whom they preſented a great bible, which they uſed for the ſervice of God. The duke taking it into his hands, calling his brother cardinal, ſaid, Lo here the title of the Hugonot books. The cardinal viewing viewing it, ſaid, There is nothing but good in this book, for it is the bible, to wit, the holy ſcriptures. The duke being offended, for that his anſwer ſuited not to his humour, grew into a greater rage than before, ſaying, Blood of God, how now? what? the holy ſcripture. It is 1500 years ago ſince Jeſus Chriſt ſuffered his death and paſſion, and it is but a year ſince theſe books were imprinted, how then ſay you that this is the goſpel? By the death of God you ſay you know not what. This unbridled fury of the duke diſpleaſed the cardinal, ſo as he was heard ſecretly to mutter, An unworthy brother.

This maſſacre continued a full hour, the duke's trumpeters ſounding the while two ſeveral times. When any of theſe deſired to have mercy ſhewed them for the love of Jeſus Chriſt, the murderers in ſcorn would ſay unto them, You uſe the name of Chriſt, but where is your Chriſt now become? And when they ſaid, Lord God, they blaſphemingly would ſay, Lord devil.

There died in this maſſacre within a few days fifty or threeſcore perſons; beſides theſe, there were about 250, as well men as women, that were wounded and ſpoiled, whereof ſome died, one loſing a leg, another an arm, another his fingers. The poor's box, which was faſtened to the door of the church with two iron hooks, was wreſted thence, with twelve pounds therein, and never reſtored again. Nothing was to be ſeen in the ſtreets but women with their hair hanging about their ears, faces beſmeared with blood, being wounded in many places with ſwords and daggers, with weeping and lamentations. Barbers and ſurgeons were ſet on work, that he that had leaſt had threeſcore under his hand to be dreſſed, and many periſhed for want thereof.

The miniſter was kept cloſe priſoner, ſo as that for twenty-four hours none were permitted to ſupply him with any neceſſaries at all, nor any ſuffered to ſee him, or ſpeak with him, and was oft threatened by his keepers to be ſowed up in a ſack, and drowned Fain would they have drawn him to have kept his Eaſter after the popiſh guiſe, under fair promiſes of his enlargement; but he would by no means conſent thereto. Thus continued he priſoner until the 8th day of May 1563, at which time he was ſet free by the ſuit of the moſt illuſtrious prince of Portien.

Whilſt the duke was at Eſclairon, the lackeys and others of their ſort put to ſale, unto ſuch as would give moſt, cloaks, hats, girdles, coifs, kerchiefs, with other things which they had ſpoiled the maſſacred of: crying them with a loud voice, as if a common crier had cried houſhold-ſtuff to be ſold.

An Account of Monſieur Pierre de la Place.

MOnſieur Pierre de la Place, preſident of the court of requeſts, whoſe ſtory we will relate ſomewhat at large, becauſe his ſingular piety requires the ſame. On Sunday morning, about ſix of the clock, one captain Michael, harquebuſier of the king, came into his lodging, into which he had the more eaſy acceſs for divers private reſpects.

The captain being armed, preſenting himſelf before the ſaid de la Place; the firſt words he ſpake were, that the duke of Guiſe had ſlain the admiral by the king's appointment, with many Hugonots beſides: and becauſe the reſt of them of what quality ſoever were deſtinated to death, he came to his lodging to exempt him from the common deſtruction: only he deſired to have a ſight of that gold and ſilver which was in the houſe. The lord de la Place, ſomewhat amazed at the audacious malepertneſs of the man, who in the midſt of ten or twelve perſons which were in the room, durſt preſume to utter ſuch language, aſked him if he knew where he was, or whether he thought there was a king or no?

To this the captain blaſpheming, anſwered, That he willed him to go with him to know the king's pleaſure The lord de la Place hearing this, fearing alſo ſome danger towards himſelf by ſedition in the city, ſlipped forth at a back door behind his lodging, purpoſing to get into a neighbour's houſe. In the mean while moſt of his ſervants vaniſhed out of ſight) and this captain having ſtored himſelf with a thouſand crowns, was intreated by the lady Marets, daughter to the ſaid lord, to convey her father with the lord Marets her huſband into the houſe of ſome Roman catholic, which he conſented to do, and alſo performed it.

After this, de la Place, being refuſed at three ſeveral houſes, was conſtrained to retire back again into his own, where he found his wife very penſive and grieved beyond meaſure, fearing leſt this captain in the end would caſt her ſon-in-law and daughter into the river, as alſo for the imminent danger wherein her dear huſband and all his family were.

But the lord de la Place, being ſtrengthened by the Spirit of God with incredible conſtancy, ſharply rebuked her; and afterward mildly remonſtrated unto her, that we muſt receive theſe and the like afflictions from the hand of God; and ſo having diſcourſed awhile upon the promiſes of God, comforted her.

Then he commanded all his ſervants that were in the houſe to be called together; who being come into his chamber, according to his cuſtom on the Lord's day, he made a form of exhortation to his family: then went to prayer, and began to read a chapter out of the book of Job, with the expoſition or ſermon of Mr. John Calvin upon it. So having ſpoken ſomewhat of God's mercy and juſtice, which as a good and wiſe father uſeth to exerciſe his elect with ſundry chaſtiſements, leſt they ſhould be intangled here below with the things of this world, he ſhewed how needful afflictions were for chriſtians, and that it was beyond the power of ſatan or men to hurt or wrong them, unleſs the Lord of his good pleaſure gave them leave. What need have we then, ſaid he, to dread their authority, which at the moſt can but prevail over our bodies: then he went to prayer again, preparing himſelf and his whole family rather to endure all ſorts of torments, yea death itſelf, than to ſpeak or do any thing that might tend to the diſhonour of God.

Having finiſhed his prayer, word was brought him, that Seneca, the provoſt marſhal, with many archers were at the door of his lodging, commanding the ſame to be opened in the king's name, ſaying, that he came to ſecure the perſon of the lord de la Place, and to preſerve his houſe from being pillaged by the common rabble. The lord de la Place having intelligence of this ſpeech, commanded the door to be opened to him, who entering in, declared the great ſlaughter that was made upon the Hugonots every where in the city by the king's command; adding this withal in Latin, that he would not ſuffer one to live, Qui mingat ad parietem. Yet have I expreſs charge from his majeſty, ſaith he, to ſee that you ſhall ſuſtain no wrong, but only conduct you to the Louvre, becauſe the king is deſirous to be informed touching many things about the affairs of thoſe of the religion, which he hath now in hand, and therefore willed him to make himſelf ready to go to his majeſty. The lord de la Place anſwered, that he always thought himſelf happy before he left this life, to gain any opportunity by which he might render an account to his majeſty of his behaviour and actions.

But in regard ſuch horrible maſſacres were every where committed, it was impoſſible for him to paſs to the Louvre, without the certain danger of his perſon; praying him to aſſure his majeſty of his willingneſs to come, the while leaving in his lodging as many archers as he thought fitting, until the fury of the people was ſomewhat pacified. The provoſt agreed to his requeſt, and left with him him one of his lieutenants called Toute Voye, with four of his archers.

Not long after came into his lodging preſident Charron, then provoſt of the merchants, with whom conferring a little in ſecret, going his way, he left with the four archers which were there before, four more of the city archers. The whole night following was ſpent in ſtopping up and fortifying all paſſages from entering the houſe; with logs and flint ſtone ſtopping up the windows, as it ſeemed by this ſo exact and diligent a defence the archers were left in the houſe, to free the ſaid de la Place and all the family from the common calamity; till Seneca returning, the next day after, at two of the clock in the afternoon, declared that he had expreſs charge from the king to bring him to his majeſty without delay. He replied as before, that it was dangerous as yet to paſs through the city, in regard there was an houſe pillaged next to his.

Seneca on the contrary inſiſted, ſaying, it was the common ſpeech of theſe Hugonots to proteſt, that they were the king's moſt loyal and obedient ſubjects and ſervants; but when they were to manifeſt their obedience to his commands, then they come off but ſlowly, ſeeming rather much to abhor and deteſt it. And whereas he pretended danger, Seneca anſwered, that he ſhould have a captain of Paris, who was well known to the people, to accompany him. As Seneca continued his ſpeech, the captain of Paris, ſirnamed Pazon, a principal actor in this ſedition, entered the chamber of the ſaid lord of Place, offering his ſervice to him through the city to the king; which de la Place would by no means yield to, telling Seneca, that he was one of the moſt cruel and bloody minded men in all the city; and therefore ſeeing he muſt needs go to the king, he intreated, that the ſaid Seneca would be his guard. To whom Seneca anſwered, that having now other affairs to look unto, he could not conduct him above fifty paces.

Then his wife (though otherwiſe a very gracious and good lady) out of that entire love which ſhe bare to her huſband, proſtrated herſelf at the feet of the ſaid Seneca, beſeeching and intreating him to accompany her huſband to the king; but the ſaid de la Place, who never ſhewed any ſign of a dejected ſpirit, came to his wife, took her up from the ground, rebuked her, and told her, that it is not the arm of fleſh that we muſt ſtoop unto, but unto God only. Then turning himſelf about, he perceived in his ſon's hat a white croſs, which thro' infirmity he had placed there, thinking thereby to ſave himſelf, for which his father ſharply chid him, commanding him to pluck that mark of ſedition thence; telling him, that we muſt now ſubmit ourſelves to bear the true croſs of Chriſt, namely, thoſe afflictions and tribulations which it ſhall pleaſe our good God to lay upon us, as ſure pledges of that eternal happineſs which he hath treaſured up for all his elect ſervants. Thus ſeeing himſelf preſſed by the ſaid Seneca to go with him to the king, reſolved upon death, which he ſaw he could not avoid, he took his cloak, embracing his wife, earneſtly wiſhing her above all things to have the fear of God, and his honour, in precious eſteem, and then boldly went on his way. Coming into the ſtreet where the glaſs-houſe is, certain murderers, who attended for his coming, with their daggers in readineſs, killed him about three of the clock in the afternoon, as an innocent lamb, in the midſt of 10 or 12 of Seneca's archers, who led him into that butchery; and then pillaged and imbezzeled away what they found in his lodging, for the ſpace of five or ſix days together. His body (whoſe ſoul was now received into heaven) being carried into a ſtable, and covered his face over with dung, the next day they threw him into the river.

Peter Ramus, the king's profeſſor in logic, a man renowned among the learned, was not forgotten. He had many enemies, particularly James Carpenter, who ſent the murderers to the college of prieſts, where the ſaid Ramus was hidden, but being diſcovered, he offered a good ſum of money to ſave his life; yet he was maſſacred, and caſt down out of an high chamber window to the ground, ſo that his bowels iſſuing out on the ſtones, were afterwards trailed through the ſtreets; the carcaſe was whipped by certain ſcholars, being ſet on by their tutors, to the diſgrace of good literature, of which Ramus was an eminent profeſſor.

A young man, who preferred his mother's ſafety in theſe broils before his own, about the age of thirty-two years, a ſincere chriſtian, of excellent learning; going abroad early on this dreadful Sunday morning upon ſome extraordinary occaſion, and hearing the rumour about the death of the admiral throughout the city of Paris, he, out of his ſingular affection for his mother, haſtened home with all poſſible ſpeed, informing her what had happened, and without delay, not regarding his own ſafety, ſecured her in a place fit for the purpoſe. After which he went to prayers in his ſtudy, as his cuſtom was, where being found, the furious maſſacrers aſked him, if he would obey the king? he anſwered, Yes, but I muſt alſo obey God. Then immediately they began with battle-axes and ſtaves to load him with blows on the head, that he received his own blood into his hands; and then making an end of him, they threw him into the river.

Note, It could not be found that above two miniſters were ſlain in this bloody maſſacre.

Philip le Doux, a great jeweller, at his return home from Guybry fair, being gone to bed, his wife at that time had the midwife attending upon her, being ready to be delivered: ſhe hearing theſe furies below bouncing at the door, commanding it to be opened to them in the king's name; and ill as ſhe was, ſhe adventured down, and opened the door to theſe tygers, who preſently ſtabbed her huſband in his bed. The midwife ſeeing them bent to murder the woman alſo, now ready to be delivered, inſtantly intreated them to ſtay, at leaſt ſo long till the infant (which would be the 20th child that God had given her) was born. Having conteſted ſome time with them, they took this poor woman, half dead with fear, and thruſt her into the fundament with a dagger to the very hilt. She finding herſelf mortally wounded, and yet deſirous to bring forth her fruit, ran into a corn-loft, whither they purſued her, giving her another ſtab into the belly with a dagger, and then threw her out of a window into the ſtreet: upon which fall the child came from her head foremoſt, gaping and yawning, to the great aſtoniſhment and confuſion of the papiſts, who were conſtrained often with deteſtation to acknowledge and confeſs the cruelties of their butchers.

One of the maſſacrers having ſnatched up a little child in his arms, the poor innocent babe began to play with his beard, and to ſmile upon him; but inſtead of being moved to compaſſion therewith, this barbarous wretch wounded it with his dagger, and then threw it all in gore blood into the river.

At the maſſacre of Meaux in Brie one Quintin Croyer, an elder of the reformed church, ſeeing many of his companions maſſacred before his eyes, kneeled down, praying God to pardon theſe murderers; at which prayer they fell a laughing, and not being able with their daggers to pierce a jerkin of double buff which he wore, and which they were loth to ſpoil (for it was a good booty) they cut aſunder the points, and then gave him five or ſix ſtabs with a dagger into his body: and ſo this good man wounded to death, calling upon God, rendered up his ſpirit into the hands of him that gave it.

Faron Haren, at the ſame time, a man zealouſly affected to religion, who had been ſheriff of the city in the firſt troubles, having by his endeavours chaſed the maſs out of Meax, for a time was mortally hated by theſe ſeditious papiſts; and therefore they were not contented ſimply to kill him, but firſt cut off his noſe, ears, and ſecret parts, then giving him many ſmall thruſts into divers parts of the body, they conſtrained him to and fro among them, as if he had gone thorough the pikes. But being weakened, and not able any longer to hold out, in regard of the blood that iſſued from all the parts of his body, he fell with his face to the ground, and inſtantly calling upon the name of the Lord, received infinite gaſhes and wounds after he was dead.

Perſecution of the faithful at Troys in Campaign.

NEWS coming to Troys of the maſſacre executed at Paris, the greater part of the judges and officers of the king were ſent to the bailiff of Troys, with commandment diligently to make ſearch for all thoſe of the religion, from houſe to houſe, and to impriſon as many as they could meet withal.

In this city there was a merchant called Peter Belin, a man of a turbulent nature. This Belin was at the maſſacre in Paris, on Saint Bartholomew's day; from whence he was ſent with letters from the king, dated the eight and twentieth of Auguſt, to the mayor and ſheriffs of Troys, to cauſe all theſe perſecutions to ceaſe, and the priſoners to be ſet at liberty. On the third of September he came to Troys, with theſe two letters (which had been firſt publiſhed in Paris) with commandment to deliver them to the foreſaid magiſtrates, to be proclaimed there alſo.

But at the firſt entrance into the city, he began to enquire, that all might hear him, whether they had not executed the Hugonots there as they had done at Paris; which was his language thorough the ſtreets till he came home. But even ſome of the papiſts, who were not ſo cruelly minded, demanded of Belin the contents of the king's letters, whereof they had ſome inkling before. But he, like a bedlam ſwelling with choler, ſware that whoſoever ſaid they contained any thing tending to pacification, lyed. Haſtening therefore to the bailiff's houſe at Troys, after he had delivered him the packet, and buzzed ſomewhat in his ear, he put him on to ſee this execution done. Now that the ſame might paſs the better for current, the help of the executioner of Troys was requeſted, whoſe name was Charles.

Yet he ſhewing himſelf more juſt and humane than the reſt, peremptorily refuſed to have his hand in an act tending to ſo great cruelty; anſwering, that it was contrary to his office to execute any man before ſentence of death had firſt been pronounced by the magiſtrates. If they had ſuch ſentence to ſhew againſt any of the priſoners, he was ready to do juſtice; otherwiſe he would not preſume, without a warrant, to bereave any man of his life: and ſo with theſe words he returned home to his houſe.

Now albeit this anſwer, proceeded from ſuch a kind of perſon, whoſe office and cuſtom it was to ſhed blood, might ſomewhat have aſſuaged and taken off the edge of the moſt barbarous tyger in the world; yet the bailiff ſlighting it, was the further enraged. Upon this he ſent for one of the goalers of the priſon who kept thoſe of the religion; but he being ſick of a tertian ague, Martin de Bures was ſent to know his pleaſure.

The bailiff telling him at large what Belin had ſignified to him in private; as alſo, that on a ſudden all the priſoners of the religion muſt be put to death, that ſo the place might be purged of them: this, he ſaid, you muſt not fail to do.

But this de Bures made no haſte to perform his charge, acquainting no man with ought that had paſſed between the bailiff and him; no, not Perennet the keeper, who then lay ſick in his bed.

The next day the bailiff came into the priſon about ſeven of the clock, and calling for Perennet aſked of him with a ſmile, Perennet, is it done? Perennet, knowing nothing more or leſs, aſked him, What? then ſaith the bailiff, Why, are not the priſoners diſpatched? and thereupon was ready with his dagger to have ſtabbed him. But coming a little better to himſelf, he told Perennet what his purpoſe was, and how he was to behave himſelf concerning the execution thereof. At which words this Perennet ſtanding amazed, tho' otherwiſe he was a fellow forward enough of himſelf to commit any outrages againſt the proteſtants, certified the bailiff, that ſuch an inhuman act could not be committed over to him, fearing leſt in time to come juſtice might be followed againſt him by the parents or allies of the priſoners. No, no, ſaid the bailiff, fear not, I will ſtand between you and all harms. Others of the juſtices have conſented thereto beſides myſelf, and would you have better ſecurity than that?

Within a while after, the goaler coming into the court of the priſon, where the priſoners were abroad recreating themſelves, cauſed every one to reſort to his cabbin, becauſe, ſaid he, the bailiff will come by and by, to ſee whether the keepers have done as he commanded them: which they did. Then began theſe poor ſheep to fear they were deſtinated to the ſlaughter, and therefore went preſently to prayers. Perennet inſtantly called his companions about him, reporting to them what the bailiff had given him in charge. Then they all took an oath, to execute the ſame; but approaching nigh to the priſoners, they were ſo ſurpriſed with fear, and their hearts ſo failed them, that they ſtood gazing one upon another, having no courage to act ſuch a barbarous cruelty, and ſo returned to the goaler's lodge, whence they came, without doing any thing.

But inſtead of laying this to heart, as a warning-piece ſent them from above; as if of ſet purpoſe they meant to reſiſt againſt the checks of their own conſciences, they ſent to the tavern for ſixteen pints of the beſt wine, and intoxicating their brains they drew a liſt of all the priſoners; which they delivered to one who was to call them forth in order; and as they came they maſſacred them.

One Meurs was no ſooner in their ſight, but one of them let drive at him with the point of his halbert, redoubling the ſame oft to have killed him, yet could not. The poor man took hold on the point of the halbert, and himſelf pointing it to the ſeat of the heart, cried to the murderer with ſtedfaſt voice, Here, ſoldier, here, right at the heart, right at the heart, and ſo finiſhed this life.

The maſſacre (ſaith my author) being ended, the murderers made a great pit on the back ſide of the chapel of the priſon, whereinto they caſt the bodies one upon another, ſome of them yet breathing. So as one called Maufere lying in the midſt of them, was eſpied to raiſe up himſelf above his fellow martyrs in this pit, upon whom they forthwith throwing earth, as was reported, ſtifled him, being but half dead. The blood ran in ſuch abundance out at the priſon door, and thence through a channel into a river, that it was turned into the colour of blood.

The next day after, this worſhipful bailiff of Troys, that he might apply the plaiſter when the parties were dead, cauſes the king's letters, which he had received before, to be publiſhed in all the corners of the city with ſound of trumpet. The bailiff was preſent in perſon at the publication, and as the notary read the contents thereof to him, he pronounced the ſame jeeringly, and not with a full and audible voice, as matters of ſuch conſequence ought to be read.

One Dechampeaux lord of Bonilli, a worthy counſellor in the city of Orleance was murdered in the following manner: One called Texier came with a ſmall troop to his houſe, bidding himſelf and his company to ſupper with him. Dechampeaux bid them all kindly welcome, making them good cheer, being ignorant of that which had happened at Paris. But ſupper being ended, Texier bade him deliver his purſe. Dechampeaux peaux laughing thereat, thinking that he had been but in jeſt, this cruel and unthankful gueſt with blaſphemous oaths told him in few words what had happened in the city of Paris, and what preparations there was among the Roman catholics of Orleance, to cut off and root out the proteſtants there. Dechampeaux ſeeing there was no time now to conteſt with him, gave money to this thief: who, to requite the courteſy and good entertainment he had had, embrued his hands in the blood of his honeſt neighbour, a man of as good and upright a carriage as was in all the city, and afterwards himſelf with his troop pillaged the whole houſe.

The 26th day of Auguſt following the maſſacrers began the execution about the ramparts in a violent manner; in theſe quarters there inhabited many of the religion. All the night long was heard nothing but ſhooting off of guns and piſtols, forcing open of doors and windows, fearful outcries of the maſſacred, both of men, women, and little children, trampling of horſes, and rumbling of carts, hurrying of dead bodies to and fro; the ſtreet ſwarming with unwonted exclamations of thoſe of the common ſort, with horrible blaſphemies of the murderers, laughing their fill at their furious exploits: ſome crying, Kill them all, and then take the ſpoil; others, Spoil not, but kill all.

On Wedneſday the maſſacre began more fiercely, and ſo continued to the end of the week, not ſparing to break theſe and the like jeſts upon the poor maſſacred: Where is now your God? What is become of all your prayers, and pſalms now? Let your God, whom you called upon, ſave you if he can. Yea, ſome of them, who in times paſt had been profeſſors of the ſame religion, whilſt they were maſſacring the poor innocents, durſt ſing unto them in ſcorn the beginning of the three and fortieth pſalm, which runs, Judge me, O Lord, and plead my cauſe. Others ſtriking them, ſaid, ſing now, Have mercy on me, O God: which language they uſed to this poor people in Paris, and elſewhere. But theſe execrable outrages no way daunted the courage of the faithful from dying ſtedfaſt in the faith.

Touching the multitude of the ſlain, the murderers did not ſtick to vaunt, that in this city they cauſed 18,000 men to periſh: alſo an hundred and fifty women, with a great number of children of nine years old and upward. The manner of their death was, firſt to ſhoot them with piſtols, then to ſtrip them of their cloaths, and either drowning, or elſe burying the dead bodies in pits.

On Tueſday at night certain of this bloody crew came and knocked at the door of one that was a doctor of the civil law, called Taillebous; who opening a caſement, and underſtanding that they had ſomewhat to ſay to him, came down immediately, and opened the door unto them. At the firſt greeting they told him he muſt die. Whereupon he fell to prayer, and that with ſuch conſtancy and affection, that the maſſacrers being aſtoniſhed, and by a ſecret celeſtial power reſtrained, contented themſelves only with taking his purſe, in which there were fifteen crowns, and ſo left him, offering him no more violence.

The day following certain ſcholars reſorting to his lodging, requeſted of him that they might ſee his library, into which having brought them, one aſked this book of him, and another another, which he gave them. At length they told him they were not as yet ſatisfied, their purpoſe being to kill him. He proſtrating himſelf upon the ground, and having ended his prayer, willed them to kill him there, but they forced him out of his own houſe from one place to another, and at length knocked him down.

A rich burgeſs of the city, called Nicholas Bougars Sieur de Nove, a man of ſingular worth, and highly eſteemed of all, was at that time deadly ſick. Some of the murderers came into his chamber with a purpoſe to kill him: but ſeeing him in that caſe ſpared him: yet finding there Noel Chaperon, apothecary, who brought him phyſic, they cut off one of his arms, then drew him into the open market-place, where they made an end of him.

The next day there came one to the lodging of him that was ſick, who was wont heretofore to viſit him. Now as he was entering in, the mother of the ſick party at the door going unto maſs, and coming up into the chamber, he ſtabbed the ſaid ſick man with a dagger in many places, and ſo killed a dying man. Then with all ſilence, as if he had done no ſuch act, wiping his dagger, he went down the ſtairs again, and meeting one at the door who came to viſit him that was ſick, this fellow ſaluting him, paſſed along by him, without any change either in his behaviour or countenance.

Francis Stample, a rich merchant, was threatened to have his throat cut preſently, if he gave not the murderers money: but having none about him, he wrote a letter to his wife, to ſend him his ranſom; he had no ſooner ſealed the letter, but the murderers deprived him thereof, and his life together, laughing at what they had done. And though they got from his window a round ſum of money, yet could ſhe not obtain at their hands the body of her dead huſband. And theſe are the fruits of popery.

Among thoſe that confeſſed the name of Jeſus Chriſt, Francis le Boſſu, a merchant, with his two ſons, well deſerve our notice: for whilſt he trampled in the blood of his brethren, being beſmeared therewith, and ſpirting as it were in his face, he encouraged his children to take their death willingly and patiently, uſing this ſpeech, "Children, we are not to learn now that it hath always been the portion of believers, to be hated, cruelly uſed, and devoured by unbelievers: as Chriſt's ſilly ſheep of ravening wolves: if we ſuffer with Chriſt, we ſhall alſo reign with him. Let not theſe drawn ſwords terrify us, they will be but as a bridge whereby we ſhall paſs over out of a miſerable life, into immortal bleſſedneſs. We have breathed and lived long enough among the wicked, let us now go, and live with our God; let us joyfully march after this company, which is here gone before us, and let us make way for them which ſhall follow after.

When he ſaw the murderers come, he claſped his arms about his two ſons, and they likewiſe embraced their father; as if the father meant to be a buckler to his children, and the children, as if by the bond of nature (which binds them to defend his life from whence they received it) they meant to ward off the blows which were coming towards their father, tho' with the loſs of their own lives, who, when the maſſacre was ended, were all three found dead, thus embracing one another.

Now after this furious aſſault, theſe impudent creatures went up and down the city, ſhewing their white doublets all beſprinked with blood; boaſting, that ſome had killed an hundred, ſome more, ſome leſs.

As the multitude were dragging the dead bodies to the river, an apothecary came and informed them, that money might be made of the greaſe that was taken out of their bodies. Then were the moſt corpulent bodies preſently ſought for, which when they had ripped up, a great quantity of that commodity being gotten thence, was ſold by theſe merchants for three ſhillings the pound.

Thoſe of Dauphine, of Languedoc, and Provence, were amazed to ſee ſo many bodies floating upon the water, ſome diſmembered, others faſtened together with long poles, others lying on the ſhore, ſome having their eyes put out, others their noſes, ears and hands cut off, ſtabbed with daggers in every part of their body, ſo as ſome among them had no human ſhape remaining. Yea, ſo great a number of theſe mangled corpſes preſented themſelves on the port of Tournon, that the men and women of the place began to make an outcry, as if the enemies had been at their gates.

Not many months after, when all theſe bloody tragedies were ended, the pope ſent cardinal Urſin as legate to the king, who was received with great ſolemnity at Lyons. Now having heard maſs at Saint John's church, and returning by the ſame door which he went in at, the greateſt number of the maſſacrers attended his coming there, and all kneeled down for his abſolution. But the legate not knowing the reaſon of it, one of the principal agents told him, that they were thoſe who had been the actors in the maſſacre. When the legate perceived that, he abſolved them all with making the ſign of the croſs.

As ſoon as the maſſacre was begun at Paris, a gentleman of Paris, called Monſoreau, obtained a paſſport with letters to maſſacre thoſe of the religion at Angiers. Who, being diſappointed of his prey in one place, came to the lodging of a reverend and learned miniſter, called Mr. John Maſon, ſirnamed de Launay, ſieur of Riviere. Meeting his wife at his entrance into the houſe, he ſaluted her, and kiſſed her, as it is the manner in France, eſpecially among the courtiers, and aſked her where her huſband was? ſhe anſwered him, that he was walking in his garden; and then directed him the way unto him.

Monſorea having lovingly embraced la Riviere, ſaid unto him, Do you know wherefore I am come? the king hath commanded me to kill you forthwith, and hath given me expreſs charge to do it, as you ſhall ſee by his letters. After which words he ſhewed him a piſtol ready charged. Riviere replied, That he knew not wherein he had offended the king; but ſeeing, ſaith he, you ſeek my life, give me a little leave to cry to God for mercy, and to recommend my ſpirit into his hands.

Having made a ſhort prayer, he willingly preſented his body to the murderer, who ſhot him with his piſtol, and he immediately died.

And the miniſter's wife was ſoon after drowned with nine others.

Six thouſand were murdered at Roan in much the ſame manner.

Now touching the prince of Conde, the king propounded to him three things; either to go to maſs, to die, or elſe perpetual priſon; and therefore to bethink himſelf well which of the three he liked beſt. The prince anſwered, as it is reported, that by God's grace he would never chuſe the firſt; as for the two latter, he referred himſelf to the king's pleaſure.

About three hundred were barbarouſly murdered at Tholouſe, and after taking all their goods, they ſtripped them naked, and expoſed them to public view for two days, and then they threw them in heaps into great pits. There were certain counſellors, who after they were maſſacred, were hung up in their long gowns upon a great elm which was in the court of the palace.

The maſſacre at Bourdeaux was begun and carried on much in the ſame manner of thoſe before mentioned. But their miniſters found means to eſcape, hiding themſelves in the rocks and marſhes, till they had an opportunity to take ſhipping for England.

One thing here may be noted: The houſe of a counſellor in parliament was forced open, pillaged and ſpoiled, and himſelf cruelly murdered. His clerk ſeeing his maſter about to be maſſacred, embraced him, and comforted him: and being aſked, whether he were of the religion, he anſwered yea, and would die with his maſter for the ſame. And they were ſlain in one another's arms.

A deacon of the reformed church named du Tour, an old man, who in the days of his ignorance had been a prieſt in the popiſh church, being ſick in his bed, was haled forth into the open ſtreet; of whom it being demanded, whether he would go to maſs, and thereby ſave his life; he freely anſwered, no, eſpecially now drawing ſo near his end, both in regard of his years, and grievous ſickneſs: I hope, ſaid he, I ſhall not ſo far forget the eternal ſalvation of my ſoul, as for fear of death to prolong this life for a few days; for ſo I ſhould buy a ſhort term of life at too dear a rate They hearing him ſay ſo, murdered him inſtantly.

It was lamentable to ſee the poor proteſtants wandering up and down, not knowing where to ſave their lives: ſome were rejected of their own parents and kinsfolks, who ſhut their doors againſt them, pretending as if they knew them not; others were betrayed and delivered up by thoſe to whoſe truſt they had committed themſelves: many were ſaved even by prieſts and others, from whom a man would have expected no ſuch ſecurity. Some were ſaved by their very enemies, whoſe hearts abhorred ſuch deteſtable outrages.

All the city was full of terrors and horrible threats againſt thoſe of this religion, ſaying, that the king's commandment was, that he would not have ſo much as one of them left in his kingdom. And if any refuſed to go to maſs, that an hole ſhould be digged for him in the earth, in which he ſhould be buried without any more ado.

The judgment of God fell not long after upon one of theſe maſſacrers called Vincent; he fell dangerouſly ſick, but in the end recovering again, and as he thought being in good health, told ſome of his friends that he felt his arms ſtrong enough to handle his coutlax as well as ever he had done. But within a while after he was overtaken by the hand of God, with ſuch a flux of bleeding at his noſe, as could not be reſtrained nor diverted by any of the remedies that were then uſed. It was an hideous ſight to ſee him ſtill bowing his head over a baſon full of blood, which without ceaſing iſſued out of his noſe and mouth, even until his laſt gaſp.

Another was taken with ſuch a ſwelling in all the parts of his body, that there was ſcarcely to be diſcerned in him the form of a man, and ſo continued ſwelling till at the length he burſt in ſunder.

Thus we have taken a view of the extreme afflictions of the reformed churches in many parts of France, wherein within a few weeks nigh thirty thouſand were put to death.

In the year 1573, the place whither the faithful fled for refuge, was aſſailed by open war; namely, Sancerre, the hiſtory whereof you have here in a ſhort view.

Sancerre being compaſſed about with irreconcileable enemies, from about the beginning of April; the want of victuals having cauſed them to gather together all the aſſes and mules they had in the city, they were eaten up in leſs than a month.

Then they came to horſes, cats, rats, moles, mice and dogs. After theſe were ſpent, they fell to eat ox and cow-hides, ſheep-ſkins, parchment, old ſhoes, bullocks and horſe-hoofs, horns, and lanthorns, ropes, and horſe-harneſs, leather girdles, &c.

In the end of June the third part of the beſieged had not bread to eat. Such as could get hemp-ſeed, ground it, or ſtamped it in mortars, and made bread of it, the like they did with all ſorts of herbs mingling the ſame with bran if they had it. There they eat meal of chaff, nut-ſhells, and of ſlate, excrements of horſes, and men, yea, the offal which lay in the ſtreets was not ſpared.

The nine and twentieth of July, a poor man and his wife were executed for having eaten the head, brains, and entrails of a young child about three years old which died of hunger; having made ready the other parts to eat at another meal. An old woman who lodged in their houſe, eating a part of this mourful diet, died in priſon, within a few hours after her impriſonment.

They were found guilty of other offences; but this aggravated the ſame the more. All children under twelve years of age died. It was lamentable to hear the pitiful voices uttered by poor parents, for the miſery wherein wherein their eyes beheld their languiſhing and dying in-infants.

To which purpoſe you may take notice here of a memorable accident. A boy of ten years old, being ready to yield up the ghoſt, ſeeing his father and mother weeping over him (whoſe arms and legs when they handled, felt as if they had been dried ſticks) ſaid unto them, Wherefore weep ye thus, in ſeeing me famiſhed to death? Mother, ſaith he, I aſk you no bread, I know you have none: but ſeeing it is God's will I muſt die this death, let us be thankful for it. Did not the holy man Lazarus die of famine? have I not read it in my bible? In uttering theſe with the like ſpeeches he yielded up the ghoſt the thirtieth day of July.

That all the people died not of famine in the end of this month, it was by reaſon of certain horſes which were reſerved for ſervice if need ſhould be, and ſix kine which were left to give milk for the ſuſtenance of young infants. Theſe beaſts were killed, and their fleſh ſold for the relief of ſuch as were living, with a little corn, which by ſtealth ſome brought into the city; ſo that a pound of wheat was ſold for half a crown.

There died by ſight in Sancerre but eighty-four perſons, but of the famine more than five hundred. Many ſoldiers getting forth as they could out of the city, flying from the famine, chooſe rather to die by the ſword of the enemy; whereof ſome were ſlain, others impriſoned, and the reſt put to death by the executioner.

But when all help of man failed, the king having ſworn that he would make them eat up one another, the King of kings delivered them by his wonderful providence. For at this inſtant the ambaſſadors from Poland came into France to accept the duke of Anjou for their king, at whoſe intreaty (which could not well be denied) poor Sancerre, more than half famiſhed, was now ſet at liberty by raiſing the ſiege, who otherwiſe were determined to leave their bones there, rather than to yield themſelves into their enemies hands, in regard they had often threatened them with a general maſſacre. Whereas now by the king's appointment they were permitted to paſs out of the city armed; if any would tarry, that they ſhould not be moleſted: having liberty granted them to diſpoſe of their affairs, as they pleaſed, with promiſe of conſerving the honour and chaſtities as well of virgins, as women, &c.

There alſo died in the ſiege of Rochel, October 20, 1628, ſixteen thouſand perſons, the reſt enduring a world of miſeries; moſt of their food being hides, leather, and old gloves: other proviſions being very ſcarce, were at an exceſſive rate, viz.

A buſhel of wheat, twenty pound; a pound of bread, twenty ſhillings; a quarter of mutton, ſix pound odd money; a pound of butter, thirty ſhillings; an egg, eight ſhillings; an ounce of ſugar, half a crown; a dry fiſh, twenty ſhillings; a pint of wine, twenty ſhillings; a pound of grapes, three ſhillings; a pint of milk, thirty ſhillings.

Alſo it is reported, that through the famine, young maids of fourteen or ſixteen years of age did look like women of an hundred years old. The famine was ſuch, that the poor people would cut off the buttocks of the dead as they lay in the church-yard unburied. All the Engliſh that came out looked like anatomies. They lived two months with nothing but cow-hides and goat-ſkins boiled; the dogs, cats, mice and frogs being all ſpent.

A brief Diſcourſe of the great Preparations of the Spaniards in order to invade England, in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

THE duke of Parma in Flanders, by command of the Spaniards, built ſhips, and a great company of ſmall broad veſſels, each one able to tranſport thirty horſe, with bridges fitted for them ſeverally; and hired mariners from the eaſt part of Germany, and provided long pieces of wood, ſharpened at the end, and covered with iron, with hooks on the one ſide, and twenty thouſand veſſels, with an huge number of faggots, and placed an army ready in Flanders, of one hundred and three companies of foot, and four thouſand horſemen. Among theſe ſeven hundred Engliſh vagabonds, who were had of all others in moſt contempt. Neither was Stanly reſpected or heard, who was ſet over the Engliſh, nor Weſtmoreland, nor any other who offered their help: but for their unfaithfulneſs to their own country were ſhut out from all conſultations, and as men unanimouſly rejected with deteſtation. And becauſe pope Sixtus the fifth in ſuch a caſe would not be wanting, he ſent cardinal Alan into Flanders, and renewed the bulls declaratory of pope Pius the fifth, and Gregory the thirteenth. He excommunicateth and depoſeth queen Elizabeth, abſolveth her ſubjects from all allegiance, and, as if it had been againſt the Turks and infidels, he ſet forth in print a conceit, wherein he beſtowed plenary indulgences, out of the treaſure of the church, beſides a million of gold, or ten hundred thouſand ducats, to be diſtributed (the one half in hand, the reſt when either England, or ſome famous haven therein ſhould be won), upon all them that would join their help againſt England. By which means the marquiſs of Burgaw, of the houſe of Auſtria, the duke of Paſtrana, Armady duke of Savoy, Veſpaſian, Gonzaga, John Medicis, and divers other noblemen were drawn into theſe wars.

Queen Elizabeth, that ſhe might not be ſurpriſed unawares, prepared as great a navy as ſhe could, and with ſingular care and providence made all things ready neceſſary for war. And ſhe herſelf, who was ever moſt judicious in diſcerning of men's wits and aptneſs, and moſt happy in making choice, when ſhe made it out of her own judgment, and not at the direction of others, deſigned the beſt and moſt ſerviceable to each ſeveral employment. Over the whole navy ſhe appointed the lord admiral Charles Howard, in whom ſhe repoſed much truſt; and ſent him to the weſt part of England, where captain Drake, whom ſhe made vice-admiral, joined with him. She commanded Henry Seimor, the ſecond ſon to the duke of Somerſet, to watch upon the Belgick ſhore with forty Engliſh and Dutch ſhips, that the duke of Parma might not come out with his forces. Albeit ſome were of opinion, that the enemy was to be expected and ſet upon by land forces, according as it was upon deliberation reſolved, in the time of Henry the eighth, when the French brought a great navy on the Engliſh ſhore.

For the land fight, there were placed on the ſouth ſhores twenty thouſand: and two armies beſides were muſtered of the choiceſt men for war. The one of theſe, which conſiſted of one thouſand horſe, twenty-two thouſand foot, was the earl of Leiceſter ſet over, and camped at Tilbury on the ſide of the Thames: for the enemy was reſolved firſt to ſet upon London. The other army was governed by the lord Hunſdon, conſiſting of thirty-four thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, to guard the queen.

The lord Grey, Sir Frances Knolles, Sir John Norris, Sir Richard Bingham, Sir Roger Williams, men famouſly known for military experience, were choſen to confer of the land fight. Theſe thought fit that all thoſe places ſhould be fortified, with men and munition, which were commodious to land in, either out of Spain or out of Flanders, as Milford haven, Falmouth, Plymouth, Portland, the Iſle of Wight, Portſmouth, the open ſide of Kent called the Downs, the Thames mouth, Harwich, Yarmouth, Hull, &c. That trained ſoldiers through all the maritime provinces ſhould meet upon warning given, to defend theſe places, that they ſhould, by their beſt means, hinder the enemy to take land; and if they did happen to take land, then they were to deſtroy the fruits of the country all about, and ſpoil every thing that might be of any uſe to the enemy, that ſo he might find no more victuals than what he brought upon his ſoldiers with him. And that by continual alarms the enemy ſhould find no reſt day or night. But they ſhould not try any battle, until divers captains were met together with their companies. That one captain might be named in every ſhire which might command.

Two years before, the duke of Parma conſidering how hard a matter it was to end the Belgick war, ſo long as it was continually nouriſhed and ſupported with aid from the queen, he moved for a treaty of peace, by the means of Sir James Croft one of the privy council, a man deſirous of peace, and Andrew Loe a Dutchman, and profeſſed that the Spaniard had delegated authority to him for this purpoſe. But the queen fearing that the friendſhip between her and the confederate princes, might be diſſolved, and that ſo they might ſecretly be drawn to the Spaniard; ſhe deferred that treaty for ſome time. But now, that the wars on both ſides prepared might be turned away, ſhe was content to treat of peace; but ſo, as ſtill holding the weapons in her hand.

For this purpoſe in February delegates were ſent into Flanders, the earl of Darby, the lord Cobham, Sir James Croft, doctor Dale, and doctor Rogers. Theſe were received with all humanity on the duke's behalf, and they preſently ſent Dr. Dale to him, that a place might be appointed for their treating, and that they might ſee the authority delegated to him by the Spaniſh king. He appointed the place near to Oſtend, not in Oſtend, which then was holden of Engliſh againſt the king. His authority delegated he promiſed then to ſhew, when they were once met together. He wiſhed them to make good ſpeed in the buſineſs, leſt ſomewhat might fall out in the mean time which might trouble the motions of peace. Richardotus ſpake ſomewhat more plainly, That he knew not what in this interim ſhould be done againſt England.

Not long after, Dr. Rogers was ſent to the prince, by an expreſs commandment from the queen, to know the truth, whether the Spaniard had reſolved to invade England, which he and Richardotus ſeemed to ſignify. He affirmed, that he did not ſo much as think of the invaſion of England, when he wiſhed that the buſineſs might proceed with ſpeed: and was in a manner offended with Richardotus, who denied that ſuch words fell from him.

The twelfth of April the count Aremberg, Champigny, Richardotus, Dr. Maeſius, and Garnier, delegated from the prince of Parma, met with the Engliſh, and yielded to them the honour both in walking and ſitting. And when they affirmed that the duke had full authority to treat of peace, the Engliſh moved, that firſt a truce might be made; which they denied; alledging that that thing muſt needs be hurtful to the Spaniard, who had for ſix months maintained a great army, which might not be diſmiſſed upon a truce, but upon an abſolute peace. The Engliſh urged, that a truce was promiſed before they came into Flanders. The Spaniard againſt that held, That ſix months ſince a truce was promiſed; which they granted, but was not admitted. Neither was it in the queen's power to undertake a truce for Holland and Zealand, who daily attempted hoſtility. The Engliſh moved inſtantly, that the truce might be general for all the queen's territories, and for the kingdom of Scotland: but they would have it but for four Dutch towns which were in the queen's hands; that is, Oſtend, Fluſhing, Bergen-up-Zoom, and the Briel; and theſe only during the treating, and twenty days after; and that in the mean time it might be lawful for the queen to invade Spain, or for the Spaniard to invade England, either from Spain or Flanders. At laſt, when the Engliſh could not obtain an abſtinence from arms, and could by no means ſee the charter by which the duke of Parma was authoriſed to treat of peace; they propoſed theſe things, that the ancient leagues between the kings of England and the dukes of Burgundy might be renewed and confirmed; that all the Dutch might fully enjoy their own privileges; that with freedom of conſcience they might ſerve God; that the Spaniſh and foreign ſoldiers might be put out of Dutchland, that neither the Dutch nor their neighbouring nations might fear them. If theſe things might be granted, the queen would come to equal conditions concerning the towns which now ſhe held (that all might know, that ſhe took up arms not for her own gain, but for the neceſſary defence both of herſelf and of the Dutch), ſo that the money which is owning therefore be repaid. To which they anſwered, That for renewing the old leagues there ſhould be no difficulty, when they might have a friendly conference of that thing. That concerning the privileges of the Dutch, there was no cauſe why foreign princes ſhould take care, which privileges were moſt favourably granted not only to provinces and towns reconciled, but even to ſuch as by force of arms are brought into ſubjection. That foreign ſoldiers were held upon urgent neceſſity, when as Holland, England, and France were all in arms.

Touching thoſe towns taken from the king of Spain, and the repaying of the money, they anſwered, That the Spaniard might demand as many myriads of crowns to be from the queen repaid him, as the Belgick war hath coſt him ſince the time that ſhe hath favoured and protected the Dutch againſt him.

At this time Dr. Dale by the queen's command, going to the duke of Parma, gently expoſtulated with him touching a book printed there, ſet out lately by cardinal Allen, wherein he exhorts the nobles and people of England and Ireland to join themſelves to the king of Spain's forces, under the conduct of the prince of Parma, for the execution of the ſentence of pope Sixtus V. againſt the queen, declared by his bull; in which ſhe is declared an heretic, illegitimate, cruel againſt Mary queen of Scots, and her ſubjects were commanded to help Parma againſt her: for at that time a great number of thoſe bulls and books were printed at Antwerp to be diſperſed through England. The duke denied that he had ſeen ſuch a bull or book, neither would he do any thing by the pope's authority; as for his own king, him he muſt obey. Yet he ſaid, he ſo obſerved the queen for her princely virtues, that after the king of Spain, he offered all ſervice to her. That he had perſuaded the king of Spain to yield to this treaty of peace, which is more profitable for Engliſh than Spaniſh: for if they ſhould be overcome they would eaſily repair their loſs, but if you be overcome, the kingdom is loſt.

To whom Dale replied, That our queen was ſufficiently furniſhed with forces to defend the kingdom. That a kingdom will not eaſily be gotten by the fortune of one battle, ſeeing the king of Spain, in ſo long a war is not yet able to recover his ancient patrimony in the Netherlands.

Well, quoth the duke, be it ſo, theſe things are in God's hands.

After this the delegates contended among themſelves by mutual replications, weaving and unweaving the ſame web. The Engliſh were earneſt in this, That freedom of religion might be granted at leaſt for two years to the confederate princes. They anſwered, That as the king of Spain had not intreated that for Engliſh catholics; ſo they hoped the queen in her wiſdom would not intreat any thing of the king of Spain which might ſtand againſt his honour, his oath, and his conſcience.

Then they demanded the money due from the ſtates of Brabant; it was anſwered, That the money was lent without the king's knowledge: but let the account be taken, how much the money was, and how much the king hath ſpent in theſe wars, and then it may appear who ſhould look for repayment.

Thus the Engliſh of ſet purpoſe were from time to time driven off, until the Spaniſh fleet was come near the

Engliſh

Engliſh ſhore, and the noiſe of guns were heard from ſea. Then had they leave to depart, and were by the delegates honourably brought to the borders near to Calais. The duke of Parma had in the mean time brought all his forces to the ſea ſhore.

Thus this conference came to nothing; undertaken by the queen, as the wiſer then thought to avert the Spaniſh fleet; continued by the Spaniards that he might oppreſs the queen, being as he ſuppoſed unprovided, and not expecting the danger. So both of them tried to uſe time to their beſt advantages.

In ſhort, the Spaniſh fleet, well furniſhed with men, munition, engines, and all warlike preparations, the beſt indeed that was ever ſeen upon the ocean, called by that arrogant title, The Invincible Armada, conſiſting of one hundred and thirty ſhips, wherein there were in all nineteen thouſand two hundred and ninety: mariners eight thouſand three hundred and fifty; chained rowers eleven thouſand and eighty; great ordnance eleven thouſand ſix hundred and thirty. The chief commander was Perezius Guſmannus, duke of Medina Sidonia; and under him Joannes Martinus Ricaldus, a man of great experience in ſea affairs.

The 30th of May they looſed out of the river Tagus, and purpoſing to hold their courſe to the Groin, in Gallicia, they were beaten and ſcattered by a tempeſt: three gallies, by the help of David Gwin, an Engliſh ſervant, and by the perfidiouſneſs of Turks which rowed, were carried away into France. The fleet with much ado after ſome days came to the groin and ſome harbours near adjoining. The report was, that the fleet was ſo ſhaken with this tempeſt, that the queen was perſuaded, that ſhe was not to expect that fleet this year. And Sir Francis Walſingham, ſecretary, wrote to the lord admiral, that he might ſend back four of the greateſt ſhips, as if the war had been ended. But the lord admiral did not eaſiy give credit to that report; yet with a gentle anſwer entreated him to believe nothing haſtily in ſo important a matter: as alſo that he might be permitted to keep thoſe ſhips with him which he had, though it were upon his own charges. And finding a favourable wind, turned ſails towards Spain, to ſurpriſe the enemies ſhaken ſhips in their harbours. When he was not far from the ſhore of Spain, the wind turning, and he being charged to defend the Engliſh ſhore, fearing that the enemies unſeen might by the ſame wind be driven to England, he returned unto Plymouth.

Now with the ſame wind, the twelfth of July the duke of Medina with his fleet departed from the Groin. And after a few days he ſent Rodericus Telius into Flanders, to advertiſe the duke of Parma, giving him warning that the fleet was approaching, and therefore he was to make himſelf ready. For Medina his commiſſion was to join himſelf with the ſhips and ſoldiers of Parma; and under the protection of his fleet, to bring them into England, and to land his land forces upon the Thames ſide.

The ſixteenth day (ſaith the relator) there was a great calm, and a thick cloud was upon the ſea till noon: then the north wind blowing roughly, and again the weſt wind till midnight, and after that the eaſt, the Spaniſh navy was ſcattered, and hardly gathered together until they came within the ſight of England the nineteenth day of July. Upon which day the lord admiral was certified by Flemming (who had been a pyrate) that the Spaniſh fleet had entered into the Engliſh ſea, which the mariners call the channel, and was deſcried near to the Lizard. The lord admiral brought forth the Engliſh fleet into the ſea, but not without great difficulty, by the ſkill, labour, and alacrity of the ſoldiers and mariners, every one labouring; yea the lord admiral himſelf put his hand to this work.

The next day the Engliſh fleet viewed the Spaniſh fleet coming along with towers like caſtles in heighth, her front crooked like the faſhion of the moon, the horns of the front were extended one from the other about ſeven miles, or as ſome ſay, eight miles aſunder, ſailing with the labour of the winds, the ocean, as it were, groaning under it; their ſail was but ſlow, and yet at full ſail before the wind. The Engliſh were willing to let them hold on their courſe, and when they were paſſed by, got behind them, and ſo got the help of the wind.

Upon the one and twentieth of July, the lord admiral of England ſent a pinnace before, called the Defiance, to denounce the battle by ſhooting off pieces. And being himſelf in the Arch-Royal (the Engliſh pretorian ſhip or admiral) he ſet upon a ſhip which he took to be the Spaniſh admiral, but it was the ſhip of Alfonſus Leva. Upon that he beſtowed much ſhot. Preſently Drake, Hawkins, and Forbiſher came in upon the Spaniſh hindmoſt ſhips, which Ricaldus governed. Upon theſe they thundered. Ricaldus laboured as much as in him lay to ſtay his men, who fled away in their navy, until his ſhip, beaten and much battered with many ſhot, hardly recovered the fleet. Then the duke Medina gathered together his diſſipated fleet, and ſetting up more ſail, held on their courſe. Indeed they could do no other, for the Engliſh had gotten the advantage of the wind, and their ſhips were much more nimble, and ready with incredible celerity to come upon the enemy with a full courſe, and then to turn and return, and be on every ſide at their pleaſure. After a long fight, and that each of them had taken ſome trial, as of their own courage, ſo of the Spaniards alſo, the lord admiral thought good not to continue the ſame any longer, in regard that forty ſhips were then abſent, which at that inſtant was ſcarce drawn out of Plymouth haven.

The night following, Saint Katherine, a Spaniſh ſhip, being ſadly torn in the battle, was received into the midſt of the navy to be mended. Here a great Cantabrian ſhip of Oquenda, wherein was the treaſurer of the camp, by force of gunpowder took fire, yet it was quenched in time by the ſhips that came to help her. Of theſe that came to help the fired ſhip, one was a galeon, in which was Petrus Waldez; the fore-maſt of the galeon was caught in the tackling of another ſhip, and broken. This was taken by Drake, who ſent Waldez to Darmouth, and a great ſum of money, viz. fifty-five thouſand ducats, which he diſtributed amongſt the ſoldiers. This Waldez coming into Drake's preſence, kiſſed his hand, and told him they had all reſolved to die, if they had not been ſo happy as to have fallen into his hands, whom he knew to be noble. That night he was appointed to ſet forth light, but neglected it; and ſome German merchant ſhips coming by that night, he thinking them to be enemies, followed them ſo far, that the Engliſh navy reſted all night, when they could ſee no light ſet forth. Neither did he nor the reſt of the navy find the admiral until the next day at even. The admiral all the night proceeding with the Bear and the Mary Roſe carefully followed the Spaniards with watchfulneſs. The duke was buſied in ordering his navy. Alfonſus Leva was commanded to join the firſt and laſt companies. Every ſhip had his ſtation aſſigned according to that preſcribed form which was appointed in Spain; it was preſent death to forſake his ſtation. This done, he ſent Gliclius an Anceani to Parma, which might declare to him in what caſe they were, and left that Cantabrian ſhip of Oquenda to the wind and ſea, having taken out the money and mariners, and put them in other ſhips. Yet it ſeemeth he had not care of all: for that ſhip the ſame day with fifty mariners and ſoldiers lamed, and half burnt, fell into the hands of the Engliſh, and was carried to Weymouth.

The three and twentieth of the ſame month, the Spaniards, having a favourable north wind, turned ſails upon the Engliſh; the Engliſh being much readier in the uſe of their ſhips, ſet about a compaſs for the wind, having gotten advantage of the wind, they came to the fight on both ſides. They fought awhile confuſedly with variable ſucceſs: whilſt on the one ſide the Engliſh with great courage delivered the London ſhips which were incloſed about by the Spaniards: on the other ſide the Spaniards by valour freed Ricaldus from the extreme danger he was in: great were the effulminations which by beating of ordnances were heard this day. But the loſs (by the good providence of God) fell upon the Spaniſh ſide, their ſhips being ſo high that the ſhot went over our Engliſh ſhips; and the Engliſh having ſuch a fair mark at their taller ſhips, never ſhot in vain. Amidſt which encounters, Cock an Engliſhman, being caught indeed in the midſt of the Spaniſh ſhips, could not be recovered, but periſhed, howbeit with great honour he revenged himſelf. Thus a long time the Engliſh ſhips with great agility were ſometimes upon the Spaniards giving them the one ſide, and then the other, and preſently were off again, and ſtill took the ſea, to make themſelves ready to come in again. Whereas the Spaniſh ſhips being of great burthen were troubled and hindered, and ſtood to be marks for the Engliſh bullets. For all that, the admiral would not admit the Engliſh to come to board their ſhips, becauſe they had a full army in their ſhips, which he had not; their ſhips were many in number, and greater, and higher, that if they had come to grapple, as ſome would have had it, the Engliſh, being much lower than the Spaniſh ſhips, muſt needs have had the worſt of them that fought from the higher ſhips. And if the Engliſh had been overcome, the loſs would have been greater than the victory could have been: for ours being overcome, would have put the kingdom in hazard.

The 24th day of July they gave over fighting on both ſides. The admiral ſent ſome ſmall barks to the Engliſh ſhore, to ſupply the proviſion; and divided all his navy into four ſquadrons; the firſt whereof was under his own government; the next Drake governed; the third Hawkins; the laſt Forbiſher. And he appointed out of every ſquadron certain little ſhips, which on divers ſides might ſet upon the Spaniards in the night; but a ſudden calm took them, and ſo that advice was without effect.

The 25th day, Saint Anne, the galeon of Portugal, not being able to hold courſe with the reſt, was ſet upon by ſome ſmall Engliſh ſhips. To whoſe aid came in Leva, and Didacus Telles Enriques, with three galeaſſes: which the admiral and lord Thomas Howard eſpying, made in againſt the galeaſſes (the calm was ſo great that they were drawn in by boats with cords) and did ſo beat upon the galeaſſes with great ſhot, that with much ado, and with great loſs, they hardly recovered the galeon. The Spaniards reported, that the admiral of Spain was that day in the hindmoſt company, and being come nearer the Engliſh ſhips than before, was ſore beaten with the Engliſh great ordnance, many men ſlain in her, her great maſt overthrown. And after that the admiral of Spain, accompanied with Ricaldus and others, did ſet upon the Engliſh admiral, who by the benefit of the wind ſuddenly turning, eſcaped. The Spaniards hold on their courſe again, and ſend to the duke of Parma, that with all ſpeed he ſhould join his ſhips with the king's fleet. Theſe things the Engliſh knew not, who write, that they had ſtricken the lanthorn from one of the Spaniſh ſhips, the ſtem from another, and had ſore beaten the third, doing much harm to her. That the Non-Parigly, and the Mary Roſe fought awhile with the Spaniards; and the Triumph being in danger, other ſhips came in good time to help her.

The next day the lord admiral knighted the lord Thomas Howard, the lord Sheffield, Roger Townſend, John Hawkins, and Martin Forbiſher, for their valour well employed in the laſt fight. After this they reſolved not to ſet upon the enemy until they came in the ſtraight of Calais, where Henry Seimor, and William Winter ſtaid for their coming. Thus with the fair gale the Spaniſh fleet went forward, and the Engliſh followed. This great Spaniſh Armada was ſo far from being eſteemed invincible in the opinion of the Engliſh, that many young men and gentlemen, in hope to be partakers of a famous victory over the Spaniards, provided ſhips of their own charges, and joined themſelves to the Engliſh fleet; among whom were the earls of Eſſex, of Northumberland, of Cumberland, Thomas and Robert Cecil, Henry Brooks, William Hatton, Robert Cary, Ambroſe Willoughby, Thomas Gerard, Arthur Gorge, and other gentlemen of good note and quality.

The 27th day, at even, the Spaniards caſt anchor near to Calais, being admoniſhed by their ſkilful ſeamen, that if they went any further, they might be endangered by force of that tide to be driven into the north ocean. Near to them ſtood the Engliſh admiral with his fleet within a great gun's ſhot. To the admiral Seimor and Winter now join their ſhips; ſo that now there were an hundred and forty ſhips in the Engliſh fleet, able and well furniſhed for fight, for ſail, and to turn which way was needful: and yet there were but fifteen of theſe which bore the burden of the battle, and repulſed the enemy. The Spaniard, as often he had done before, ſo now with great earneſtneſs ſent to the duke of Parma to ſend forty flie boats, without which they could not fight with the Engliſh, becauſe of the greatneſs and ſlowneſs of their own ſhips, and the agility of the Engliſh ſhips: and intreating him by all means now to come to ſea with his army, which army was now to be protected as it were under the wings of the Spaniſh Armada until they took land in England.

But the duke was unprovided, and could not come out at an inſtant. The broad ſhips with flat bottoms being then full of chinks muſt be mended. Victuals wanted muſt be provided. The mariners being long kept againſt their wills, began to ſhrink away. The ports of Dunkirk and Newport, by which he muſt bring his army to the ſea, were now ſo beſet with the ſtrong ſhips of Holland and Zealand, which were furniſhed with great and ſmall munition, that he was not able to come to ſea, unleſs he would come upon his own apparent deſtruction, and caſt himſelf and his men wilfully into a headlong danger. Yet he omitted nothing that might be done, being a man eager and induſtrious, and inflamed with a deſire of overcoming England.

But queen Elizabeth's providence and care prevented both the diligence of this man, and the credulous hope of the Spaniard: for by her command the next day the admiral took eight of their worſt ſhips, charging the ordnance therein up to the mouth with ſmall ſhot, nails, and ſtones, and dreſſed them with wild-fire, pitch, and roſin, and filled them full of brimſtone, and ſome other matter fit for fire, and theſe being ſet on fire by the management of Young and Prowſe, were ſecretly in the night, by the help of the wind, ſet full upon the Spaniſh fleet, which on Sunday the 7th of Auguſt they ſet in among them as they lay at anchor.

When the Spaniards ſaw them come near, the flame giving light all over the ſea, they ſuppoſing thoſe ſhips, beſides the danger of fire, to have been alſo furniſhed with deadly engines, to make horrible deſtruction among them; lifting up a moſt hideous cry, ſome pull up anchors, ſome for haſte cut their cables; they ſet up their ſails, they apply their oars, and ſtricken with a pannic terror, in great haſte they fled moſt confuſedly. Among them the Pretorian galleaſs floating upon the ſeas, her rudder being broken, in great danger and fear drew towards Calais, and ſticking in the ſand, was taken by Amias Preſton, Thomas Gerard, and Harvey; Hugh Moncada, the governor, was ſlain, the ſoldiers and mariners were either killed or drowned: in her there was found great ſtore of gold, which fell to be the prey of the Engliſh. The ſhip and ordnance went to the governor of Calais.

The Spaniards report, that the duke, when he ſaw the fiery ſhips coming, commanded all the fleet to pull up their anchors, but ſo as the danger being paſt, every ſhip might return again to his ſtation: and he himſelf returned, giving a ſign to the reſt, by ſhooting off a gun, which was heard but by a few; for they were far off ſcattered, ſome into the open ocean, ſome through fear were driven upon the ſhallows of the coaſt of Flanders.

Over againſt Graveling the Spaniſh fleet began to gather themſelves together; but upon them came Drake and Fenner, and battered them with great ordnance: to theſe Fenton, Southwell, Beeſton, Croſs, Riman, and preſently after the lord admiral, Thomas Howard, and Sheffield, came in and all joined together. The duke Medina, Leva, Oquenda, Ricaldus, and others, with much ado, getting themſelves out of the ſhallows, ſuſtained the Engliſh force as well as they might, until moſt of their ſhips were pierced and torn; the galeon Saint Matthew, governed by Diego Pimentellus, coming to aid Francis Toleton, being in the Saint Philip, was pierced and ſhaken with the reiterated ſhots of Seimor and Winter, and driven to Oſtend, and was at laſt taken by the Fluſhingers. The Saint Philip came to the like end; ſo did the galeon of Biſcay, and divers others.

The laſt day of this month, the Spaniſh fleet ſtriving to recover the ſtraights again, were driven toward Zealand. The Engliſh left off purſuing them, as the Spaniards thought, becauſe they ſaw them in a manner caſt away: for they could not avoid the ſhallows of Zealand. But the wind turning, they got them out of the ſhallows, and then began to conſult what were beſt for them to do. By common conſent they reſolved to return into Spain by the northern ſeas, for they wanted many neceſſaries, eſpecially ſhot, their ſhips were torn, and they had no hope that the duke of Parma could bring forth his forces. And ſo they took the ſea, and followed the courſe toward the north. The Engliſh navy followed, and ſometimes the Spaniards turned upon the Engliſh, inſomuch that it was thought by many that they would turn back again.

Queen Elizabeth cauſed an army to encamp at Tilbury, a place by the ſea ſide, upon the river of Thames. After the army was come thither, her majeſty, to ſhew her own courage, and for the comfort of her people, went in perſon to viſit the camp, which then lay between the city of London and the ſea, under the charge of the earl of Leiceſter; where placing herſelf between the enemy and her city, ſhe viewed the army, paſſing thro' it divers times, and lodging in the borders of it, returned again, and dined in the army. Firſt viewing from place to place the people as they were by their countries lodged and quartered by their ſeveral camps. Afterwards, when they were reduced into battle, prepared as it were for fight, ſhe rode round about with a leader's ſtaff in her hand, only accompanied with the general, and three or four others attending upon her: but yet to ſhew her ſtate (I well marked it) ſhe had the ſword carried before her by the earl of Ormond. There ſhe was ſaluted with ſhouts, with all tokens of love, obedience, and readineſs to fight for her, as the like had ſeldom been ſeen in any army. All which tended to ſhew a marvellous concord, and mutual love between a queen and her ſubjects, which ſhe requited with very princely thanks.——I could enlarge the deſcription hereof with many more particulars of mine own obſervation (ſays the author) for I wandered, as many others did, from place to place all the day, and never heard a word ſpoke of her, but in praiſing her for her ſtately perſon and princely behaviour, in praying for her long life, and earneſtly deſiring to venture their lives for her ſafety. In her preſence they ſung pſalms of praiſe to Almighty God, for which ſhe greatly commended them, and devoutly praiſed God with them. This that I write, you may be ſure I do not with any comfort, but to give you theſe manifeſt arguments, that neither this queen doth diſcontent her people, nor her people do ſhew any diſcontent in any thing they be commanded to do for her ſervice, as heretofore hath been imagined.

This account was related by a Popiſh ſpy, in a letter written here in England to Mendea. The copy of which letter was found upon Richard Leigh a ſeminary prieſt, in French and Engliſh: which prieſt was executed for high treaſon whilſt the Spaniſh Armada was on the ſea.

The ſame day wherein the laſt fight was, the duke of Parma, after his vows offered to the lady of Halla, came ſomewhat late to Dunkirk, and was received with opprobrious words by the Spaniards, as if in favour of queen Elizabeth he had ſlipped the faireſt opportunity that could be to do the ſervice. He, to make ſome ſatisfaction, puniſhed the purveyors that had not made proviſion of beer, bread, &c. which was not yet ready nor imbarked, ſecretly ſmiling at the inſolence of the Spaniards, when he heard them glorying, that what way ſoever they came upon England, they would have undoubted victory; that the Engliſh were not able to endure the ſight of them. Bernardinus Mendoza did indeed by books in France ſing a fooliſh and triumphant ſong before the victory. The Engliſh admiral appointed Seimor and the Hollanders to watch upon the coaſt of Flanders, that the duke of Parma ſhould not come out: himſelf followed the Spaniards upon their backs, until they were paſt Edinborough Frith.

The Spaniards ſeeing all hopes fail, fled amain; and ſo this great navy, being three years preparing, with great coſt, was within a month overthrown, and after many were killed, being chaſed away, was driven about all Britain by Scotland, Orcades, Ireland, toſſed and ſhaken with tempeſts, and much leſſened, and went home without glory. There were not an hundren men of the Engliſh loſt, and but one ſhip. Whereupon money was coined with a navy fleeting away at full ſail, and this inſcription, Venit, Vidit, Fugit. Others were coined with the ſhips fired, the navy confounded, in honour of the queen, inſcribed, Dux Fœmina Facti. As they fled, it is certain that many of their ſhips were caſt away upon the ſhores of Scotland and Ireland. Above ſeven hundred ſoldiers and mariners were caſt upon the Scotiſh ſhore, who at the duke of Parma's interceſſion with the Scots king, the queen of England conſenting, were after a year ſent into Flanders. But they that were caſt upon the Iriſh ſhore came to more miſerable fortunes; for ſome were killed by the wild Iriſh, and others were deſtroyed for fear they ſhould join themſelves with the wild Iriſh (which cruelty queen Elizabeth much condemned) and the reſt being afraid, ſick and hungery, with their torn ſhips, committed themſelves to the ſea, and many were drowned.

The queen came to public thankſgiving in St. Paul's church, accompanied with a glorious train of nobility through the ſtreets of London, which were hung with blue cloth: the companies ſtanding on both ſides in their liveries: the banners that were taken from the enemies were ſpread: ſhe heard the ſermon, and public thanks was rendered unto God with great joy. This public joy was augmented when Sir Robert Sidney, returning out of Scotland, brought from the king aſſurance of his noble mind and affection to the queen, and to religion; which as in ſincerity he had eſtabliſhed, ſo he purpoſed to maintain with all his power. Sir Robert Sidney was ſent to him when the Spaniſh fleet was coming, to congratulate and to give him thanks for his propenſe affection towards the maintenance of the common cauſe; and to declare how ready ſhe would be to help him if the Spaniard ſhould land in Scotland; and that he might recal to memory with what ſtrange ambition the Spaniard had gaped for all Britain, urging the pope to excommunicate him, to the end that he might be thruſt from the kingdom of Scotland, and from the ſucceſſion in England: and to give him notice of the threatening of Mendoza, and the pope's nuncio, who threatened his ruin if they could work it; and therefore warned him to take ſpecial heed to the Scotiſh papiſts.

The king pleaſantly anſwered, That he looked for no other benefit from the Spaniard, than that which Polyphemus promiſed to Ulyſſes, to devour him laſt after his fellows were devoured.

A Relation of the Diſcovery of the Gunpowder Treaſon, in the Year 1605, in the Reign of King James I.

WHILST every thing ſeemed to procure king James a quiet and peaceable reign, the devil envying the happineſs of the Engliſh, inſpired ſome of his agents with one of the moſt horrible plots that ever was heard of. I mean the gun-powder treaſon plot, which has made ſo much noiſe in the world, and of which I ſhall relate the particulars without any aggravation.

The chief perſons concerned in this helliſh contrivance were, Robert Cateſby, a gentleman of Northamptonſhire; Thomas Percy, the earl of Northumberland's couſin, John Grant, Ambroſe Rookwood, John and Chriſtopher Wright, Francis Treſham, Guy Fawkes, Sir Everard Digby, Robert and Thomas Winter, Thomas Bates, and Robert Keyes: ſome of theſe conſulting together how they might reſtore the popiſh religion in England, Percy one of the moſt zealous, purpoſed to kill the king, and offered to perform it himſelf. To which Cateſby anſwered, That if the king was taken off, there were ſtill two young princes and the princeſs, with the greateſt part of the nobility and gentry, devoted to the proteſtant religion; and unleſs theſe were involved in the ſame fate with the king, they ſhould render their condition rather worſe than better, by attempting his majeſty's life only: He propoſed therefore the blowing up the king, queen, and prince, with both the houſes of lords and commons, at the next aſſembly of the parliament, when the king ſhould come to the houſe, and make his ſpeech there, at the opening of it; which being approved by the reſt as a moſt glorious undertaking, it was reſolved to put it in execution; only ſome, ſcrupling the lawfulneſs of committing ſo terrible a ſlaughter on a religious account, they agreed, before they proceeded in it, to demand the opinion of their confeſſors; whereupon Henry Garnet, the ſuperior, with Oſwald Teſmond and John Gerard, two other prieſts of the Jeſuits order, were conſulted; who did not only declare the enterpriſe lawful, but applauded the deſign as juſt, and even pious; ſince it was to be executed upon excommunicated heretics.

Then an oath of ſecrecy was taken by the conſpirators; and maſs being celebrated by Gerard, they alſo took the ſacrament to be true to each other, and promote the plot with all their powers: After which, Percy took a houſe adjoining to the houſe of lords, from whence they propoſed to dig a mine under it, which would contain a ſufficient quantity of gun-powder to blow up the whole building; and they began to work on their mine about Chriſtmas 1604. But the parliament being prorogued firſt to February, then to October, and again to the fifth of November 1605, they had time enough, or rather too much, to effect their deſign, though they were obliged to dig through the foundation of a very thick wall. When the conſpirators had almoſt conquered this difficulty, they were ſurpriſed to hear a noiſe and the talking of people near the place where they were at work, and began to conclude they were diſcovered; but ſending out Guy Fawkes for intelligence, he brought them word, that the voices he had heard were in an adjoining cellar, where coals were expoſed to ſale: that it was exactly under the houſe of lords, and now offered to be let: Whereupon Percy went immediately and hired it, putting thirty-ſix barrels of gun-powder into it, which he imported from Holland, and covered them with coals and faggots.

Having made this proviſion for their grand deſign, it was conſidered, that though the king and prince might be taken off by this means, yet the duke of York and the princeſs Elizabeth would be out of their power; and conſequently the ſucceſs of their enterprize muſt ſtill be very doubtful: But Percy, being one of the band of penſioners, and well acquainted with the palace, undertook to ſecure the duke of York; and it was looked upon as no difficult matter to ſurprize the princeſs, who reſided at the lord Harrington's in Warwickſhire, under a pretence of a hunting-match. It was next conſidered what money and horſes they could raiſe towards effecting their purpoſe: Whereupon Digby promiſed fifteen hundred pounds, Treſham two hundred, Percy the rents of Northumberland, which he was empowered to receive, and computed they would amount to four thouſand pound. He alſo ingaged to provide ten horſes from the ſame quarter; and the reſt of the conſpirators promiſed to raiſe what money and troops they could, that they might be able to make a ſtand, and encourage their friends to take arms in defence of their religion, when the great blow was given. It was debated alſo, whether they ſhould require the aſſiſtance of any princes of their communion; but it was thought proper to defer this till after the fact was committed, leſt the plot ſhould be diſcovered by being communicated to too many. And it was reſolved to proclaim the princeſs Elizabeth queen, when they had aſſembled their troops, a proclamation being drawn up with this view, in which they made no mention of the intended alteration of religion: this being agreed to be deferred till their forces ſhould be joined by ſome of the catholic powers. In the mean time, they reſolved to charge the Puritans with the deſtruction that was intended: And it is ſuppoſed, they deſigned to aſſaſſinate the duke of York, by their promiſing to proclaim the prineeſs Elizabeth.

Thus had the conſpirators formed their ſcheme, and proceeded ſo far in the execution of it, that there remained little more for them to do, than to ſet fire to the train they had laid for blowing up the king, the queen, the prince, the nobility, and the repreſentatives of a great and flouriſhing people. When, on a ſudden, an unaccountable fit of tenderneſs ſeized one of theſe mercileſs wretches, who, by his endeavouring to reſcue a friend from this unparalled deſtruction, diſcovered the deep laid deſign, which Lucifer only could be the contriver of. This diſcovery was made by the following letter, ſent to the lord Monteagle by one of the conſpirators, about ten days before the meeting of the parliament, viz.

" My Lord,

OUT of the love I bear to ſome of your friends, I have regard to your preſervation; therefore would adviſe you, as you tender your life, to invent ſome excuſe to ſhift off your attendance at this parliament; for God and man have concurred to puniſh the wickedneſs of this time. Think not ſlightingly of this advertiſement, but retire yourſelf into the country, where you may expect the event in ſafety; for though there be no appearance of any ſtir, yet, I ſay, they ſhall receive a terrible blow in this parliament, and ſhall not ſee who hurt them. This council is not to be contemned, becauſe it may do you good, and can do you no harm, for the danger is paſt, as ſoon as you have burnt the letter: and I hope God will give you the grace to make good uſe of it: to whoſe holy protection I commit you."

This

This lord carried the letter, the ſame evening he received it, to ſecretary Cecil; who communicated it to ſome other members of the council: but they did not think it of that conſequence, to make any enquiries about the matter, till the king ſhould return from Royſton, whither he was gone to hunt, and did not return till the laſt day of October. The next day this letter was ſhewn to his majeſty; who, upon peruſing it, ſaid, He did not think it was to be contemned. To which Cecil anſwered, He was of opinion, that it was written either by a fool or a madman, by that expreſſion in it, "The danger is paſt, as ſoon as you have burnt the letter." For he obſerved, the warning given by it could be of no uſe, if the burning the letter would remove the danger. But the king interpreted it, That the danger would be over in as little time as he could burn the letter; having great regard to that paſſage, "They ſhould receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet ſhould not ſee who hurt them." Which ſudden blow, he apprehended, would be the effect of gunpowder; and therefore ordered the cellars, and all other places near the parliament-houſe, to be ſearched. The earl of Suffolk, who was then lord-chamberlain, and whoſe proper buſineſs it was to ſee all places prepared for the king's reception, put off the ſearch till the day before the parliament was to meet; and then, taking the lord Monteagle with him, viewed all the rooms about the parliament-houſe, and particularly the cellar under the houſe of lords; which he found full of wood and coals. And having aſked, who it belonged to? was anſwered, to Mr. Percy; who being a ſervant of his majeſty, and one who made ſome figure at court, the earl returned, and acquainted the king in what ſtate he found things, without ſearching further. But the king's ſuſpicion being rather increaſed than diminiſhed by this report, he ordered all the wood and coals in the cellar, already mentioned, to be removed forthwith; and Sir Thomas Knevet, a juſtice of peace of Weſtminſter, and gentleman of the privy-chamber, was ordered to ſee it done, though it was then late at night. This gentleman was ſo fortunate, as to diſcover the thirty-ſix barrels of powder hidden under the coals; he found alſo a man ſtanding near the place, booted and ſpurred, with his cloak on, whom he ſearched, and found upon him a dark-lanthorn and three matches. This perſon proved to be Guy Fawkes, one of the conſpirators, who paſſed for Percy's man; who ſeeing their hopeful plot diſappointed, ſwore, when he was apprehended, that had he been found within the cellar, he would have blown up himſelf, and all of them. This diſcovery being made, the ſecretary and the lord-chamberlain immediately acquainted the king with it, who was then in bed; and the priſoner, being examined before the council, was ſo far from being in any conſternation, that he acknowledged the villainous deſign, took it all upon himſelf, ſaid his religion and conſcience prompted him to it, and would name none of his accomplices; only obſerved, That the devil had betrayed a very good deſign, and that there was no crime in deſtroying an heretical king. However, being carried to the Tower the next day, and threatened with the rack, he confeſſed the conſpiracy, and named his accomplices; who having ſome intimation of the diſcovery, fled into Warwickſhire; where ſome of his friends were preparing to riſe in arms, and ſurpriſe the princeſs Elizabeth, according to the ſcheme they had laid; and they actually had broke open a ſtable of one Benock, and ſeized ſeven or eight managed horſes for their purpoſe: but underſtanding by their friends who fled from London, that the enterprize was entirely defeated, they aſſembled about an hundred horſe, and endeavoured to perſuade their brethren the papiſts, to take arms in the defence of their religion: but no-body joining them they fled, and were purſued by Sir Foulk Grevill, deputy-lieutenant of Warwickſhire, and the ſheriffs of that and the neighbouring counties, till the rebels took ſhelter at a houſe called Holbach, in Staffordſhire. Here they endeavoured to defend themſelves, when a ſpark of fire falling into a parcel of gun-powder, which they were drying by the fire, blew up part of the houſe; whereupon they endeavoured to ſally out of the gate, and make their way with their ſwords in their hands, but were repulſed; Cateſby, Percy and Winter, ſetting themſelves back to back, reſolved to die fighting. The two firſt had their deſire, but Winter was wounded and taken: Digby, Rookwood, Grant and Boter ſurrendered, and Treſham, Robert Winter, and Littleton, were apprehended at their lodgings at London, and all of them committed to the Tower.

Thomas Winter, upon his examination, confeſſed the whole conſpiracy, and acknowledged their crimes too great to be forgiven; while Digby, on the other hand, ſaid, they were provoked to this deſperate attempt by the ſevere uſage they met with from the government, after hopes had been given them of a toleration; and Treſham, in his examination, accuſed Garnet the Jeſuit as privy to the conſpiracy, though he afterwards retracted it, and pretended he had not ſeen Garnet in ſixteen years.

And thus theſe reſolute and high aſpiring papiſts, who dreamed of no leſs than the deſtruction of king and kingdoms, promiſed to themſelves no lower eſtate than the government of great and ancient monarchies, were miſerably defeated, and quite overthrown in an inſtant; falling in the pit which they had prepared for others, and ſo fulfilling that ſentence which his majeſty did in a manner propheſy of them in his oration to the parliament; ſome immediately ſlain, others wounded, and ſtripped of their cloaths, left lying miſerably naked, and ſo died rather by cold than by their wounds; and the reſt, that either were whole, or but ſlightly wounded, were taken and led by the ſheriff, the ordinary miniſter of juſtice, to the goal, the ordinary place even of the baſeſt malefactors, where they remained till they were ſent up to London, being met by an huge confluence of all ſorts of people, deſirous to ſee them as the rareſt ſort of monſters; fools to laugh at them, women and children to wonder, all the common people to gaze, the wiſer ſort to ſatisfy their curioſity in ſeeing the outward caſes of ſo unparalleled a villany, and generally all ſorts of people to gratify their eyes with the ſight of thoſe whom in their hearts they deteſted: ſerving ſo for a fearful and public ſpectacle of God's fierce wrath and juſt indignation.

The Troubles and Perſecution of Bartholomew Copin, Martyr of Chriſt.

IN the year 1601, Bartholomew Copin of the valley of Luſerne, reſorted unto a place called Aſt in Piedmont, with certain merchandiſe, purpoſing to vend the ſame at a fair there, which was to be kept the day following. It ſo fell out, that ſitting at ſupper in the evening with ſundry other merchants, one amongſt the reſt began to uſe ſome ſpeech about the diverſities of religions, and therewithal ſpake ſomething tending to the diſgrace of thoſe of the vallies of Angrougne and the neighbouring villages.

Copin hearing ſuch ſpeeches caſt forth againſt his brethren, as he little expected from men of that ſort, and alſo againſt their religion, all which tended to the diſhonour of God; he feared leſt it ſhould be offenſively taken, if he ſhould not make ſome reply unto thoſe blaſphemies which he heard with his ears, and ſo anſwer him who held ſuch a diſcourſe againſt the religion which himſelf profeſſed. He who reproved Copin, aſked, Are you one of Vaudois? He anſwered, Yes, I am. And what what, ſaid the other, believe you not that God is in the hoſt? No, ſaid Copin. Oh, ſaid the other, ſee how falſe your religion is? My religion, ſaid Copin, is no leſs true than God is God, and as certain as I am ſure to die.

The next day Copin was called before the biſhop of Aſt, who told him that report had been made to him of ſome offenſive ſpeeches which he had uſed the night paſt in his lodging: and therefore it behoved him now to acknowledge his fault, if he meant to obtain pardon for the ſame, otherwiſe he muſt look to be chaſtiſed according to his demerits.

Copin anſwered, he had uttered nothing but that which he was firſt provided to ſpeak; nor had he ſaid ought but what he was reſolved to maintain to the hazard of his life. He affirmed that God had beſtowed upon him ſome worldly goods, as alſo a wife and children, but that he was not ſo glued in his affection to any of them, but he could be content to forego them all rather than the peace of a good conſcience.

As touching his carriage and behaviour, if it pleaſed him, he ſaid, to make enquiry thereof among the merchants of Aſt, they could all reſolve him as touching his honeſt dealing: who alſo he knew would witneſs with him, that he had wronged none in all that he had converſed among them. And inaſmuch as he was a merchant trafficking in and about his lawful calling, he ought to be diſmiſſed, and to be no further moleſted. For if it were lawful for Jews and Turks to trade in fairs and markets, and to uſe commerce throughout Piedmont; that favour ought much more to be permitted him who was a chriſtian. And as touching the matter of religion, whereabout he was accuſed, he meddled not at all therewith for his own particular, but had queſtions propounded to him concerning the ſame by others: in which regard leave was granted to him to anſwer, and to yield a reaſon of his faith in any place, to any whomſoever they were that ſhould aſk what he thought of the ſame: yea a liberty was granted even by his excellency to thoſe of the valleys of Vaudois to anſwer any man to a queſtion demanded, provided that he proceeded not to teach and inſtruct others.

The biſhop regarded none of theſe allegations, but commanded he ſhould be put into priſon. The next day the biſhop's ſecretary came to viſit Copin, teſtifying how much good will he bore him; adviſing him as a friend, that if he acknowledged not his fault, he was in great danger of his life.

Copin anſwered, that his life was in the hands of God, and that he would never ſeek to ſave it to the prejudice of God's glory: alſo that he had not above two or three turns to fetch here in this world before he arrived in heaven; and therefore prayed God ſo to aſſiſt him by his grace, that he might never leave the ſtrait way which leadeth thereto.

A few days after he was examined by a monk, who was an inquiſitor, in the preſence of the biſhop, who vexed him a long while with his ſugared diſcourſe, and by fair words endeavoured to draw him to abjure his religion. But Copin reſiſted him ſtill by the holy ſcriptures, ſhewing that if he ſhould now be aſhamed of Chriſt, and deny him, Chriſt might juſtly be aſhamed of him, and utterly deny him before his heavenly Father.

The monk finiſhed his diſpute with this dogged farewel, "Away, thou curſed Lutheran, thou ſhalt go to all the devils in hell; and when thou comeſt to be tormented among thoſe unclean ſpirits, then wilt thou remember theſe holy admonitions which we have tendered unto thee for the ſaving of thy ſoul, but thou hadſt rather go to hell, than to reconcile thyſelf to thy holy mother the church." To which Copin anſwered, It is not long ſince I was reconciled to the true church.

After many violent aſſaults, they gave leave for his wife to come unto him, and with her one of his ſons, promiſing them to ſet him at liberty to go home with them, if he would make amends for his fault, by acknowledging the ſame. His wife and ſon ſtaid to ſupper with him in priſon: during which time he uſed many exhortations tending to patience; albeit the wife ſhould depart to her houſe without an huſband, or the child without his father: For be you well aſſured, ſaid he, that God will be a better huſband and father unto you than ever I was or can be. For his own part, he ſaid, he was not bound to love wife or children more than Chriſt: beſides, they had cauſe to rejoice, and to think him happy, that God would honour him ſo far as to bear witneſs of his truth with the loſs of his life, and hoped, he ſaid, that God would be ſo favourable to him, as to ſupport him under any torments he was to endure for his glory's ſake.

In concluſion, he committed his ſon and daughter to his wife's care, which God had given them in holy wedlock, charging her again and again, to ſee them brought up virtuouſly and in the fear of God. He charged his ſon to obey his mother, ſo ſhould he be made partaker of the promiſed bleſſing. He intreated them both to pray for him, that God would fortify him againſt all temptations. And thus having bleſſed his ſon, and taken leave of his wife, they were conducted out of the priſon, and he ſhut up as he was before.

The woman and her ſon were diſſolved into tears, ſighing and crying out, that it would have moved the ſtonieſt heart to compaſſion: but this holy man not contenting himſelf with what he had ſaid to them by word of mouth, writ unto his wife this following letter, the original whereof ſhe hath exhibited to us, written and ſigned with the hand of the ſaid Copin, the inſcription thus:

To my well-beloved Wife, Suſanna Copin, from the Tower of Luſerna.

DEAR yoke-fellow, I received much conſolation by your coming to this place, and by ſo much the more as it were beyond my expectation; and I ſuppoſe you alſo were not a little comforted that you had ſuch an opportunity offered you, as to ſup with me the laſt night, being Saturday the 15th of September 1601. I know not well what they aimed at in permitting you ſo to do. But God ordereth all theſe things. But as far as I can gueſs, it ſhall be the laſt time that ever we ſhall ſup together in this life: and therefore pray to God that he will not ceaſe to be a comfort unto you. Truſt you ſtill in him, for he hath promiſed never to leave nor forſake them that put their truſt in him. God hath endued you with wiſdom, govern your own family in ſuch manner, that our children Samuel and Martha may be obedient unto you: whom in the name and authority of God I command that they obey you, for ſo the bleſſing of Almighty God ſhall light upon them.

Dear wife, be not over penſive for me; for if God hath ordained me now to attain unto the end of my race, and that I muſt render into the hands of the Almighty my ſoul, which ſo long time he hath lent me, my hope is, that of his holy and divine mercy he will receive it into his kingdom, for his own beloved Son's ſake Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, through whom I believe that my ſins are forgiven, for the only merit of his holy death and paſſion. Alſo my prayer is, that he will aſſiſt me by the power of his Holy Spirit unto my laſt breath.

Be fervent in prayer, and in all other parts of God's worſhip and ſervice, for this is the way to true bleſſedneſs. Take no care about ſending any thing unto me for theſe three weeks, and then I pray you ſend me ſome money, if you think good, to give the goaler, and ſomewhat more for mine own neceſſaries, if pleaſe God I live ſo long. Alſo I pray you call to mind what I have often told you, namely, how God prolonged Hezekiah's life for fifteen years. But he hath preſerved my life much longer; for it is many years ago ſince you ſaw me at the point of death, and through God's goodneſs I am alive; and I hope, yea I am aſſured, that he will ſo long preſerve me as ſhall be for his glory and my good, thro' his eternal goodneſs.

From the priſon of Aſt, Sept. 16, 1601.

The biſhop of Aſt was ſomewhat troubled about this priſoner; for if he had let him go, he feared it would breed ſome ſcandal, and many might thereby be emboldened to open their mouths wide againſt the Roman religion. Beſides, there was a clauſe in the contract made between his excellency and the people of Vaudois, which exempted thoſe of the religion from offence, in theſe words: and if it ſhall fall out that they be aſked or queſtioned withal in Piedmont, about the cauſe of religion, by any of his excellency's ſubjects, it ſhall be lawful for thoſe of the ſaid religion to anſwer without ſuffering any penal or perſonal puniſhment for the ſame.

Now Copin had a queſtion put to him, in which reſpect he ought to have been cleared. But the biſhop would by no means hear that he had unjuſtly impriſoned him; and therefore that his death ſhould not be laid to his charge, nor yet that he ſhould be ſent away abſolved, he ſent the cauſe of his indictment to pope Clement the eighth, to know what ſhould be done with him. We cannot learn what anſwer the pope returned to the biſhop; but not long after this good man was found dead in priſon, not without ſome apparent ſuſpicion of his being ſtrangled there; leſt if they had executed him in public, the people ſhould have been edified by his conſtancy.

Being dead, he was condemned to be burned, and therefore having cauſed him to be brought out of priſon, they read his ſentence openly, and the body was caſt into the fire.

The Death of Henry III. King of France.

A Friar of the order of Saint Dominick, pretended he had matters of great conſequence to impart to the king; who being admitted into his preſence, upon his knees preſented a letter to him, which he drew out of one ſleeve; which whilſt the king attentively read, the friar pulled forth a poiſoned knife out of his other ſleeve, wherewith he ſtabbed the king into the lower part of his belly. The king finding himſelf wounded, ſnatched out the knife, and ſtruck it into the friar's eye, who haſtening to get away, the king cry'd out. His lords and gentlemen perceiving what the friar had done, ſlew him immediately with rapiers and ſwords.

A Narration of a Bloody Maſſacre in the Valtoline, in the Year 1620.

THE beginning of the murders were at Tyrane. The ringleaders of this cruel maſſacre gave orders, that all the ways and paſſages ſhould be well guarded, that their bloody deſigns might not be ſo readily diſcovered, and they leſs troubled in the execution. Then about ſix of the clock in the night, they entered the country like ſo many foaming wild boars, and cauſed four muſkets to be diſcharged before the palace of the Seignior Podeſta, the principal magiſtrate of the place, and rung the great bell of Tyrane; upon which ſignal all the inhabitants of that vicinity took the alarm, and made head towards the ſaid houſe. They gave orders to break the bridges which lay towards Bruce, and on the place they planted a ſtrong guard, and this was done before day. Upon the dawning of the day the bells began to ring another peal at Matello, and then theſe traitors began to range themſelves together. The proteſtants, who without fear or ſuſpicion came out of their houſes to ſee what the matter was, were ſuddenly ſhot in the place. Others by force entered into the houſes of proteſtants, drew them out of their beds, and without any compaſſion ſlew all they could meet with.

One poor gentleman hid himſelf in a garret, but the villains finding him, threw him out of the window; and when they found him yet alive, they diſpatched him with a piece of timber.

Antonio de Salva, a chancellor in that valley, being appointed judge upon criminal cauſes, a man of the greateſt authority in the place, being deſirous to ſave himſelf, together with his deputy, was drawn out of the houſe, and ſhot.

Another gentleman of great worth, very ſingularly learned, and ſkilful in many languages, being at that time governor of Teglio, being by chance in this hurly burly at Tyrane, was alſo with his ſervant ſtrangled to death in the chamber where he was found.

The reverend paſtor of the church of Tyrane, a man of great ſanctity and wiſdom, and a lover of the peace of the country, hearing the noiſe of theſe uproars, he and the paſtor of Mello withdrew themſelves into a hall, where having commended their ſouls to God, were there murdered.

The furious wretches cut off Baſſo's head, and carry'd it into the church, and fixed it upon a pole in the pulpit where he was wont to preach, ſcornfully ſaying, Come down, Baſſo, thou haſt preached long enough already.

In like manner at the ſame time the palace of the chequer of Tyrane was beſieged by thoſe hell-hounds; wherein dwelt Seignior John de Cappaul, being at that time governor. To which place Michael Lazarone, a man of good account, and chancellor of that office, had retired himſelf early in the morning to ſave his life. But becauſe he was extremely hated by the papiſts, for his ſingular piety and ſincerity, he was eſpecially purſued by them: inſomuch as thoſe rebels followed him even to the palace, threatening to ſet fire to the ſame, if he were not delivered into their hands. Lazarone ſeeing that, was forced that evening to leave the houſe, and hide himſelf about the banks of the river Adda, wherein he covered himſelf, and lay cloſe three whole hours, all naked, poor gentleman, to ſave himſelf. But his enemies followed him hotly, and at laſt found him, and dragged him out of the water; and though with tears in his eyes he begged for his life, in conſideration of his dear ſmall children; but they anſwered, That this was no time for pity and favour: but if he would ſwear by the pope's bull, and abjure his faith, they would grant him his life. But he, with a courageous reſolution, anſwered, God forbid that I for love of this temporal life ſhould deny my Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who with his precious blood on the wood of the croſs did at ſo dear a rate redeem me, and after I have ſo long time, through his grace, freely and publicly confeſſed him, ſhould now hazard the loſs of eternal life; I ſay, God forbid. Upon this they immediately murdered him.

The very ſame evening the gate of the palace was burnt to the ground by thoſe rebels, who the next morning entered into the ſame, raging with fury, and took the governor priſoner with his young ſon, ſpoiling and ranſacking wives and maidens, and carrying away all they could lay hands on. The governor of the place was carry'd away priſoner, and after he had been a long time tugged to and fro, he was ſhot.

John Antonio Mazano, endeavouring to make reſiſtance againſt thoſe rebels, and his wife defending him, was with herſelf and two young children miſerably killed.

Another, called John Antonio Schloſſer, a Gardoneſe, having made long reſiſtance, and killed one of the rebels, was at the laſt taken, and tyed to a tree, and ſo ſhot to death.

To be ſhort, theſe villains had no regard to any perſon, neither young, nor old, nor weak, nor ſtrong, but all of all ſorts were either ſhot unto death, or cut in pieces, or in one manner or other deſtroyed; and the number of thoſe perſons in eſtimation, who in Tyrane received the crown of martyrdom for the profeſſion of the goſpel, was about ſixty.

The ladies who were not ſlain were conſtrained to change their religion, and at this day go to maſs, ſaving the wife of the ſaid Lazarone and her daughters, and her niece, being the wife of one Egido, who by the aſſiſtance of Almighty God continued in ſafety. And there alſo the 8th of Auguſt, the ſaid ladies were releaſed, who retired themſelves into Retia, viz. the wife of this Lazarone, and her two daughters, leaving behind them in the Valtoline one daughter and two young ſons, who cannot obtain leave to depart the country.

At the maſſacre of Teglio were murdered about ſixty perſons. Theſe wicked wretches, apparelled in red caſſocks, and well mounted on horſeback, marched in the morning to Tellat the hour when the ſermon was, and ran like ravening wolves to the Volta church; the proteſtants who were in the church, obſerving the evil intention of thoſe villains, aroſe ſuddenly from their ſeats, and endeavoured to ſhut the church door, and to barricado the place with the benches. They without laboured with all their power to enter the church: but not being able ſo ſpeedily to do it, ſome of them climbed up unto the windows, and diſcharged their muſkets among the people, without reſpect of any perſon, and killed many of them. At laſt they forced the door, entered, and ſlew all they found, ſaving a few, who promiſed to go to maſs. Some of the men and ladies with their children fled into the belfrey to ſave themſelves: but they ſet fire to the place, and burnt all that were within.

At the maſſacre at Sondres in the mountain of Sondrium and Malenk, were left dead above 140 perſons. But the chancellor Giovan Andrea Migardino, with his brother Gregory, and others of the church of Sondres, withdrew themſelves to the number of eighteen together, with certain ladies and their young children into their own houſe, which joined to the palace, and there they fortify'd themſelves with reſolution to defend themſelves even to the death, ſeeing that in the ſtreet wherein they dwelt none durſt come out of the doors, nor enter into the church which ſtood over-againſt them. Nevertheleſs, the enemy reſolved to ſet upon the houſe with a thouſand armed men, threatening alſo to kill the magiſtrate, in caſe any of them ſhould take any harm by thoſe who were in the houſe. Whereupon the magiſtrate commanded thoſe in the houſe to depart; who being well armed, immediately took their way by Sandres towards the bridge, where for a time they fortify'd themſelves; then returning again, they drew unto them certain others, and marched towards the church of the mountain of Sondres. In which place being gathered together with the paſtor, they made their prayers to God, and afterwards, to the number of threeſcore and thirteen perſons in all, they paſſed the valley of Malenco, which was beſet by the enemy on two ſides: but thoſe that kept thoſe places were by the providence of God ſo aſtoniſhed, that they fled away, and the proteſtants, though they were purſued to the tops of the hills, did miraculouſly eſcape with ſafety.

Annaidi Lita, wife of Anthoni Grotti, of Chio, in the territory of Vicentine, of an honourable and ancient houſe, was come out of Italy but a few years before for the liberty of her conſcience. She was firſt by them exhorted with fair words to change her religion; but ſhe conſtantly perſevering therein, was admoniſhed that ſhe would at leaſt have a care of her young infant which ſhe held in her arms, being about two months old; otherwiſe ſhe would make reckoning, that in the twinkling of an eye both ſhe and her babe ſhould die: but ſhe with a bold and undaunted courage anſwered, That ſhe had not departed out of Italy her native country, neither had ſhe forſaken all the eſtate ſhe had, to renounce at laſt that faith which had been inſpired into her by the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; yea, that ſhe would rather ſuffer, if it were poſſible, a thouſand deaths. And how, ſaid ſhe, ſhould I have regard in this cauſe of my infant, ſince God our heavenly Father ſpared not his only Son, my Lord Jeſus, but delivered him up to death for the love of me and of all ſinners? Then giving them the child, ſhe ſaid, Behold the child; the Lord God, who hath care of the birds of the air, will much more be able to ſave this poor creature, although by you it were abandoned, and left in thoſe wild mountains. So unlacing her gown, ſhe opened her breaſt, and ſaid, Here is the body which you have power to kill; but my ſoul, on which you have no power to lay hand, that I commend to my God; and immediately ſhe was cut in pieces, being 35 years old. The infant, becauſe it was a lovely and a ſweet babe to look on, was ſuffered to live, and was delivered to a popiſh woman to nurſe. The huſband of this gentlewoman was murdered for the faith before.

Some women were by force taken up to the tops of high and craggy mountains, and threatened to be thrown down headlong with their children, unleſs they would go to maſs. And although ſome being moved and terrified with the horror of death, had conſented to change their religion, yet were they murdered for all that without any pity at all.

The ſame befel a gentleman of Soglio, in the Pregaglia; for though his life was promiſed him, he was brought into the market-place pinioned with a cord, and miſerably ſlain by two muſketeers, being 72 years of age, after he had been robbed of his gold and ſilver, whereof great ſtore was found in his houſe, according to the common and too much practiſed rule of the Roman catholics.

An aged man of 67 years, was ſet upon an aſs, his face turned to the tail, which he held in his hand, inſtead of a bridle, and in his other hand a book, whom in this manner they carried through Sondres, with great joy and triumph. Then they cut off his ears, noſe, and cheeks, boring holes into divers parts of his body, with a ſtrange and unparalleled barbarity, until they had quite killed him; but he for the love of Chriſt his Saviour with great and incredible courage endured all thoſe varieties of torments.

An aged man of 75 years, being ſet upon by thoſe inhuman wretches, leaped out of a window, and paſſed the river Maleto, and having got to his houſe, and ſhifted his cloaths, he was aſſailed again, taken priſoner, and carried to the palace, put often to the ſtrapado, and at laſt was ſo hewn and ſliced with a ſword, that he had nothing left him but the arms which were faſtened to the cord.

Paulo Beretta, of Chio, in the county of Vicence, a virgin of the age of 75 years, of an honourable, noble, and ancient family, who came 27 years before to Sondres to embrace the goſpel, was by theſe villains carried thro' Sondres, with all diſgrace, ſhame, and ſcorn, having a mitre of paper put upon her head, her face beſmeared with dirt, and many buffets given in her cheeks, and in many other faſhions abuſed. Being required to call upon the holy virgin Mary and the ſaints, and to place her truſt in them; ſhe ſmiling readily anſwered them, My truſt and my ſalvation is in my only Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and in him only will I reſt. And it is alſo true, that I acknowledge the the virgin Mary for the moſt holy virgin above all others which ever was, or ever will be; who was a virgin before the birth, a virgin in the birth, and after birth, and ſo ſhall remain. Who though ſhe be favoured and beloved of God, above all women in the world, to be made the mother of my Lord Jeſus, the Saviour of the world; nevertheleſs, becauſe ſhe is not able to know our neceſſities, as not being omnipotent (for otherwiſe ſhe would be God himſelf) and beſides hath had need of the merits of her Son, it was not lawful for her to call upon any other than the eternal God, who knoweth all things, and upon no creature of any quality whatſoever, &c. In this manner ſhe endured the ſcorns and outrages with an incredible conſtancy and cheerfulneſs, ſaying continually, I do willingly endure as becometh me to do, deſiring no better uſage, ſince the very ſame hath been done to my Lord and Saviour Jeſus, and to his apoſtles, and to thouſands of the holy martyrs. At laſt ſhe was carried away to be ſent to Milan. On the 28th of July an elderly woman was found murdered in the highway in the plain of St. Gregory in the Valtoline, which ſome conjectured to be the body of this gentlewoman, who it was thought was murdered by the aſſaſſins in that place.

Many hid themſelves in holes and caves, and woods, out of which they durſt not come but by night only to get ſome food, and that with great fear and terror of the watching enemy; others for want of convenient food to eat, and others that fed only upon roots, leaves, and graſs, made an end of their lives; and many were murdered in divers places, who had no burial; ſo as many carcaſes were to be ſeen in groves and woods, in the mountains, and in waters in many places.

At the maſſacre of Berbenno were ſlain about eleven perſons. And likewiſe

At Caſpano and Trahorn about the ſame number; one of them was by his trade a taylor, who being diſcovered by his countrymen and kindred, was taken and carried to Morbegnio, and being ſolicited to forſake the true religion, and to embrace the Roman, and ſtanding with great manfulneſs thereto, was condemned to the fire, and was placed between two heaps of wood, to make him recant; but all was in vain; for being aſked if he were a catholic, he anſwered, that he was. Then, if he were a Roman catholic; he likewiſe affirmed, he was ſo. But being demanded if he held the Roman faith as it is at this day, he anſwered, No. It is true, ſaid he, that I hold the ancient catholic Roman faith, which was preached by St. Paul, That a man is ſaved by grace by the means of faith, and not by works, leſt any man ſhould boaſt. Being demanded, if he believed the pope to be the head of the church, he anſwered, No; becauſe Chriſt only is the head of the church, according to the promiſe, "I will be with you unto the end of the world." And tho' the fire was kindled, and put out again, on purpoſe to draw him to a recantation, nevertheleſs he perſevered, and endured that cruel death with admirable conſtancy, the 15th of Auguſt, being ſixty years old.

Giovan Pietro Malacrida, altho' he were little of ſtature, yet was he great and mighty in the confeſſion of the truth, inſomuch that for the love of his Saviour, he ſuffered death with ſingular cheerfulneſs, being forty years of age. His example was devoutly and conſtantly imitated by Elizabeth his wife, who was killed in the 38th year of her age; and moreover theſe Herodian murderers not therewith content, but joining one barbarous inhumanity to another, obſerving a daughter of hers, being an infant of three years old, to lie in the cradle, although it was a child of ſweet countenance, and theſe wretches ſeeing that the babe looked lovingly and pleaſantly upon them, which would have been enough to have moved any admantine heart to compaſſion, yet notwithſtanding they took this pretty innocent babe by the feet, and daſhed her brains againſt the wall.

Upon the moſt ſerious conſideration it every way appeareth, that the foreſaid perſons underwent thoſe ſufferings for no other cauſe, but only for the truth of the goſpel! even as by the eternal decree of God the holy prophets, St. John the Baptiſt, the holy apoſtles, yea even our Lord Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, and after him thoſe many millions of the martyrs in all ages have done before, and eſpecially in theſe miſerable laſt times, in Germany, France, England, Scotland, Low-Countries, Bohemia, Italy, Spain, Portugal, &c.

Which martyrdom they endured willingly, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to ſuffer blame for the name of Jeſus, remembering the promiſe of our Lord, Bleſſed are they who are perſecuted for righteouſneſs ſake, becauſe the kingdom of heaven is theirs. Bleſſed are you when others ſhall revile and perſecute you, and ſhall falſely ſpeak all evil of you for my ſake: Rejoice and triumph, for your reward is great in heaven, for ſo have they perſecuted the prophets who were before you. Read to this purpoſe, 1 Pet. 4. verſes 12, 13, 14, 15, 16. which words of all good chriſtians are to be well pondered and weighed: for firſt by ſuch trial we periſh not. Secondly, we are thereby made conformable to Chriſt our head. Thirdly, ſuch ſufferings cauſe unto us greater joy than ſorrow. Fourthly, they are infallible marks that the Spirit of God reſts upon us. Fifthly, they manifeſt to all our unfeigned love to Chriſt and his goſpel. Sixthly, hereby we have good proof that the Lord doth correct us, not as a ſevere judge, but as a moſt loving and tender-hearted Father: to whom therefore with his Bleſſed Son, and Holy Spirit, be all glory and honour aſcribed in all the churches of the ſaints, world without end, Amen.
